On the north side of the hill Gaash.] So called, as the Jews fable, because it trembled and quaked, at the burial of Joshua, whose death the people did not enough bewail. Which fancy, it is likely, came into their head, because there is no mention here of any days of mourning for him, as there were for Aaron and Moses. In which St. Jerome and other of the fathers think there is a mystery; viz. that under the law, when the kingdom of heaven was not yet opened, they had reason to mourn and weep for the death of their friends; but under the gospel, wherein is revealed by the Lord Jesus (of whom Joshua was a figure) the wonderful love of God to men, &c. there is no reason for mourning and lamentation, but rather for rejoicing.

Of this hill, see Const. L'Empereur upon Benjamin's Itinerarium, who calls Montpelier by this name of Har-Gaash, the trembling hill, p. 142, 143.

Ver. 31. And Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua.] No idolatry appeared among them publicly while he lived, (whatsoever private superstition might be practised, ver. 14. 23.) for all that wicked generation which came out of Egypt (except the younger sort) were consumed in the wilderness, before Joshua took the conduct of them. And God kept them there so many years, as wasted them also, for this reason, among others, that they might forget the idolatrous custom of Egypt, unto which it early appeared, by their making the golden calf, they were strongly inclined. Thus St. Chrysostom discourses: (lib. i. advers. Vitæ Monast. vituper.) God, saith he, that the children of Israel might unlearn the evil customs of Egypt, brought them καταμόνας ἐπὶ τῆς ἐρημίας, to lead a solitary life in the wilderness, forming their minds, as in a monastery, far from those who had corrupted them. And he destroyed there all the elder sort, that none might enter into Palestine, but they who had not seen the superstitious impieties of the Egyptians, καὶ μηδένα διδάσκαλον ἔχειν τῆς τοσαύτης πονηρίας, and that they might have no master left among them to teach them such kind of wickedness.

And all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua, and which had seen all the works of the Lord, that he had done for Israel.] These elders had been chosen by Moses, who knew them to be men of great piety; that had not only seen, but observed and kept in mind all God's wonderful works; and would put others in mind of them, and teach them to serve and obey the Lord.

From this place the Jews labour to establish all their oral traditions; which Moses, say they, delivered to Joshua, and he to these elders, and they to the prophets, and they to others, (see Maimonides in Seder Zeraim, set forth by our most learned Dr. Pocock, p. 34.) for which there is no foundation.

Ver. 32. And the bones of Joseph, which the children of Israel brought out of Egypt.] It is a needless pains which the Jews bestow in reconciling this place with Exod. xiii. 19. where it is said, Moses took the bones of Joseph with him. For there is no contradiction between these two places, the children of Israel doing what Moses required them to do; who could not carry them away himself, but saw them brought out of Egypt. Yet thus they gravely discourse about this matter in the Talmud: (tit. Sota, cap. 1. sect. 47.) "When any one begins a thing, but doth not bring it to perfection, and another comes and finishes it, the Scripture speaks of him who completes it, as if he alone had done it."

Buried they in Shechem.] Which was one reason, perhaps, for gathering the great assembly abovementioned, that they might the more solemnly deposit the bones of this great man, in that portion of land which his father Jacob had given him; see Gen. xlviii. 22. where it seems they thought it most agreeable to lay him, rather than in the cave of Machpelah. It may be reasonably thought, also, that the bodies of the rest of the sons of Jacob, from whom the twelve tribes descended, were brought into Canaan, to be there interred, as Josephus relates from ancient tradition, lib. ii. Antiq. cap. 4. And St. Stephen confirms it, Acts vii. 16. For though Joseph excelled them all in dignity, and gave this special charge about his body, yet, no doubt, every tribe had as great a regard to the head of it, and would be inclined to do the same for their fathers that Joseph desired for himself. But whether they buried them in the sepulchre at Machpelah, or in some eminent place in their own tribe, as Joseph was, there is none that gives us any account.

In a parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor, the father of Shechem, for a hundred pieces of silver.] See Gen. xxxiii. 18, 19. This shews they did not bury him in the city of Shechem, but in a field near it, which was his own ground: for so the ancient manner was, not to bury in cities and towns, but in the adjacent fields or gardens.

And it became the inheritance of the children of Joseph.] Of the Ephraimites, who gave Shechem to the Levites for a city of refuge, (xxi. 20, 21.)

Ver. 33. And Eleazar the son of Aaron died.] Who imitated Joshua (if we may believe the Samaritan Chronicle), in calling all the elders and princes of the tribes to him before he died, charging them strictly to obey all the commands of God. After which he put off his sacred garments, and clothed his son Phinehas with them. This is so far from being improbable, that it is likely all the elders did the same, as far as their authority could reach; being very desirous their posterity might continue firm and steadfast in the worship of God alone.

And they buried him in a hill that pertained to Phinehas his son.] In the Hebrew the words are, in the hill of Phinehas; that is, a hill called by his name. It being the manner, as I have noted elsewhere, to call places by the name of their eldest son.

Which was given him in Mount Ephraim.] It is a question to whom this hill was given: most probable to Eleazar, who, being the high-priest at the time of the division of the land, they thought fit to give him a peculiar portion, distinct from all the cities of the priests; none of which were in the tribe of Ephraim, but all in the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon, as we read xxi. 9. 17. 19. And they gave it Eleazar in this country, that he might be near to the tabernacle (which was in Shiloh), and near to Joshua, to be ready on all occasions to advise him, and consult the oracle for him. But against this there lies a great objection, that no Levite or priest was to have any portion in the division of the land: and therefore it is the most received opinion among the Jews, that either Eleazar or Phinehas had this inheritance in the right of his wife. So the Gemara Babylonica on Bava Bathra, and a great many others, mentioned by Mr. Selden, in his book de Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 18. where he observes another example of this marital succession, as he calls it; that is, the husband succeeding his wife in her estate after her death, in 1 Chron. ii. 21. where the twenty-three cities which Jair possessed, Kimchi saith he had by his wife.

These five last verses, it is evident, were not written by Joshua: but this is no argument he did not write this book; no more than that Moses did not write the Pentateuch, because there is the like account given of his death and burial in the conclusion of it, by some other author. (See Deut. xxxiv. 1.) The Talmudists, I observed, say, in Bava Bathra, that Joshua wrote his own book, and the eight last verses of the Pentateuch. And they say in the same place, (cap. 1.) as to what is written here, ver. 29. it was done by Eleazar; and what is said, ver. 33. it was wrote by Phinehas: or rather, these five verses, from 29. to the end, were written by Samuel; who, being a prophet, was moved and directed by God to continue the history of this people from the death of Joshua to his own time.

THE BOOK OF JUDGES.

THIS book is called by the name of SHOPHETIM, or JUDGES, because it treats principally of the great things done by those illustrious persons, who were raised up by God, upon special occasions, after the death of Joshua, till the time of making a king, to judge, that is, to rule the people of Israel, and to deliver them from their oppressions. It consists of two parts; the one containing the history of the Judges, from Othniel to Samson, which ends with the sixteenth chapter (the history of the two last judges, Eli and Samuel, being not recorded here, but in the following book); the other containing several memorable actions, which were performed in or about the time of the Judges; with which the holy writer would not interrupt their history, but reserved them to be related by themselves in the conclusion, viz. in the seventeenth, and the following chapters, unto the end of the book.

It is but conjectured who was the writer of it. Some think Ezra; but it is more probable the prophet Samuel, who was the last of the judges; and, by the direction of God, brought down their history unto his own days, when they desired a king to be set over them. The Talmudists, in Bava Bathra, (cap. 1.) are of this opinion; which Kimchi, Abarbinel, and other great authors follow. And, indeed, there is reason to think, that he who wrote the conclusion of the book of Joshua was the writer of this book also; in the second chapter of which he inserts part of that which is written there. And it is manifest it was written before the second book of Samuel, where mention is made of a passage in this book; which would not have been so commonly known, if it had not been published here, 2 Sam. xi. 21. out of Judg. ix. 53. David, also, in Psal. lxviii. 7, 8, seems to allude unto what we read in the song of Deborah, v. 4. (See Du Pin.) Certain it is, it was written before David's reign; for the Jebusites were possessed of Jerusalem when this author lived (ver. 21. of the first chapter), who were driven out of it by David, (2 Sam. v. 6.) and therefore this book was written before that; and is of wonderful use, as Procopius Gazæus observes, to represent unto us the mighty power of true religion to make a nation happy, and the dismal calamities which impiety brings upon it. And therefore, saith he, St. Paul thought fit to propound a great many examples to us out of this very book; such as Gideon, and Barak, and Samson, and Jephthah, who did marvellous things by the power of faith.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. NOW after the death of Joshua.] And of Eleazar, it is probable (for this book gives an account of what followed after those things that are mentioned in the foregoing), but how long after cannot be certainly determined: but we have reason to think it was not till they were multiplied so much, as to be able to people more of the country than they had yet in possession.

It came to pass, that the children of Israel.] There was no person appointed by Joshua to succeed him in the government, as he was appointed by Moses to be his successor; but the government was left in the hand of the elders. For it is a mere fiction which we meet withal in the Samaritan Chronicle, that at the last assembly (mentioned Joshua xxiv.) he chose twelve of the chief of the tribes, and cast lots which of them should hold his place when he died; and that the lot fell upon one whose name was Abel, and his nephew; to whom he assigned his authority, and set a crown upon his head. (See Hottinger, in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 8. p. 522.)

Asked the Lord, saying.] Inquired of him by urim and thummim, as the manner was in all cases that concerned the whole congregation of Israel. For which end, it is to be supposed, that some who represented the body of the people (their elders, perhaps, or heads of their tribes) were sent to Shiloh, where the sanctuary was, and desired Phinehas the high-priest to represent their case to God, and beseech his directions. Here the Jews raise a question, why we never read that Joshua, in all his wars, consulted God by the oracle, but the elders immediately after his death did. To this they give several answers. (See Numb. xxvii. 21.)

Who shall go up for us against the Canaanites first, to fight against them?] They being increased, as I said, to such a number, that they were able to people more of the country; and beginning to be straitened for want of room, thought of enlarging their possessions; but would not adventure without God's approbation and direction to do any thing: and therefore desired he would tell them who should make the first attempt; that the rest, being encouraged by their success (of which they did not doubt, if they had his warrant for what they did), might make the like. For it is evident by these words, go up for us, that all the tribes on this side Jordan were concerned in this matter.

Ver. 2. And the Lord said, Judah.] i. e. The tribe of Judah, who were very populous, and no less valiant.

Shall go up.] And assault the mountainous country, which was the lot of this tribe. According to the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 9. where, comparing Judah to a lion's whelp, he saith, "From the prey, my son, thou art gone up."

Behold, I have delivered the land into his hand.] That is, all the land belonging to their lot. By this it seems plain, that the answer by urim and thummim was given by a voice which uttered these words. Here Abarbinel endeavours to give satisfaction to the question beforementioned, why Joshua did not inquire in this manner, though it be expressly said, (Numb. xxvii. 21.) that "he shall stand before Eleazar the priest, and ask counsel of the Lord, after the judgment of urim." He thinks he did so all the time after that, till Moses's death, to shew he was made the leader of God's people, for none but such could inquire by urim: but, after his death, he was endued with the spirit of prophecy, as Moses was, and so had no need to inquire in that manner, being immediately directed by God in his proceedings. But, after his death, there being none endued with the prophetical spirit, the children of Israel were constrained to have resort to this oracle. Which is an account very much below the judgment of so great a man; for Moses, being a prophet, did frequently ask counsel of God at the sanctuary, which was the same as if he had inquired by urim. Therefore the true answer is, that Joshua did thus inquire of the Lord in the case of Achan: and it is highly probable he did the same in the management of his war, and other great occasions, though it be not expressly mentioned in so many words.

Ver. 3. And Judah said to Simeon his brother.] They were brethren by the same father and mother; and also nearly joined in their situation, the lot of the tribe of Simeon being taken out of that of Judah, (Josh. xix. 9.)

Come up with me into my lot, that we may fight against the Canaanites.] Which people, with the Perizzites (as is further declared in the next verse), still possessed a considerable part of the lot which fell to Judah.

And I likewise will go with thee into thy lot.] To drive them out of that part of the country which was the portion of Simeon.

So Simeon went with him.] They joined their forces together in this expedition, under the conduct, no doubt, of some eminent leader. And who so fit as Caleb? who, though an old man, was full of vigour, and fit for war, (as he himself declared not long ago, Josh. xiv. 10, 11.) and had not yet got possession (as appears by the sequel) of the portion which, by God's commandment, was assigned him.

Ver. 4. And Judah went up.] They were the principal persons concerned in this expedition, and therefore only mentioned, though the children of Simeon also went up with them.

And the Lord delivered.] We meet with no such religious expression (which occurs often here in these holy books) in any heathen writer.

The Canaanites and Perizzites into their hand.] Though most of the people properly called Canaanites dwelt by the Mediterranean Sea, yet many of them were scattered up and down in other parts of the country, (as I observed upon Numb. xiv. ult.) and particularly in these mountains and woody places, where the Perizzites dwelt. (See Josh. xvii. 15, 16.)

And they slew of them in Bezek ten thousand men.] In the country near to Bezek, which was a city in the tribe of Judah, not far, some think, from Bethlehem. Here they chose to make their rendezvous (as we now speak) of their forces, and wait to receive the children of Judah, that, if they were worsted, they might easily find a strong place of retreat.

Ver. 5. And they found Adoni-bezek in Bezek.] He was the king, or lord of this place, as his name imports, whom they surprised, as the word found signifies, (see Bochart. Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 21.) by a sudden assault upon this city, whither he seems to have fled when he had lost the field. Theodoret makes this king the same with Adonizedek, (mentioned in Josh. x.) but as their names are different, so he was king of Jerusalem, and this of Bezek, where he was overcome; but the former in Gibeon, who was killed also with the sword, and then hanged on a tree; but this had only his thumbs and toes cut off, and so brought to Jerusalem, where he died.

And they fought against him.] Took the city wherein he thought to have defended himself, and the remainder of his army, which escaped hither.

And they slew the Canaanites and Perizzites.] Put all the people of those two nations, whom they found there, to the sword.

Ver. 6. But Adoni-bezek fled.] He made his escape.

And they pursued him, and caught him.] They found which way he went, and pursued him so close, that they overtook him before he could get to the strong fortress of the Jebusites; where, it is likely, he hoped to secure himself.

And cut off his thumbs and his great toes.] That he might be made incapable of war hereafter, being unable to handle arms, by reason of the loss of his thumbs; or to run swiftly (which was a noble quality in a warrior), by the loss of his great toes. This had been his own practice, it appears by his confession in the next verse, which made them think it reasonable to serve him in his kind.

Ver. 7. And Adoni-bezek said, Threescore and ten kings.] In those days the chief person in every city had a kingly power; as we learn from the history of Joshua, who found many kings in Canaan when he conquered it. And seventy such petty princes Adoni-bezek had subdued; who were not kings of so many several cities, but some of them, it is likely, kings of the same place, who successively opposed him, and were dethroned by him.

Having their thumbs and great toes cut off, gathered their meat under my table.] He was proud and insolent, as well as cruel, treating those kings whom he conquered as if they had been dogs.

As I have done, so hath God requited me.] Justice was defined by the Pythagoreans to be τὸ ἀντιπεπονθὸς, to make others feel the hurt they had done, by their suffering the like punishment. Which Harmenopulus calls ταυτοπάθεια, suffering the very same; as Grotius notes, lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. n. 32. Now, Adoni-bezek's acknowledgment of God's justice in this punishment, hath made some think he was a penitent, and became a convert to the true religion: for he speaks of God in the singular number, and not of the gods, as the heathen manner was; which might possibly be the reason why they spared his life, and did not kill him. Certain it is, his pride and arrogance was very much humbled by his punishment, which extorted this confession from him. For it carried in it (as Mr. Mede observes on these words) the very stamp and print of the sin for which it was inflicted.

And they brought him to Jerusalem.] Which, as it follows in the next verse, was now in the possession of the children of Judah: though the Jews think they had not yet taken the city; but having begirt it, they brought him prisoner thither, and he died in the time of the siege.

And there he died.] After he had lived some time, perhaps, to perfect his repentance.

Ver. 8. Now the children of Judah had fought against Jerusalem, and taken it.] We do not read of its being taken by Joshua, though it seems to me highly probable, that when he took the king of Jerusalem he also took his city, and did to it as he did to the rest of the cities of those kings, mentioned Josh. x. 3. 23. But when he was gone to conquer other parts of the country, it is likely the old inhabitants returned again and took possession of it; for the land was not then divided among the Israelites: after which, this city falling in part to the share of Judah, they dispossessed the Jebusites that dwelt there of all but the strong fortress on the top of Mount Sion, which held out till the days of David. (See upon Josh. x. 1. and xv. 63.)

And burnt it with fire.] As Joshua had done to Jericho, Ai, and Hazor: this being a city, it is probable, deeply infected with idolatry; from which they thought fit entirely to purge it before they rebuilt it.

Ver. 9. Afterward the children of Judah went down.] From Jerusalem (I suppose) which stood high.

To fight against the Canaanites that dwelt in the mountain.] There were several mountains round about Jerusalem, (Psal. cxxv. 2.) and we often read of the mountains of Judah, which were possessed, it seems, by the old inhabitants till after the death of Joshua.

And the south.] Towards the wilderness of Paran.

And the valley.] Or the flat country about those mountains, some of which are mentioned in the following verses.

Ver. 10. And Judah went up against the Canaanites that dwelt in Hebron.] This shews the old inhabitants of the country had returned to this place after it had been destroyed by Joshua, as we read it was, Josh. x. 36, 37. Who were now again expelled by the children of Judah after his death, this city being in their lot.

Now the name of Hebron before-time was Kirjath-Arba.] As much as to say, the city of Arba, who was the father of Anak. (See Josh. xiv. ult. xv. 13.)

And they slew Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai.] These were the three sons of Anak, as we read there, Josh. xv. 14. where it is said that Caleb drove them out from thence: for he was the conductor of the children of Israel in this expedition, (as I observed upon ver. 3.) and had great reason to go up against this city, because this part of the country was given to him by a particular direction of God, (Josh. xiv. 13, 14. xv. 13.) But he did not conquer it till after the death of Joshua, as this place shews us.

Ver. 11. And from thence he went against the inhabitants of Debir, &c.] Another city which had been taken by Joshua in the beginning of the war; (Josh. x. 38, 39.) but, while he was gone to bring under other parts of the country, was reinhabited by the Canaanites, who were not expelled till after Joshua's death: when Caleb (to whom it was given, together with Hebron, for his portion, Josh. xv. 15.) drove them out again and possessed himself of it.

Ver. 12. And Caleb said.] Hence it still appears that the children of Judah fought under the conduct of Caleb as their general.

He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife.] This, and the three following verses, 13—15. have been explained upon Josh. xv. 16, &c. where the portion of Judah being described, there is a particular mention of what was given to Caleb, and how he disposed of it. Which relation seems to have been taken out of this book, and inserted there by the authority of Ezra, for the fuller illustration of all that belonged to that tribe, whether by lot or peculiar donation before the division of the land. For any one may see that the description of Judah's lot is entirely coherent (as Huetius truly observes), if all between the twelfth and the twentieth verses were left out. And that all things here mentioned were not done till after the death of Joshua, is so evident, by the narration which is here made of all that fell out after that time, as to leave no doubt of it.

Ver. 16. And the children of the Kenite, Moses's father-in-law.] See Numb. x. 29. where Hobab, the son of Jethro, was invited by Moses to accompany him into the land of Canaan, and in all probability accepted the invitation, as I there observed.

Went up out of the city of palm-trees.] That is, Jericho, which was in a flat country. (See Deut. xxxiv. 3.) Here it seems they were pleased to settle themselves at their first coming into Canaan, where Moses promised, that whatsoever goodness God should shew to the Israelites, they should have their share in it: and there was no sweeter place in that country than this about Jericho, in the territory of which they dwelt, for the city itself was destroyed.

With the children of Judah.] Admiring the courage and success of this tribe, they seem to have contracted a particular friendship with them, and to have accompanied them in this expedition into the high country.

Into the wilderness of Judah, which lieth in the south of Arad.] In the southern part of the land of Canaan, where Arad was, (Numb. xxi. 1.) which, as Procopius Gazæus here observes, was a city of the Amorites, near to the wilderness of Kadesh, which is Paran: in his time it was a village four miles from Malaathon; but twenty from Hebron.

And dwelt among the people.] They removed from the city of palm-trees, which was in the tribe of Benjamin, and settled themselves among the people of Judah. Yet not all of them; for some went into the northern parts among the tribe of Naphtali, as appears from iv. 10, 11. What should be the reason of their forsaking so pleasant a place, as that where they were first settled, is but conjectured. Some think it was the love of solitariness and retirement; which they gather from Jer. xxxv. 6, &c. Or, as I said, out of their great affection to the children of Judah; under whose protection they hoped for greater safety than in other places.

Ver. 17. And Judah went with Simeon his brother.] Having finished, as far as they were able, the conquest of what belonged to the tribe of Judah, they went to assist the Simeonites, according to their mutual engagement, (ver. 3.)

And they slew the Canaanites that inhabited Zephath, and utterly destroyed it.] Some think this was the name both of a city and of a small region; but whereabouts it was situated is not known.

And the name of the city was called Hormah.] From the utter destruction beforementioned. Some think this was the same place with that mentioned Numb. xxi. 2, 3. But there he speaks of more cities that were laid waste; here but of one.

Ver. 18. And Judah took Gaza with the coast thereof, and Askelon with the coast thereof, and Ekron with the coast thereof.] These three cities were in the land of the Philistines, upon the sea-coast; which the Israelites did not hold long, before the Philistines recovered them again. For the Israelites contenting themselves with taking these cities, without destroying the people (as they did in other places, and ought to have done here), and only making them tributaries, it was not hard for them to regain their liberty.

Ver. 19. And the Lord was with Judah.] The Targum here uses the same language, which we find all along in the book of Joshua, when he speaks of God's presence with him: (see Josh. xiv. 12.) And the Word of the Lord helped the house of Judah.

And they drave out the inhabitants of the mountain.] God gave them such success wheresoever they went, that it ought to have encouraged them to go on with their enterprise; which they did not, as the following words tell us. This mountain, it is very likely, was Mons Casius, which was near to Gaza.

But could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron.] Here now the fountain of all the ensuing evils which befel the Israelites begins to be opened. In that, either through sloth, or covetousness, or distrust of God's power, or more lenity than the law of Moses allowed, they did not attempt those people that were stronger than ordinary; or, being unfaithful to God, failed in their attempt; or, having some success, only brought them under tribute. And it is most likely, they were so affrighted at the iron chariots (which were in use in the plain country, though not in the mountains), that they were quite disheartened; and did not remember what God had promised them (ver. 2. of this chapter), and how undauntedly Joshua set upon those that came thus dreadfully appointed, (Josh. xi. 4. 6.) Concerning these chariots, see Josh. xvii. 16. 18. where I have observed they are frequently mentioned in profane authors. And see Dilherrus, tom. i. Disput. Academ. p. 129.

Ver. 20. And they gave Hebron unto Caleb, as Moses said, and he expelled thence the three sons of Anak.] Thus ends the account of the wars of the tribe of Judah: which concludes with a repetition of what part in their country was given to Caleb; because he was their leader (as I have often said), and this was his reward, viz. the country about Hebron; the city itself belonging to the Levites.

Ver. 21. And the children of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites that inhabited Jerusalem.] This tribe, and that of Judah, had an interest in Jerusalem: but though both of them joined together, they could not drive the Jebusites out of the south part of it, where they had a strong fortress upon Mount Sion. (See Josh. xv. 63.) Nay, of that part of the city which belonged to Judah, they were not dispossessed till the forenamed expedition.

But the Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin to this day.] That is, they kept possession of that fortress, from which they were not able to drive them; but they dwelt there in the days when Samuel wrote this book, being not expelled till the reign of David. And they seem also to have dwelt with the Benjamites in that part of the city belonging to them; which though conquered, yet the inhabitants were not destroyed, but only brought under tribute. For this was very agreeable to the lazy and covetous humour which now began to prevail in Israel.

Ver. 22. And the house of Joseph.] viz. The tribe of Ephraim, (Josh. xvi. 1.)

They also went up against Beth-el.] They, following the example of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, endeavoured to enlarge their border by taking Beth-el.

And the Lord was with them.] As the success demonstrated. The Targum hath it, (as before, ver. 19.) The Word of the Lord was their helper.

Ver. 23. And the house of Joseph sent to descry Beth-el.] They proceeded very cautiously; sending spies (as we read in the next verse) to view the strength of the place, and to discover how it might be best approached.

Now the name of the city before was Luz.] See Gen. xxviii. 19. Josh. xvi. 2.

Ver. 24. And the spies saw a man come forth out of the city.] Whom they apprehended, as he passed by the place where they lay to make their observations, and get intelligence.

And they said unto him, Shew us, we pray thee, the entrance into the city.] Where it may be most easily entered. For they did not inquire the way to the gate, which was common and plain enough; but for the weakest part, where the walls were lowest, or most out of repair, or had the least guard. Or, they desired him, perhaps, to shew them some private way to get into it, which none knew but the inhabitants.

And we will shew thee mercy.] As they spake civilly and gently to him when they apprehended him, so they make him a promise of kind usage, when they got into the city, by sparing his life, and all belonging to him, as they did Rahab and her family: which, it is highly probable, he begged of them, being fallen into their hands; and it was not unlawful for them to grant, if he changed his religion, or left the country, as we find he afterward did.

Ver. 25. And when he shewed them the entrance into the city.] Notice, I suppose, was immediately sent to the army, which lay not far off.

They smote the city with the edge of the sword.] Came upon them on a sudden, and assaulted them where they least expected it; so that they found little resistance.

But they let go the man, and all his family.] Did them no harm; but gave them their liberty, as well as lives, to go whither they pleased.

Ver. 26. And the man went into the land of the Hittites.] A colony of this nation, I suppose, had planted themselves heretofore in some of the neighbouring countries, Syria, or Arabia, or some of those that fled upon Joshua's invading the land, settled themselves there. To whom this man thought good to go with his family, being, perhaps, of the same nation.

And built a city.] Which is an argument, that the children of Ephraim were so kind as to dismiss him and his family, with all their goods and estate.

And called the name of it Luz.] To preserve the memory of the place from whence he came. The founders of cities are mentioned with honour by all authors; and this seems to be so intended.

Which is the name thereof unto this day.] It kept this name to the time of the writing of this book, and long after. For it seems to be the same city mentioned by Josephus in Arabia (not far from Judea), which he calls Λούσσα, (lib. xiv. Antiq. cap. 2.) And Bochartus observes, that this place had its name originally from the great plenty of almonds growing there; from whence also it may be Lusitania had its name, (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 35.)

Ver. 27. Neither did Manasseh.] He speaks of that part of this tribe which was seated on this side Jordan.

Drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shean and her towns, &c.] Hitherto several of the Israelites had shewed some valour, and expelled some of the Canaanites. But now he begins to shew how cowardly others of them were; for these do not seem to have attempted any thing against the places here mentioned, or any where else. Beth-shean was a city not far from Jordan. See Josh. xvii. 11. where the rest of the cities here named in this verse are mentioned.

But the Canaanites would dwell in that land.] Not only in the cities, where they might have been straitened and kept under, but in the towns and villages, where they had the same liberties with the Israelites, and perhaps held some of the ground belonging to them. For so some think the word dwell signifies; that they enjoyed all the benefits that any others had. And this they demanded as their right; which the Hebrew word jaal imports; a settled resolution not to quit that land. (See Josh. xvii. 12.)

Ver. 28. And it came to pass, when the Israelites were strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute, and did not utterly drive them out.] Herein they acted contrary to the law, whereby they were enjoined to destroy them, when they were able. And being strong enough to make them tributaries, they might, no doubt, have utterly expelled them out of the land. But they found more profit in making them pay tribute; and it cost them less pains to bring them into some subjection, than to destroy them. And this seems to be here noted, as the common fault of all the children of Israel, that, when they grew strong, they did not use their power to destroy or expel the Canaanites: but let them live quietly under them, upon payment of tribute.

Ver. 29. Neither did Ephraim drive out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer.] See Josh. xvi. 10. It is very probable, they did not so much as exact a tribute from them (which is not here mentioned), but made a covenant of friendship with them; which was still a higher crime. And this the next words seem to import.

But the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among them.] Which is a form of speech not used in the foregoing exceptions. And to dwell among a people, signifies a quiet settlement, with the enjoyment of all their rights. As in 2 Kings iv. 13. when Elisha offered the Shunamite to do her any kindness at court, she expresses herself satisfied with her condition, in these words, I dwell among my own people.

Ver. 30. Neither did Zebulun drive out the inhabitants of Kitron, nor the inhabitants of Nahalol.] Which was the greater crime, because this last city was ἀφωρισμένη Λευίταις, one of those that were separated for the Levites, as Eusebius speaks. (See Josh. xxi. 35.) Yet they did more than the Ephraimites; for though they let them dwell among them, they made them pay tribute.

But the Canaanites dwelt among them, and became tributaries.] They troubled themselves no further than to make them pay a tribute to them; when they might, with a little more pains, have expelled them. This laziness, or covetousness, or whatsoever it was that made them act in this manner, brought them into a dangerous snare.

Ver. 31. Neither did Asher drive out the inhabitants of Accho.] A city near the Mediterranean Sea, called by Strabo and others Ace; and afterward Ptolemais, as Eusebius saith, who observes, that the Asherites did not drive out the Ἀλλοφύλους from hence. Procopius saith the same.

Nor the inhabitants of Sidon.] Which every one knows was another great city upon the same sea.

Nor of Ahlah, nor of Achzib.] We find no mention of the former of these elsewhere; but the latter is in Josh. xix. 29. and was called in aftertimes Ecdippa, as Eusebius relates.

Nor Helbath, nor Aphik, nor of Rehob.] The two latter of these we read of in Josh. xix. 28. 30. but nothing of the former, unless it be the same with Helkath, mentioned there, ver 25.

Ver. 32. But the Asherites dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land; for they did not drive them out.] They seem to have entered into a league of friendship with the Canaanites; so that they were mixed with them as if they had been the same nation, which was most strictly forbidden by the law of Moses: for they did not so much as make them tributaries; but the Asherites seem to have submitted to the basest condition of all the other tribes: for it is not said, as of the other tribes, that the people dwelt among the Asherites; but that the Asherites dwelt among them. As if the Canaanites remained still the lords of that country, and the Asherites were only permitted to live among them.

Ver. 33. Neither did Naphtali drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh, nor the inhabitants of Beth-anath.] Both these cities are mentioned as in the lot of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 38.

But they dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land.] Imitating the Asherites, in letting the old inhabitants live promiscuously with them; or rather contenting themselves with the liberty to live quietly among the Canaanites.

Nevertheless, the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh and Beth-anath became tributaries to them.] In this they were more valiant than the Asherites, that they brought these two cities under contribution, and made them acknowledge them for their lords.

Ver. 34. And the Amorites forced the children of Dan into the mountain.] The condition of the Danites was the worst of all the tribes: for they could neither expel the old inhabitants of their country, nor make them tributaries, nor so much as possess it together with them; but the Amorites distressed them sorely, by penning them up in the cities that were in the mountainous parts of their country, not suffering them to dwell below in the plain.

For they would not suffer them to come down into the valley.] Being very strong, it is likely, in chariots of iron (which were of use, I observed, in the flat country, though they could do no service in the mountains), which the Danites so dreaded, that they durst not venture to encounter them.

Ver. 35. But the Amorites would dwell in Mount Heres, in Aijalon, and Shaalbim.] And, to add to their affliction, would not let them enjoy all the mountainous country, but possessed these three cities there: which constrained the Danites to seek for larger quarters in other parts; and seems to have been the occasion of that expedition mentioned Josh. xix. 47. where, ver. 41. we read of the two last-mentioned cities. (See my notes there.)

Yet the hand of the house of Joseph.] That is, the Ephraimites, who were next neighbours to the Danites, in one part of their country.

Prevailed.] Against the Amorites, as the LXX. expound it, Ἐβαρύνθη ἡ χεὶρ οἴκου Ἰωσὴφ ἐπὶ τὸν Ἀμορῥαῖον, The hand of the house of Joseph was heavy upon the Amorites; for they came to the assistance of their brethren, when they were grievously distressed.

So that they became tributaries.] They brought the Amorites so much under, that they made those three cities beforementioned pay tribute to the Danites, if not all the low countries which they inhabited; for he saith, in general, They became tributaries, speaking of all the Amorites thereabouts.

Ver. 36. And the coast of the Amorites was from the going up to Akrabbim, from the rock, and upward.] We find mention of the going up to Akrabbim in Josh. xv. 3. (See my notes there.) And the Vulgar by the rock (in Hebrew, selah) understands the city called Petra, which was upon the borders of Edom, and by Amaziah called Joktheel, in 2 Kings xiv. 7. Some take these words to signify the large extent of the country which the Amorites inhabited; but I take them rather to denote, that the children of Ephraim gave such a check to their insolence, that they were confined to this country, which reached from Akrabbim and Selah, to the mountains here mentioned. By this it appears, the Israelites let so many of the old inhabitants remain in Canaan, that they settled themselves among them; insomuch, that, in the days of Solomon, we read of a remnant of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, (1 Kings ix. 20, 21.) and in far later ages, as I have often observed, the Gergesenes remained in the days of our Saviour, (Matt. viii. 28.) though it is likely they were all become proselytes so far as to worship the God of Israel, though not entirely of their religion.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND an angel of the Lord.] The Jews by an angel here understand a prophet, who was sent by God as his messenger; which the word angel imports: and they commonly take it to have been Phinehas, who was employed on this message. But I see no reason to depart from the natural signification of the word, when there is no absurdity in it, and it is not usual to speak in this metaphorical style: for there can no instance be given, that I remember, of a prophet called an angel of the Lord; which I take to signify more than an angel, which appeared from heaven on this occasion; that is, the angel of the covenant.

Came up from Gilgal.] Angels are not commonly said to come up, but to come down; which is one reason, I suppose, why this angel hath been taken for a prophet. But if we consider whence he was seen to come, and why from Gilgal, this phrase will appear to be most proper; of which I shall give an account presently.

To Bochim.] This was not the name of the place before, but was given it on this occasion, (ver. 5.) In all probability it was Shiloh; for there was no other place where all the people of Israel were wont to assemble, as they were now when this angel appeared to them, (ver. 4.)

And said, I made you to go out of Egypt.] These words evidently shew, this was not a created angel, but an uncreated; even that very person who appeared to Joshua hard by Jericho, Josh. v. 13, 14. which I have shewn there was God himself: for who but God could speak in this style, I made you to go out of Egypt? No prophet, nor any created angel, durst have been so bold; but would have prefaced to this speech in some such words as these, Thus saith the Lord, I have made you to go, &c. Supposing, then, this angel to be the same with him that then appeared, it was fit for him to appear now as coming from Gilgal, to put them in mind of that illustrious appearance of God near that place, and the assurance he then gave them of his presence with them in the conquest of the land, and the solemn covenant they made with him, by the renewing of circumcision in that place: which upbraided them with their base ingratitude to God, and their sloth in not endeavouring to expel the Canaanites.

And have brought you into the land which I sware to your fathers.] Of which he had given them possession.

And I said, I will never break my covenant with you.] If they proved not false to him, he assured them they should always find him present with them, to make good his promises to them. This Joshua told them they knew very well, that not one good thing had failed which he promised; and bade them be confident he would still continue the same faithful God. (See Josh. xxi. 45. xxiii. 14.)

Ver. 2. And ye shall make no league with the inhabitants of this land.] Or rather, But ye shall make no league, &c. For this was the condition of the covenant on their part, Deut. vii. 2. and long before that, Exod. xxiii. 32. xxxiv. 12. and again more lately, Josh. xxiii. 12.

Ye shall throw down their altars.] See Exod. xxxiv. 13. Deut. vii. 5. xii. 3.

But ye have not obeyed my voice; why have you done this?] That is, you can give no account of your disobedience to such plain, and express, and repeated commands.

Ver. 3. Wherefore I also said, I will not drive them out from before you.] God, therefore, resolved to make good the threatenings pronounced in his covenant; as hitherto he had performed his promise. (See Josh. xxiii. 13.)

But they shall be thorns in your sides.] To vex and gall them, as Joshua there told them.

And their gods shall be a snare unto you.] As Moses had foretold them, (Exod. xxiii. 33. xxxiv. 12.) For they were taken, by their conversation with idolaters, as beasts are in a toil, and drawn to the worship of their gods, which was their ruin.

Ver. 4. And it came to pass, when the angel of the Lord

spake all these words unto all the children of Israel.] By this it appears they were all met at some solemn festival, as they were bound to do three times every year (for otherwise it cannot be conceived what should occasion such an assembly of the whole congregation), and, consequently, the place where these words were spoken to them was Shiloh.

That the people lift up their voice, and wept.] They made doleful lamentations; some, it is likely, when they reflected on their sin; others, when they thought of their danger.

Ver. 5. And they called the name of that place Bochim.] Which signifies weepers. It is possible the place where the angel, or where they stood, was called by this name, in memory of this great goodness of God; which, for the present, mightily wrought upon their hearts, as appears by what follows.

And they sacrificed there unto the Lord.] This shews it was the place of public worship where they now were; and offered upon this occasion whole burnt-offerings unto God, by way of supplication and prayer to him, with thanksgiving for his goodness in calling them to repentance. Some think, indeed, that they offered expiatory sacrifices to make atonement for their sin: but they would not have been called simply sacrifices, which commonly are meant of whole burnt-offerings, or peace-offerings, by which they acknowledged him to be the Lord, and promised to serve no other god.

Ver. 6. And when Joshua had let the people go.] Or, Now when Joshua had broke up that last great assembly which he held before his death; (xxiv. 28.) so some expound it. But the next words seem to direct us rather to understand it of his dismission of them, after he had cast lots, and divided the land among them, (Josh. xix. 51. xxi. 43.)

The children of Israel went every man unto his inheritance to possess the land.] To take possession of that land which fell to their share, and settle themselves in it. And they went with a resolution, no doubt, to serve the Lord only; as, we cannot but think, he exhorted them before they parted: for the lots were cast in Shiloh before the Lord, as we are often told in the book of Joshua, xviii. 6. 8. 10. xix. 51. From whence they going to take possession of their lot, it is reasonable to think he did not dismiss them without his blessing, and with a solemn charge to observe the laws of God, such as he gave to the two tribes and half, (xxii. 5, &c.) And this is the reason why the author of this book repeats this out of the book of Joshua, to shew when their apostacy began, and how it came about: for though they went to their possessions well-disposed, yet their love of the world, and study of their own private advantages, so increased, that they made them forget the public good, and take little care of their religion.

Ver. 7. And the people served the Lord all the days of Joshua.] According to his exhortation, and their solemn promises, a little before he died, (Josh. xxiv. 14—16, &c.)

And all the days of the elders that out-lived Joshua.] Such as Eleazar, and the rest mentioned Josh. xix. 51. who were men of great authority, as well as piety; and often, no doubt, admonished them of their duty, and put them in mind of their promises made to Joshua in Shechem, where he made a covenant between God and them, and wrote it in the book of the law of God, (xxiv. 25, 26, &c.)

Who had seen all the great works of the Lord that he did for Israel.] Both among the Egyptians, and in the wilderness, and in Canaan; which Joshua had represented to them as a motive to fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity, (Josh. xxiv. 5, 6, &c. 14, 15.) Of these things the elders, we may reasonably suppose, frequently reminded them, and thereby kept them steadfast in their religion. (See Josh. xxiv. 21.) For whatsoever bad inclinations they had in them, they were restrained, by the reverence they bare to these great men, from breaking loose from God while they lived.

Ver. 8. And Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord, died, &c.] After he had made that excellent speech to them beforementioned, and engaged them in a solemn covenant to be God's people. (See Josh. xxiv. 29.)

Ver. 9. And they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-heres, &c.] This is mentioned only to shew that they honoured him after his death, by attending his funeral, as they had done in his life. (See Josh. xxiv. 30.)

Ver. 10. And also all that generation were gathered unto their fathers.] I suppose he means, not only all those who had seen the works of God in Egypt and the wilderness, but those also who had seen Jordan dried up, the walls of Jericho fall down, and the sun stand still at Joshua's word, and their enemies smitten down with hailstones, &c. Which had made such impressions on their hearts, that they generally continued in the service of God while they lived; and kept others in obedience to him.

And there arose another generation after them, which knew not the Lord.] But the next generation did not regard the Lord, nor mind their religion; but only studied to settle themselves, on any terms, in their possessions, by making peace with the Canaanites, whom they should have driven out.

Nor yet the works which he had done for Israel.] Which they did not keep in mind, as they ought to have done; being wholly intent to their earthly concerns, in building houses, planting vineyards, and improving their lands. Unto which they were invited by the peace they enjoyed; by which men's minds are wont to be corrupted; as the Greeks and Romans were in future ages. According to those known words of the Roman satirist:

"Nunc patimur longæ pacis mala."——

Ver. 11. And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord.] By this forgetfulness of God and of his works, and by their familiarity with the people of Canaan, they soon learned to do as they did, and that openly and publicly, not fearing the dreadful sentence of God against such evil-doers, who were most odious to him, whatsoever excuses men make for them. So that phrase, in the sight of the Lord, may be interpreted.

And served Baalim.] The gods of the nations whose land they possessed, who were called by this general name, which signifies lords. For among the heathen, as St. Paul observes, there were gods many, and lords many. In Hebrew he would have said many Baalim, who were their deified great men, as Mr. Mede hath shewn, (p. 776. of his works.) For Baal (in Chaldee, Bel) the king of Babel next after Nimrod, was the first that was deified, and reputed a god after his death, from whence they called all other demons by the name of Baalim; as from the first Roman emperor who was called Cæsar, all that followed him were styled Cæsars. Baalim, therefore, being the general name of the gods of Syria, Palestine, and the neighbouring countries, there were as many Baals as there were nations: for example, Baal of the Sidonians, and Baal of the Amorites, of the Moabites, and Ammonites, and the rest of the people thereabouts, who had their Baalim. (See also Selden, de Diis Syris, Syntagm. ii. cap. 1.)

Ver. 12. And they forsook the Lord God of their fathers, which brought them out of the land of Egypt, and followed other gods of the people that were round about them.] By other gods may be meant the gods of the people of Canaan; which did not content them, but they worshipped also the gods of other neighbouring nations, none of which had bestowed any benefit upon them. This was a very high aggravation of their sin; that when all other nations made to themselves such gods as they thought had done them good, or could be helpful to them, they forsook the greatest Benefactor to their nation, who had made them a free people, and worshipped such gods as had done nothing for them, nor had been able to preserve those that worshipped them from destruction.

And bowed themselves unto them.] They did not only own them for gods, but publicly adored them.

And provoked the Lord to anger.] Who had told them he was a jealous God, and could not bear any rival, (Exod. xx. 1, 2.) It is not easy to give an account what moved them to forsake their God after such wonderful things as he had done for them, and their most solemn engagements to him. It is not unlikely that one reason was, the unusual rites prescribed in his Divine service, much different from all other nations; and several laws that made them unlike all the rest of the world, who hated them upon this account. This they could not bear, desiring to be conformable to other people and to gain their friendship. For Hosea saith, viii. 12. they looked upon the great things of the law as a strange thing.

Ver. 13. And they forsook the Lord, and served Baal and Ashtaroth.] Especially they worshipped the sun, and the moon, or Venus; which some understand by Astarte. In the next chapter it is said they worshipped Baalim and the groves, iii. 7. For in those groves several goddesses, under the name of Ashtaroth, were worshipped, as Mr. Selden conjectures in his Syntag. ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 2. where he shews there were many Astartes among the heathen, as there were Baals; and therefore the Scripture speaks of them in the plural number (as the LXX. here doth, ταῖς Ἀστάρταις), because of the multitude of images representing Juno, or Venus, or Diana, which had the name of Ashtaroth, signifying (as some think) as much as Beatas, blessed.

Ver. 14. And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel.] Brake out in very dreadful effects upon them.

And he delivered them into the hands of the spoilers that spoiled them.] Carried away their cattle and their goods.

And he sold them into the hands of their enemies round about.] Who carried away their persons, as well as their goods, and made them slaves. For that seems to be the meaning of selling them, which is a phrase often used in this book, (iii. 8. iv. 2.) and in other places, (Deut. xxxii. 30. Psal. xliv. 12, &c.) This was a just punishment of God upon them, that, as they served the gods of the people round about them, (ver. 12.) so they should be slaves to all those nations round about them.

So that they could not any longer stand before their enemies.] Being so far from being able to make any further conquests, that they could not defend themselves.

Ver. 15. Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the Lord was against them for evil.] They had ill success in all their affairs, whether private or public business.

As the Lord had said, and as the Lord had sworn unto them.] See Deut. xxviii. xxx. 17, 18. xxxi. 16, 17. and many other places.

And they were greatly distressed.] As soon as they slackened their endeavours to drive out the Canaanites, and made leagues with them (as we read in the foregoing part of this chapter), God began to withdraw himself from them, and would not drive out their enemies from before them, (ver. 3.) But when by this means they were ensnared to worship their gods, (as he foresaw they would, ver. 4.) then he gave them up into the hands of those enemies, with whom they had made friendship, and suffered them to tyrannize over them, and use them cruelly.

Ver. 16. Nevertheless, the Lord raised up judges, &c.] Extraordinary rulers and governors, whose authority, I take to have been chiefly in time of war; they being raised up (by a particular inspiration and excitation from God), as it here follows, to deliver them out of the hands of those that spoiled them. So that commonly, when they had wrought deliverance for the people, and their army was dismissed, they became private men again; as appears by the story of Jephthah, who would not undertake to lead them against the Ammonites, unless he might be their governor when the war was done; (Judg. xi. 9.) and of Gideon, who refused to rule over them, when they offered the government to him, after the conquest of the Midianites, (viii. 22, 23.) Their business, therefore, principally was to preserve the people's liberties, to restore them, together with God's true religion, and to prescribe what was to be done in such cases; being a kind of dictators, whose power continued as long as there was occasion for it. Yet it must be acknowledged, that some of them had an established authority for their life over those whom they had rescued from slavery (not over the whole commonwealth of Israel, part of which was some time in peace, when another part was oppressed), and managed political matters, when they were too hard for the ordinary judges to divide them. (See Deut. xvii. 9.) Thus we read that Deborah, a prophetess, judged Israel, and that the people came to her for judgment, before she excited Barak to vindicate their liberties: but commonly they seem to have contented themselves with this, not minding judgment; as Samuel, the last of them, chiefly exercised his authority in matters of justice, 1 Sam. vii. 15, &c. where he is said in his house at Ramah to have judged Israel, and ended their controversies, and done right to every man: and when, by reason of age, he could do this no longer, he committed it to his sons. (See Corn. Bertram. de Repub. Judaica, cap. 9. p. 109, &c.)

Ver. 17. And yet they would not hearken to their judges.] Not constantly; but revolted again, (ver. 18, 19.)

But they went a whoring after other gods, and bowed themselves unto them.] Worshipped them publicly; which is commonly called going a whoring from God, who had espoused them to himself.

They turned quickly out of the way.] As soon as the judge was dead, who had wrought deliverance for them.

Which their fathers walked in, obeying the commandments of the Lord.] In the days of Joshua, and the elders which survived him, (ver. 7.)

But they did not so.] Whom the next generation would not imitate.

Ver. 18. And when the Lord raised them up judges.] This is the constant phrase wherein he speaks of these great men, whose spirit was stirred up by an extraordinary motion from God, to undertake things beyond the reach of human wisdom or power.

Then the Lord was with the judge.] Endued him with heroical courage, and gave him wonderful success. Here the Targum continues the same language, The Word of the Lord was the helper of the judge. (See chap. i. 19. 22.)

And delivered them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge.] As long as he ruled over them, and kept them in obedience to him. This signifies, that if they did not exercise their authority, yet the effects of it remained all the days of their life.

For it repented the Lord because of their groanings, by reason of them that oppressed and vexed them.] He altered the course of his providence, when they not only sighed and groaned under their oppressions, but cried unto him for help, and promised amendment, as we find they did, iii. 9. 15. vi. 7, 8, &c.

Ver. 19. And it came to pass, when the judge was dead, they returned.] To their former idolatry.

And corrupted themselves more than their fathers.] Who lived in the former judge's time, and had sorely smarted for this sin, till God, upon their repentance, sent them deliverance.

In following other gods, to serve them, and bow down to them.] They either multiplied more strange gods, or devised still new rites of worship contrary to God's law. The common service they paid to every one of them was building temples to their honour, setting up altars, planting groves, burning incense, and sacrificing beasts.

They ceased not from their evil doings.] In the Hebrew, Would not let fall their own inventions; but retained them, notwithstanding all that God had done to bring them off from their idolatry.

Nor from their stubborn way.] But obstinately persisted in their evil courses, as if nothing had been done to reclaim them.

Ver. 20. And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel.] This highly incensed the Divine displeasure, and provoked him to punish them more grievously.

And he said, Because the people hath transgressed my covenant which I commanded their fathers, &c.] By making leagues with the Canaanites, and not throwing down their altars, &c. Arius Montanus very well observes, that this verse expresses what great reason there was for God's being exceeding angry with them. First, because they had forsaken him, to whom they owed their being a nation. Secondly, because they had violated that covenant, which was not a new or obscure thing, but made long ago with their fathers, who, it was very well known, had reaped the benefit thereof. And, thirdly, because (as this verse concludes) they had not hearkened unto God's voice; i. e. though he had often admonished them, by his prophets, of their duty, and chidden and threatened them; yet they would not mind what he said, but in a most rebellious manner gave themselves up to the impieties of other nations.

Ver. 21. I also will not henceforth drive out any from before them.] That is, not presently, or so soon as he intended, if they had pleased him. (See ver. 23.)

Of the nations which Joshua left when he died.] For God never intended they should be all rooted out at once, as hath been often noted from Exod. xxiii. 29, 30. yet their expulsion had been more speedy, if they had obeyed him, than now he resolved it should be. Nor could it well be otherwise; for, by being delivered into their enemies' hands, to spoil and to enslave them, their increase was thereby hindered; so that they were not able to people all the land so soon as they might have done if they had been obedient: for then God promised to multiply them exceedingly, (Deut. vii. 13, 14, &c.)

Ver. 22. That by them I may prove Israel, whether they will keep the way of the Lord to walk therein, as their fathers did keep it, or not.] That it might appear, whether they would continue firm, as their fathers resolved, in the service of God, (Josh. xxiv. 16. 24.) or revolt from him to serve other gods.

Ver. 23. Therefore the Lord left these nations, without driving them out hastily; neither delivered he them into the hand of Joshua.] This was one reason they were not all cast out at once, by the victorious hand of Joshua; for if none of them had been left remaining, there would have been no temptation to worship their gods; which would have been all abolished with them. Another reason is given of this, in the place beforementioned, Exod. xxiii. 29, 30. and Deut. vii. 22.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. NOW these are the nations which the Lord left, to prove Israel by them.] Having said in general, that God thought fit not to drive out all the Canaanites, that he might try the care and fidelity of his people in his service, (ii. 22.) he now names the particular nations that remained unsubdued.

Even as many of Israel as had not known all the wars of Canaan.] Such as were born since the war was ended; and had seen none of the wonderful works of God in the conquest of the land; God intended to prove them, whether they would worship him, when they saw what they must expect if they did not; viz. that he would let the Canaanites, their mortal enemies, loose upon them.

Ver. 2. Only that the generations of the children of Israel might know to teach them war.] There was another reason why they were left remaining, as was observed before in the last verse of the foregoing chapter: but this had been sufficient, if there had been no other; that the Israelites might not grow sluggish for want of some to awaken and exercise their courage, and to keep up martial discipline among them; and that they might, by having powerful enemies so near them, betake themselves to God constantly, and depend upon his help and succour, by whose power their fathers had brought them under.

At the least such as before knew nothing thereof.] If this was not needful for all, it was at least for such as had never handled arms; that they might be trained up to be ready upon occasion to fight with their enemies. For they being wholly bred to husbandry, and feeding of cattle, would have had no military discipline among them, if they had not had the Canaanites so near to them.

Or this may be the meaning of this verse, They shall know what it is to be left to themselves: for their fathers fought by a Divine power, but now they shall learn what it is to fight like other men, without God to go along with them.

Ver. 3. Namely, the five lords of the Philistines.] See upon Josh. xiii. 2, 3. and Judg. i. 18. where it appears, that three of them had been, in some measure, conquered; but it seems had recovered their country again, by the sloth of the Israelites.

And all the Canaanites.] These were a particular people of that country (as hath been often said), near to the midland sea, many of which still remained scattered up and down the land.

And the Sidonians.] Who lived in the territory belonging to the famous city of Sidon; who was one of the sons of Canaan, (Gen. x. 15.)

And the Hivites that dwelt in Mount Lebanon.] A famous mountain in the north part of Canaan.

From Baal-Hermon unto the entering in of Hamath.] See in Josh. xi. 3. xiii. 5.

Ver. 4. And they were to prove Israel by them, to know whether they would hearken to the commandments of the Lord, &c.] That their virtue might appear, if they did not imitate these people; or their baseness, if they did.

Ver. 5. And the children of Israel dwelt among the Canaanites, Hittites, and Amorites, and Perizzites, and Hivites, and Jebusites.] The Israelites soon discovered their bad disposition, in suffering all sorts of the wicked people of this land to remain and dwell with them; as if they were still the possessors of this country, and the children of Israel but intruders among them.

Ver. 6. And they took their daughters to be their wives, and gave their daughters to their sons.] Which was not only directly contrary to the law of God, (Deut. vii. 3.) but a higher breach of their covenant with him, than the mere making leagues with them.

And served their gods.] As Moses, in the same place, foretold they would, (Deut. vii. 4.) if they contracted such marriages with them.

Ver. 7. And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and forgat the Lord their God.] They grew in time so very wicked, that they not only worshipped other gods, together with the Lord; but quite forgot him, and worshipped them alone.

And served Baalim and the groves.] Some here take groves, literally, for the trees themselves that composed those shady places, which were anciently consecrated to heroes; being, some time, the place of their sepulchre; where their manes were supposed to haunt. For Baalim were the same with heroes; and trees were accounted sacred things, by the ancient heathen, who consecrated them to this or that deity, and trimmed them up with ribands, and adorned them with lights, and made vows to them, and hung the spoils of their enemies upon them. Insomuch, that travellers were wont to stop when they were to pass by them, as if they had been the habitation of some god. But Mr. Selden thinks, that by groves are to be here understood the images of their gods in the groves; as it is certain they must signify in some places. (See upon chap. vi. 25.) And he probably conjectures, that there were several goddesses, under the name of Ashtaroth, worshipped in them. (See the place mentioned above, in his De Diis Syris, Syntag. ii. cap. 2.)

And it is evident, that these deities, whatsoever they were, were different from Baalim; for the prophets of Baal, and the prophets of the groves, were distinct persons, in 1 Kings xviii. 19.

Ver. 8. Therefore the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel.] This expression we had twice before. (See chap. ii. 14. 20.)

And he sold them.] See in the same place.

Into the hand of Chushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia.] Of that country which lay between the two great rivers of Euphrates and Tigris. So the first enemy that oppressed them were the Syrians; who, either out of hatred, or desire to enlarge their dominions, came over Euphrates and invaded them.

And the children of Israel served Chushan-rishathaim eight years.] He forced them to buy their peace upon hard terms, and brought them under tribute to him; but did not impose garrisons upon them; so that they more easily recovered their liberty, when one appeared to head them. When these eight years began (that is, how long after the death of Joshua), is variously disputed; but it is certain it was in the next age (which in Scripture signifies about three-and-thirty years) after Joshua and the elders that survived him (during whose time they served God and lived in freedom). For Caleb's younger brother, as it here follows, was the first judge whom God raised up to them.

Ver. 9. And when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord.] Returned to him, and acknowledged him to be their only God, of whom they earnestly begged pardon, and implored help with fervent prayer; beseeching him to deliver them from this cruel servitude; as he did Jacob their forefather, from the bondage of Laban the Syrian.

He raised a deliverer to the children of Israel, who delivered them.] All the judges are called by the name of saviours, or deliverers, in Nehemiah ix. 27. because they rescued them from the oppression of their enemies, when they could not help themselves.

Even Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother.] So he is called, i. 13. concerning which, see Josh. xv. 17.

Ver. 10. And the Spirit of the Lord came upon him.] He had an extraordinary motion from God to take upon him the government of the people; which none durst presume to do, but such as were appointed by God, who was their king. Josephus thinks that God appeared to them, or some way revealed his will to them, in these matters; so that they were sure they acted by his authority. The Chaldee paraphrast seems to favour the latter opinion, who calls this spirit, the Spirit of prophecy. Certain it is, that they had not only an inward incitement to undertake the deliverance of God's people, but were endowed with extraordinary courage and conduct; and it is likely with a singular gift of Divine eloquence, to persuade the people to forsake their idolatry, and vindicate their liberty.

And he judged Israel, and went out to war.] This was the first part of the office of a judge, to plead their cause, and avenge them of their oppressors; as this phrase of judging is used, Deut. xxxii. 35, 36. and other places. Though here being set before going to war, it may be thought that he first rectified what was amiss among them, and especially reduced them to the worship of the Lord alone; and then went to fight against their enemies.

And the Lord delivered Chushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia into his hand.] They overthrew and entirely routed all his forces, and, as the words seem to import, took or slew the king himself.

And his hand prevailed against Chushan-rishathaim.] So that he could not recover his strength to oppress them any more.

Ver. 11. And the land had rest forty years.] It doth not suit with my design to enter into chronological disputes; and therefore I remit the learned reader to the Canon Chronicus of Sir J. Marsham, lib. ii. where he supposes the idolatrous generation to have risen in the thirty-fourth year after the death of Joshua; who lost their liberty, and fell under the oppression of Chushan, for the space of eight years, and after their deliverance from it, lived happily forty years. Which will appear in the sequel to be more reasonable, than to interpret these words as if they signified, The land rested in the fortieth year after Joshua first settled them in peace and quiet. So our great primate of Ireland: (vide A. M. 2599.)

And Othniel the son of Kenaz died.] It is not certain in what part of these forty years of rest he died; nor is it material whether in the beginning, middle, or end of it.

Ver. 12. And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord.] Fell into the sin of idolatry after Othniel was dead.

And the Lord strengthened Eglon the king of Moab against them, because they had done evil in the sight of the Lord.] As he raised up deliverers to Israel when they were penitent; so he stirred up enemies to them, and gave them power also to oppress them, when they revolted from him. And the next enemy to the Syrians were the Moabites; for since they worshipped the gods of the people round about them, (chap. ii. 12.) it was fit they should be punished by those very people.

Ver. 13. And he gathered unto him the children of Ammon and Amalek.] Persuaded these two nations, who were his near neighbours (Moab lying between them), to associate themselves with him in this war. Unto which they were easily inclined; especially Amalek, who had an old grudge to the Israelites.

And went and smote Israel.] Either by a sudden invasion, or in a pitched battle.

And possessed themselves of the city of palm-trees.] That is, Jericho, as appears from Deut. xxxiv. 3. Judg. i. 16. Which, though it was destroyed by Joshua, yet the place where it stood remaining, it is likely they made fortifications, and placed a strong garrison there, that they might the better keep the whole country in subjection. For, as the country thereabouts was very fertile (of which they deprived the Israelites, and sent the riches of it to their own country, which was not far off), so they hindered all communications between those on this side Jordan, and those on the other side, but what they pleased to allow; and maintained a correspondence with their own people, from whom they could receive more forces, if there were need, by having the command of the passages over Jordan. By which means also they thought to secure their retreat, if there should be occasion, to their own country.

Ver. 14. So the children of Israel served Eglon the king of Moab eighteen years.] He ruled all this time as an absolute master over them, and imposed what burdens he pleased upon them; of which, it is likely, the Ammonites and Amalekites had a share, as a reward of their help and assistance.

Ver. 15. But when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord.] Humbled themselves before him, acknowledged their offence, begged his pardon, and beseeched his help; as before, ver. 9.

The Lord raised them up a deliverer.] As he had done before. (See ver. 9.)

Ehud the son of Gera, a Benjamite.] Which tribe was the most immediately oppressed (the country of Jericho being in it), and therefore one of them was very proper to be their deliverer.

A man left-handed.] The Hebrew words itter jad jemini are very obscure, being used no where else but here, and xx. 16. In both places the LXX. translate them ἀμφοτεροδέξιος, whom the Vulgar follows, "qui utraque manu pro dextra utebatur," who could use both hands, as we do our right. This the Hebrew phrase will bear, which literally signifies, as we translate it in the margin, shut of his right hand; i. e. who did nothing with it, but used his left, though he could use both alike: or, as Josephus will have it, τῶν χειρῶν τὴν ἀριστερὰν ἀμείνων, who of the two could use his left hand best.

And by him the children of Israel sent a present unto Eglon king of Moab.] Some understand by this the tribute that was laid upon them; but it rather signifies a voluntary present, above their ordinary payments; whereby they hoped to mollify him, and make him favourable to his loving subjects: for mincha is used for such offerings as were presented to God to obtain his favours.

Ver. 16. But Ehud made him a dagger.] Privately prepared this weapon, intending to make use of this opportunity for their deliverance.

Which had two edges, of a cubit length.] Therefore Josephus calls it ξιφίδιον, a little sword; which was long enough to do execution, but so short as to be easily concealed.

And he did gird it under his raiment.] Which the LXX. and the Vulgar take to have been a military garment; but the Hebrew word mad signifies any sort of raiment.

Upon his right thigh.] To avoid all suspicion (for men use to wear their swords on their left side), and that he might more readily draw it out, and use it with his left hand, when he should find occasion.

Ver. 17. And he brought the present to Eglon king of Moab.] Was admitted into his presence, and delivered the present with his right hand, as men usually do; which he could use, I suppose, as well as his left, though not, perhaps, with so much strength.

And Eglon was a very fat man.] Which made him unwieldy, and less able and ready to rise up, and avoid or defend himself from a sudden stroke. The LXX. translate it ἀνὴρ ἀστεῖος σφόδρα, an exceeding civil or courteous man; which made it the more easy for Ehud to give the blow, when he embraced him, perhaps, or stooped, when he rose out of his seat to receive his message, in an obliging manner.

Ver. 18. And when he had made an end to offer the present.] Which was done (as appears by this) with such ceremony as was in use in those days.

He sent away the people that bare the present.] It was brought by some of his retinue (consisting, it is likely, of several things), who being all withdrawn, and gone some part of their way homeward with him, he bade them go forward, and leave him to dispatch some private business which he pretended: for such designs, as he had in his mind, seldom succeed where many are engaged in them.

Ver. 19. And he himself turned again.] As if he had forgotten something, or had met with some new instructions by the way.

From the quarries that were by Gilgal.] Some understand by the word we translate quarries, a place where they digged or hewed stones; others, the twelve stones which Joshua placed in Gilgal. But the LXX. and the Vulgar take it for graven images; for so, indeed, the word pesil commonly signifies in Scripture, and so we translate it in the margin of our Bible: which when Ehud beheld, his spirit was mightily stirred within him (as Conradus Pellicanus explains this passage), and he proceeded no further in his return home, but went back, with a resolution to revenge this affront to God, as well as the oppression of his people. For it is to be supposed, the Moabites had set up these graven images in this place, rather than any other; which had been famous for the presence of God for a long time in it.

And said, I have a secret errand unto thee, O king.] Being admitted again into the king's presence, he desired a private audience of him.

Who said, Keep silence.] He bade Ehud say no more till all his attendants were withdrawn, whom he would not have to hear the message.

And all that stood by him went out from him.] It may seem strange, that a prince should trust himself alone with one of that nation, who he knew groaned under his yoke; but his mind was blinded by the present, and by the compliments wherewith it was delivered; and God deprived him, at this time, of his wonted prudence. For, as Solomon observes, "There is no wisdom, nor understanding, nor counsel against the Lord:" who intended he should be destroyed, (Prov. xxi. 30.)

Ver. 20. And Ehud came unto him.] Approached nearer to his person.

And he was sitting in a summer parlour.] In a cool room (as the Hebrew word imports), where he was defended from the heat of the sun, and enjoyed the fresh air.

Which he had made for himself alone.] Where he was wont to retire from all company, when he had a mind to sleep, perhaps in the heat of the day, or to dispatch business with which he entrusted nobody.

And Ehud said, I have a message from God unto thee.] Which in some sense was true, but not in that wherein the king understood it; who thought he had met with some Divine apparition in the way, or been at some oracle; for he doth not say he had a message from Jehovah the God of Israel (whom he would have despised, perhaps, as Pharaoh did), but from Elohim, which was a common name to all gods, (xxiv. 2. 15.)

And he rose out of his seat.] Out of reverence as to God, whose words, he supposed, he was to hear. A remarkable instance of the ancient veneration men paid to whatsoever carried the name and authority of God in it, and reproaches those who now behave themselves irreverently, even in his worship and service. (See Numb. xxiii. 18. 2 Kings xxiii. 3.)

Ver. 21. And Ehud put forth his left hand, and took the dagger from his right thigh.] If the king had his eye upon his hands, it was upon the right, and not the left, so that he might more unobservedly employ it as he designed.

And thrust it into his belly.] So that it pierced his heart (as Josephus understands it), or some other vital part; upon which he immediately died, without speaking a word, or making a noise to alarm his servants who were without. Nothing can justify this fact but an order from the Lord, which he not only pretended, but really had. (See ver. 26.)

Ver. 22. And the haft also went in after the blade.] The thrust he made was so violent, that not only the blade of the dagger, but the handle also, went into his bowels.

And the fat closed up the blade.] And the haft, so that they could not be seen.

So that he could not draw the dagger out of his belly.] But left it there, because he could take no hold of it.

And the dirt came out.] All agree that the word parschedona, which is no where found but here, signifies the dung or excrements; which came not out at the wound (for that was closed), but at the usual place; it being common for bodies to purge after they are dead, especially such corpulent ones as his was, in whose bowels, no doubt, there were violent convulsions made by this sudden stroke.

Ver. 23. And Ehud went forth through the porch.] It is very uncertain what the Hebrew word misredona signifies, which we translate porch. Some take it for the guard-chamber (as the LXX. seem to understand it), or a place where the king's servants sat; through which he passed boldly, that he might give no suspicion of any mischief he had done: or, as Kimchi explains it, the place where the people sat, who waited for audience.

And shut the doors of the parlour upon him, and locked them.] As he came out of the parlour, he not only shut the doors after him, and locked them; but, it is likely, took the key away with him. There seem to have been double doors, an inward and an outward, as is usual.

Ver. 24. And when he was gone out, his servants came.] Seeing Ehud was gone from the king, his attendants came into the antechamber (as we speak), to be ready at the king's call, to wait his pleasure.

And when they saw, that, behold, the doors of the parlour were locked, they said, Surely he covereth his feet in the summer parlour.] They concluded he was easing nature, as this phrase is commonly understood here, and in 1 Sam. xxiv. 3. for when they were about that business, the long garments which they wore in those countries were so disposed as to cover their feet. (See Gataker in his Cinnus, lib. ii. cap. 3.) But it may be understood, I think, of laying himself down to sleep, which they were wont to do in those countries in the heat of the day; (2 Sam. iv. 5.) and then, lying down in their clothes, it was necessary to cover their feet for decency's sake, to keep their garments from slipping up, and exposing those parts which should not be seen. And this suits better with the story than the other; for they thought fit to wait a great while before they entered the chamber, that they might not disturb his rest; whereas the other business being soon dispatched, would not have occasioned their waiting so long. (See the Arabic and Syriac version, both here and upon 1 Sam. xxiv. 3.)

Ver. 25. And they tarried.] Waiting in the antechamber.

Till they were ashamed.] Till they were in a great confusion, not knowing what to think should be the cause that he slept longer than ordinary.

And, behold, he opened not the door of the parlour.] At which it is likely, after tedious expectation, they knocked, and had no answer.

Therefore they took a key and opened them.] For in kings' courts, there were more than one who had keys to the same room.

And, behold, their lord was fallen down dead on the earth.] Perhaps they did not at first perceive that he was killed; which might something retard their pursuit of Ehud.

Ver. 26. And Ehud escaped while they tarried.] Their long expectance of the king's awaking out of sleep, gave him the advantage of making his escape.

And passed beyond the quarries.] From whence he returned to do this exploit, (ver. 19.) which had been murder, if he had not had a Divine warrant for what he did: unto which none can pretend now, without blaspheming God as the author of sin; but then was evident, by the wonderful gifts of wisdom, and courage, and might, wherewith such men were divinely inspired. (See Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. i. cap. 4. sect. 19. n. 4.)

And escaped unto Seirath.] Gilgal was so near to the garrison which the Moabites had in those territories, that he did not think himself safe till he was got out of the tribe of Benjamin into the mountainous country of Ephraim, where this town was, upon the confines of the tribe of Benjamin.

Ver. 27. And it came to pass, when he was come.] To Seirath.

That he blew a trumpet in the mountain of Ephraim.] To summon those who were disposed to recover their liberties, to take arms and follow him.

And the children of Israel went down with him from the mount.] A considerable body of men, no doubt, presently met together (being before prepared, it is likely, by his emissaries), and marched after him into the country of Benjamin, where the Moabites were settled.

And he before them.] He led them on as their captain; and had many more, in all probability, joined him as he marched further into the country.

Ver. 28. And he said unto them, Follow after me.] Be not afraid to venture your lives, as I will do, for the liberty of your country.

For the Lord hath delivered your enemies the Moabites into your hand.] He was assured that God, who had succeeded his enterprise, and deprived the Moabites of their supreme head (whereby, no doubt, they were in great confusion), would accomplish what he had begun, and give them a perfect deliverance: with this belief he endeavoured to possess their souls, as if the thing was already done, which he knew would inspire them with such courage as could not be withstood.

And they went down after him, and took the fords of Jordan.] He proceeded prudently, as well as courageously; and therefore led them directly to the fords of Jordan, of which they possessed themselves; that the Moabites who had settled themselves in that part of Judea, (ver. 13.) might not be able to save themselves by retreating into their own country, nor they in Moab be able to come to their assistance.

And suffered not a man to pass over.] To carry or bring any intelligence.

Ver. 29. And they slew of the Moabites at that time about ten thousand men.] Who had taken possession of the city of palm-trees, (ver. 13.) and posted themselves thereabouts, to keep the Israelites in subjection.

All lusty men.] In the Hebrew it is, all fat men; that is (as some understand it), men of estates, or very wealthy persons: men of quality, or of the better sort (as others expound it), who chose to transplant themselves hither, because of the richness and deliciousness of this country; but it may be interpreted strong men, as our translation imports, who were culled out from among the Moabites, to keep the Israelites in greater awe.

And all men of valour.] Who had given proof of their undaunted spirit in war.

And there escaped not a man.] But they were all cut off, either by those that guarded the fords, and intercepted their passage into their own country, or by the other part of the army of Israel who fell upon them, and drove them thither.

Ver. 30. So Moab was subdued that day under the hand of Israel.] This doth not signify that they brought the country of Moab under their subjection, as the Moabites had brought theirs, but that they freed themselves from the yoke they had laid upon them, and served them no longer. (See ver. 14.)

And the land had rest fourscore years.] Which the same great man, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, thus interprets: ad A. M. 2679. "Et quievit terra anno octuagesimo, post quietem priorem ab Othniele restitutam." And the land had rest in the eightieth year, after the former restored to it by Othniel: but there is another way which some learned writers among the Jews suggest, of bringing the years of servitude and of peace, mentioned in this book, into such a compass, as may agree with what is said in 1 Kings vi. 2. concerning the number of years that passed from the deliverance out of Egypt to the building of Solomon's temple: for they suppose that there was scarce any of the judges who ruled over the whole country of Israel, but some in one part, and some in another; so that at the same time there were several judges in several parts of the land; and peace in one part, when there was war in another. Accordingly our learned chronologer Sir J. Marsham (who follows this opinion) understands here by the land which had rest fourscore years, not the whole land of Israel, but the eastern part of it, which had shaken off the yoke of Moab; but in the meantime the Philistines invaded the western parts, as it here follows, and were repulsed by Shamgar, while the eastern countries enjoyed perfect peace. This I take to be the clearest account of these words, the land had rest fourscore years; that is, the eastern part of the country, which had shaken off the yoke of Moab, not the whole land of Israel: for, as the Philistines invaded the western parts, so Jabin afflicted the northern (as it follows in the next chapter), while the oriental tribes remained in peace.

Ver. 31. And after him was Shamgar the son of Anath.] It is not said of what tribe he was, and it is in vain to inquire about it; but it is probable he was one of those tribes that bordered upon the Philistines, because what he did was against them, and those were Judah, Dan, and Ephraim: nor is there the least signification how long he judged them; but he succeeding Ehud, his government was in some part of the fourscore years beforementioned: and, perhaps, it was not long before that time wherein Jabin oppressed Israel in the northern parts, as may be probably gathered from ver. 6.

Which slew of the Philistines six hundred men.] Now some of the people of Canaan made an attempt upon the Israelites, in the western parts, to bring them under their power. And these words sound as if Shamgar alone made opposition to them, and slew the number mentioned; being excited by the mighty power of God, which gave him unwonted courage and strength; for he was raised up, as the two foregoing great men had been, by a Divine inspiration, to be their judge, as appears by the last words of this verse.

With an ox-goad.] The Vulgar takes the Hebrew word malmud for a plough-share, and the LXX. favour this interpretation: but if we may judge by the derivation of the word, our translation is more probable; wherein we follow Kimchi and other learned Jews, who take it for the instrument whereby oxen are provoked (and, as it were, put in mind of their duty) when they draw the plough lazily. And thus Lycurgus is said to have overthrown the forces of Bacchus, without any other arms but βουπλῆγι, an ox-goad. So Homer describes the Bacchæ as put to flight ἀνδροφόνοιο Λυκούργου βουπλῆγι. (See Bochartus, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 18.)

And he also delivered Israel.] From hence it appears that he was a judge as well as the two former, though some both ancient and modern have questioned it; for this is the very phrase whereby they are described, ii. 9. 15. And the first words of this verse signify as much; which say, that after him (i. e. Ehud) was Shamgar, who succeeded him; that is, in the office of a judge, as the words naturally signify: and the great slaughter he made of the Philistines argues the same; for it manifestly was an heroical act, like that of Samson, who slew a thousand with the jaw-bone of an ass: neither of which could have been performed but by a Divine power wherewith they were possessed. It is not said here, indeed, how long he continued to judge them, nor from what oppressions he delivered them; but he is a deliverer who preserves a nation from being oppressed, as well as he who rescues them from oppression when they groan under it: and that it is likely was the case of Shamgar, who, when the Philistines came to invade his country, gave them a repulse with the loss of six hundred of their men; which, it is probable, discouraged them from further attempts. And this being done without any weapon but an ox-goad, it is likely he was at plough when the Philistines made this inroad to plunder and spoil the country; feeling a strong impulse upon him to oppose them, though he had no other arms, nor any to assist him, but such of his servants as were, perhaps, at plough with him. Thus some great men among the ancient Romans were called from the plough to be their dictators. But I will only add a strange passage out of the Midrash upon Lev. xvii. 3. who, mentioning these words, and he also delivered Israel, saith, "Thus he saved them by the hand of other judges, who being but flesh and blood, yet fell into slavery again; but in the age to come (i. e. of the Messiah) I in my own substance will redeem you, and ye shall not be reduced into servitude any more. According to what Isaiah saith, xlv. 17. But Israel shall be saved by the Lord with an everlasting salvation," &c. (See Raymund in his Pugio Fidei, p. 510.)

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. AND the children of Israel again did evil in the sight of the Lord.] See iii. 12.

After the death of Ehud.] And of Shamgar. Concerning whom there is no further mention made, because he did nothing more than this one memorable act; religion being reformed by Ehud, who left it so at the time of his death; when, it is likely, the Philistines, seeing their chieftain gone, made the forenamed inroad upon the Israelites; but they being not yet openly fallen into idolatry, God was pleased to raise up Shamgar to give them a repulse, before they could possess themselves of any part of the country, as the Moabites had done. After which blow, given them by this single champion, it was a long time before we read of any disturbance they gave them; though Shamgar, it is probable, lived but a short time after this noble achievement. And then, when Ehud and he had been some time dead, the Israelites forgot the wonderful works of God, and returned to their old sin: for so the words in the Hebrew are to be understood, which run thus, and Ehud was dead: for that particle ve, which we translate and, oft-times signifies because; and here makes these words the reason of their relapse, because Ehud was dead, who had been the great instrument of bringing them back to God, and keeping them, while he lived, in his service.

Ver. 2. And the Lord sold them.] Delivered them up to be made slaves. (See iii. 8.)

Into the hands of Jabin king of Canaan.] Of that part of the country where the people, properly called Canaanites, now dwelt under his government.

Who reigned in Hazor.] In the region belonging unto Hazor; for the city itself was burnt by Joshua, (Josh. xi. 10.) and the king of it also slain, as we read there, xii. 9. whose name also was Jabin, (Josh. xi. 1.) of whose posterity it is probable this Jabin was; whose name was common to all the kings of that country, as Pharaoh was to the kings of Egypt. It is possible, indeed, that Hazor might be rebuilt, as some other cities were, and possessed by the ancient inhabitants; but there is no need to suppose that; for he might reign in Hazor, just as the Moabites possessed Jericho; that is, the region appertaining to it. And according to the opinion I mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 30. Jabin is supposed to have invaded and brought under only the northern tribes; those in the east remaining at the same time in peace, after the expulsion of the Moabites; twenty years after which (Sir John Marsham makes account) Jabin's dominion over the northern tribes began. The text, indeed, makes no such distinction, the children of Israel in general being represented as sold under Jabin for their sins; yet it is said, ver. 10. that Barak gathered his army out of the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali, which are the tribes supposed to be alone oppressed by Jabin. Other tribes, indeed, joined with them, and they that did not, are very much blamed for it by Deborah in her song, even the Reubenites, and they beyond Jordan, (v. 14—16.) for it might very well be expected, that they who lived in peace and ease should be ready to assist their brethren who were heavily oppressed.

The captain of whose host was Sisera, who dwelt in Harosheth of the gentiles.] If we suppose that Hazor lay in its ruins, then Harosheth was the royal city, wherein Jabin dwelt, as well as Sisera. Which is called Harosheth of the gentiles, because people of several nations fled hither to be under his protection, when they heard that he had possessed himself of that country, and kept the Israelites out of it.

Ver. 3. And the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, for he had nine hundred chariots of iron.] His power was so increased, that they had no hope to redeem their liberty but by the help of the Lord. It may seem strange, that in this petty kingdom they should be so strong in chariots, when Mithridates had but a hundred in his army, and Darius no more than two hundred, as good authors inform us. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 9. p. 156.) I suppose they placed their chiefest strength in these, being not able to set out a great number of horsemen.

And twenty years they mightily oppressed the children of Israel.] Who groaned under a long servitude; during which time Jabin squeezed them, I suppose, by heavy exactions, which enabled him to raise greater forces than he had at first, when he brought them under his power. For God's anger increased by their frequent revolts from him; and he punished them more severely than he had done before by the Moabites; the Canaanites being the old inhabitants of the land, who hated them mortally, and kept them under a sorer as well as a longer oppression, than the Moabites had done.

Ver. 4. And Deborah the prophetess.] Such a one as Miriam, endued with Divine gifts of wisdom to instruct, direct, and govern others. For she was not only instructed with the knowledge of Divine things, but also was excited by the Holy Spirit (as Kimchi here notes) to declare the will of God to the people (which was the proper office of a prophet), as appears by the following part of this history. Her name in Hebrew signifies a bee; which hath been given (as learned men have observed) by other nations, to illustrious women. As among the Greeks, the nymph, said to be the nurse of Jove, is called Melissa; and the wife of Periander king of Corinth had the same name.

The wife of Lapidoth.] Or, as others translate it, a woman of Lapidoth; taking this word to signify a place, not a person. But our translation seems the most natural, and is to be preferred to that of R. Solomon and others, who translate it a woman of splendours; that is, an illustrious woman.

She judged Israel at that time.] Had the supreme authority over them; being so well known to be divinely inspired, that it procured her universal reverence, and submission to her judgment.

Ver. 5. And she dwelt under the palm-tree of Deborah.] Or, as the LXX. and the Vulgar understand it, she sat under the palm-tree, when she administered judgment. Whence the tree was called by her name; because it was the place where all resorted to her.

Between Ramah and Beth-el.] That is, in the confines of the tribes of Benjamin and Ephraim. For Ramah was a city in the tribe of Benjamin, and Beth-el in the tribe of Ephraim.

In Mount Ephraim.] In one of the mountains in the borders of that country; for though the tree was near both tribes, yet it stood in the tribe of Ephraim. The Jews (as appears by the Chaldee paraphrase) from hence conclude she was a very great woman, who had noble plantations in Jericho, Ramah, Beth-el, and other places; that is, of palms, saith R. Solomon, in Jericho, of vineyards in Ramah, and of olive-yards in the plain of Beth-el. And from her dwelling in a mountain, and being a prophetess, and a governess, and other things, some learned men imagine the story of the Theban sphinx was invented by the Greeks. (See Bochartus, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 6.)

And the children of Israel came up to her for judgment.] For direction and the ending of differences, by deciding causes; which none could do with such satisfaction as she did. By which it appears, that though Jabin oppressed them sorely, yet it was rather by rigorous taxations, than infringing all their laws; the course of which he did not stop, but suffered to be administered by their own officers. And he took the less notice of it, perhaps, because the supreme judicature was exercised by a woman; from whose power and authority he thought there was no reason to apprehend any danger. It may be probably hence gathered, that there was no such Sanhedrin in these days, as the Jews conceive there always was in the most early times: for why should they go to her for judgment, if there were a court of seventy eminent persons, then sitting at Shiloh?

Ver. 6. And she sent and called.] A plain act of authority, which was owned by the whole nation.

Barak the son of Abinoam.] Concerning whom we know no more (for, that he was Deborah's husband, or, as others say, her son, are ungrounded conceits of some of the Jews), but that he was born or dwelt in a famous city in the tribe of Naphtali, as it follows in the next words.

Out of Kedesh-Naphtali.] There were several cities of this name. One in the tribe of Issachar, (1 Chron. vi. 72.) another in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 23.) and therefore, for distinction's sake, this is called Kedesh-Naphtali; which was a city of great note, in the upper Galilee, belonging to the Levites, and a city of refuge.

And said unto him, Hath not the Lord God of Israel commanded, saying.] She could not think he doubted of the commission she now gave him from God; which he received as an oracle.

Go, and draw.] The Vulgar takes the word draw to signify gathering forces together: but the LXX. take it to be of the same import with the foregoing word; signifying that he should go till he drew near to Mount Tabor.

Towards Mount Tabor.] A noble mountain in Galilee, not far from Kedesh, in the tribe of Zebulun, and in the confines of Issachar and Manasseh; which had a very large plain at the top of it, as Josephus tells us, who calls it Staburium, lib. iv. de Bello Jud. cap. 2. where he might draw up an army, and exercise them very conveniently.

And take with thee ten thousand men.] Who were moved to list themselves under him, by the proclamation of this commission, which he brought with him from God.

Of the children of Naphtali, and of the children of Zebulun.] She thought he need go no further than these two tribes, which were nearest to him; but others also offered their service out of Manasseh and Issachar, as appears from ver. 14, 15.

Ver. 7. And I will draw unto thee.] These are the words of God (which Deborah pronounced in his name), signifying, as Arius Montanus understands the word draw, that he would, by his secret providence, incline Sisera to come within his power to destroy him; as hunters (unto whom warriors are compared) entice wild beasts to fall into their toils.

To the river Kishon.] Which was near Mount Tabor; having its beginning at the foot of it.

Sisera, the captain of Jabin's army, with his chariots and his multitude.] Wherewith he intended to encompass this mountain; and block up Barak till he forced him to yield up himself unto him.

And I will deliver him into thine hand.] This shews Deborah to have been endued with the highest gift of prophecy; which was to foretell certainly things to come.

Ver. 8. And Barak said unto her, If thou wilt go with me, then will I go; but if thou wilt not go with me, then I will not go.] He is commended for his faith in God by the apostle, Heb. xi. 32. as well as other great worthies in ancient time; though it was so weak and imperfect, that he made conditions with God's messenger, and absolutely refused to obey unless they were granted. He had great reason, he thought, for it; because he might want her advice in doubtful matters, and her authority also, both to gather soldiers, and to keep them together in good order, and to inspire them with courage. The LXX. here add a great many words, which make this the reason of his backwardness; that without her he should not be able to know the best time of giving Sisera battle.

Ver. 9. And she said, I will surely go with thee.] She saw he had faith enough to undertake the enterprise, and therefore consented to his proposal.

Notwithstanding the journey that thou takest.] In the Hebrew it is, the way that thou takest. Which may signify the course which he had resolved upon, not to go without her.

Shall not be for thine honour.] Though his faith was accepted, yet the weakness of it something eclipsed his glory.

For the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman.] It is a great part of the glory of a conqueror to take the general of the enemy's army, or to kill him with his own hand; which she tells him should be denied him, as a small punishment of his backwardness to do as he was bidden; and as he would not go without a woman, so a woman should take away this honour from him.

And Deborah arose, and went with Barak to Kedesh.] She made no delay, but immediately accompanied him to his own city; where he began, I suppose, his levy of men.

Ver. 10. And Barak called Zebulun and Naphtali to Kedesh.] He caused proclamation to be made of God's command, and his own intentions, in these two tribes; who resorted to him in great numbers.

And went up with ten thousand men.] He picked, I suppose, ten thousand men out of those who flocked to him; and went up with them to Mount Tabor.

At his feet.] That is, they followed him as their leader. Though it may signify that they were all footmen; there being no horses in Judea, which they brought out of other countries. This made the victory the more glorious, by the overthrow of a great many chariots and horses in the opposite army.

And Deborah went up with him.] To encourage him and his forces, now they were gathered.

Ver. 11. Now Heber the Kenite, who was of the children of Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses.] See Numb. x. 29. This is interposed to explain what follows concerning Jael, who was Heber's wife.

Had severed himself from the Kenites.] Who went along with the children of Judah, to settle among them, (Judg. i. 16.) What the reason was of Heber's leaving them, as they all left the plain of Jericho, is not known; but there was a special providence of God in it.

And pitched his tent.] The Kenites lived after the manner of the Midianites (from whom they descended), in tents, not in houses.

Unto the plain of Zaanaim.] A place in the tribe of Naphtali, (Josh. xix. 33.) where there was a plain, or (as the LXX. expound the Hebrew word alon) a grove of oaks, under the shadow of which their tents were pitched.

Which was by Kedesh.] Though they loved to live in the open fields, yet not far from a city.

Ver. 12. And they shewed Sisera that Barak the son of Abinoam was gone up to Mount Tabor.] They could not want intelligence of a thing done so publicly as this was; and the words seem to import, that Sisera had many who informed him of all that passed.

Ver. 13. And Sisera gathered together all his chariots, even nine hundred chariots of iron.] In which (as I said ver. 3.) their main strength consisted. But they being unfit for service in mountainous countries, as I have often observed, it is probable they placed them so below the mountain as to coop up Barak there; by seizing all the avenues, and hindering all provisions from being brought to him.

And all the people that were with him.] As great a number of footmen, as came to him upon the summons he sent forth, to require them to appear on this occasion. For so the word gathered together signifies in the Hebrew (as we observe in the margin of our Bibles), gathered by cry or proclamation.

From Harosheth of the gentiles, unto the river Kishon.] With whom he marched from that city to this river; which descended, as I said, from the foot of Mount Tabor.

Ver. 14. And Deborah said unto Barak, Up.] Make no delay.

For this is the day in which the Lord hath delivered Sisera into thine hand.] She speaks of the victory as already gained, that she might work in him a full assurance thereof. This doth not contradict what was said ver. 9. that God would sell Sisera into the hand of a woman: for both were true; he and his army were delivered into the hand of Barak, to be routed by him; but he, in his flight, fell into Jael's hands to be killed. How long this was after Sisera encamped at the river Kishon, we have no means to know; but it was upon some day when Deborah knew the army of Sisera lay secure in their quarters, or were about fortifying the passages more strongly; or were to be joined with greater forces; or some other way might be taken at advantage.

Is not the Lord gone out before thee?] As a general doth before his army; to animate, and raise their courage.

So Barak went down from Mount Tabor, and ten thousand men after him.] It is not said that Deborah went with him any farther than to Mount Tabor: where, it is likely, his faith was grown so strong, that he durst undertake any thing without her presence with him.

Ver. 15. And the Lord.] Who conducted Barak, as he did his army, (ver. 14.)

Discomfited Sisera, and all his chariots, and all his host.] They did not expect such a bold sally as this, which struck a sudden terror into them; for he fell upon them, it is likely, before they were aware, which put them into the greater confusion. The Lord also struck a terror into them (as the word hamam imports) by a noise of thunder and lightning; as the word is used 1 Sam. vii. 10. and also in Josh. x. 10. where we read the Canaanites were discomfited by great hailstones falling down upon them: or he made a terrible sound of horses and chariots rattling in their ears, by the ministry of his angels, in the clouds; as he did in the days of Elisha, (2 Kings vii. 6.) which seems to be acknowledged by Deborah, in her song in the next chapter, (ver. 20.)

With the edge of the sword.] This terror and confusion wherein they were, exposed them to be slain easily.

So that Sisera lighted down off his chariot.] Which he thought did not make haste enough to carry him out of danger; and, besides, made it known where he was.

And fled away on his feet.] As a common soldier, that he might not be discovered; and that he might likewise secure himself, by his speedy running: for anciently valiant men were wonderful swift of foot, as it is noted of Asahel, 2 Sam. ii. 18. and every one knows it was the character of the famous Achilles among the Grecks.

Ver. 16. But Barak pursued after the chariots, and after the host, unto Harosheth of the gentiles.] He resolved to follow his blow to the very gates of their own city.

And all the host of Sisera fell upon the edge of the sword.] In the pursuit, he and his men cut off all they overtook.

And there was not one of them left.] Which was their whole army; not one escaping to carry the news of their defeat to Jabin. Or, there was not one man to be seen in the way to Harosheth; but they were all scattered to shift where they could for themselves.

Ver. 17. Howbeit Sisera fled away on his feet to the tent of Jael wife of Heber the Kenite.] Only Sisera, by his swift running, got, as he thought, into a place of safety, in the tent of Jael; her husband, perhaps, being abroad in the field, and she only at home. Women also had their apartment by themselves, in a tent of their own, as appears by Gen. xxiv. 67. see there, and Gen. xxxi. 33. where he imagined no search would be made for him.

And there was peace between Jabin king of Hazor and the house of Heber the Kenite.] It seems Heber was a considerable person, who had a great family, and many dependants; like that of Abraham, Gen. xiv. 14. How he came to escape the sore oppression under which the Israelites groaned (being incorporated into their nation and religion), and to live at ease in a time of great distress, we can but conjecture. Perhaps their manner of life, retired from towns and company, made Jabin not fear any danger from them; and if they still kept close to their religion, when the Israelites were apostates, God inclined the heart of Jabin to be favourable to them, and give no molestation to his harmless neighbours; who, perhaps, purchased their freedom from vexation, by their frequent incursions.

Ver. 18. And Jael went out to meet Sisera.] She watched, it is likely, to hear the event of Sisera's expedition; and seeing him come with great speed towards her house, went out, to invite him there to repose himself.

And said unto him, Turn in, my lord, turn in; fear not.] She assured him there was nobody in the tent to do him any hurt. Which was true; and it is not certain that she now intended to do, what afterward she did.

And when he had turned in unto her into the tent, she covered him with a mantle.] Being weary, he desired to take some rest; when it was proper to throw a covering over him, to preserve him, being very hot, from taking cold. What kind of covering this was, which the Hebrews call semicha (and we translate mantle), is not very material. They say it was a thick covering, which hath flocks of wool on both sides; such as our double rugs. (See Bochart, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 42.)

Ver. 19. And he said unto her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water to drink, for I am thirsty.] By the heat of the fight, and his long running.

And she opened a bottle of milk.] Out of respect to him, she brought him the best liquor she had, and of the best sort; for it appears by ver. 25. of the next chapter, that the cream was not taken off from it. It is possible also she might design, by this draught, to throw him into a sounder sleep; for milk, when largely drank, flies up into the head, and causes drowsiness. But however that be, it is certain milk was anciently accounted the most agreeable nourishment, which Hippocrates calls ἀδελφὸν καὶ συγγενὲς to human bodies. And therefore the most warlike nations lived upon it, more than any other food; as Hermannus Conringius hath shewn at large in his book de Habitus Germanorum Corporum causis.

And gave him drink, and covered him.] He rose up to drink; and then lying down again, she covered him as before.

Ver. 20. Again he said unto her, Stand in the door of the tent.] Because he doth not say, Stand I pray thee (as he did before when he asked for drink), some fancy (particularly Arius Montanus) that he spake this imperiously; laying his commands upon her, as a confederate of his master: but I see no ground to think, that, when he was in such need of her friendship, he would take upon him so much as to give her a charge to do any thing, but rather entreat it of her.

And it shall be, when any man doth come and inquire of thee, and say, Is there any man here?] Who was not of their own family.

That thou shalt say, No.] They imagined there was no harm in telling an officious lie to deceive an enemy; that they might preserve a friend or ally, as he was.

Ver. 21. Then Jael Heber's wife took a nail of the tent.]

Or one of the great pins wherewith the tent was fastened to the ground. For she had no better instrument at hand (sword, or such-like weapon, being not usually kept in women's tents), and this she knew how to use more readily than any other; being accustomed, it is likely, when they removed from one place to another, to take up her tent, and to fasten it again by striking such nails into the earth.

And took a hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the nail into his temples.] Where it would most easily enter (being the thinnest part of the skull), and most speedily dispatch him.

And fastened it into the ground.] Upon which he lay (not on a bed), with a carpet, or some such thing under him; as the manner was in those countries.

For he was fast asleep and weary.] His weariness made him sleep soundly.

So he died.] She might as well have let him lie in his profound sleep, till Barak came, and took him; if she had not felt a Divine power moving her to this, that the prophecy of Deborah might be fulfilled. Nothing but this authority from God, of which she was certain, could warrant such a fact as this. Which seemed a breach of hospitality, and to be attended with several other crimes; but was not so, when God, the Lord of all men's lives, ordered her to execute his sentence upon him.

Ver. 22. And, behold, as Barak pursued Sisera, Jael came out to meet him.] As she had done Sisera, (ver. 18.).

And said unto him, Come, and I will shew thee the man whom thou seekest.] Before he made any inquiry, she knew he was desirous, above all men, to take Sisera; and, perhaps, she knew, by an inspiration, that he was in quest of him.

And when he came into the tent, behold, Sisera lay dead, and the nail was in his temples.] He lay in the place and posture wherein he was killed, that Barak might see the prophecy of Deborah made good.

Ver. 23. So God subdued on that day Jabin the king of Canaan before the children of Israel.] So that he was not able to oppress them any longer, but they were restored to perfect liberty.

Ver. 24. And the hand of the children of Israel prospered and prevailed against Jabin king of Canaan.] They prosecuted this day's victory with new successes; wherein his forces were overthrown in other battles, and his cities taken.

Until they had destroyed Jabin king of Canaan.] To the utter ruin of this kingdom of the Canaanites in Hazor: for Jabin himself, as Arius Montanus thinks, was slain at the brook Kishon, Psal. lxxxiii. 9. (though, it must be confessed, that may be meant only of his forces), so that we hear of none of his name in future times. And herein the Israelites seem to me to have begun to be sensible of their duty; which was to extirpate the people of Canaan, and not merely to bring them under tribute, (Deut. vii. 2—4.)

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. THEN sang Deborah, and Barak the son of Abinoam, in that day, this song.] It was composed by Deborah, (ver. 7.) being a prophetess, one of whose special gifts was to sing God's praises, (1 Chron. xxv. 1—3.) and commanded to be sung by the authority of Barak; who was now, I suppose, become a judge, upon this great deliverance God had wrought by him. For it is not to be thought that these two persons alone sang this song; but all the elders of the people were called together in one assembly to sing it with them; and they afterward delivered it to the people. It was likely it was composed and sung after they had completed their victory by the destruction of Jabin's kingdom. For the prophets were taught such sublimity of thought and speech, as is used in these songs, by their admiration of such wonderful events as they observed.

Ver. 2. Praise the Lord for the avenging of Israel, when the people willingly offered themselves.] It is evident to all, that this hymn is expressed in another kind of language, than the historical part of this book; and in a language so majestic, in such variety of elegant figures, and such native expressions of those affections which the occasion required, that none of the ancient Greek or Latin poets have equalled; at least it appears, there was a most excellent spirit of poetry among the Hebrews, especially such of them as were divinely moved, when the Greeks lay in dark ignorance.

And first she excites all the people to give thanks unto God, and acknowledge his wisdom and power, in taking vengeance of their oppressors, and in moving the hearts of so many especially in Naphtali and Zebulun, voluntarily to list themselves to fight against the Lord's enemies: where it is to be noted, that she very wisely excites them so to ascribe the victory unto God, as not to forget the instruments he used to obtain it; for that she knew would be a great encouragement to others in time to come, to engage themselves in such enterprises, when they saw these men so highly praised, and looked upon as employed by God in his service.

Ver. 3. Hear, O ye kings; give ear, O ye princes.] Next, she calls upon all the neighbouring potentates to give attentive heed unto her song; whereby they might understand what God had done for Israel, and learn from thence not to oppress them, when it was in their power; for fear of the same vengeance which God had taken upon Jabin.

I, even I, will sing unto the Lord; I will sing praises to the Lord God of Israel.] Who she would have the world know was superior to all in power, and would defend his people, while they depended on him alone.

Ver. 4. Lord, when thou wentest out of Seir, when thou marchedst out of Edom.] This is but a repetition of the same thing; Edom and Seir signifying the country where the posterity of Esau dwelt, who refused to give Israel a passage through their land, as the Lord led them into Canaan; and therefore he conducted them from thence another way, and made them encompass that land: (Numb. xxi. 4. Deut. ii. 1.) and when they had left it behind them (which is here called marching out of Edom), then he wrought for them astonishing things, as it follows in the next words.

The earth trembled, and the heavens dropped, the clouds also dropped water.] These are poetical phrases, to express the great consternation in which all those countries were, when they saw Sihon king of the Amorites, and Og the king of Bashan, overthrown on a sudden by the Israelites, and utterly destroyed. (See Numb. xxi. 21, &c.)

Ver. 5. The mountains melted from before the Lord.] All the inhabitants of those mountains.

Even that Sinai, from before the Lord God of Israel.] Just as Sinai trembled and quaked at the giving of the law.

In these two verses she turns her speech unto God, and commemorates his wonderful acts in former times, with which she compares the glorious deliverance he had given them now: as much as to say, his power was not at all decayed, but he was as terrible to his enemies in her days, as he had been in former times.

Ver. 6. In the day of Shamgar the son of Anath, in the days of Jael.] The sense of this verse will be very plain, if we translate these words, as I think the Hebrew will bear, from the days of Shamgar, &c. After his death they fell into sin and great misery. And Jael is here mentioned, not as a judge (as Rasi and Ralbag fancy), but as a great woman of a masculine and valiant spirit, who yet could do nothing to hinder those spoils that were committed.

The highways were unoccupied.] The people being corrupted in their religion, broke out into all manner of violence, and turned highway-robbers; so that men durst not travel in the common road upon their occasions, but were fain to seek for by-paths, because the highways were infested by thieves: or this may be meant of robberies which Jabin's soldiers committed, after he had brought them in subjection to him; who took no care to protect the Israelites, but suffered their country to be ravaged by his troops.

The travellers walked through by-ways.] In the Hebrew (as in the margin of our Bibles is observed) the words are, the walkers of paths: by which we may understand men accustomed to travel, who, though they went in great companies together, yet durst not venture in the direct road, but went about through crooked ways (as the Hebrew word signifies, which we translate by-ways), by which means commerce was very much obstructed.

Ver. 7. The inhabitants of the villages ceased, they ceased in Israel.] Men were not safe in their own houses; which were broken open, if they lived in villages, and therefore they forsook them, and fled to walled towns, and fortified places.

Until that I Deborah arose.] This some of the Jews take to be a proud and arrogant expression, for which the Holy Spirit was taken from her: but Rasi (who reports this conceit) soberly acknowledges, that they are not words of boasting, but of joy and gladness.

That I arose a mother in Israel.] A judge or ruler of God's people. For, as men that governed were called fathers of their country, so it was proper for her, being a woman, to call herself a mother in Israel; among whom she did such great things, and governed with so much prudence, that it made her famous in other countries. For very learned men think, as I noted above, that the story of Sphinx among the Greeks was made out of the history of Deborah, she being a judge among the Bœotians, as Deborah was in Israel. (See Bochart in the book beforenamed; and Hermannus Witsius more lately, in his Miscellanea Sacra, lib. i. cap. 23.)

Ver. 8. They chose new gods.] That is, the Israelites, after the death of Ehud, forsook the Lord, and served Baalim and Ashtaroth, (as they had done formerly, ii. 13. iii. 7.) or perhaps they introduced the worship of some other gods, whom they had not served before, fancying they might be more powerful than their former had proved.

Then was war in the gates.] This was the fountain of all their calamities; for God immediately delivered them into the hand of some enemy or other, who possessed themselves of their cities and strong holds; for that is the meaning of war in the gates. Their enemies seized on their cities and fortresses; for their strength was in their gates; where sat also the courts of justice.

Was there spear or shield seen among forty thousand in Israel?] They were generally disarmed, for the securing their subjection to the Canaanites; as afterward the Philistines took the same course with them, (1 Sam. xiii. 19.) Here the Targum makes a strange excursion in mustering up the many thousand commanders, and sword-men, and spear-men, and archers, &c. that were in the army of Sisera.

Ver. 9. My heart is towards the governors of Israel, that offered themselves willingly among the people.] It seems there were some of the greatest men in the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun, who, of their own accord, hazarded their lives, among the common people, in this service: towards whom she expresses a singular affection; and, with the praises of God, mixes the commendation of those who were his instruments in this deliverance.

Bless ye the Lord.] This is added, like a prophetess, who, when she commends the most deserving men, carries their thoughts up to God, who gave them that courage and good success. Abarbinel had a conceit came into his head, as he tells us, when he was commenting on these words, that by chokkee Israel (which Kimchi interprets as we do, the great men of Israel), are meant the scribes, whose office it was to register all notable passages, particularly the causes of wars, and their events; whom Deborah exhorts to bless the Lord, and when they wrote the history of this war, to ascribe the success to the Divine favour. But it is not likely they had such scribes in these ages, as it is likely they had in future times; much less such plenty of them now in these confused days, that Deborah should make a particular address to them to do their duty.

Ver. 10. Speak.] i. e. Give thanks to God.

Ye that ride on white asses.] She calls upon such men, as the governors beforementioned, to proclaim aloud the praises of God. There were no horses in Judea, but what were brought out of other countries, so that the greatest persons rode on asses, as appears by the Scripture story; but in this country they were commonly of a red colour, (whence an ass hath the name of chamor, as Bochart observes, lib. ii. Hieroz. cap. 12.) and therefore white asses (or, as he translates this word, whitish, or that were of a colour inclining to white) were highly esteemed for their rarity, and used only by honourable persons; who could not appear in any splendour during their servitude under Jabin, but now were restored to their dignity; for which she would have them praise the Lord.

Ye that sit in judgment.] With whom she exhorts the judges to join, who now sat in the gates, as they were wont to do, which were not possessed by their enemies, (ver. 8.) Or perhaps this belongs to the foregoing clause, it being probable that these judges rode about the country on white asses to do justice. (See upon x. 4.)

And walked by the way.] All the merchants who now travelled safely about their business, which they durst not do before this deliverance; (ver. 6.) for which, therefore, they were bound to praise the Lord.

Ver. 11. They that are delivered from the noise of archers in the places of drawing water.] Together with the princes, judges, and merchants, she would have the shepherds praise the Lord every time they came to water their flocks; remembering how they were disturbed formerly by the archers, that lurked in woods or thickets, and shot whole quivers of arrows at them and at their cattle, which now they brought safely to the springs of water.

There shall they rehearse the righteous acts of the Lord.] Who had taken a just vengeance on their oppressors, and most graciously delivered them from their tyranny; for righteousness frequently signifies the great goodness of God.

Even the righteous acts towards the inhabitants of his villages in Israel.] She would have the meanest peasants (as we speak) bear them company in the praises of God; for now they lived as quietly in their open villages, as if they had been in the strongest cities.

Then shall the people of the Lord go down to the gates.] She sums up all in these words; that the whole country was bound to praise the Lord, who had given the law its free course; every man having liberty to go down safely to the gate of his own city, where judgment was administered.

Ver. 12. Awake, awake, Deborah; awake, awake; utter a song.] Having called upon all others to praise the Lord, she now excites herself, with the most earnest and zealous affection (expressed by the repetition of the same thing four times), to celebrate his wonderful works, by composing a song in his praise.

Arise, Barak, and lead thy captivity captive, thou son of Abinoam.] She calls upon Barak to go in triumph, carrying (as the manner was in ancient times) his principal captives and spoils along with him unto the house of God: for one cannot think she meant merely a secular pompous show; since the Romans themselves in their triumphs marched to the capitol, and there offered sacrifice to Jupiter. Some ask, what captives he had to lead, when the whole army of Sisera was cut off? (iv. 16.) To which the answer is easy, That when Barak, after he had routed their army, pursued his victory as far as Harosheth, he brought several persons, and perhaps of the best quality, captive with him, out of that country.

Ver. 13. Then he made him that remaineth have dominion over the nobles among the people.] Or, then he shall make him that remaineth, &c. that is, when Barak triumphed, that small remnant of Israel (as the best of the Jews interpret him that remaineth) who were not utterly dispirited by the oppression of Jabin, but had some courage left in them, triumphed together with him over the nobles of Canaan.

The Lord made me have dominion over the mighty.] She, who was but a weak woman, triumphed also over the most powerful enemies.

Ver. 14. Out of Ephraim was there a root of them against Amalek.] Now she makes a catalogue of those who any way assisted in this war, as Homer doth of those people who equipped ships for the war against Troy: and I find no sense of these words so plain as this, that the Amalekites coming to assist Sisera, as they had done the Moabites, (iii. 13.) a small party of the Ephraimites (called here a root) opposed their passage, and hindered them from joining their forces with the Canaanites. Peter Martyr by a root understands a great captain among them, as in Isa. xi. 10. the word is thought to be used. But a most learned friend of mine (Dr. Alix) admonishes me, that Amalek doth not only signify the people descended from Amalek, but a mountain in the tribe of Ephraim, mentioned xii. 15. And, if we understand it so in this place, it makes this clear sense far easier and more natural than the other, out of Ephraim was their beginning (so the word root may be interpreted) about Amalek. That is, the Ephraimites, who came to the assistance of Barak, began their listing of men near to this mountain. And so the particle beth (I observed upon Josh. x. 10.) signifies as well near or about, as in or against.

After thee, Benjamin, among thy people.] Following the example of the tribe of Benjamin; who seem to have all of them engaged in this quarrel, with whom a few of the Ephraimites joined.

Out of Machir.] An eminent family in Manasseh; which is put here for all that tribe on the other side Jordan, where Machir was settled, (Numb. xxxii. 39. Josh. xiii. 31.) Which made their zeal the more remarkable, in coming so far to the aid of their brethren; when they heard they were engaged in this enterprise.

Came down governors.] Some of the principal persons of that country; who, no doubt, had their followers, that accompanied them in this expedition.

And out of Zebulun they that handle the pen of the ready writer.] They were nearer to Mount Tabor than any of the forenamed; but are therefore highly commended, that though they were better skilled in books than in arms, yet offered their service to Barak on this occasion: for scribes in Scripture signify men of letters, that studied the law, and expounded it.

Ver. 15. And the princes of Issachar were with Deborah.] Came and offered their service, when they heard that Barak, by her order, had summoned their neighbours Zebulun and Naphtali to come to him, (iv. 10.)

Even Issachar.] And the people of that tribe followed the example of their princes.

And also Barak.] The Hebrew chen (translated here and also) signifies as, or like unto; that is, they were as forward as Barak to march into the field, though they had no summons.

He was sent on foot into the valley.] That is, when he was sent down from Mount Tabor, by the order of Deborah, (iv. 14.) to fall upon Sisera in the valley; whither he went on foot, against his chariots and horsemen: or, he went with his footmen (as the LXX. translate it), and engaged that vast number of chariots, which were of greatest use in the valley.

For the divisions of Reuben there were great thoughts of heart.] But the Reubenites were so divided in their counsels, that they stayed at home (as if they were separated from their brethren in their affections, as they were in their situation, beyond Jordan), which begat many sad thoughts in the hearts of the rest of the Israelites; who could not understand the reason of it.

Ver. 16. Why abodest thou among the sheepfolds, to hear the bleatings of the flocks?] It was a shameful and an unaccountable thing, that they should wholly mind their private business (which was feeding cattle, Numb. xxxii. 1.) and neglect the public good.

For the divisions of Reuben there were great searchings of hearts.] And therefore she could not sufficiently bewail it; which she doth, by repeating what a great trouble it was to all their brethren; who were not able to discover the reason, and give any account of their being no more concerned than their beasts, for their common religion and liberties.

Ver. 17. Gilead abode beyond Jordan.] She complains also of the Gileadites, who were men of valour; and notwithstanding sat still, and would not step over Jordan to help their brethren. Under the name of Gilead, are comprehended the Gadites, who had half of Gilead, (Josh. xiii.) as the other half was given to the children of Machir. Who did come to the aid of their brethren; at least their governors engaged with them, (ver. 14.) Which hath moved some to read these words interrogatively, Did Gilead abide beyond Jordan? as if she still upbraided the Reubenites; who had not this to allege for themselves, that they were far off, beyond Jordan; for so were the Gileadites (that is, those descended from Machir), who they suppose comprehended the rest; and yet the best and most worthy of them came to join with their brethren, in the common cause of the nation.

And why did Dan remain in ships?] She reproves this tribe, which was near the sea (the famous port of Joppa belonging to it), that they minded nothing but their merchandise; while their brethren hazarded their lives in the field.

Asher continued on the sea-shore.] This tribe also bordered upon the Mediterranean; Tyre and Sidon being part of their portion. Which they did not possess; yet, no doubt, they held several other lesser places upon that sea; from which they would not stir in this common danger.

And abode in his breaches.] Or, in his creeks, as it is in the margin; and as the LXX. take it, who expound the Hebrew word miphratsim (fractures) by διεξόδοις, outlets, or small havens; where vessels lay, to go out to sea. Some take the words to signify, that they were busy in repairing the breaches made in their walled towns, by length of time, or other ways.

Ver. 18. Zebulun and Naphtali were a people that jeoparded their lives unto the death.] They were the only people (which was much for their honour) who unanimously despised life, in comparison with the liberty of their country and religion. For the Hebrew word charaph doth not signify merely to expose one's self to danger; but to expose one's self to reproach, as we observe in the margin of our Bibles: and here denotes that they made no account of their lives, &c.

In the high places of the field.] They went down from Mount Tabor (where they were drawn up in a large plain, as I observed on iv. 6.) with a resolution to conquer or die.

It is observable, that, in this narration, there is not a word said of Judah, or Simeon, or Gad (unless comprehended under Gilead, as I said before); and that as Reuben, Dan, and Asher are taxed for their cowardly carelessness in this case, so Ephraim, Benjamin, part of Manasseh, and Issachar did afford some assistance; but nothing comparable to what Zebulun and Naphtali did; who, as one man, engaged to hazard their lives and fortunes (as we now speak) for the regaining of their liberty; which was the more highly commendable, because they were but a handful of men, when they first engaged, in comparison with the vast army which they undertook to assault.

Ver. 19. The kings came and fought.] When the Israelites conquered Canaan, Hazor had several kingdoms subject to it, or depending on it, (Josh. xi. 10.) And now, it is likely, there were divers kings, who were, at least, Jabin's confederates; and came to join their forces with his, to reduce the Israelites to his obedience.

Then fought the kings of Canaan in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo.] These were two cities belonging to the Manassites, but in the tribe of Issachar; (Josh. xvii. 11.) between which, as Rasi understands it, the army of Sisera lay; reaching from Taanach to Megiddo, by which the river Kishon ran.

They took no gain of money.] The simple sense seems to be, that they were kings of such bravery, as fought not for money, but for glory and dominion; so Rasi and Ralbag among the Jews understand it; They fought not for pay, but came gratis (as we speak) to the assistance of Jabin. But the Vulgar takes it otherwise; They got nothing but blows, no spoil or prey at all, as they expected. And Kimchi still much differently (which the words will bear), They came so enraged against the Israelites, that they would have spared no man's life, though he offered great sums of money for his redemption; because they thirsted only after their blood.

Ver. 20. They fought from heaven.] But, on the other side, God fought for the Israelites, by sending thunder, and lightning, and hailstones from heaven upon the Canaanites (as he did in the days of Joshua); and, perhaps, as P. Martyr conjectures, raising a great dust, which a stormy wind blew so violently into their eyes, that they could not see. As Livy saith it fell out to the Romans, in the great battle at Cannæ.

The stars in their courses fought against Sisera.] Some take these words literally, and render the words, not in their courses, but in their exaltations, i. e. with all their power and strongest influences: whence the saying of Rasi, on this place, The head, or beginning of the stars is in heaven; but the feet, or the end of them, is upon the earth. That is, hither they send their influences. But others think these words signify, that all this was done by the ministry of angels, who are here called stars, (as in the book of Job, xxxvii. 7.) because he is speaking of heaven; from whence they came to raise this terrible tempest, and, by other means which we are ignorant of, to trouble the host of Jabin, as they did that of Pharaoh in the Red Sea: and this they did in such rank and order, as is observed in that heavenly host.

It may be also thought, that, this fight lasting till night, the stars may be said to fight against Sisera, because they shone brightly to give light to the Israelites to pursue their victory.

Ver. 21. The river Kishon swept them away.] It so swelled at this time, that, though otherwise it was very shallow, many of them were drowned in it; being carried away with a rapid stream: for so the word jerapham signifies, which we translate swept them away. It is no where else found; but frequent among the Arabic authors, among whom it is commonly used in this sense; as Bochart shews, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 16. and 42. It is likely there was a great flood, which was made by that sudden violent rain, which fell in the forenamed tempest.

That ancient river, the river Kishon.] It is an elegancy used by orators themselves (as we find in Cicero) to repeat the same words, when there is great occasion. And here she makes an addition to the same word; by calling Kishon that ancient river; because of some other great exploit performed there in ancient time; the memory of which is now lost. But Kedumim some take to be a proper name, and another name of the same river Kishon.

O my soul, thou hast trodden down strength.] This is an elegant apostrophe (or turning of her speech) to herself; whose happiness she applauds, in beholding the most powerful enemies quite vanquished, by her commission which she gave from God, and by her prayers to him: for none can doubt that she implored help from heaven, while Barak fought with Sisera.

Ver. 22. Then were the horse-hoofs broken.] They could not save themselves by flight, their horse-hoofs being broken in stony places, when they ran away as fast as they were able.

By the means of their prancings.] The more haste they made the worse speed (as the common saying is), for they running full gallop (so the Jews interpret the Hebrew word dahar [prancings] to signify the swiftest course), they trod the harder on the ground, and were in the more danger to break their hoofs.

The prancings.] The Hebrews wanting a superlative degree in their language, are wont to double a word (as Peter Martyr here observes); and therefore prancings, prancings, he thinks, are not here an ornament of speech, but signify the most vehement motion, when a horse is in his full speed.

Of their mighty ones.] Of their best and strongest horses: for the word abbirim in Hebrew, as Bochart observes, signifies not only strong bulls, but horses also. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 6.)

Ver. 23. Curse ye Meroz.] Most interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, understand by Meroz a city not far from the place where the fight was. Which seems to be proved by the following words, where he speaks of the inhabitants thereof. But R. Sol. Jarchi thinks Meroz signifies a potent person in those parts, who being able to give great assistance to Barak, and living near Mount Tabor, refused to do any thing. And this is the opinion of the Talmudists (whom Jarchi is wont to follow), as Mr. Selden shews out of the Gemara Babylon, lib. i. de Synedriis, cap. 6. p. 123, &c. where they fancy that this great man was excommunicated by Deborah, with all his adherents; and hence they fetch the ground and original of the excommunication in use among them: which is an idle conceit; there being no such thing as excommunication practised among them, till they had quite lost their civil government, and it was in the hands of the heathen.

Saith the angel of the Lord.] She would not have it thought that this curse proceeded from her anger, but from the authority of God, who, by his angel, which spake to her, denounced it against Meroz. And who should this angel be, but the Captain of the Lord's host, mentioned Josh. v. 14.? (See there.)

Curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof.] They that take Meroz for a person, by inhabitants understand those that dwelt near him, and were his dependants or associates; which is very forced.

Because they came not to the help of the Lord.] The battle was the Lord's, as the Scripture elsewhere speaks, and therefore they that refused to engage in it, refused to maintain his cause: and the people of this place are so heavily cursed, when all others that came not in to help their brethren are only discommended, because they lived so near, that they might easily have joined their forces with them, whereas some others lived a great way off, which might something excuse them.

To the help of the Lord against the mighty.] According to this translation of the last word, she means their most powerful enemies; but the Hebrew may as well be translated with the mighty; that is, with other valiant men, who freely offered their service in this enterprise. This aggravated their guilt, that when they had such noble examples of zeal from others, who were less able to help, they would afford no assistance.

Ver. 24. Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be.] On the other side, she desires Jael may be ever praised; or rather foretells she shall always continue famous, and her husband too, in future generations.

Blessed shall she be above women in the tent.] This is thought to be a wishing, or promising her all happiness in her domestic affairs. But P. Martyr thinks it may be interpreted, Blessed shall she be for what she did in her tent. Which was no less glorious, than what others did in the field.

Ver. 25. He asked water, and she brought him milk.] Her prudence is first commended, in treating him with great respect, that he might entertain no suspicion of danger.

She brought forth butter.] Milk from which the cream (of which butter is made) was not separated.

In a lordly dish.] The Hebrew word sephel (which we translate dish) is no where else found, but in the story of Gideon in the next chapter, vi. 38. where we translate it a bowl. From whence Bochart rightly concludes, it signifies a large and wide vessel, (par. i. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 49.) which explains the word lordly or princely; which doth not signify that she had any gold or silver vessel in her tent (which was not agreeable to their manner of living), but that she brought him milk in the best vessel she had, and that very capacious: for out of such great men were wont to drink, as Pet. Martyr observes out of Cicero against M. Antony.

Ver. 26. She put her hand to the nail.] Next her courage and fortitude is celebrated: and by hand is to be understood her left, wherewith she held the nail, as with her right hand the hammer.

And her right hand to the workmen's hammer.] A lively description how she went about this work; just as if she had been fastening her tent.

And with her hammer she smote Sisera.] The Hebrew word halam, which we translate smote, signifies such a blow as makes a contusion.

She smote off his head.] The word machak, which is commonly translated cut off, cannot have that signification here; because there is not the least indication in this story of her cutting off his head from the body, but only of striking it through, as here it must be understood.

When she had pierced and stricken through his temples.] Here are two words more, machatz and chalaph, signifying penetrating and boring quite through. And the place is specified where his head was perforated, which was in his temples, the softest part of it, which gave the easiest entrance to the nail.

Ver. 27. At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down.] In the Hebrew, between her feet, &c. which some of the Talmudists have abused to a lewd sense; justly censured by Kimchi: who observes, that this is according to the style of the Hebrew language, which reduplicates words, that they may more strongly affirm what is said; and these words, he bowed, he fell, signify (he thinks) such a fall that he never rose up again. But taking all these expressions together [he bowed, he fell, he lay down], they seem to me to import, that, at the first stroke, he started and lifted up his body; but being very much stunned, he soon laid down again.

At her feet he bowed, he fell.] Then I suppose she repeated her stroke, which perfectly disabled him to move.

Where he bowed, there he fell down dead.] And at the third stroke, it is likely, she fastened his head to the ground. But this repetition doth not certainly argue that she gave so many blows (though it may pass for a probable conjecture); for it is an usual elegancy in such composures, wherein she intended to set out this fact of Jael's with the highest encomiums. Some may fancy, indeed, that it deserved reprehension, rather than commendation, upon many accounts; being a breach of the laws of hospitality, and of the peace which was between her family and Jabin, &c. But this fact is not to be measured by the common rules which are to govern us, it being an extraordinary, heroic, and Divine work, unto which she was excited by God; whose people Jabin oppressed with a cruel servitude, from which God ordered Barak to be their deliverer; who, having defeated all his forces in a miraculous manner, Jael understood there was a Divine hand in this victory, and was moved by the same spirit which stirred up Deborah and Barak, to help, by this act, to complete their shameful overthrow. For nothing could be more dishonourable, than for a great captain to fall thus by the hand of a woman.

Ver. 28. The mother of Sisera looked out at a window.] Was in earnest longings and expectations to see him return victorious.

And cried through the lattice.] Either fear of some miscarriage, or impatient desire, made her cry out with a lamentable voice; as the word jabab in the Hebrew signifies.

Why is his chariot so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariot?] Having such numerous forces, they promised themselves an easy and speedy victory over a handful of the Israelites; and therefore wondered what retarded his coming back, with all his chariots, in triumph.

Ver. 29. Her wise ladies answered her.] The Vulgar takes the Hebrew words to signify, one of the wisest of his wives (who was not so apt to despair as his mother) replied to her. For it is well observed by Terence, in his Adelphi (as Pet. Martyr here notes), "Multo satius est, ea evenire nobis quæ de absentibus suspicantur uxores quam ea quæ parentes." It is much better that those things should happen to their absent husbands, which their wives suspect, than those which their parents fear. But I see no reason to depart from our translation, which is the same with the LXX. αἱ σοφαὶ ἄρχουσαι, the prudent noble women that attended her, &c.

Yea, she returned answer to herself.] Upon better consideration, her hopes exceeded her fears.

Ver. 30. Have they not sped?] She did not think it possible they should miscarry.

Have they not divided the prey?] She was willing to be confident they had got the victory; and therefore imputed their stay to the time that must needs be taken up in making an equal division of the spoil. For those days were not like to ours, wherein every man keeps to himself what he can lay his hands upon; but after the battle, they were obliged to bring all that they had gotten to the general of the army; who considered every man's quality and desert, and accordingly distributed the prey among them.

To every man a damsel or two.] Young virgins are by all historians and poets reckoned as a principal part of the soldiers' prey. And she puts here an unusual word for a damsel, which is racham; for it properly signifies a womb, and seems here to be spoken by way of contempt, as if they were good for nothing but to serve their filthy appetites.

To Sisera a prey of divers colours, a prey of divers colours of needle-work, of divers colours of needle-work on both sides.] These were the richest part of the spoil, being highly esteemed by all people, as Pliny observes, lib. viii. cap. 48. where he mentions great variety of them, both in his own and in ancient time: for he takes notice, that Homer mentions pictas vestes, as he calls them, painted garments, which shined with flowers and trees in beautiful colours; which the Phrygians afterward wrought with needles; and Attalus invented the interweaving gold in them: but for divers-coloured garments, Babylon was above all places famous; from whence they had the name of Babylonish garments, which were much valued even in those early times, as appears by the story of Achan, Josh. vii. 21. and they were of such account in aftertimes, that every one was not permitted to wear them, but only the greater sort of persons (as Pet. Martyr observes out of the Roman laws), which may be the reason that here they are appropriated to Sisera as his part of the spoil.

Meet for the necks of them that take the spoil?] That is, of the chief commanders, to whom the spoil, as I said, was brought to be divided. In the Hebrew the words are, for the necks of the spoil; which Kimchi expounds, the head of the prey. As if she had said, These are to be put in the head of the prey; and therefore fit to be given only to the general of the army.

Ver. 31. So let all thy enemies perish, O Lord.] From hence she takes occasion to convert her speech to God, beseeching him, that all his enemies may be thus disappointed of their vain hopes.

But let all them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might.] Increase in power and force, as the sun doth from the time of its rising till it comes to its meridian height.

And the land had rest forty years.] These forty years are to be computed from the time of Ehud, as our great primate thinks, who thus translates these words, The land rested in the fortieth year, after the former rest which was restored to it by Ehud. (See him ad A. M. 2719.) But it is far more reasonable to compute them from the conquest of Jabin by the northern tribes; after which, the whole country lived in peace for the space of forty years, till the Midianites, as it follows, sorely oppressed them.

I conclude this chapter as Conradus Pellicanus doth; "Let some Homer or Virgil go now, and compare his poetry, if he be able, with the song of this woman. And if there be any one that excels in eloquence and learning, and hath more leisure than I, celebrate the praises and learning of this panegyric more copiously."

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. AND the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord.] After the death of Deborah and Barak (who kept them, I suppose, in the true religion), they relapsed to idolatry.

And the Lord delivered them into the hand of Midian seven years.] Because it is not said, that the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, (as in chap. ii. 14. iii. 8, &c.) nor that he sold them into the hand of Midian (which is the expression, iv. 2. and other places), Pet. Martyr thinks they were not altogether so bad as they had been formerly; and therefore God was pleased to shorten the tyranny of the Midianites over them; who, being their old enemies, as they came through the wilderness, and having been, in a manner, utterly destroyed by the Israelites, (Numb. xxxi.) were very much disposed to take a sharp revenge: for that those Midianites who were neighbours to Moab are here meant, is evident from their situation, which was beyond Jordan, (vii. 24, 25. viii. 4.) and by the people that joined with them, who were the children of the east, (ver. 3.) whereas the other Midianites, where Jethro lived, were in the south, near the Red Sea. Some fancy, indeed, that the Midianites, neighbours to Moab, being cut off by Moses, there was no such nation. But it must be considered, that some of them saved themselves by flight into other countries, and, after the Israelites were settled in Canaan, returned again; and, in near two hundred years' time, may well be thought to have repeopled their country, especially by the help of other people, who came, it is likely, and planted among them; and being seated in the same country, are all called Midianites.

Ver. 2. And the hand of Midian prevailed against Israel.] They brought the Israelites in subjection to them, and were the fourth nation that oppressed them, after the Mesopotamians, Moabites, and Canaanites.

And because of the Midianites, the children of Israel made them the dens that are in the mountains, and caves, and strong holds.] They betook themselves to these places for safety; for, I suppose, they did not now make them, but made them their retreat. And by the first word minhareth, is meant those hollow places in the rocks upon the mountains, where men might hide themselves, and make them their habitation; there being cracks and holes in them here and there, to let in light, as the Hebrew word signifies. And the second word maharoth denotes such caves as were in the fields, made either by nature, or by art and labour; which being dark, were fit only to hide their goods and provision in them. And the third word mitzaroth signifies such fortresses, as secured themselves, and families, and cattle, and all they could carry thither. But this shews their condition was very lamentable, in that they were driven from their houses in the villages, and cities too; at least the richest of them durst not trust themselves there, but fled to strong holds for safety.

Ver. 3. And so it was, that when Israel had sown.] They did not disturb them in seed-time, but let them be quiet till they had ploughed and sowed their land.

Then the Midianites came up, and the Amalekites, and the children of the east.] This shews, that some of the same people joined with the Midianites, that did formerly with the Moabites, when they oppressed Israel, (iii. 13.) For by the children of the east, are meant some of the people of Arabia, as Procopius notes, who observes Josephus to be of the same mind: for Arabia lay east of Egypt, where the Israelites learnt to speak in this manner.

Even they came up against them.] Entered the land of Israel with such armies as might destroy the fruits of the earth; as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 4. And they encamped against them.] The Vulgar translate it, They pitched their tents among them; which signifies them to have been an Arabian people, or such as lived after their manner.

And destroyed the increase of the earth.] Having formed a camp, they sent out parties from thence well armed to destroy all the corn, and the rest of the fruits of the earth.

Until thou come unto Gaza.] That is, they made an universal devastation from one end of the country to the other; for they came from the east, and destroyed all till they came to the western coast, where Gaza was.

And left no sustenance for Israel.] Whom they intended to famish.

Neither sheep, nor ox, nor ass.] Their camels and other cattle, which they brought along with them, having eaten up all; for they were so numerous, as we are told in the following verse, that they overspread the whole country.

Ver. 5. For they came up with their cattle.] Not merely an army of men, but of cattle of all sorts, came on purpose to make this destruction.

And their tents.] With their whole families, that they might be able to consume the more.

And they came up as grasshoppers for multitude.] Or, as locusts (as the word arba is commonly translated), which have their very name from the vast numbers wherein they were wont to come, and were most devouring creatures.

For both they and their camels were without number.] No country more abounded with camels than Midian; (as I observed before out of Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 2.) and they are only peculiarly mentioned, because the Midianites were more famous for them than for horses or other beasts.

And they entered into the land to destroy it.] Their very design was to depopulate the country by this means.

Ver. 6. And Israel was greatly impoverished because of the Midianites.] For the fruits of their land being thus destroyed, their money was drained from them to purchase corn from other countries.

And the children of Israel cried unto the Lord.] Who never failed to help them, when they truly turned to him.

Ver. 7. And it came to pass, when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, because of the Midianites.] Though the poverty which pinched them was that which moved them to cry unto God for relief, yet he was so gracious as to send one to make them sensible of their sin.

Ver. 8. That the Lord sent a prophet unto the children of Israel.] Whom the Jews fancy to have been Phinehas, which is not probable, men not commonly then living to the age of two hundred years, which he must be of, and more, if he were the prophet now sent to them. It is far more likely, that God still continued other prophets among them, beside the high-priest, to put them in mind of their duty, and to call them to repentance when they forsook him. And it appears by the foregoing story, that there was a woman who had the spirit of prophecy; which shews that, at least, upon special occasions, he raised up such persons among them.

Which said unto them.] At some great festival, it is likely, when they were all assembled.

Thus saith the Lord God of Israel.] This is the style in which the prophets commonly spake.

I brought you up from Egypt, and brought you forth out of the house of bondage.] All the prophets put them in mind of this, as the greatest obligation upon them, to be entirely devoted to God's service. See Exod. xix. 4—6. where God himself tells them for what purpose he had delivered them from that bondage. And see Josh. xxiv. 5, 6.

Ver. 9. And I delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians.] Who, when they pursued them to bring them back into slavery, were all drowned in the Red Sea.

And out of the hand of all that oppressed you.] That endeavoured to oppress them; such as the Amalekites, Sihon, and Og, who opposed their passage to Canaan.

And drave them out from before you, and gave you their land.] By the hand of Joshua, who settled them in the land which God promised to them. All this is said to put them in mind how faithfully God had performed his covenant with them, and to upbraid them with their own infidelity.

Ver. 10. And I said unto you, I am the Lord your God.] See Exod. xx. 1. Deut. v. 6. vi. 4.

Fear not the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell.] Do not worship them, nor imagine they can do you any harm, (Deut. vii. 12—14. Josh. xxiv. 14, 15.)

But ye have not obeyed my voice.] Which was the cause of all the evil that had befallen them, and would still continue, if they did not now hearken unto him, as they desired him to hear their cry. This, no doubt, the prophet pressed upon them, in more words than are here set down, these being only the heads of his speech.

Ver. 11. And there came an angel of the Lord.] The Israelites laid the application of the prophet's speech to their heart (it is to be supposed), and began to reform their ways, which moved him to send an angel to appoint them a deliverer; for he is called an angel of the Lord, both here and ver. 12. 20—22.

And sat under an oak.] In a grove of trees (as Arius Montanus understands it), where there was one great well-spread oak, in which there was a seat.

Which was in Ophrah.] The city where Gideon was born and lived, (viii. 27.)

That pertaineth unto Joash the Abi-ezrite.] This is added to shew what Ophrah he means; for there was another in the tribe of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 23.) whereas the family of Abiezer belonged to the tribe of Manasseh, (Josh. xvii. 2.)

And his son Gideon thrashed wheat.] The Hebrew chabat, in this place, signifies to thrash out with a stick or rock, as Kimchi here observes. And so the LXX. ῥαβδίζων. But the common way of thrashing corn out of the ear was by treading it with oxen, which they called dash, 1 Chron. xxi. 20. This Gideon did not use, partly for privacy, but chiefly because he had but a little to beat out.

By the wine-press.] Where none would suspect his thrashing of corn.

To hide it from the Midianites.] Who watched narrowly all the thrashing-floors of the Israelites, who might have bought sheaves of their neighbours, or, perhaps, sown and reaped a little corn, in some private fenced places, where the cattle of the Midianites did not come to eat it up.

Ver. 12. And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him.] Gideon, I suppose, turning his face that way, beheld him sitting under the oak.

And said unto him, The Lord is with thee.] He did not take him to be one of the Midianites by his posture, and manner of appearance, and was made more certain of it by this salutation. Wherein he doth not pray God to be with him, but declares him to be with him (as appears by Gideon's answer), that is, to assist him to be the deliverance of his people. The Targum here translates it, The Word of the Lord is thy help. Whereby it appears, the ancient Jews did not look upon this angel merely as a heavenly messenger sent from God, but as the Lord himself, as he is called, ver. 14. 16. 23—25. 27. Which is confirmed by the following verse, as the same Targum translates it.

Thou mighty man of valour.] He was naturally courageous, but made more so by a Divine inspiration, and yet did not disdain to mind husbandry, as the greatest persons did in ancient time. Insomuch that Pliny saith, The earth brought forth its fruit more happily and abundantly, "cum imperatorum clarissimorum manibus tractaretur," when it was cultivated by the hands of the most famous commanders: for they had more skill and industry in their management, than the ordinary people.

Ver. 13. And Gideon said unto him, Oh, my Lord.] The Hebrew word bi (which we translate O, or I beseech thee) may literally be translated, with me; by way of interrogation: as much as to say, How can that be? It appears by the word Adonai (Lord) which is used to all great men, that he did not yet think him to be an angel, but some person of extraordinary quality, who wished well to the Israelites.

If the Lord be with us, why then is all this befallen us? And where are all the miracles which our fathers told us of, saying, Did not the Lord bring us up from Egypt, &c.] He thought their present condition sufficiently shewed that their whole nation was forsaken by God; who had thrown them into that slavery, out of which he delivered their fathers, and did not appear, by any miraculous works, to be present among them as he was in Egypt, but left them to be devoured by the Midianites.

Here the Targum makes Gideon's answer to have been this, Is the Schechinah of the Lord our help? Whence then hath all this happened unto us? Which paraphrase shews that they took the Word of the Lord to be the same with the Schechinah of the Lord, who had most gloriously appeared for their help. (See ver. 16. and Josh. xiv. 12.)

Ver. 14. And the Lord looked upon him.] This shews it was not a mere angel, but the same Jehovah, who appeared to Joshua (v. 13, 14.) in the likeness of an angel, and now cast a gracious aspect upon him: for to have respect unto a man, or unto his sacrifice, is graciously to accept him, and to be favourable to him; as the Lord now declared he was, by his very countenance, which had great kindness in it.

And said, Go in this thy might.] This seems to intimate that Gideon was immediately inspired with a great courage, by that gracious aspect of the Lord upon him.

And thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites.] See those wonders renewed, which appeared in the deliverance of their fathers out of Egypt, of which Gideon said there was no token, (ver. 13.)

Have not I sent thee?] Is not this a sufficient authority, that thou hast a commission from God? great care is taken throughout all this book, to shew that the judges all acted by a Divine warrant.

Ver. 15. And he said unto him, Oh, my Lord.] Still he took him to be only some extraordinary man.

Wherewith shall I save Israel?] He doth not reject the commission, but modestly declines it (as Theodoret observes), considering his own meanness, in comparison with many others.

Behold, my family is poor in Manasseh.] And consequently of little power to raise forces, to oppose so potent an enemy: the word we translate my family, is in Hebrew my thousand: for the Israelites were distributed, by Jethro's advice, into hundreds and thousands; and the thousand to which Gideon belonged, was the meanest of all the rest in that tribe. The Jews will have it, that Gideon was the chiliarch, or chief commander of this thousand; others say, his father Joash, who, it appears by the story, was a considerable person; but it is uncertain whether he had such a government.

And I am the least in my father's house.] This shews that Gideon had no such command as the Jews imagine.

Ver. 16. And the Lord said unto him, Surely I will be with thee.] Do not consider thy poverty, but the power of God, which shall accompany thee: here the Targum thus paraphrases, My Word shall be thy help; who was the same that appeared to Joshua, with a sword in his hand.

And thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man.] Defeat them as easily, as if he had but one man to deal withal.

Ver. 17. And he said, If now I have found grace in thy sight.] Am so highly favoured as to have this honour.

Then shew me a sign.] He doth not so much make a doubt, as desire to be confirmed in his belief.

That thou talkest with me.] That thou hast brought this commission from God, and that I shall be able to destroy the Midianites. He said this (as Conr. Pellicanus thinks) not because his faith wanted confirmation, but that he might make others believe, who would require a sign before they joined with him.

Ver. 18. Depart not hence, I pray thee, until I come unto thee.] Stay here till I go home, and return.

And bring forth my present.] So we rightly interpret the Hebrew word mincha; which, though it signify a meat-offering (as we observe in the margin), yet there was nothing of a sacrifice intended here, nor was Gideon a priest, or this a place of sacrifice.

And set it before thee.] He intended to entertain him, by making a feast for him.

And he said, I will tarry till thou come again.] It was a great thing he was to undertake, and so God graciously condescended to give him all manner of satisfaction about it.

Ver. 19. And Gideon went in, and made ready a kid, and unleavened cakes of an ephah of flour.] For expedition's sake he made such cakes, they being soonest prepared: for it is a mere fancy of the Jews, that this was done about the Passover in the days of unleavened bread.

The flesh he put in a basket, and he put the broth in a pot, and brought it unto him under the oak, and presented it.] Set it before him on a table, and desired he would be pleased to eat: in which he followed the example of Abraham and Lot, and seems to have entertained him nobly, according to the way of feasting in those days; for a whole kid (part of which was boiled, and the other part, perhaps, otherwise prepared), and so many cakes, as an ephah of flour would make, was enough for several guests; and therefore so much set before one man, was to shew his great respect to him.

Ver. 20. And the angel of the Lord said unto him, Take the flesh and the unleavened cakes.] He did not taste of them, intending to turn them into a sacrifice unto God.

And lay them upon this rock.] Which was near the grove of oaks, in the higher part of the city of Ophrah, as Bertram conjectures, in his book de Repub. Judaica, cap. 15.

And pour out the broth.] As Elijah, in aftertimes, bade them pour water upon his sacrifice.

And he did so.] He obeyed him; though, it is likely, he thought it strange he should command him thus to dispose of the good cheer he had prepared for him.

Ver. 21. Then the angel of the Lord put forth the end of the staff that was in his hand.] For he appeared, I suppose, in the form of a traveller, who were wont to walk with a staff in their hand.

And touched the flesh and the unleavened cakes; and there rose up fire out of the rock.] He did not smite the rock with his staff (by which stroke the fire might have been thought to be stirred up), but only gently touched the flesh and the cakes with it.

And consumed the flesh and the unleavened cakes.] Together with the broth, that was poured on them; which was as great a miracle (if not greater) as if fire had come down from heaven, as in the sacrifices which Moses, and Elijah, and others, offered: by which the faith of Gideon was mightily strengthened, that the miracles done in ancient times (which he inquired after, ver. 13.) were not ceased, and that God would be as good as his word to him, for this was a token of God's acceptance of him.

And the angel of the Lord departed out of his sight.] Went up into heaven, as the Chaldee paraphrase interprets it.

Ver. 22. And when Gideon perceived that he was an angel of the Lord.] He was convinced, by this wonder, that he was not a mere prophet that appeared to him.

Alas, O Lord God! for because I have seen an angel of the Lord face to face.] He speaks as a man in a fright, and cuts off part of his words; for his meaning was, I shall die: such was the opinion of good men in those days, that if they saw apparently an inhabitant of the other world, he came to call them away from this: as appears more fully in the story of Manoah and his wife, in the thirteenth chapter of this book: and this opinion was very ancient, as may be gathered from the words of Jacob, Gen. xxxii. 30. and they were confirmed in it, perhaps, by the words of God to Moses, Exod. xxxiii. 20.

Ver. 23. And the Lord said unto him.] Though the angel disappeared, and nothing was to be seen, yet the Lord, who appeared in that form to him, made him know he was still present with him, by speaking the following words in an audible voice.

Peace be unto thee; fear not: thou shalt not die.] He bids him fear no harm, but quite contrary, expect all manner of good (which is comprehended in the word peace), and that in this world, where he should still continue, to work that deliverance which he promised by him: from such places as this the ancient Christians rightly gathered, that the Son of God appeared, upon some great occasions, in old time; which is not incredible, but a matter of easy belief, if we be persuaded that he did really appear in our flesh, which he took of the Virgin Mary, and dwelt among us for a long time, and then ascended in it to heaven, where he lives for ever: for why should we think it strange, if, for a short time, he appeared some time in human shape, as a prelude to what he intended in the fulness of time? "Fuit sane id majus quod nobis præstitit," &c. (as Peter Martyr speaks.) It was indeed a greater thing which he did for us at last; but he that did the greater, may well be granted to have done the less, and there is no reason to doubt of it.

Ver. 24. And Gideon built an altar there unto the Lord.] Not for sacrifice (which had been directly contrary to the law of God), but as a monument of that heavenly vision, and of the mercy promised to him, in that place where he built the altar; viz. where the angel stood and touched the flesh and unleavened cakes, and consumed them: such an altar the Reubenites made, Josh. xxii. 10, &c.

And called it Jehovah-shalom.] That is, the Lord here pronounced peace to me, (ver. 23.) or (as we understand it in the margin), the Lord grant peace: which he had the greatest reason to expect, when God had declared it, at that very time when he looked for death.

Until this day it is yet in Ophrah of the Abi-ezrites.] It was remaining when Samuel wrote this book.

Ver. 25. And it came to pass the same night.] After the angel's appearance.

That the Lord said unto him.] In a dream, it is most likely, because it was in the night.

Take thy father's young bullock.] In the Hebrew the words are two, par, shor, signifying a bullock full-grown; which his father, it is probable, had fatted up for a sacrifice to Baal.

Even the second bullock.] Our translation supposes there was but one bullock, which he was ordered to take (because we read in the next verse, that this alone was sacrificed); but in the Hebrew, and the LXX. and the Vulgar (and our margin also), the words are, and the second bullock; which was next to the first in age.

Of seven years old.] Which was calved, as Arius Montanus observes, when their oppression under the Midianites began; and was now ordered to be sacrificed, in token that it should end with this bullock's death.

And throw down the altar of Baal that thy father hath.] Which was in his ground, and built, perhaps, at his charge; but was for public use, as appears from ver. 28.

And cut down the grove that is by it.] Or rather, upon it; for so the Hebrew word alau signifies; and so the LXX. translate it ἐπ' αὐτῷ, upon the altar beforementioned. And therefore by ashereh, which we translate grove, must be meant the image in the grove, which stood upon the altar. And so the word is used in other places, (1 Kings xxiii. 6.) Which Mr. Selden probably conjectures was the image of Ashtaroth, or Astarte; for she was worshipped together with Baal, ii. 13. where they are said to have worshipped Baal and Ashtaroth (for there was more than one Astarte), which is the same with iii. 7. where it is said they worshipped Baalim and the groves. (See Syntag. ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 2.) There could be no hope of deliverance till religion was reformed; with which therefore God orders him to begin.

Ver. 26. And build an altar unto the Lord thy God upon the top of this rock.] Where the angel appeared to him; from whence Bertram thinks the Israelites learnt to sacrifice in high places; if it were not rather a custom derived from the gentiles.

On the top of this rock there was a fortress, as I take it; which, it is likely, had been built to secure them from the Midianites. For the word for rock is not the ordinary one, viz. tzor, or sela, but mahoz; which signifies a strong hold.

In the ordered place.] Which St. Jerome took to be the place where the flesh and unleavened cakes were laid in order upon the rock; (ver. 20.) but it may signify, as we translate it in the margin, in an orderly manner.

And take the second bullock, and offer a burnt-sacrifice.] If there were two bullocks which he took, it is hard to say what became of the first. Arius Montanus supposes it was offered for himself, and for his family; but this second is only mentioned, because it was the sacrifice that was offered for the whole nation, to implore God's mercy to them; for sacrifices were a kind of prayer and supplication. Gideon was no priest, but by God's special order was required to do this; which otherwise would have been a presumptuous sin.

With the wood of the grove which thou shalt cut down.] This was also an extraordinary command, whereby things employed to idolatry were converted to a sacred use: otherwise, God had ordered them all to be utterly destroyed, (Deut. vii. 5. xii. 3.)

Ver. 27. Then Gideon took ten men of his servants.] In whom he could confide; and this number was as many as was necessary to make a congregation for public worship; and was sufficient also to execute what God had commanded.

And did as the Lord had said unto him.] Broke down the altar of Baal, cut down the grove, and built an altar unto the Lord, and offered the burnt-sacrifice.

And so it was, because he feared his father's household, and the men of the city, that he could not do it by day.] Without endangering a tumult, which might have ended in a fray.

That he did it by night.] When he was likely to meet with no opposition. In this he gave an early proof of his faith in God, for it was a bold undertaking: but prudence is not excluded in the execution of the Divine commands: yet the greater speed men make, the more acceptable it is; and some think his zeal moved him to do this the very same night wherein God appeared to him.

Ver. 28. And when the men of the city rose early in the morning.] And came to worship Baal, before they went about their business.

Behold, the altar of Baal was cast down, and the grove cut down that was by it.] They were very much surprised to see such an alteration.

And the second bullock was offered.] Which they knew was designed for a sacrifice to Baal.

Upon the altar that was built.] Not upon the altar of Baal which was thrown down, but on a new one which was built in another place; upon which the flesh of the second bullock was still flaming, being not quite consumed, when they came thither.

Ver. 29. And they said one to another, Who hath done this thing?] Their superstition made them very solicitous to find out the author of this impiety, as they accounted it.

And when they inquired and asked.] Here are two words in the Hebrew, importing that they made a diligent inquisition; examining many persons what they knew of it.

They said, Gideon the son of Joash hath done this thing.] Who gave this information, we are not told; nor how the discovery was made: perhaps some had seen him that morning stand by the sacrifice; which it is likely he would not forsake, as long as he durst attend it. Or some of his servants might let fall such words as gave suspicion: or, the altar and image standing in Joash's ground, and his bullock being offered, they thought that none, without the knowledge of his family, could come to attempt it: and, besides, it is probable that Gideon was known to be no zealous servant of Baal; and when all were so very much concerned for the demolishing of his altar, he expressing no concern at all, they confidently charged him with the fact.

Ver. 30. Then the men of the city said to Joash, Bring out thy son, that he may die; because he, &c.] It seems they were all zealous idolaters; and thought him worthy of death who dishonoured those who were accounted gods.

Ver. 31. And Joash said unto all that stood against him.] That is, against his son; demanding to have him produced and punished.

Will ye plead for Baal? Will ye save him?] i. e. Will you take upon you to avenge his quarrel, and to be his patrons? Doth it belong to you to be his defenders and deliverers? It seems to have been a popular tumult, which he endeavours to repress; by representing to them, that such crimes were not to be punished by them, but by the magistrates of the city; and that they would bring themselves in danger of what they intended to do to Gideon, if they did not desist; as it follows in the next words.

He that will plead for him, let him be put to death.] That is, Let me tell you, he that thus moves sedition in this cause, by my consent, should be put to death himself. And, it is likely, Joash was a magistrate in the city; who terrified them by declaring what his opinion would be, if they came to be tried for this riot.

While it is yet morning.] That is, immediately. For it was early in the morning (ver. 28.) when they came in this manner to Joash.

If he be a god, let him plead for himself, because one hath cast down his altar.] If the magistrates neglected to punish the pretended crime, Baal, he tells them, in case he were a real god, would take care to do himself right; and therefore they need not be so much concerned about it: and so some understand the latter part of this verse, He deserves to die presently, who is an adversary to Baal: but let the execution be done then by Baal himself. For if he be a god, he will take care of his own honour; and you need not trouble yourselves about it. It is likely Joash had been convinced by his son, that God had given him a commission to deliver his people; and to begin it with this reformation: which made him appear thus boldly in his son's cause; because he knew it was the cause of God.

Ver. 32. Therefore on that day he called him Jerubbaal.] In 2 Sam. xi. 21. he is called Jerubbesheth; for so some called Baal, in contempt, by the name of Besheth, that is, shame and confusion; which well expresses the nature of such idols.

Saying, Let Baal plead against him, because he hath thrown down his altar.] This is the reason why he gave him this name; which is as much as to say, the adversary of Baal; or, him whom Baal hath a quarrel withal; upon the account of the affront put upon him, in throwing down his altar. The Phœnicians called him Jerombalus, as appears by Sanchoniathon, whom Eusebius often quotes, as he is translated by Philo-Byblius into Greek: and Porphyry saith, he received certain commentaries from Jerombalus, the priest of the god Jevo. Which can be nothing but the books of Moses, which contain the laws delivered by Jehovah; as Huetius justly observes in his Demonstr. Evangel. propos. iv. cap. 2. for the remains which we have of his writings plainly taste of the doctrine of Moses.

Ver. 33. Then all the Midianites, and the Amalekites, and the children of the east, were gathered together.] As they were wont to do every year, to waste the country, (ver. 3—5.)

And went over.] The river Jordan.

And pitched in the valley of Jezreel.] Which alarmed Gideon, and gave him occasion to execute his commission; it being not far from Ophrah; for Jezreel in the tribe of Judah is not here meant, (mentioned Josh. xv. 36.) but Jezreel in the tribe of Manasseh, or Issachar, which is frequently spoken of in the book of the Kings, being one of the royal seats of the kings of Israel; where there was a noble valley, running from the east to the west, mentioned Josh. xvii. 16. Hosea i. 5.

Ver. 34. But the Spirit of the Lord came upon Gideon.] Or (as the words are in the Hebrew, and as the LXX. translate it), clothed Gideon: which is a phrase St. Paul uses to signify a man is replenished with that wherewith he is said to be clothed; or that he is fully possessed of it. So was Gideon with courage, and all other qualities necessary in a great commander.

And he blew a trumpet, and Abi-ezer was gathered unto him.] Came and offered their service to fight under his banner. This was a wonderful change, if the city of Ophrah, who were lately so incensed against him, that they would have killed him for destroying their idol, now not only submitted to him, but were ready to join with him against all his enemies: but though this be not incredible, that they were converted from the idolatrous worship of Baal, when they saw no hurt befal Gideon for throwing down his altar, &c. yet this may be meant only of the rest of the Abi-ezrites, and especially those of his own kindred and family.

Ver. 35. And he sent messengers throughout all Manasseh, who also were gathered after him.] That is, the rest of his tribe; whose hearts God moved to resort unto him.

And he sent messengers unto Asher, and unto Zebulun, and unto Naphtali.] After his own tribe was come in, he invited these three who bordered upon the tribe of Manasseh northward to come to his assistance: but he did not send unto the tribe of Ephraim, who were neighbours to the Manassites on the south; which afterward begat a quarrel, as we read chap. viii.

And they came to meet them.] One of the copies of the LXX. refers this to Gideon, that he went up to meet those of the three tribes beforementioned; but others refer it to them who came up to meet Gideon; and so the Hebrew words seem to import. But which way soever we take it, they all joined their forces together; and from hence Sir J. Marsham infers, that the oppression fell only on this part of the country; though the whole story represents all the Israelites as in a miserable condition, and as submitting to his government, after he had delivered them.

Ver. 36. And Gideon said unto God.] In a prayer, which, I suppose, he made unto him.

If thou wilt save Israel by my hand, as thou hast said.] He did not doubt of God's intentions, who had promised to be with him: for in pursuit of his commands he had done one great thing already, in throwing down Baal's altar; and had also blown a trumpet and listed soldiers; and had likewise seen wonderful effects of God's power, in consuming the flesh and the cakes that were laid upon the rock, by fire coming out of it: therefore he desired only a confirmation of his faith; and that, perhaps, for the sake of those who were to go with him, who might possibly be timorous: or he might desire by some sign to know, whether at this time he would make him victorious over the Midianites, or he was to wait for some other opportunity.

Ver. 37. Behold, I will put a fleece of wool in the floor.] Where they were wont to thrash corn; which was done in the open air, not in barns, as we do now.

And if the dew be on the fleece only, and it be dry upon all the earth beside, then shall I know that thou wilt save Israel by my hand, as thou hast said.] He supposed that the dew which distilled from heaven was a Divine gift, (as the Scripture often testifies, particularly Gen. xxviii. 28.) which he desires might be so governed by God, that though it commonly fall every where, it might now, by his extraordinary providence, water only his fleece.

Ver. 38. And it was so: for he rose up early in the morning, and thrust the fleece together, and wringed the dew out of the fleece, a bowl-full of water.] When there was not a drop upon the earth round about it. The word sephel, which here we translate bowl, was used in the foregoing chapter, ver. 25. Which see.

Ver. 39. And Gideon said unto God, Let not thine anger be hot against me, and I will speak but this once.] Though God did not chide him for his former desire, nor charge him with any distrust of his power and will to do what he promised; yet Gideon was afraid lest he should be very angry at his renewing the same request, because it looked like a diffidence in God's word. But if we consider, that it was for the farther and fuller satisfaction of those that were to go with him, it may be excused; and as he promises that he will ask no more signs, so we do not find the Lord took it ill of him that he asked this.

Let me prove thee, I pray thee, with the fleece.] This is a bad word, when it denotes men's infidelity, that no sign will be given them; but a good one, when it signifies an humble desire to have such a sign granted them, as here it doth.

Let it be dry now only upon the fleece, and upon all the ground let there be dew.] Upon these words Ralbag hath this observation, "The former miracle was not sufficient for his conviction, because it is in the very nature of wool to draw moisture to it; and therefore he desires this second miracle, which is contrary to the first."

Ver. 40. And God did so that night.] For some dewdrops in the morning, other in the night. And here God was pleased, not in the morning, but in that very night when he asked this sign, to sprinkle all the floor with dew, and let none fall upon the fleece. So ready (saith Bochartus) is God to hear our prayers; which his benefits do not so much follow, as go before them, or immediately accompany them.

For it was dry upon the fleece only, and there was dew on all the ground.] Not upon all the country of Israel, but upon all the floor, or the land thereabout. By these quite contrary signs his faith was fully confirmed; and perhaps there was some need of it, when he saw the number of his followers reduced to a small handful of three hundred men, (vii. 10.) There are those who think he chose a fleece of wool for that purpose, not only because it was ready at hand, but the better to express how the earth was shorn by the Midianites, as the sheep had been by him; and when he begged the dew (a sign of the Divine favour) might fall upon the fleece, it was to represent the kindness of God to him; and when he begged it might fall upon the whole ground, it represented his favour to all the people: and, lastly, that these two miracles, opposite one to the other, do notably set forth the state of that nation, who were moistened with the dew of heaven (the knowledge of God) when the rest of the world were dry; and now are dry, when the rest of the earth are filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. THEN Jerubbaal (who is Gideon), and all the people that were with him, rose up early.] The very next morning, I suppose, after the last miracle.

And pitched beside the well of Harod.] It is but conjectured where this well was; viz. not far from Mount Gilboa.

So that the host of the Midianites were on the north side of them, by the hill of Moreh.] The Vulgar takes the word Moreh to signify high; and then this high hill can be no other than the forenamed Gilboa. Here Pellicanus observes, that prudence and diligent forecast is to be used, even when we are under the Divine conduct; for he thinks Gideon acted like a skilful commander, when he quartered his army so, as to have the enemy on the north of him, rather than the east or the south.

In the valley.] Of Jezreel, as was said before, vi. 33.

which had Hermon on the north, and Gilboa on the south of it.

Ver. 2. And the Lord said unto Gideon, The people that are with thee are too many for me to give the Midianites into their hand.] They were but thirty-two thousand, against an innumerable army of the enemies, (ver. 3. 12.) which was a vast disproportion; and yet God would not use the service of such a company, lest it should obscure his glory; as it follows in the next words.

Lest Israel vaunt themselves against me, saying, Mine own hand hath saved me.] He knew their humour, and foresaw they might be so vain as to ascribe the victory to their own power and prowess, and not to him who intended to shew to all the world it was his miraculous work.

Ver. 3. Now therefore go to, proclaim in the ears of the people.] According to the command of Moses, Deut. xx. 8.

Whosoever is fearful and afraid.] The word which we translate afraid, is in the Hebrew harod: from whence some have conjectured the well where they pitched (ver. 1.) was called by the name of Harod, because here a great fear came upon most of Gideon's army.

Let him return and depart early.] As soon as he can: or, as a great many understand it, make what haste he can to his home; it being a metaphor, they think, from the flying of a bird.

From Mount Gilead.] Not that mountain which is so often mentioned in Scripture; for that was on the other side of Jordan, and in the most eastern part of their country (as appears from the story of Jacob, when he returned from Padan-Aram), but another mountain on this west side of Jordan, in the tribe of Manasseh: the name of whose grandson Gilead (from whom all the tribe descended) was given, it is probable, in memory of him, to some mountain in this country; which was called Mount Gilead, just as another mountain in the tribe of Ephraim was called Mount Ephraim. This seems to me a far more rational account of these words, than theirs who translate them towards Mount Gilead, or about it; or devise some other such-like explication of the particle min (which we rightly translate from), as may consist with their opinion, that the mount on the other side Jordan is here intended. Gataker hath collected many interpretations of this kind in his Cinnus, lib. ii. cap. 18.

And there returned of the people twenty and two thousand.] As God thought there were too many, so they thought there were too few, to fight with such a host as came against them: and therefore, though they were at the first forward to list themselves under Gideon, yet, when they saw no greater number come in, as they expected, their hearts failed them; for they trusted not in God, but in their own strength.

And there remained ten thousand.] Who had more courage, and were resolved to venture their lives in the cause. Ralbag thinks the greater number that went away were men of bad lives, whose consciences made them afraid; and that these who remained were better men, which made them valiant and undaunted. And they were just the same number that went down with Barak from Mount Tabor, in their last deliverance, (iv. 10.)

Ver. 4. And the Lord said unto Gideon, The people are yet too many.] The more valiant they were, the more they might be apt to ascribe to themselves.

Bring them down unto the water.] Which, it is likely, ran from the well or fountain of Harod, and made a brook.

And I will try them for thee there.] Give thee a proof who are fit for the service. The Hebrew word tzaraph signifies to scour, purge, and purify; as fullers do cloth from its filthiness, or as refiners do gold and silver from their dross. So God intended to purge Gideon's army, from all such persons as he judged unmeet for the undertaking.

And it shall be, that of whom I say unto thee, This shall go with thee, the same shall go with thee; and of whomsoever I say unto thee, This shall not go with thee, the same shall not go.] He intended by such a voice as now spake unto him, to declare who should go with him, and who should not.

Ver. 5. So he brought down the people unto the water.] Where it was proper to purge them.

And the Lord said unto Gideon, Every one that lappeth of the water with his tongue, as a dog lappeth, him shalt thou set by himself; likewise every one that boweth down upon his knees to drink.] They were thirsty, we may well suppose, by the heat of the weather, and by their march, which made them greedily betake themselves to the water: where he bid Gideon observe the different postures which they used in quenching of their thirst. The LXX. here translate it πᾶς ὃς ἂν λάψῃ τῇ γλώσσῃ αὐτοῦ, Whosoever licketh up the water with his tongue. Which is the very word the great philosopher uses in his History of Animals, lib. viii. cap. 6. where he saith, those creatures whose teeth are continued close together, sup up water as horses and oxen do; but such as he calls καρχαρόδοντα, that have teeth like a saw, do λάπτειν, which is of the same signification with our English word lap, and the French laper, as Bochart observes.

Ver. 6. And the number of them that lapped, putting their hand to their mouth, were three hundred men; but all the rest of the people bowed down upon their knees to drink water.] Some ascribe it to the sloth and laziness of these three hundred men, that they would not stoop down to drink as the rest did; others to their timorousness, and the great fear they were in of being suddenly surprised by their enemies, which is the opinion of Josephus and Theodoret; both which great authors think, that God chose these three hundred men, on purpose because they were poor-spirited, that the victory might be acknowledged to be entirely owing to himself: and Grotius is of this mind, who thinks they lapped, just as the dogs do of the river Nile, as they run, for fear of the crocodiles. (See Sixtiri Amama's Antibarbarus, lib. iii. p. 385.) But it is evident that all the fearful persons were dismissed before; and it is not likely that courageous men were lazy; therefore I take it, as others do (particularly Procopius Gazæus), to be a token of their temperance, and of the nobleness of their spirit, which made them so desirous to engage the enemy, that they would not stay to drink; but though they were very thirsty, contented themselves to moisten their mouth with a little water; whereas the rest indulged themselves so far, as to drink their belly-full. And it is the opinion of Ralbag, among the Jews, that their lapping standing, was a sign of their alacrity and fortitude. R. Solomon, and Kimchi, also think, that the rest had been worshippers of Baal, and, by bowing their knees to drink, were discovered, which is a far-fetched conceit.

Ver. 7. And the Lord said unto Gideon, By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand.] It was sufficient to let all the world see God saved them and not men, that he employed only three hundred persons in this service, yet it was necessary these three hundred should be men of extraordinary faith and courage (such as Gideon had) to embolden them to this enterprise.

And let all the other people go every man unto his place.] He had sent away above two-thirds of his army before, and now of that third part he keeps only the thirtieth.

Ver. 8. And the people took victuals in their hands.] They that returned home left so much provision as would serve to maintain three hundred men for some time.

And their trumpets.] If we suppose every thousand men to have ten trumpeters belonging to them, it was easy to furnish three hundred men with every one a trumpet, which we read (ver. 16.) they had, that they might, when they sounded, make a noise, as if they were a greater number than really they were. It is hard to say, how Josephus came to say, that they carried in their hand κριοῦ κέρας, a ram's horn, which they used ἀντὶ σάλπιγγος, instead of a trumpet, (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 8.) for rams' horns are not hollow: and the LXX. only call them κερατίνας, not saying of what they were made. It may be supposed, indeed, that rams' horns were made hollow for this use, as the Jews make them at this day.

And he sent all the rest of Israel, every man, unto his tent.] Who, it is probable, did not go so far, but that they were ready to join with those who pursued the Midianites after their defeat, (ver. 23, 24.)

And retained those three hundred men.] Kept no more with him than this number whom God had chosen to accomplish his promise.

And the host of Midian was beneath him in the valley.] It seems his small handful of men lay encamped upon a hill, where the Midianites thought it not safe to assault them, not knowing what number they were, nor how entrenched, and therefore they lay still in the valley of Jezreel.

Ver. 9. And it came to pass the same night.] After he had reduced his forces to this small number.

That the Lord said unto him, Arise, get thee down unto the host of the Midianites.] Who lay in the valley below him.

For I have delivered it into thy hand.] There, he means, he should understand, and be fully satisfied by what he should hear, that his victory over them was as sure as if he had already obtained it.

Ver. 10. But if thou fear to go down.] As he had some reason, having now such a slender company with him.

Go thou with Phurah thy servant down to the host.] Every man is more afraid alone, than when he hath a trusty companion with him; yet it was not fit to carry more than one, whose fidelity was known to him; for secret designs are not to be committed to many.

Ver. 11. And thou shalt hear what they say.] Hear the discourse that some of them would have with another.

And afterward shall thine hand be strengthened to go down unto the host.] Whereby he should be encouraged to attack that great army, with so small a number as he had remaining with him. This shews how exceeding acceptable his faith and obedience was to God, in sending away as many of his army as he bade him dismiss; for now he gives him a further confirmation of his faith without asking.

Then went he down with Phurah his servant.] Faith had quite expelled all his fear.

Unto the outside of the armed men that were in the host.] To the out-guards, as we now speak, who seem to have consisted of fifty men, as the LXX. think the Hebrew word chamuschim signifies; for they translate it τῶν πεντήκοντα.

Ver. 12. And the Midianites, and Amalekites, and all the children of the earth.] Who joined with them in this invasion.

Lay along in the valley.] Of Jezreel beforementioned, into which Gideon now went down.

Like grasshoppers for multitude.] See vi. 5.

And their camels were without number.] Both Midian and Amalek, and the countries about them, abounded with camels, which were serviceable to them in their wars, as well as in carrying burdens. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 2.) And in them they placed their principal riches, as he observes out of Leo Africanus, who saith, that when the Arabians would express the great wealth of their prince, they do not say, he hath so many thousand pounds of gold or silver, but so many thousand camels.

As the sand by the sea-side for multitude.] So the Hebrews are wont to express a vastly great number. The certain knowledge of their number, it is likely, never came to the knowledge of the Israelites; but we read of a hundred and twenty thousand men that were slain, and fifteen thousand that escaped, with their two princes, viii. 10. And how many were taken captive, is not recorded.

Ver. 13. And when Gideon was come, behold, there was a man that told a dream unto his fellow.] Which troubled his thoughts, I suppose, when he was awake, as the dream of Pharaoh, and his butler, and baker, and of Nebuchadnezzar, in aftertimes, disturbed them.

And said, Behold, I dreamed a dream, and, lo, a cake of barley-bread.] Or, as the Vulgar translates it, A loaf baked in the ashes, which was the meanest of all other bread, and hastily prepared.

Tumbled.] Came tumbling down like a bowl from the mountain.

Into the host of Midian.] Through all the guards, into the very middle of the army, which was a sign that Gideon should break through all opposition.

And came unto a tent.] The principal tent, which was pitched for their kings, or their general, in the midst of the host.

And smote it, that it fell.] This seemed strange to the man, that so small a thing as a cake, or a loaf of bread, should throw down a tent, which was not shaken by a strong wind.

And overturned it, that the tent lay along.] It not only fell, but was so shattered that it could not be reared up again; which was a lively emblem of the utter overthrow of the Midianites, and their numerous host, by Gideon, and his small company, as his fellow-soldier interpreted it.

Ver. 14. And his fellow answered and said.] It appears by the example beforementioned, that God sometimes sent dreams into the minds of pagan people, who were much concerned to find an interpreter of them: but here, by a single providence, one of his comrades was inspired to tell the meaning immediately.

This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon the son of Joash.] The barley-cake was a fit emblem of Gideon and his soldiers, who were a small number, as a cake is made of a little flour kneaded together; and was mean also, and contemptible, in comparison with the Midianites, as a barley-cake is in comparison with wheaten bread: but the man could not have understood this, unless God had suggested it to him, for the confirmation of Gideon's faith and resolution.

A man of Israel.] i. e. A great commander; for so the Hebrews truly interpret the word isch, who (as L'Empereur observes out of R. Schamaja) called the governor, or chief commander of those who guarded the temple, isch har habeth, the man of the mountain of the temple. (Cod. Middoth, cap. 1.)

For into his hand hath God delivered Midian, and all the host.] All their confederates. Nothing is more vain than our common dreams, yet God hath sometimes admonished men that way of future things, as many of the heathen themselves acknowledge (and those, the wisest of them, such as Hippocrates). But that a common soldier should give such an exact interpretation of another soldier's dream, and that against themselves, and their own nation, is very extraordinary.

Ver. 15. And it was so, when Gideon heard the telling of the dream, and the interpretation thereof.] He understood the Midianitish language, it is likely, having been long a subject to that nation; or, perhaps, it did not differ much from the Hebrew.

That he worshipped.] Gave humble thanks to God for his goodness, in giving him new encouragement to proceed in his undertaking.

And returned to the host of Israel.] So he calls it (though it scarce deserved that name), because God intended to do the same by this small number, as if they had been a great host.

And said, Arise, for the Lord hath delivered into your hand the host of Midian.] He bids them make no doubt nor delay, for God had given fresh assurance of success.

Ver. 16. And he divided the three hundred men into three companies.] Under three commanders-in-chief, as the Hebrew raschim imports, which signifies heads.

And he put a trumpet into every man's hand.] That they might make a sound of a great army.

With empty pitchers.] Earthen pitchers, which had no water in them; wherein they hid their lamps till they should think fit to light them.

And lamps within their pitchers.] Or, rather, torches; for, no doubt, they were made of pitch, or wax, and rosin, and such-like things as would burn long, and not be blown out by the wind, as lamps made of oil only are apt to be.

Ver. 17. And he said unto them, Look on me and do likewise.] Follow my example.

And, behold, when I come to the outside of the camp.] Where he began the assault.

It shall be, that as I do, so shall ye do.] I suppose he told them what he would do, viz. after they heard him blow the trumpet (as it follows in the next verse), they should do the same, and then break their pitchers and light their torches, &c.

Ver. 18. When I blow with a trumpet, I, and all that are with me.] It is likely he commanded one of the three troops with whom he began the attack, as the next verse imports.

Then blow ye the trumpet also on every side of all the camp.] By this it appears that they did not fall upon them all in one place, but some on one part of their camp, some on another, that they might strike the greater terror into them, and put them into confusion.

And say, The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon.] The word sword is not here in the Hebrew, where these words run thus, for the Lord, and for Gideon: but there being mention of the sword, ver. 20. it moved our translators to add it here also: and it is not to be thought contrary to the design of God, (who would have the victory ascribed to himself, ver. 2.) that Gideon here joins his own name with God's when they went to fight; for, as he puts God in the first place, and names himself only as his minister, so it is likely he had directions from God for it, who knew the name of Gideon, of whose extraordinary courage, no doubt, the Midianites had heard, would be very formidable to them.

Ver. 19. So Gideon and the hundred men that were with him.] The Vulgar took a hundred to be put for the whole host of Gideon, and therefore saith, The three hundred men that were with him: but the LXX. expressly follow the Hebrew; and it is most probable that he led only a hundred men himself, the rest being commanded by some other valiant captains.

Came to the outside of the camp.] It is not said on what quarter; but it is probable on the east part of their camp, as the second troop set upon them on the north-east part, and the third on the south-east: for this way they knew they would bend their flight when they were routed, and endeavoured to escape; their own country, and the fords of Jordan, lying on the east: and if they ran westward, there were Israelites enough to pursue them, and cut them off.

In the beginning of the middle watch; and they had but newly set the watch.] That is, a little after midnight: for there were three watches among the Hebrews and the rest of the eastern nations, as Bochart observes out of Kimchi, R. Solomon, and others; the night being divided into three parts: and when the first third part was ended, they that had watched went to sleep, and another company succeeded them, till the morning watch. The Romans afterward divided the night into four parts, from whence we read, in the gospel, of the fourth watch.

And they blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers that were in their hands.] Though Gideon placed his hope in God alone, yet he did not neglect such prudent stratagems as are used in war, but made an appearance of a greater number of men than he had with him: for, hearing three hundred trumpets sound, the Midianites could not but apprehend a great army was come to assault them: the breaking of the pitchers also made a clattering noise, and the torches then, on a sudden, flaring in their eyes, was very amazing, especially when they heard them shout, for the Lord, and for Gideon: he chose also to make his attack at midnight, when they were in a dead sleep, and expected no disturbance.

Ver. 20. And the three companies.] The former words were concerning Gideon and his men, who began the attack; whose example the rest of the three companies followed, as he required, ver. 17, 18.

Blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers, and held the lamps in their left hand, and the trumpets in their right hand to blow withal.] So that they made no use of their swords, in the first onset; both hands being full of something else.

And they cried, The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon.] But this stratagem had been of no efficacy, if God had not struck such a terror into them, when they heard these words, as quite confounded them: and yet these words do not import, as I said before, that the victory was divided between the Lord and Gideon; for it is most likely (as Pet. Martyr observes) that God suggested even this stratagem to Gideon, and made it successful.

Ver. 21. And they stood every man in his place round about the camp.] Not one of the three hundred men stirred a foot from his place, but stood there without striking a stroke; as if they had been only torch-bearers, to give light to their army, to see their way to the camp, and to do execution.

And all the host ran, and cried, and fled.] They did not stand in their ranks to repel the Israelites; but brake up their camp (as the Hebrew word jaratz may be translated), and cried out with a lamentable voice, fleeing as fast as they could to their own country.

Ver. 22. And the three hundred men blew the trumpets.] That is, continued to blow them without ceasing.

And the Lord set every man's sword against his fellow, even throughout all the host.] Being suddenly awaked out of their sleep in the middle of the night, and hearing such a noise, as if a vast multitude were falling upon them, they were in such disorder (which was increased by the clattering of the pitchers, and the blaze of the torches), that they could not distinguish their friends from their enemies, but killed one another; every man falling upon him that was next to him, whom he fancied to be one of Gideon's army. Thus the Philistines were defeated by Jonathan, (1 Sam. xiv. 16. 20.) and the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites, in the days of Jehoshaphat, (2 Chron. xx. 22, 23.)

And the host fled to Beth-shittah in Zererath, and to the border of Abel-meholah, unto Tabbath.] We find none of these places mentioned elsewhere in Scripture, but only Abel-meholah, in 1 Kings iv. 12. xix. 16. which being in the tribe of Manasseh, not far from the river Jordan, may support a conjecture, that the rest of the places were in the way thither.

Ver. 23. And the men of Israel gathered themselves together out of Naphtali, and out of Asher.] He had sent to these tribes at the first raising of his army, and also to Zebulun, who, being neighbours, came to join him, (vi. 35.)

And out of all Manasseh.] Who were the forwardest in this enterprise, being his own tribe.

And pursued after the Midianites.] Though they had been lately disbanded by God's order, yet it is likely they lay ready, if there should be occasion, to help to complete the victory.

Ver. 24. And Gideon sent messengers throughout all Mount Ephraim.] He was desirous that others should have some share with him, in finishing this work; though he alone, with some few began it, and were exposed to all the danger. Would to God (saith P. Martyr on this occasion) that we were of this spirit in the church of Christ, that when any noble work is begun, we would call in all to help to perfect it: but, alas! such are our sins, we oft-times do all we are able to hinder one another.

Saying, Come down against the Midianites.] He invites them to come to his assistance against the common enemy; which his small handful of men were not sufficient to destroy, though they had entirely routed them.

And take before them the waters.] He would have them make such haste, as to possess themselves of the fords, before the Midianites could get to them.

Unto Beth-barah and Jordan.] It is very probable, that Beth-barah is the same place with Beth-abara in St. John's gospel, (i. 28.) being the place where the Israelites passed over Jordan, when they first entered Canaan: and then by Jordan must be meant all the fords upon this river, from Beth-barah to the lake of Gennesaret.

Then all the men of Ephraim gathered themselves together, and took the waters unto Beth-barah and Jordan.] Posted themselves all along the river, from the lake beforementioned unto Beth-barah.

Ver. 25. And they took two princes of the Midianites.] Two great commanders, as the word sarim signifies, which we translate princes.

Oreb and Zeeb.] From hence some gather that the Midianitish language did not much differ from the Hebrew: in which Oreb signifies a crow, and Zeeb a wolf; from which creatures, and such-like, it seems very anciently great men thought fit to take the names of their families: as the Romans did afterward, (among whom we read of the Corvini, and Gracchi, and Aquilini, &c.) either as omens, or as monuments of their undaunted courage and dexterity in military achievements.

And they slew Oreb upon the rock Oreb.] It is likely that there he was taken hidden in some hole, and from his slaughter there the rock had its name in future times.

And Zeeb they slew at the wine-press of Zeeb.] Where he also, in like manner, being taken and slain, gave name to this place.

And pursued Midian.] Did not content themselves with this, but pursued them to the other side of Jordan; whither some of them had escaped, before they would obey Gideon's summons.

And brought the heads of Oreb and Zeeb to Gideon.] As the manner was in aftertimes, when they would gratify a great conqueror with a welcome spectacle: for thus Pompey's head was offered to Cæsar, and Cicero's to Mark Antony.

On the other side Jordan.] Over which we read (viii. 4.) Gideon passed, in the pursuit of the enemy.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. AND the men of Ephraim said unto him.] When they presented the heads of the two princes unto him.

Why hast thou served us thus?] They thought themselves slighted by their brethren of the tribe of Manasseh; which they took the more heinously, because they looked upon themselves to be every way superior to them, by the blessing of Jacob.

That thou calledst us not when thou wentest to fight with the Midianites.] As he had done other meaner tribes, (vi. 35.) who were not so able to assist him as themselves.

And they did chide with him sharply.] Spake very angry words, as if they would have come to blows.

Ver. 2. And he said, What have I done now in comparison with you?] Proud men love to be praised; and therefore he magnifies their service as far surpassing his own.

Is not the gleaning of the grapes of Ephraim, better than the vintage of Abi-ezer?] A common proverb, I suppose, in those days, whereby they were wont to commend the smallest action of one, as superior to the greatest of another: and here it is most fitly applied; for it is as if he had said, These scattered parties that you have gleaned and picked up (as we now speak) at the fords of Jordan, are far more than those which I and my whole host (as it is called, vii. 15.) have destroyed.

Ver. 3. God hath delivered into your hands the princes of Midian, Oreb and Zeeb.] Which he was content they should think more considerable than all the common men that he had vanquished.

And what was I able to do in comparison with you?] To yield unto others the glory which they affect, wonderfully appeases their highest displeasure.

Then their anger was abated towards him when he had said that.] According to that of Solomon, Prov. xv. 1. This is an argument of the singular modesty and prudence of Gideon, and no less conspicuous in him than his courage; which is a mixture that rarely meets together, but is absolutely necessary to make a truly great man; who never appears so great, as when he treats insolent men with humility, and angry men with meekness.

Ver. 4. And Gideon came to Jordan, and passed over.] Or rather, had passed over; for he was gone over Jordan before Oreb and Zeeb were taken; but it is not related till now, that what concerned the Ephraimites might be told altogether without interruption.

He and the three hundred men that were with him.] Not one of which was lost.

Faint, yet pursuing them.] Tired with a long march, and eager pursuit; which notwithstanding they continued, being more solicitous for the public safety than their own.

Ver. 5. And he said unto the men of Succoth.] A city in the tribe of Gad, mentioned in Gen. xxxiii. 17. and other places.

Give, I pray you, loaves of bread unto the people that follow me.] A small request, considering their great merits.

For they be faint, and I am pursuing after Zebah and Zalmunna.] He gives two reasons for his request; because his men were faint with a whole night's labour for the public safety, and he had not made his victory so complete as he hoped to do, if his men were refreshed and enabled to pursue the enemy.

Kings of Midian.] It is no wonder we read of more kings than one in this country, there being five in Moses's time, (Numb. xxxi. 8.) and more than five times five in Canaan, which was divided into many petty kingdoms: and therefore, if we take Oreb and Zeeb also to have been kings, there is no improbability in it.

Ver. 6. And the princes of Succoth said.] The rulers and governors of the city, who had the chief authority among them; as Oreb and Zeeb had in the army of Midian, for it is the very same word in the Hebrew.

Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna now in thy hand, that we should give bread unto thy army?] They bid him first take those kings captives, and bring them thither with their hands bound behind them, before he made any demands of them. It is a bitter sort of taunt or derision, arising from irreligion; which made them think there was nothing of God in this victory, and that he would not be able to perfect it.

Ver. 7. And Gideon said, Therefore when the Lord hath delivered Zebah and Zalmunna into my hand.] As he was confident he would.

Then will I tear your flesh with the thorns of the wilderness, and with briers.] This city was near to a wilderness, in which there were plenty of thorns and briers; with which he threatens to thrash their flesh, as the word is in the Hebrew: which some think signifies, that laying briers and thorns on their naked bodies, he intended to bring the cart-wheel over them (as the manner was of thrashing out their corn) to fasten them deep in their flesh, and then crush them to death: such a kind of punishment David inflicted on the Ammonites, (2 Sam. xii. ult.)

Ver. 8. And he went up from thence.] He would not stay to avenge this repulse at present, but sacrificed his private resentments to the public service, and therefore went on after the enemy.

Unto Penuel.] Another city in the tribe of Gad, not far from Succoth; unto both which Jacob gave their name, (Gen. xxxii. 30. xxxiii. 17.)

And spake unto them likewise.] Desired some provision of them, for the same reason.

And the men of Penuel.] i. e. The principal persons of the city.

Answered him as the men of Succoth had answered him.] It is very likely they were idolaters; and therefore hated Gideon, who began to reform religion: and, trusting to the strength of their tower, despised the small forces he had with him.

Ver. 9. And he spake unto the men of Penuel, saying, When I come again in peace, I will break down this tower.] In which they confided; and perhaps pointed to it, when they gave him their rude answer.

Ver. 10. Now Zebah and Zalmunna were in Karkor.] We read of this place no where else; and therefore it is but a conjecture that it was in the confines of the tribe of Gad. St. Jerome saith, there was a castle in his time called Carcaria, about a day's journey from the city Petra; and Eusebius saith the same.

And all the hosts with them.] That is, all the troops or regiments, as we now speak, that fled with them.

About fifteen thousand men, all that were left of all the hosts of the children of the east.] This moved those of Succoth and Penuel to mock at Gideon; that he should think with three hundred men, and they fatigued (as we now speak), to vanquish fifteen thousand; and that he should make demands to them, as if he had his enemies already in his power.

For there fell a hundred and twenty thousand men that drew sword.] Besides all the people that attended their baggage.

Ver. 11. And Gideon went up by the way of them that dwelt in tents.] He fetched a compass, by the country of the Arabians called Scenitæ, because they dwelt in tents: and so he came upon the back of Zebah and Zalmunna; where they suspected no danger.

On the east of Nobah and Jogbehah.] Two cities, the last of which is expressly said to be in the tribe of Gad, Numb. xxxii. 35. and the former in the tribe of Manasseh, on the borders of Gad, as may be gathered from this place.

And smote the host: for the host was secure.] He fell upon them, it is very probable, in the night, as he had done upon their main army at the first: and they having fled as fast as they could, the day, and part of the night before, were gone to take their rest; supposing they had been out of all danger of disturbance, now they were got so far from the place of battle.

Ver. 12. And when Zebah and Zalmunna fled, he pursued after them.] We read of no refreshment that he and his men had all this time; but either they met with some by the way, or God miraculously supported them.

And took the two kings of Midian, Zebah and Zalmunna, and discomfited all the host.] Having routed their army, the two kings could make little resistance.

Ver. 13. And Gideon the son of Joash returned from the battle before the sun was up.] The Hebrew words milmahaleh hachares are so variously translated by very learned men, that it hath made it uncertain whether he returned after sun-rise, or a little before it set (as Kimchi among the Jews, and Mercer among Christians understand it), or, as our translation, before sun-rise: so the Vulgar, with Junius, and Tremellius, and others. And then it shews, both that Gideon had smote the army in the night, and that he made such haste to return, that he came to Succoth before they were aware, by break of day.

Ver. 14. And caught a young man of the men of Succoth, and inquired of him.] Surprised him in the field, and examined him who were the principal men of the city.

And he described to him the princes of Succoth, and the elders thereof, even threescore and seventeen men.] He wrote down (as the Hebrew word for describe signifies) the names, and, perhaps, the dwellings of the great men of the city, and of the judges; who were the persons that derided him, and whom alone he intended to punish; not all the people, who were not in the guilt.

Ver. 15. And he came unto the men of Succoth.] Got into the city very early; and called those men before him, who had put the late affront upon him.

And said, Behold Zebah and Zalmunna, with whom you upbraided me.] He kept these two kings alive, on purpose that the princes of Succoth might see the Lord had delivered them into his hand; and made their jeers turn to their own shame.

Saying, Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna in thy hand, that we should give bread unto thy men that are weary?] He repeats their own words to them, (ver. 6.) that he might reproach them with their inhuman usage of him; when he was in distress, and had done such wonders for their preservation.

Ver. 16. And he took the elders of the city.] Under this name of elders, all their great men are comprehended.

And thorns of the wilderness, and briers.] Which he had ready at hand.

And with them he taught the men of Succoth.] He thrashed or tare them (as he threatened, ver. 7. and as some copies here have it), and by this severe correction taught them better manners, and more wisdom. It is not said that he tormented them till they expired, (as some think he did, see ver. 7.) for then it would have been as plainly said, as it is in the next verse of the men of Penuel.

Ver. 17. And he beat down the tower of Penuel, and slew the men of the city.] It is not said the princes and elders, and therefore this looks as if the whole city had been guilty of the affront put upon him, and consequently punished by him. But the men of the city in this story, hath signified only the principal persons in it, as I interpreted ver. 8. (see ver. 15, 16.) and therefore it is probable no other men are here meant, who fled into the tower, perhaps, for safety (knowing their own guilt, and the danger they were in of suffering for it), and were there slain.

Ver. 18. Then said he unto Zebah and Zalmunna, What manner of men were they whom ye slew at Tabor?] Where Gideon brought them before him to be judged, is uncertain: and when it was that they slew some Israelites at Tabor, we can but guess. It is probable he brought them out to receive their sentence after he came home: and that some who hid themselves in dens and caves, which were in the mountains, (vi. 2.) being found out, were slain by the Midianites. And Gideon's brethren being missing, he desired to find out, whether they were the persons whom they slew.

And they answered, As thou art, so were they.] They were very like him, and perhaps resembled him in their countenance; as brethren frequently do one another.

Every one resembled the children of a king.] By this it appears, that Gideon was of a goodly presence; carrying greatness and majesty in his aspect: and that kings took care in those days to match only with graceful persons; by whom they might hope to have children like to themselves.

Ver. 19. And he said, They were my brethren, even the sons of my mother.] Though, perhaps, not by the same father.

As the Lord liveth, if ye had spared them alive.] As generous men are wont to do comely and graceful persons; who look like men of quality, as we now speak.

I would not slay you.] For not being of the race of Canaan, he was not bound by the law to cut them off.

Ver. 20. And he said unto Jether his first-born, Up, and slay them.] It was not unusual for great persons to do execution upon offenders in ancient times; no more than it unbecame them to sentence them to death: and therefore they had not, as now, such as the Romans called carnifices, public executioners; but Saul bade such as waited on him kill the priests; and Doeg, one of his great officers, did it, (1 Sam. xxii. 17, 18.) And Samuel himself is said to have hewed Agag to pieces in Gilgal; and Benaiah, the general of the army, to have fallen upon Joab at the horns of the altar. Accordingly Gideon would have had his son do this execution, that he might be early animated against the enemies of Israel; as Hannibal is reported, when he was a boy, to have been incensed against the Romans.

But the youth drew not his sword; for he feared, because he was yet a youth.] They were men, it is likely, of great stature, and of a fierce and stern countenance, who (as appears by the story) feared not death; which made the youth afraid even to look upon them.

Ver. 21. Then Zebah and Zalmunna said, Arise thou, and fall upon us: for as the man is, so is his strength.] They thought it more honourable to die by the hand of Gideon, who was a man of as great strength as dignity; and would sooner dispatch them, than a stripling could do.

And Gideon arose, and slew Zebah and Zalmunna, and took away the ornaments that were about their camels' necks.] As well as all the ornaments which they wore themselves. The word saharonim is found no where but here, and ver. 26. and in Isaiah iii. 18. where we translate it round tires like the moon. So our margin also in this place, ornaments like the moon; following the LXX. who translate it μηνίσκους, little moons. So ancient was this custom of wearing ornaments of this figure; which was spread afterward over many nations. Huetius thinks it came originally from the Phœnicians, who were the worshippers of Astarte, i. e. the moon; and went from them to the Arabians, who were very anciently devoted to the moon, who propagated it to the Turks; and the Brachmans also are wont to adorn their heads in the same figure; as he observes in his Demonstr. Evangel. propos. iv. p. 197.

Ver. 22. Then the men of Israel said unto Gideon, Rule thou over us, both thou, and thy son, and thy son's son also.] They would have made his dominion over them hereditary.

For thou hast delivered us from the hand of Midian.] They pretended to make this offer out of gratitude to him; but, in truth, they were disposed now (as their posterity were afterward) to throw off the Divine government; being desirous to set a king over themselves, like the rest of the nations round about them. And now they thought was a fit opportunity; when such an extraordinary judge was raised up, as had done wonders beyond all his predecessors; and might, they thought, be ambitious enough to establish the supreme authority in his family.

Ver. 23. But Gideon said, I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you.] He absolutely rejected their offer; because he looked upon God as their king, who appointed what deputy he pleased to rule them: and therefore he accounted this to be an attempt to alter the government of God without asking his consent.

The Lord shall rule over you.] As he hath done hitherto. This shews that these two could not consist together; a successive dominion of kings and such governors as they now had by the Divine appointment. Such a one was Gideon, raised up by God when they needed a deliverer; and therefore he durst not accept of the authority they offered him, because it was a thing sacred, and proper only to the Divine Majesty to order who should govern: whence it is that the judgment which was administered among that people was called God's judgment, Deut. i. 17. and Solomon is said to sit upon the throne of the Lord, 1 Chron. xxix. 23. and the kingdom of his posterity is called the kingdom of the Lord, 2 Chron. xiii. 8. because, before kings were settled in Israel, the Lord was their king; from whom the government was derived to the house of David by a special act of God.

Ver. 24. And Gideon said unto them, I would desire a request of you.] Which he thought, after such a great offer from them, they would not deny him.

That ye would give me every man the ear-rings of his prey] He doth not ask all the ear-rings they had got; but from every man one, or as many as he pleased.

For they had golden ear-rings, because they were Ishmaelites.] The Chaldee paraphrast well expresses it, because they were Arabians, who are called the children of the east, (vi. 3.) and generally wore such ornaments, as I observed upon Exod. xxxii. 2. Ishmaelites, also, and Midianites, were so near neighbours, and so mixed together, that the Scripture speaks of them as one people. (See upon Gen. xxxvii. 28.)

Ver. 25. And they answered, We will willingly give them. And they spread a garment, and did cast therein every man the ear-rings of his prey.] They made no difficulty to grant his request; but, as we speak, no sooner said than done.

Ver. 26. And the weight of the golden ear-rings that he requested was a thousand and seven hundred shekels of gold.] It is easy to compute what this makes of our money, by considering the value of a shekel, and the proportion that silver holds to gold. Of which see the very learned treatise of the Bishop of Peterborough, concerning Scripture Weights and Measures, chap. 4.

Besides ornaments.] Of which see above, ver. 21.

And the collars.] The Hebrew word hanetiphoth is thought to signify little pots of precious ointments. For neteph signifies a drop, or a tear; the most precious of which is balsam. Among the spoils of Darius (as Arius Montanus observes) historians mention boxes of ointments set with precious stones, and curiously wrought with elegant art.

And purple raiment that was on the kings of Midian.] Who were distinguished from other men, as kings are now, by robes peculiar to them.

And beside the chains that were upon their camels' necks.] All these, I take it, fell to Gideon's share, by the custom of war, without asking. For it was the ancient manner, as Grotius observes, to give the commander-in-chief the best of the spoils they had taken.

Ver. 27. And Gideon made an ephod thereof.] He would not have them think that he requested the ear-rings for his own private gain; but to employ them religiously in the service of God, by making a monument of his victory, as obtained solely by the miraculous mercy of God, for the restoring of his true religion among them. It is commonly said, that so much gold could not be laid out upon an ephod; and therefore some take this for a short expression, to signify the breast-plate, with the urim and thummim; that he (being now supreme governor) might consult God at his own house, in such difficulties as might occur: and they think it probable that he made also a private tabernacle with cherubims: for how else could he employ such a quantity of gold? An ephod being only fine linen embroidered with it, &c. which would not cost much. (See Exod. xxviii. 6.) Theodoret and St. Austin seem to incline to this opinion; for which I refer the reader to our Dr. Spencer, in his most learned work De Leg. et Rit. Hebr. p. 881. But I do not see how Gideon can be excused from apostacy from God, if he set up an oracle in his own house; nor was there any need of it, Shiloh being not far from him, in the tribe of Ephraim, which adjoined to this of Manasseh. Therefore I take this ephod to have been only a monument of his victory, and of God's great mercy, which conquerors were wont to erect: but he would not follow the common custom in erecting a pillar, and hanging up trophies, or any thing of that nature; but chose to make an ephod, as a token that he ascribed his victory only to God, and triumphed in nothing, but only in the restoration of the true religion by his means. As for the gold that was laid out upon it, the reader may observe, that it is said he made an ephod thereof; that is, out of this offering; but not that it was all spent in this.

And put it in his city, even in Ophrah.] This is to be well noted; because I think it shews that Gideon did not make this that he might have resort to God thereby on all occasions at home; for he went and dwelt at another place, (ver. 29.) It was kept here therefore as a monument of God's appearing to him, and of the sacrifice the angel here offered, and of all the wonders that followed, by the power of God who dwelt in the sanctuary. There are those who think, that because God bade Gideon build an altar, and offer his father's second bullock in Ophrah, (vi. 26.) he thence concluded, he might take upon him to have priestly garments made, and the high-priest came to minister at Ophrah upon extraordinary occasions. But he understood religion better than to make such conclusions, unless he had received a Divine command for this, as he did for the building of an altar.

And all Israel went thither a whoring after it.] This, I suppose, was after his death, when the people began to return to idolatry; and had this fancy, among others, that God would answer them here where this ephod was, as well as at his tabernacle in Shiloh, where he dwelt.

Which thing became a snare unto Gideon, and his house.] Occasioned the ruin of him and of his family. For though they perished after his death, yet he may be said to have suffered with them, because his name and memory, which is preserved in men's posterity, was in a manner extinct in Israel.

Ver. 28. Thus was Midian subdued before the children of Israel, so that they lifted up their heads no more.] To oppress the Israelites; or, perhaps, to disturb any of their neighbours.

And the country was in quietness forty years in the days of Gideon.] The country was in quiet in the fortieth year after the former rest restored to it by Deborah and Barak, as our primate Usher understands it, in his Annals ad A. M. 2759. and in his Chronologia Sacra, par. i. cap. 13. where, in more words, he thus interprets it: In the fortieth year after the rest restored by Deborah and Barak, the land began to rest again in the days of Gideon, after he had subdued the Midianites, who had oppressed them seven years. But the plainest account is, that after seven years' oppression by the Midianites, the country was in peace forty years in the days of Gideon, who was their deliverer; and died, as we read ver. 32. in a good old age.

Ver. 29. And Jerubbaal the son of Joash went and dwelt in his own house.] Having refused to be a king, and dismissed his army, he went from Ophrah (as I understand it), and lived not so publicly as he had done, but in a private house of his own in the country.

Ver. 30. And Gideon had threescore and ten sons, of his body begotten.] These last words are added to shew, that they were none of them adopted sons.

For he had many wives.] According to the manner of those times. And this is said to lessen the wonder of having so many children; many women bringing two or three at a birth, and one woman having had above twenty children by one man.

Ver. 31. And his concubine.] The difference between a wife and a concubine hath been often noted. Their wives administered the affairs of the family, the concubines meddled not with them; but, as the word signifies, were only admitted to their beds: and their children did not inherit, though they were married to them; for they were not harlots, but a secondary sort of wives.

That was in Shechem.] A famous city in the tribe of Ephraim, adjoining to that of Manasseh; where, going frequently to judge the people, he took a wife of this sort, who lived constantly with her father in this city, and not in Gideon's family.

She also bare him a son.] Beside the seventy beforementioned, as Josephus understands it.

Whose name was Abimelech.] His name is here set down when nothing is said of the names of the rest, because the following story depends upon it. And perhaps his mother gave him this name (signifying my father a king) out of pride and arrogance, that she might be looked upon as the wife of one who was thought to deserve a kingdom, though he did not accept it: which afterward, it is likely, inflamed the mind of this son to affect the royal dignity.

Ver. 32. And Gideon the son of Joash died in a good old age.] This is a phrase often used in Scripture, to signify that such persons lived long and in great prosperity and happiness.

And was buried in the sepulchre of Joash his father, in Ophrah of the Abi-ezrites.] Which was accounted a great blessing in those days.

Ver. 33. And it came to pass, as soon as Gideon was dead, that the children of Israel turned again.] He preserved them, it seems, in the true religion while he lived; but they had no great affection to it, it appears, by their revolting from it as soon as he was dead.

And went a whoring after Baalim.] This seems to have been a general name of all the gods which they worshipped, particularly of demons, which were all called Baalim from the first demon, or deified king in the world, Belus or Baal, as Mr. Mede thinks, book iii. p. 777.

And made Baal-berith their god.] They worshipped a new god, which was not known to them before, nor ever mentioned but here and in the next chapter: who was reputed, as some think, the god that punished those who broke their covenants and contracts; or, as others, was so called because his servants covenanted to maintain his worship and service. But Bochartus, by a more probable conjecture, interprets it Baal of Berith, i. e. of Berytus. That Baal which was worshipped in that famous city which had its name from Beroe, the daughter of Venus and Adonis, who was there worshipped, as Nonnus tells us. This he takes to be the Baal here mentioned; for Baal is of the feminine gender as well as of the masculine, as appears from St. Paul, Rom. xi. 4. and many places of the LXX. which Bochartus mentions, lib. ii. Canaan, cap. 17.

Ver. 34. And the children of Israel remembered not the Lord their God, who had delivered them out of the hands of all their enemies on every side.] Out of the hand of the king of Mesopotamia, and then of the Moabites, and after that of the Canaanites, and now lately of the Midianites and the children of the east.

Ver. 35. Neither shewed they kindness to the house of Jerubbaal, namely Gideon.] No wonder they were so ungrateful to his family when they were so forgetful of God: the fear of whom is the foundation of all virtue.

According to all the goodness which he had shewn unto Israel.] In hazarding his life freely, and working for them a glorious deliverance; and in leaving them in their liberty, by refusing the despotic power which they offered to put into his hands; and in governing them so prudently many years, that he left them in peace, and in the possession of God's true religion, when he died.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. AND Abimelech the son of Jerubbaal went.] From his father's house, where it is likely he was educated.

Unto Shechem.] The place of his nativity.

Unto his mother's brethren.] Though the word brethren has many times a large signification, yet it is reasonable here to understand it properly, of his uncles by the mother's side; for his other near kindred are mentioned in the words following.

And communed with them, and with all the family of the house of his mother's father, saying.] Discoursed with them, and with all the rest of his cousins, and his near kinsmen, descended from his grandfather.

Ver. 2. Speak, I pray you, in the ears of all the men of Shechem.] By the men of this city are to be understood, the chief persons of authority in it, as in the foregoing chapter the men of Succoth signify the princes and elders of that place.

Whether is better for you, either that all the sons of Jerubbaal (which are threescore and ten persons) reign over you, or that one reign over you.] He wickedly supposed that the sons of Jerubbaal were ambitious of the kingdom which their father refused; and therefore prays them to consider, what horrible divisions and confusion it would make, if so many were permitted to pretend to the government; and how much better it would be to choose one of them from among the rest; pointing then (in the next words) to himself. He uses the argument of Homer, mentioned by Aristotle, οὐχ' ἀγαθὸν πολυκοιρανίη, &c. It is better to be subject to the rule of one man than of many.

Remember also that I am your bone and your flesh.] Since there must be a king, he represents himself, as the most desirable to them of all other single persons, he being of the same tribe, and their fellow-citizen.

Ver. 3. And his mother's brethren spake of him in the ears of the men of Shechem, all these words.] They were ready enough to promote his design, hoping for preferment under him. But neither he nor they considered, that it did not belong to them to set a judge over the people, much less a king, which was to shake off the government of God.

And their hearts inclined to follow Abimelech, for they said, He is our brother.] This consideration of their interest in him, prevailed with them against the clearest reason. For if it had been in any person's power to appoint a king, but God alone, the men of Shechem had it not in them, but all the men of Israel ought to have been consulted.

Ver. 4. And they gave him threescore and ten pieces of silver out of the house of Baal-berith.] Out of the public treasury, which was in this temple. It is uncertain what is meant by pieces of silver; but, in all probability, more than shekels; for they would have been but a small present to make a man a prince. Therefore the Vulgar translates it so many pound weight of silver, which learned men approve of, particularly Stanislaus Grepsius, in his book de Siclo et Talento. For seventy shekels were too little for his occasions; and so many talents too much for them to give. And thus Josephus interprets Gen. xxxvii. 28. where it is said, Joseph was sold to the Ishmaelites for twenty pieces of silver; that is, for so many pound weight of it.

Wherewith Abimelech hired vain and light persons.] The Hebrew word rekim, which we translate vain, signifies empty; that is, poor and needy persons: and the other word, pochazim, idle, vagabond fellows, that could settle to no business, but wandered about the country; who being commonly men of loose lives, were fittest for his purpose. Therefore Kimchi understands by them light-headed persons (as we speak), who have no settled principles, but are disposed to do any thing, though never so wicked. Such Zephaniah saith the prophets in his time were, (iii. 4.) light and treacherous.

Which followed him.] As a constant guard to him.

Ver. 5. And he went into his father's house at Ophrah.] With this wicked crew to attend him; who, I suppose, beset the house, that none might escape out of it. I supposed that he had a house in the country, viii. 29. for I could not see with what propriety he could be said to go and dwell in his house at Ophrah, in which he had always lived. But this was the house of the family, where all his children lived.

And slew his brethren the sons of Jerubbaal, being threescore and ten persons.] All of them except Jotham. Thus Romulus slew his brother Remus, as Tully observes, (lib. iii. de Officiis) "Specie quadam utilitatis," under the specious pretence of the public good; that the kingdom would be governed more happily by one, than by two persons.

Upon one stone.] Some understand this, as if he intended to make them a great victim to Baal; for a stone was sometimes used for an altar, 1 Sam. vi. 14, 15. And so they take this to have been done in revenge of the sacrifice of the bullock prepared for Baal upon the rock, (vi. 25, 26.) which crime of Gideon, as these idolaters accounted it, they designed to expiate by the sacrifice of all his sons that they could lay hold on. For that the men of Shechem joined in this impious slaughter, is manifest from ver. 18. and 24. of this chapter.

Notwithstanding, yet Jotham, the youngest son of Jerubbaal, was left; for he hid himself.] Either he had some notice of their intention, and saved himself by flight, or, when they came to seize them, got into some secret place in the house, where they could not find him; or, by some that pitied his youth, he was preserved from falling into their hands. So the LXX. and the Vulgar translate it, He was hid.

Ver. 6. And all the men of Shechem gathered themselves together, and all the house of Millo.] None seem to have understood these words better than Corn. Bertram, in his little book de Republ. Jud. cap. 9. where by col-baale Shechem he understands all the principal men or lords of that city; principes civitatis, the princes of the city, by whom it was governed: and by col-beth Millo, all the citizens, who in a full assembly (for Millo signifies fulness) agreed upon what follows: and so we read in the next chapter, (x. 18.) that the people and princes of Gilead consulted together, who should fight for them; that is, all the citizens met together, with their elders, (as these princes are called, xi. 5.) to advise about this matter: for when the Canaanites, and other people, ruled over the Israelites and oppressed them, they contented themselves with setting such a power over them, as should make them pay what tribute they imposed, and other taxes; but left them to their own government and laws, as appears from viii. 14. where we read of the elders of Succoth in the time of the Midianites.

And went.] To the place where they were wont to meet for public business.

And made Abimelech king.] Voted him their king, in full senate.

In the plain of the pillar that was in Shechem.] Or the oak (as St. Jerome commonly translates this word elon), where Joshua set up a pillar as a token of the covenant between God and them, Josh. xxiv. 26. That is, in a very remarkable place, as the manner was to do such things: but here, I suppose, they proclaimed him king, after they had chosen him in the common hall of the city: and some think they intended hereby to declare, that they would not forsake the worship of God, to which they were engaged, but only to join the worship of Baal with him: but see what I have noted of this pillar, Deut. xxvii. 13. And after all it must be confessed, that the Hebrew word mutzab doth not certainly signify a pillar; for I cannot find it so used in any other place of Scripture: and therefore St. Jerome translates this passage thus, By the oak which stood in Shechem, and the LXX. ἐν βαλάνῳ τῆς ὀτάσεως, which seems to signify as if it was the place where they had their stations, or solemn assemblies. See Mr. Mede's Discourse xviii.

Ver. 7. And when they told it Jotham.] Who had some friends among them, that took care to inform him of what passed: but it is an amazing thing, that in all Israel there should none be found to revenge the murder of this noble family: of which no account can be given, but that, with the sense of God and religion, they had lost all goodness and virtue. (See viii. 34, 35.)

He went.] From the place where he lay hid.

And stood on the top of Mount Gerizim.] Which overlooked the city of Shechem. (See Deut. xxvii. 12, 13.)

And lifted up his voice and cried, and said unto them.] This was not on the same day that Abimelech was inaugurated, but some time after; when he, it is probable, was absent, and all the people met (as Josephus saith) at a public festival; which was a fair opportunity for him to declare his mind to them.

Hearken unto me, ye men of Shechem, that God may hearken unto you.] It is a form of adjuration, whereby he not only intreats, but obliges them to be as attentive to him, as they desired God would be to their requests.

Ver. 8. The trees went forth on a time.] By this it appears, that such fictions as these, wherein the most serious truths are represented, were in use among the Jews (as they are still in the eastern countries) long before the time of Æsop, or any other author that we know of. And they made choice of them for two reasons; because men would suffer themselves to be reprehended this way, when they would not endure plain words; and they heard them also with delight and pleasure, and more easily remembered them than a rational discourse. So A. Gellius observes of Æsop's Fables, that they slid into the mind and affections of men, cum audiendi quadam illecebra, with a certain enticement to hear them, (lib. ii. cap. 29.)

To anoint a king over them.] This was two hundred years (as Mr. Selden observes in his Titles of Honour) before the first kings of Israel (Saul and David) were anointed. Which shews the great antiquity of this custom; and that it was the same to anoint a person, and to declare him king.

And they said unto the olive-tree, Reign thou over us.] By this they would easily apprehend he meant his father Gideon; to whom all the Israelites had offered the kingdom, when he was in a most flourishing condition, and had newly triumphed over their enemies.

Ver. 9. But the olive-tree said unto them.] In this reply he represents his refusal of the offer, and the reason of it.

Shall I leave my fatness, wherewith by me they honour God and man.] He makes the trees speak after the manner of men; who, when they are in a plentiful condition, and live at ease, are not willing to take upon themselves a great deal of care and trouble, especially when they think themselves to have honour enough already; as Gideon had, in being such a glorious conqueror over mighty enemies. God and man are said to be honoured by oil, because it was offered in sacrifice to God, and fed the lamps of his house; and priests were wont to be anointed with it among men. (See Lev. ii. 1. 4. Numb. xv. 4. 6, &c.)

And go to be promoted among the trees?] This is a most lively representation of the duty of a good man; who, for the public good, denies his own quiet and tranquillity. For the Hebrew word we translate promote, signifies (as is noted in the margin) action and agitation to and fro; shewing how a man must bestir himself who executes the kingly office; and what solicitude and continual carefulness is the concomitant of authority, when it is duly administered.

Ver. 10. And the trees said unto the fig-tree, Come thou and reign over us.] He intends to represent the same mind to be in all Gideon's sons that was in their father: for as Gideon refused the kingdom himself, so he did for his posterity, saying, I will not rule over you, neither shall my son, or my son's son (i. e. any of mine) rule over you, (viii. 23.) Therefore Abimelech had most vilely slandered them in suggesting that they affected a regal power over the people.

Ver. 11. But the fig-tree said unto them, Shall I forsake my sweetness, and my good fruit, and go to be promoted over the trees?] No fruit is more luscious than a fig, which makes this an apt representation of the sweet content, or rather full pleasure, that may be enjoyed in a private life, which it would be folly to exchange for the troubles and cares which men meet withal in the managery of public affairs, if they be not drawn to it purely out of love to the public good.

Ver. 12. Then said the trees unto the vine, Come thou and reign over us.] All these are noble trees, setting forth the same thing, that better men than Abimelech had refused that of which he was ambitious.

Ver. 13. And the vine said unto them, Shall I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?] The same thing is repeated for the fuller illustration of the thing intended, according to the manner of all such ways of speech: for A. Gellius, in the place beforenamed, makes the birds among the corn, when it was to be reaped, say the same thing more than once to their dam before she bade them be gone. As for wine cheering God and man, it is a form of speech imitated by the heathen, particularly by Virgil, lib. ii. Georg. ver. 101. where speaking of noble vines, or wine, he saith, they were "Mensis et Diis accepta secundis." For wine, as the Hebrew doctors note, was not only used in their sacrifices, as it was also among the heathen; but Jarchi saith, Till the drink-offering was poured out, they did not begin the hymn that was then sung to God. (See upon Numb. xv. 5.)

Ver. 14. Then said all the trees unto the bramble, &c.] The meanest of all trees, good for nothing but to be burnt, aptly representing Abimelech, from whom they could receive no benefit, but much trouble and vexation from his ambitious cruelty.

Ver. 15. And the bramble said unto them, If in truth ye anoint me king over you.] This well sets forth Abimelech's distrust of the sincerity of the Shechemites; for which he had great reason, having no title to the kingdom but the great achievements of his father, and he the basest of all his sons.

Then come and put your trust in my shadow.] Be assured of my protection, if you live quietly under my government. This represents how ridiculous Abimelech was, in imagining that he should be able to maintain the authority of a king; for a bramble doth not spread itself so as to afford any shelter or shadow, it being a kind of a thorn, which the Hebrews call atad. From whence, as Avenarius observes, came the word aphris among the Greeks, and in Dioscorides the word ἀταδίμ. And from hence he thinks was derived the word οὐτάω, and οὐτάζω, which signify to wound, as a thorn doth when it pricks.

And if not, let fire come out of the bramble.] It is a wood that easily catches fire, as Forsterus observes out of Josephus, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 11.

And devour the cedars of Lebanon.] This represents the vengeance Abimelech would take of the greatest of them, if they proved unfaithful to him.

Ver. 16. Now therefore.] Here follows Jotham's application of this apologue, as the Greeks call it, unto his purpose.

If ye have done truly and sincerely in that ye have made Abimelech king.] If his preferment was a righteous act.

And if ye have dealt well with Jerubbaal and his house, and have done unto him according to the deserving of his hand.] And if they had requited Gideon and his family according to his merits, which were exceeding great.

Ver. 17. For my father fought for you, and adventured his life far.] Put it in great hazard.

And delivered you out of the hand of Midian.] When they were sorely oppressed by them, and could not help themselves.

Ver. 18. And ye are risen up against my father's house this day.] This shews the men of Shechem consented to the murder, and assisted Abimelech in it.

And have slain his sons, threescore and ten persons.] For they intended the slaughter of Jotham, as much as of the rest, if he could have been found.

Upon one stone, and have made Abimelech, the son of his maid-servant.] For concubines were often put to do the work of the house

King over the men of Shechem.] Who could not pretend to make him king over all Israel: no, nor over the whole tribe of Ephraim, but only of their city and territory.

Because he is your brother.] Without any title to it, but because he was a native of their city.

Ver. 19. If you have done truly and sincerely.] Like honest and upright men.

With Jerubbaal and his house this day, then rejoice ye in Abimelech, and let him rejoice in you.] He wishes they may be happy in one another.

Ver. 20. But if not, let fire come from Abimelech, and devour the men of Shechem, and the house of Millo.] This is not a prediction, but an execration or curse, as appears from the opposition to the foregoing wish, and from ver. 57. where it is called Jotham's curse. Which was not causeless, but like that of Joshua's, (Josh. vi. 26.) which was fulfilled, as this was. Not by fire, properly so called, breaking forth from Abimelech, but by his rage and furious revenge, which is fitly compared to fire, in allusion to what is said of the bramble, (ver. 15.)

And let fire come out from the men of Shechem, and from the house of Millo, and devour Abimelech.] He wishes they may mutually destroy each other, which came to pass by the righteous judgment of God, who hears the cries of the oppressed.

Ver. 21. And Jotham ran away, and fled.] As he might easily do, I have shewn upon Deut. xxvii. 13. The first word signifies, he made what haste he could away, as soon as he had done speaking; and the second, that he stopped not till he had got to a place of safety.

And went to Beer, and dwelt there, for fear of Abimelech his brother.] It is not certain where this place was, whether in the land of Israel, or out of it. It is probable, that it was in the tribe of Judah, about eight miles from Eleutheropolis, as both Eusebius and St. Jerome affirm.

Ver. 22. When Abimelech had reigned three years over Israel.] It is not said, over all Israel, who, it cannot be thought, would submit to the ambitious tyranny of so cruel a man as Abimelech was. And if Beer was in the tribe of Judah, we may be sure they did not own him for their king; for then Jotham could not have dwelt in safety there. The meaning therefore is, that he called himself king of Israel, and reigned over a great part of them, who were so desirous of a king (it appears by their offer made to Gideon), that they were content with him, rather than have none at all.

Ver. 23. And God sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem.] At the three years' end, I suppose, God ordered things so in his providence, that they grew jealous and distrustful one of another, and fell into dissensions and discords.

And the men of Shechem dealt treacherously with Abimelech.] Conspired against him. So true is the observation of Grotius upon these words, that nothing is more unstable than the popular breath which is won by evil arts, and that men hate the wickedness which hath done them service.

Ver. 24. That the cruelty done to the threescore and ten sons of Jerubbaal might come, and their blood be laid upon their brother Abimelech, which slew them.] By this means God intended to punish Abimelech for the cruel murder of his brethren, whose blood cried for vengeance on him.

And upon the men of Shechem, which aided him in the killing of his brethren.] And to punish the men of Shechem, who enabled him to commit that wickedness, and helped him in it.

Ver. 25. And the men of Shechem set liers in wait for him, on the top of the mountains.] They were not yet broken out into open hostility against him; but there being a misunderstanding between them, Abimelech, I suppose, left the city in anger; but they thought he would return again, and thereupon set men to lie secretly on the top of the mountains over which he was to pass, to seize his person.

And they robbed all that came that way by them.] That the report coming to Abimelech's ears (as Arius Montanus understands it) how insecure his subjects were who passed that road, he might make the more speed, as good kings are bound to do, to clear the way from those thieves which infested it, and thereby give them an opportunity to seize him.

And it was told Abimelech.] What robberies were committed, and, perhaps, that they lay in wait for him.

Ver. 26. And Gael the son of Ebed.] We have no means to know who this Gael was, nor whence he came. R. Solomon thinks he was a gentile, and not one of the Jewish nation.

Came with his brethren.] He passed accidentally that way (as P. Martyr thinks) with his brethren and his attendants, about some business they had in that country: but the common opinion is, that he was a known enemy of Abimelech's, who hearing the men of Shechem were at defiance with him, came to offer them his service against him.

And the men of Shechem put their confidence in him.] That is, put themselves under his protection.

Ver. 27. And they went out into the fields, and gathered their vineyards, and trod the grapes.] Their first action under this new commander, was to go out of their city into their vineyards, which were in the fields, and gather their grapes, and press them, which they durst not do before, though the vintage was ripe, for fear of Abimelech; who being told how things stood there, had raised forces I suppose against them, but durst not now disturb them in their business, they being defended by Gael.

And made merry.] As they were wont to do in time of vintage, and now especially, when they were full of joy in hope to be rid of Abimelech's tyranny. The LXX. of the Vatican edition retain the Hebrew word, and translate it they made Ἐλλουλίμ, whereby some understand songs, as others dances: both are expressed by the Vulgar, and other copies of the LXX. have χορούς; for their merriment consisted very much in dances, with music and songs; which, as Max. Tyrius observes, were among the Greeks first used, and in honour of Bacchus, when they pressed out their grapes. (See Dr. Spencer, lib. iii. dissert. i. cap. 9.)

And went into the house of their god.] It is most likely into the temple of Baal-berith; there to offer their first-fruits, or such other sacrifices as were customary at that festival.

And did eat and drink.] Upon that part of the sacrifices which fell to the share of the people, who, perhaps, engaged in a covenant against Abimelech.

And cursed Abimelech.] Some think they only scoffed at him with taunts and reproaches, as men used to do in their cups: but the LXX. translate it κατηράσαντο, which signifies cursing, as we translate it; that is, they wished their god would confound him. And so we translate this word, Lev. xx. 9. Prov. xx. 20. A marvellous change, that they who lately gave him a great sum of money to advance him to the throne, should, in that very house from whence they took it, reproach him with imprecations of the Divine vengeance upon him.

Ver. 28. And Gael the son of Ebed said.] In the midst of this jollity, Gael (being elevated, I suppose, with wine) burst forth into this insulting language.

Who is Abimelech.] That is, he is but the son of a maid-servant, (ver. 18.)

And who is Shechem.] Some think he means the city of Shechem is as noble as he is base: why, therefore, should they be subject to him? but it seems, by what follows, to be rather the same thing repeated, Who, I say, is the Shechemite?

That we should serve him?] Suffer him to rule over us, and use us as he pleases.

Is he not the son of Jerubbaal?] Who threw down the altar of that god whom you worship.

And Zebul his officer.] Hath he not set one of his servants over you to be your governor?

Serve the men of Hamor the father of Shechem.] If we must be servants, let us restore the dominion of the old lords of this city, and subject ourselves to those who are descended from the ancient stock of Hamor; who was the father, as it were, of the Shechemites.

For why should we serve him?] But what reason can be given for our subjection to this upstart; who is famed for nothing, but his ambition and cruelty to his own brethren? this shews pretty plainly, that R. Solomon's opinion is true, that Gael was a gentile; who would have been glad to see the authority of the Canaanites restored. For though he suggests it only as comparatively more desirable than Abimelech's rule over them, yet, it is likely, he thought they might as well receive their government, as they had done their religion.

Ver. 29. And would to God this people were under my hand!] He wishes they would make him their king, at least their commander-in-chief: which it seems they had not yet resolved upon; some being still for Abimelech, and others not trusting to a stranger.

Then would I remove Abimelech.] That he should trouble them no more; but flee the country, as he was driven out of their city.

And he said to Abimelech, Increase thine army, and come out.] Some take this to be only a vapouring speech (as if Abimelech was present), when he knew he might boast and insult without danger, because he did not hear him; but it may as well be thought that he bid Abimelech's friends go and tell him what he said; that he wished him to reinforce his army, and come out (of the intrenchments wherein perhaps he was) and give him battle: for he pretended to scorn to set upon him by surprise, but desired to decide the quarrel in open field.

Ver. 30. And when Zebul, the ruler of the city, heard the words of Gael the son of Ebed, his anger was kindled.] It is likely he had carried fair (as we speak) with Gael hitherto; thinking it in vain to oppose a popular commotion, till their fury was a little calmed; but he could not bear these insolent thrasonical words of Gael, which perhaps were not spoken in his presence, but brought to him by some that heard them.

Ver. 31. And he sent messengers unto Abimelech privily, saying.] He had some wit in his anger, and did not openly declare his resentments; but gave secret intelligence to Abimelech how matters stood, with his advice how to proceed against Gael.

Behold, Gael the son of Ebed, and his brethren, be come to Shechem.] Where, no doubt, he informed him what entertainment he had found, and in what reviling terms he had spoken of him.

And, behold, he fortifieth the city against thee.] This was no sign that Gael desired, as he boasted, to meet Abimelech in a pitched battle; but that he rather provided for his own defence, in case he should be assaulted.

Ver. 32. Now therefore up by night, thou and the people that are with thee, and lie in wait in the fields.] His advice is, that, for fear of discovery, he should march with all his forces in the night, towards Shechem; and lurk in the fields till morning light.

Ver. 33. And it shall be, that in the morning, as soon as the sun is up, thou shalt rise up early, and set upon the city.] Surprise them, before they were better provided.

And, behold, when he and the people that are with him come out against thee.] As Gael had boasted he would do.

Then thou mayest do to them, as thou shalt find occasion.] He could give him no farther advice; but that then he should dispose his forces to the best advantage against him.

Ver. 34. And Abimelech rose up, and all the people that were with him by night, and they laid wait against Shechem in four companies.] He divided his army into four battalions (as they now speak), and disposed them in four places, as the Vulgar understands it: perhaps on the east, west, north, and south sides of the city.

Ver. 35. And Gael the son of Ebed went out.] Of his house.

And stood in the entering of the gate of the city.] To see, it is likely, if his soldiers were upon their guard.

And Abimelech rose up, and the people that were with him, from lying in wait.] Out of their lurking-places, where they had lain undiscovered all night.

Ver. 36. And when Gael saw the people, he said to Zebul.] Who, it seems, accompanied him, or, as governor of the city, was there to see every one do their duty.

Behold, there come people down from the top of the mountains.] Which were adjoining to the city, viz. Mount Gerizim, and Mount Ebal.

And Zebul said, Thou seest the shadow of the mountains as if they were men.] It being early in the morning, the trees, and all things else, cast long shadows, which being moved by the breath of air, which commonly accompanies the sun-rising, Zebul persuaded him he took for men marching down from the top of the mountains. Some think he spake this in mockery, that he was afraid of shadows; but delivered it in such a serious tone, that Gael believed he spake in earnest; by which it is plain that Zebul notably dissembled his resentments, and behaved himself as if he was on Gael's side; who was strangely infatuated, to trust one that was servant to Abimelech, and placed by him as governor of the city, whose pretences of friendship were reasonably to be suspected.

Ver. 37. And Gael spake again, and said, See.] Observe attentively.

There come down people by the middle of the land.] Now it was visible they were men; for they were come down to the middle of the mountains.

And another company come along by the plain of Meonenim.] It is likely the other two companies of the four, into which his forces were divided, appeared in other places, the more to distract the thoughts of Gael: and it is probable that Abimelech had seized the ambush, which they had laid for him on the top of the mountains, (ver. 25.) that they could carry no tidings of his coming. We read of this place no where else, and so I can give no account of it: but the Vulgar takes elon to signify not the plain, but an oak; and translates these words, by the way which looks towards the oak; which, in some copies of the LXX. are rendered, the oak of those that look towards, or that regard times, as we have it in the margin of our Bibles; as if it were like the oak at Dodona, among the Greeks, where they made divinations.

Ver. 38. Then said Zebul unto him, Where is now thy mouth, wherewith thou saidst, Who is Abimelech, that we should serve him?] Now Zebul pulls off his mask, and puts him in mind of the brags which he made, (ver. 28.)

Is not this the people that thou hast despised?] But now, he supposes, was afraid to encounter.

Go out, I pray thee, and fight with them.] He upbraids him with cowardice, unless he now shewed himself a man with his sword, as the other day with his tongue.

Ver. 39. And Gael went out.] It may seem strange that he did not first leave Zebul dead upon the spot behind him: but he was afraid of him, he having, as appeared afterward, a strong party in the city; and it was dangerous to have two enemies to deal withal, one without, and another within.

Before the men of Shechem, and fought with Abimelech.] As unprovided as he was he would not decline the fight, and was followed by the principal persons in Shechem.

Ver. 40. And Abimelech chased him, and he fled before him.] Towards the city.

And many were overthrown and wounded.] Some were killed, and others wounded.

Even unto the entering of the gate.] Where the rest, and Gael himself, got into the city, and there secured themselves: so the Vulgar, for explication's sake, He pursued him and drove him into the city.

Ver. 41. And Abimelech dwelt at Arumah.] It appears, by the next verse, this place was not far from Shechem; whither Abimelech thought fit to retreat, and there watch for an opportunity to be revenged of the Shechemites.

And Zebul thrust out Gael and his brethren, that they should not dwell in Shechem.] Because they were not able to defend it against Abimelech. Zebul had the stronger party on his side, otherwise he could not have expelled him; but Gael had so many adherents, that they durst not put him to death, for his ill management, as no doubt they called it, in the late fight.

Ver. 42. And it came to pass, on the morrow, that the people went out into the field.] Finding that Abimelech was retreated, as not strong enough, they imagined, to assault their city, they went about their business into the field; which, at that time of the year, after the vintage, was to plough and sow their lands, and dress their vines, and other trees: some will have it, that they went out to fight Abimelech again, which is not probable.

And they told Abimelech.] He wanted not some to carry him intelligence of it.

Ver. 43. And he took the people.] His forces, which lay in and about Arumah.

And divided them into three companies.] One of which (the next verse informs us) he commanded himself, and committed the other two to the conduct of their commanders.

And laid wait in the field.] With that company which he commanded, whom he ordered to lie close, and not discover themselves.

And looked, and, behold, the people were come forth out of the city.] He set some to spy when the people were come out, and set about their business.

And he rose up against them, and smote them.] His men came, on a sudden, out of their ambush, and killed many of them.

Ver. 44. And Abimelech, and the company which was with him, rushed forward, and stood in the entering of the gate of the city.] Made all the haste they could to get between them and home: and accordingly they posted themselves at the entering of the gate of the city; whereby they hindered those in the field from getting into it, and likewise those in the city from coming out to their relief: so that they were dispersed about the fields, where the other two companies picked them up, as it here follows.

And the two companies ran upon all the people that were in the fields, and slew them.] Which was a great disheartening, no doubt, to those in the city, to see so many of their fellow-citizens cut off.

Ver. 45. And Abimelech fought against the city all that day.] Having destroyed so many of the citizens in the morning, he made his battery against the city itself, the rest of the day.

And took it.] In the evening, I suppose, either by an assault, or by surrender.

And slew the people that were therein.] It is not said what became of Zebul, who, it is likely, went over to him, and directed him in his attack upon the city; leaving his own party, in whom he put no confidence, to perish with the rest.

And he beat down the city.] Laid the houses and walls level with the ground.

And sowed it with salt.] Salt makes land barren, and therefore Ralbag refers this to the ground about it or in it; that was wont to be employed for sowing any sort of grain, or planting vineyards, &c.: for, as Pliny observes, "Omnis locus in quo reperitur sal, sterilis est et nihil gignit," (lib. xxxi. cap. 7.) All places in which salt is found are barren, and bring forth nothing. Therefore Abimelech endeavoured to make this city a perpetual desolation. (See Bochart. Hierozoicon, p. 1. lib. iii. cap. 16.) But unless the soil had been salt of itself, his sowing salt there would not have made it barren; but would have soon recovered its fruitfulness: therefore all he intended was to shew his hatred of them, by wishing their city might lie waste, and be a perpetual desolation.

Ver. 46. And when all the men of the tower of Shechem heard that.] By these last words, it is plain this tower was not in the city, but at some distance from it: for otherwise, it would not have been said that they heard of the destruction of Shechem, but that they saw it with their eyes; yet it is likely, that this tower of Shechem was kept by a garrison of the Shechemites.

They entered into a hold of the house of the god Berith.] They durst not trust to the strength of the tower, but took sanctuary rather in a strong fortress of the temple of the god mentioned ver. 4. which was built, in all likelihood (according to the common custom of the world), upon one of the mountains hard by, and had near it this fortified strong hold; wherein they kept their treasure, (ver. 4.) It may be compared to the Roman capitol, and to the temple of Jerusalem, in aftertimes; which Josephus describes as an impregnable place.

Ver. 47. And it was told Abimelech, that all the men of the tower of Shechem were gathered together.] In the forenamed fortress.

Ver. 48. And Abimelech got him up to Mount Zalmon, he and all the people that were with him.] Some think this to be the same mountain which the Psalmist mentions lxviii. 15. and take it to have been near to Shechem, which had many mountains about it, (ver. 36.)

And Abimelech took an axe in his hand, and cut down a bough from the trees.] Which grew there in great abundance, for Zalmon seems to have had its name from the shadiness of the place.

And took it and laid it on his shoulders, and said unto the people that were with him, What ye have seen me do, make haste and do as I have done.] He, in some measure, imitates his father's speech to his three hundred men, before he went to fight, (vii. 17.)

Ver. 49. And the people likewise cut down every man his bough, and followed Abimelech, and put them to the hold, and set the hold on fire upon them.] Which was done with such expedition (as he ordered in the foregoing verse), that they within had no time to provide against it.

So that all the men of the tower of Shechem died also, about a thousand men and women.] Who perished in the fire and smoke, as the Vulgar here adds: but the Hebrew and LXX. say nothing of smoke, but only of fire: yet, it is highly probable, that many were choked by the smoke, which was very great and smothering, the wood being green: here the prediction, or rather imprecation of Jotham, ver. 20. was exactly fulfilled.

Ver. 50. Then went Abimelech unto Thebez, and encamped against Thebez, and took it.] This was a city, which, as Kimchi observes, had revolted from Abimelech; but it is uncertain whereabout it lay, though most think it in the territory near Shechem.

Ver. 51. But there was a strong tower within the city, and thither fled all the men and women, and all they of the city.] It was a place so large, that it could contain not only all the men of the city and their wives, but their servants also: who all betook themselves hither, as a place not easy to be taken, though the city could make little resistance.

And shut it to them.] Shut to the gate, and, I suppose, blocked it up so that it could not be opened.

And gat them up to the top of the tower.] Which was flat, as their houses were, with battlements round about it: here the besieged thought fit to stand in great numbers, that they might do what they could to beat him off, if Abimelech attempted to burn them, as he had done others in a neighbouring tower.

Ver. 52. And Abimelech came unto the tower, and fought against it.] His rage was insatiable; for, not content to have overthrown the Shechemites, and beat down their city, and burnt their strong hold, and taken Thebez, he beset their tower also; where, if he had not perished, none can tell how far his revenge would have proceeded.

And went hard unto the door of the tower to burn it with fire.] Being flushed with great success, he was so bold and hardy as himself to make this dangerous attempt.

Ver. 53. And a certain woman cast a piece of a mill-stone.] Which they had carried up among other stones and logs, and whatsoever they thought might offend the enemy: the Hebrew word rechab properly signifies the upper mill-stone, which moves (and, as it were, rides) upon the lower.

Upon Abimelech's head.] Being directed, no doubt, by a special providence of God, as the stone was out of the sling that killed Goliah, and the arrow wherewith Ahab was shot.

And all to break his scull.] Made such a fracture in it, that he concluded it to be mortal. Thus Plutarch relates that Pyrrhus, at the siege of Thebes, was killed by a woman, who threw a tile upon his head: but Abimelech's death by a stone is the more remarkable, because it carried some stamp of his sin upon it; for he slew all his brethren on one stone.

Ver. 54. Then he called hastily.] Fearing he should immediately expire.

Unto the young man his armour-bearer, and said unto him, Draw thy sword and slay me, that men say not of me, A woman slew him.] Though he knew she had given him his death's wound, yet he would have posterity think otherwise; for he thought it dishonourable to die by the hand of a woman: a foolish piece of vain-glory, wherewith he concluded his life as he had led it; for she had given him a mortal blow.

And his young man thrust him through, and he died.] Just when he imagined he was upon the point of conquering all opposition to him.

Ver. 55. And when the men of Israel.] That is, all that were in his army.

Saw that Abimelech was dead, they departed every man unto his place.] Disbanded themselves, having none to head them.

Ver. 56. Thus God rendered the wickedness of Abimelech, which he did unto his father, in slaying his seventy brethren.] Which was as much as in him lay, to root out the memory of his father, unless it survived in himself, who took a course to make his name infamous.

Ver. 57. And all the evil of the men of Shechem did God render upon their heads, and upon them came the curse of Jotham the son of Jerubbaal.] These two verses conclude this story with a Divine admonition, That no man should think such things came to pass by chance, but God, the Judge of all, punished both Abimelech and the men of Shechem according to their deserts, and made them the instruments of each other's destruction: and it is remarkable, that this punishment overtook them speedily, within less than four years after their crime was committed.

It was not the business of this holy writer to tell us what became of Jotham, no more than what became of Gael and Zebul: but only to shew, that as men have done, so God requites them; with which he ends this part of his history.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. AND after Abimelech.] Who was not a judge, much less appointed by God, but an usurper, who took upon him to alter the Divine government, and made himself a king.

There rose up.] It is not said that God stirred him up, as he did the foregoing judges; but it is so understood, because God would not have saved Israel by one that took upon him this high office without his order: and, therefore, as Peter Martyr well observes, in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, that as, after many good judges God had given them, he suffered the cruel tyrant Abimelech to interpose himself, that their virtues might shine more illustriously by his wickedness; so, after he was gone, God was pleased to raise up to them good judges again, who learnt moderation by the punishment of his vain ambition: and, in all likelihood, the dreadful end of Abimelech and his partakers, who made him king, affrighted the Israelites from presuming to make another, of their own heads.

To defend Israel.] Or, to save, as it is in the margin: for this was the great office of a judge, to deliver the people from the oppression of their enemies: we do not find indeed from what enemies they were delivered by this judge; but they may be said to save and deliver, who preserve men's liberties from being invaded, as well as they that vindicate and restore them when they are lost: and therefore we well translate it, To defend Israel. He may be thought also to have delivered them from those confusions and disorders they were in, by the disagreement between Abimelech and those that made him king: for both sides had many partakers, which made great divisions, and dangerous combinations among the people; but were all happily ended by the prudent management of this governor. Serrarius also adds, that he might be said to save or deliver them, because he restored the purity of their religion, by abolishing the worship of idols: for we read, that after the death of Gideon, "they went a whoring after Baalim, and made Baal-berith their god," (viii. 33.) which they continued in the reign of Abimelech; but were now brought back to the worship of the true God, and remained in it, in the days of this and the following judges; otherwise there would not have been occasion to say, (ver. 6.) that after the death of Jair, "the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord:" but how far this is true, will appear upon ver. 8.

Tola the son of Puah, the son of Dodo.] So the Chaldee paraphrast understands the word Dodo, to be the proper name of his grandfather, as Puah was of his father: but there are those that by Dodo understand his uncle, viz. Abimelech forementioned: which seems to me unreasonable; for he was of another tribe, and his relation to such a man no good qualification, one would think, for this great trust.

A man of Issachar.] A mean tribe; which did not hinder his advancement by God to the highest dignity: and by this expression, a man of Issachar, he seems to have been of no great family, in that tribe.

And he dwelt in Shamir in Mount Ephraim.] After he was made a judge he settled in this place for the convenience of the people; it being in the midst of the land.

Ver. 2. And he judged Israel twenty and three years, and died, and was buried in Shamir.] There are no memorable acts of his recorded; for the principal intention of the holy writer of this book, was to shew what great calamities befel the Israelites when they forsook God's worship, and how graciously he delivered them, in a marvellous manner, when they returned to it: as I suppose they did, in the beginning of this man's government, and continued steadfast therein; so that they were not infested by their enemies.

Ver. 3. And after him arose Jair, a Gileadite, and judged Israel twenty and two years.] This is the first judge that was raised up from among those that lived beyond Jordan.

Ver. 4. And he had thirty sons that rode on thirty asses' colts.] For the noblest persons rode on these beasts, (see ver. 10.) and that not only in Judea, but in Arabia, and in other countries, even among the Romans, as Bochartus hath at large observed in his Hierozoicon, p. 1. lib. ii. cap. 13. And it is highly probable, that this is here mentioned, because these persons were ordered by their father to ride circuit up and down the country, to minister justice according to the law; as Samuel did when he judged Israel, 1 Sam. vii. 16. For the courts of judicature appointed by the law (Deut. xvi. 18.) were not yet settled; nor, in all likelihood, settled in every city, till the days of Jehoshaphat, as Mr. Thorndike observes in his Rites of the Church, chap. 4. p. 226.

And they had thirty cities.] Of which they were the governors, as the Vulgar understands it.

Which are called Havoth-Jair unto this day.] This Jair, as our most learned primate of Ireland observes in his Annals, (ad A. M. 3504.) was of the posterity of that Jair who called the cities which he took in Argob by his own name Havoth-Jair, the towns or villages of Jair, (Numb. xxxii. 41. Deut. iii. 14.) After whose example, these thirty sons of this younger Jair, (who, to distinguish him from the elder, seems to be called Bedan, 1 Sam. xii. 11. 1 Chron. vii. 17.) called these cities which they possessed by the very same name.

Which are in the land of Gilead.] In the same country, where the other cities anciently called by this name lay: from which, it is likely, they were distinguished by some such addition as this, the new Havoth-Jair.

Ver. 5. And Jair died, and was buried in Camon.] Which, it was probable, was the place where he dwelt while he judged Israel.

Ver. 6. And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord.] Or, as the forenamed primate thinks it must be interpreted, had done evil again, &c. as was said viii. 33. and now is repeated, to shew the cause, why God delivered them up into the hands of their enemies: for he supposes this was before the death of Jair, as I shall note on ver. 8.

And served Baalim and Ashtaroth.] As they had frequently done in former times, ii. 13. iii. 7, &c.

And the gods of Syria.] They added to their former idolatries the worship of new gods; particularly those of Syria, which were, as Mr. Selden observes (in his Prolegomena to his book de Diis Syris), beside Bel, or Baal, and Astarte, Dagon, Moloch, and Thammuz.

And the gods of Zidon.] Their supreme gods were Baal and Ashtoreth, as the same great man observes, (in his ii. Syntagma de Diis Syris, cap. 2.) But it is likely they had more, such as Asaroth, Asarim, and Asarah; being the very same with Ashtoreth.

And the gods of Moab.] The principal of which was Chemosh, (1 Kings xi. 7.)

And the gods of the children of Ammon.] The chief of which was Milcom, (1 Kings xi. 5.) where Ashtoreth is mentioned as the goddess of the Zidonians.

And the gods of the Philistines.] They had more, it seems, beside Dagon; whose names are not mentioned in Scripture.

And forsook the Lord, and served not him.] Their hearts were possessed with the love of so many gods, that they quite forgot the Lord, and did not worship him at all; though they were wont formerly only to worship other gods together with him. This was such a strange apostacy, that one cannot but inquire into the reason of it, and (besides what I have noted upon ii. 12.) one reason may possibly have been, that the solemn reading of the law to all the people, once in seven years, was neglected: for we do not read that it was publicly done from the time of Joshua to the reign of Jehoshaphat, which was above five hundred years: it doth not follow, indeed, that it was not done, because it is not recorded; but if we consider how prone they were to return to idolatry, after the death of every judge, and how soon after the death of David (even in the reign of his son Solomon) it began to appear among them, it may incline one to think there was not sufficient care taken about this matter.

Ver. 7. And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he sold them into the hands of the Philistines, and into the hands of the children of Ammon.] Two of those nations, whose gods they chose to serve.

Ver. 8. And that year they vexed and oppressed the children of Israel.] That is, the Ammonites vexed them in the east (as we are told in the conclusion of the verse), while the Philistines vexed them in the west: for their idolatry being strangely increased, so was their punishment, by the invasion of their enemies on both sides, as the foregoing verse tells us; which is a preface to the following histories of their oppression by the Philistines and the Ammonites, both at the same time; but, to avoid confusion, he first relates the story of the Ammonites, who are at last named in the foregoing verse.

Eighteen years.] Their invasion began in the same year, but they did not end at the same time, for the Ammonites domineered over them only eighteen years; but the Philistines forty, (xiii. 1.) I must not here omit the construction which our primate Usher makes of these words, which run thus in the Hebrew, and he translates in this manner, They vexed and oppressed the children of Israel that year, (viz.) the eighteenth year. For the oppression, he thinks, began the fifth year of Jair, and continued till the twenty-second, which was his last. (See his Chronol. Sacra, p. 1. cap. 13.) But this is said only to solve a difficulty, which is, that if we suppose this oppression to have begun after the death of Jair, and to have lasted eighteen years (as our translation imports), it will be impossible to make the years of the government of the judges agree with what we read, 1 Kings vi. 1. that Solomon began to build the temple at Jerusalem, in the four hundred and eightieth year after they came out of Egypt: but there is a more easy way of accounting for this difficulty, by supposing that several of the judges were contemporaries, as will be apparent in this very history; (see upon xi. 25.) and if we do not take these words eighteen years to signify the continuance of the Ammonitish oppression, it is no where mentioned any where else; as the duration of all other oppressions is.

All the children of Israel that were on the other side Jordan, in the land of the Amorites.] Which belonged to the Amorites, till Moses dispossessed them, (Numb. xxi.) and gave the land to the two tribes of Reuben and Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh.

Which is in Gilead.] The principal part of which was Gilead; out of which Jair sprang, being of the tribe of Manasseh; who, like a good man, used all his endeavours to purge the Israelites from idolatry; as Tola, I suppose, had done before: but they being, after the death of Gideon, fallen from God, and continuing in their idolatry all the reign of Abimelech, our forenamed primate supposes these judges were not able to reform them; but they rather grew worse, as is related ver. 6. And therefore God permitted the Ammonites and Philistines to begin to afflict them, as was said before in the fifth year of Jair; but not so as to make them subject to their power: for Jair held the government eighteen years after they began their inroads, but then their vexations and oppressions grew intolerable, and they not only afflicted his own country Gilead, but endeavoured to make their brethren, on the other side Jordan, to feel the weight of their power, as it follows in the next verse. This is said very plausibly, but cannot be admitted without some violence to the natural sense of the beginning of the verse; and also to the course of this history, which doth not mention their departure from God, and these oppressions of their enemies, on both sides, till after the death of Jair.

Ver. 9. Moreover, the children of Ammon passed over Jordan to fight against Judah, and against Benjamin, and against the house of Ephraim.] Who were the tribes that lay next to Jordan.

So that Israel was sore distressed.] For while the Ammonites afflicted those countries in the eastern part of Canaan, the Philistines made ravages in the countries of Zebulun, and Asher, and the rest of the tribes that lay on the western coast: for so the LXX. explain those words in the foregoing verse, In that year, ἐν τῷ καιρῷ ἐκείνῳ, in that same year, the Philistines in the west, and the Ammonites in the east, vexed and oppressed the children of Israel.

Ver. 10. And the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, saying, We have sinned against thee, both because we have forsaken our God, and also served Baalim.] All the rest of the gods mentioned ver. 6. are comprehended under the name of Baalim: which were so many and various, that they had quite drawn their affection from their own God; as they now sorrowfully acknowledge.

Ver. 11. And the Lord said unto the children of Israel.] By some prophet, I suppose.

Did not I deliver you from the Egyptians.] See Exod. xii.

And from the Amorites.] Who would have hindered their passage to the land of Canaan, (Numb. xxi.)

And from the children of Ammon.] Who were confederate with the Moabites to oppress them, (Judg. iii. 13.)

And from the Philistines?] In the days of Shamgar, (iii. ult.)

Ver. 12. The Zidonians also.] We never read of any invasion they made upon the Israelites; but only in general, that God left them, among other people, unsubdued, to prove the children of Israel, (iii. 3.) who took their opportunities, in all likelihood, to afflict them.

And the Amalekites.] Who joined both with the Moabites and the Midianites to oppress them, (iii. 13. vi. 3.)

And the Maonites did oppress you.] Maon is the name of a nation; the plural of which, Meunim, occurs in many places, particularly in 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, 7. where they are called in Greek Μιναιοι· a people in Arabia, both in that which we call Felix, and in that called Deserta. Which latter was not far from the Moabites and the Ammonites; with whom interpreters are apt to confound the Meunites, as if, by a transposition of letters, they were the same with the Ammonites: which hath misled us in our translation of those words, 2 Chron. xx. 1. And with them from the Ammonites, which makes no sense; but if we read with them from Meunim (as it is in Greek ἐκ Μιναίων), all runs clearly, and makes perfect sense: and thus we ought to translate that place, 1 Chron. iv. 41. where we take Meunim to signify dwellings, and render the words thus, The habitations which were found there; as if where there were tents (which are mentioned before) there were not habitations, which are the same: therefore Meunim is the name of a people (as the LXX. understood it) who dwelt in tents, being Arabians: who being neighbours (as I said) to the Moabites and Ammonites, joined with them in their invasion of the land of Israel, and helped to oppress them: But they are plainly distinguished from the Ammonites, in the first place mentioned, and 2 Chron. xxvi. 6—8.

And ye cried to me, and I delivered you out of their hand.] When they were utterly unable to help themselves.

Ver. 13. Yet ye have forsaken me, and served other gods.] But all these deliverances proved ineffectual to keep them steadfast in the worship of God.

Wherefore I will deliver you no more.] He threatens therefore to leave them under the power of their enemies, which now sorely distressed them, as they justly deserved; but it was with an intention to awaken them to a more serious and hearty repentance, otherwise he resolved not to deliver them.

Ver. 14. Go and cry unto the gods you have chosen, let them deliver you in the time of your tribulation.] A bitter reflection both upon them and upon their gods, like to that in the song of Moses, (Deut. xxxii. 37, 38.)

Ver. 15. And the children of Israel said unto the Lord, We have sinned.] In worshipping such gods as could not save them.

Do thou unto us as seemeth good unto thee.] They submit to such punishment as he thought fit to inflict, confessing they deserved no favour; which shews their hearts were for the present very sensible of the folly wherewith they were reproached in the foregoing verse.

Deliver us only, we pray thee, this day.] They acknowledged that they deserved the severest punishment, but beseech him to have so much pity on them, as not to punish them this way, by letting these cruel enemies insult over them any longer.

Ver. 16. And they put away the strange gods from among them.] Gave open proof of their repentance by renouncing all idolatry.

And served the Lord.] And returned to the worship of the Lord, and of him alone, which is the most remarkable repentance and reformation that we read of hitherto in this history of the Judges; and it seems to have been so serious, that for a long time they did not relapse; for we read nothing of their idolatry in the time of those three judges that followed Jephthah.

And his soul was grieved for the misery of Israel.] Nor do we read before of such an expression of the Divine compassion towards them. Every one knows the Divine nature is not capable of grief, properly so called; but the meaning is, he quite altered his former intentions, and in much mercy resolved upon their repentance to deliver them. So Maimonides observes, that the word nephesh, which we translate soul, signifies his will, Jer. xv. 1. Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, my soul could not be towards this people; that is, it could not be his will to save them. And so here, his soul was grieved; that is, saith he, his will ceased from afflicting Israel any longer; for it was said before, that God's providence had deserted them, and he refused to relieve them till they called upon him and seriously repented; and then their miseries being very great by the sore oppressions of their enemies, he took pity on them, and willed their cruel afflictions should not continue. (See More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 41.)

Ver. 17. Then the children of Ammon were gathered together.] In the Hebrew, were cried together; that is, a proclamation went out, requiring all their dispersed troops, which were ravaging the countries of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim, to return back to their camp, on the other side of Jordan.

And encamped in Gilead.] Or, against Gilead; for both Arius Montanus and Peter Martyr think that they laid siege to Gilead, the chief city in those parts: by taking which, they hoped to be masters of all that country; and then, with greater forces, go over Jordan again, and conquer the other tribes beforementioned.

And the children of Israel assembled themselves together, and encamped in Mizpeh.] There were two Mizpehs on the other side Jordan, one in the tribe of Gad, the other in the half tribe of Manasseh, as I observed upon Josh. xi. 3. the latter of which may be probably thought to be the place where they now assembled, Jephthah, who was afterward chosen their captain, being one of this tribe. How many of the Israelites here encamped, and whether any of those in the land of Canaan, or only those of the two tribes and a half, cannot now be known; but upon their repentance, they seem to have recovered their ancient courage, and to have taken a resolution to drive the Ammonites out of their country, insomuch that thereupon the Ammonites seem to have left the siege, and to have made a retreat into their own land, either to recruit their army, and raise more forces, or for some other reason; for thither Jephthah sent messengers to them, after he was chosen general of the Israelites; and there he fought them, when they would not yield to his convincing arguments, that they unjustly invaded the Israelites, as appears in the following chapter.

Ver. 18. And the people and princes of Gilead.] Who were most nearly concerned in this matter, their country lying nearest to the Ammonites.

Said one to another.] Entered into a consultation, in a grand assembly of all the people, and their rulers. (See ix. 6.)

What man is he that will begin to fight against the children of Ammon?] Will be our leader. It seems to me a probable conjecture of Peter Martyr, that they consulted God also about this matter, who directed them, perhaps, to go to Jephthah.

He shall be head over all the inhabitants of Gilead.] They resolved, whatsoever the mind of the rest of the tribes should be, that he should command all the Gadites and Manassites that inhabited the land of Gilead.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. NOW Jephthah the Gileadite.] A man of the same country with Jair, their last judge.

Was a mighty man of valour.] A warlike person, of great courage and conduct.

And he was the son of a harlot.] Or, but he was, &c. Some, by the Hebrew word zonah, understand a concubine, but it never signifies so in Scripture; but, as we translate it, a harlot; and sometimes one that kept a public house; for such people were wont to make their bodies as common as their houses, to all comers. (See Josh. ii. 1.) But several of the Hebrew doctors think that this word may signify either one of another tribe, or a stranger, one of another nation: and so Josephus himself here understands it, that he was ξένος περὶ τὴν μητέρα, a stranger by his mother's side. And Saidas Batricides saith, his mother was an Ishmaelite, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. de Successionibus, cap. 3. Now such were called νόθαι by the Greeks, as Grotius observes, who were born of a wife that was not a citizen. But among the Jews, if such persons embraced the law, their children were not stained, but capable to inherit among the rest of their brethren; and therefore Jephthah complains of his expulsion, (ver. 7.) looking upon himself as unjustly dealt withal, which could not have been said, had he been a bastard.

And Gilead begat Jephthah.] One of the posterity of Gilead, the son of Manasseh, was his father, who was called after the name of his great ancestor.

Ver. 2. And Gilead's wife bare him sons.] He took a wife also of the Jewish nation, who bare him several sons.

And his wife's sons grew up, and they thrust out Jephthah.] When his father was dead; for till then the inheritance was not to be divided; and, if he had been alive, he would not have suffered them to be so injurious to Jephthah, who was the son of a wife whom he loved extremely, as Josephus relates, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 9.

And said unto him, Thou shalt not inherit in our father's house.] Have no share of his estate.

For thou art the son of a strange woman.] This explains the word zonah, to be the same with a woman of another country; for there is no reason to think, that by another woman (as the words are in the Hebrew) he means a woman of another tribe, as the Chaldee paraphrast, R. Bechai, and others, expound it. (See Selden, in the place beforenamed, and Buxtorf, de Sponsal. et Divortiis, p. 61.)

Ver. 3. Then Jephthah fled from his brethren.] When they were so unkind as to drive him from his father's house, he did not think fit to stay in their country.

And dwelt in the land of Tob.] We read no where else of this country, which, it is likely, was not far from Gilead, upon the borders of the Ammonites, in the entrance of Arabia Deserta; or, perhaps, it is the same with the country called Ish-tob, 2 Sam. x. 6. 8. which was in Syria, and so near the Ammonites, that they hired forces from thence, as well as from other Syrians, to fight with king David. We find some footsteps of this land, it is very probable, in the second book of the Maccabees, chap. xii. 17. where we read of Τουβιήνοι Ἰουδαῖοι, i. e. Jews who dwelt in the land of Tob.

And there were gathered vain men to Jephthah.] Or empty men; for the word rekim signifies poor and needy persons, men of no estates, such as resorted to David when he fled from Saul, (1 Sam. xxii. 2.) So I suppose it to be here understood (not that they were profligate persons), for the word pochazim, light men, is not here added, as it is in the story of those who followed Abimelech, ix. 4. Therefore Grotius doth not seem rightly to have represented Jephthah, when he saith, he was one of those who "ex prædonum ducibus justi duces facti sunt," (lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 3. sect. 3.) For these were not highwaymen, as we call them, that lived by prey; but only men of small or no fortune, who were glad of an occasion to join themselves to so gallant a man as Jephthah was. And so the word we translate gathered, imports that they listed themselves under him of their own accord, being invited to it by the great fame of his humanity and valour. But Grotius herein follows the Vulgar, who adds the word latrocinates, without any authority, either from the Hebrew, Chaldee, or LXX.

And went out with him.] Made excursions upon the enemies of the Israelites thereabouts, and got what booty they could from them for their subsistence, just as David did when he was forced to flee into the land of the Philistines, (1 Sam. xxvii. 8—11.)

Ver. 4. And it came to pass in process of time.] In the Hebrew it is after days, i. e. as primate Usher understands it (in the place abovenamed), after those years mentioned x. 8. viz. eighteen years, in the conclusion of which, when Jair was dead, the Ammonites took the following resolution; but there is no good ground, as I have shewn there, for this interpretation; therefore by after days I understand some time after their retreat into their own country, which I mentioned x. 17.

That the children of Ammon made war against Israel.] They only came in parties before to rob and spoil them; but now, finding the Israelites began to take courage, and had formed a camp in Gilead, (x. 17.) they raised an army, intending to conquer them and possess themselves of their country.

Ver. 5. And it came to pass, when the children of Ammon made war against Israel.] The Vulgar interprets it, pressed hard upon them.

The elders of Gilead.] Who are called princes, x. 18.

Went to fetch Jephthah out of the land of Tob.] Some of the principal persons of the country were sent in the name of all the inhabitants of Gilead, in an embassy to him, to invite him to return to them.

Ver. 6. And they said unto Jephthah, Come, and be our captain, that we may fight with the children of Ammon.] They did not pretend to make him their king (remembering, perhaps, what had befallen the men of Shechem and Abimelech), but only the leader of their army.

Ver. 7. And Jephthah said unto the elders of Gilead, Did ye not hate me, and expel me out of my father's house?] This signifies, that his brethren ejected him by the assistance of the public authority (unless we suppose that they were of the number of elders that were sent to him); or the elders, who saw the wrong his brethren did him, connived at it, and did not interpose, according to their office, to do him right, whereby they made his expulsion their own act.

And why are ye come unto me now when you are in distress?] As much as to say, What reason have you to expect that I should hearken to you, since I know it is only your distress which moves you to recall me?

Ver. 8. And the elders of Gilead said unto Jephthah, Therefore we turn again to thee now.] This may relate either to what immediately goes before, and then the sense is, We confess we are in distress, and therefore implore thy help (which, if thou wilt afford us, thou shalt command us all for ever); or to the beginning of the foregoing verse, and the meaning is, We are sensible of the injury that was done thee, and therefore are come to repair it, by inviting thee to be our head; for that is meant by their turning again to him: they had altered their mind, and not only revoked that unjust act, but offered him a recompence.

That thou mayest go with us, and fight against the children of Ammon, and be our head over all the inhabitants of Gilead.] Of the tribes on their side Jordan; for they could promise nothing for the tribes in the land of Canaan, some of which were oppressed now by the Philistines, as they were by the Ammonites.

Ver. 9. And Jephthah said unto the elders of Gilead, If ye bring me home again to fight against the children of Ammon, and the Lord deliver them before me, shall I be your head?] He offers to be the general of their army, if, after he had vanquished their enemies, they would, in good earnest, make him their governor in chief, and not throw him off when they had no further need of him. In which agreement he supposed the consent and appointment of God, by whose aid alone he hoped to be victorious.

Ver. 10. And the elders of Gilead said unto Jephthah, The Lord be witness between us, if we do not according to thy word.] They solemnly call God to witness their sincerity, confirming what was agreed by an oath, and wishing God to revenge it, if they did not perform what they promised.

Ver. 11. Then Jephthah went with the elders of Gilead.] Unto his own country.

And the people made him head and captain over them.] In a full assembly of the people, with the princes, (ix. 6. x. 18.) he was made general of their army; with an assurance he should be their head, after the war was successfully ended.

And Jephthah uttered all his words before the Lord.] The people had done their part, but Jephthah would undertake nothing, without God's approbation, before whom, in a solemn prayer, he laid all that he had said unto them; and it is likely that God answered him by some prophet, and authorized him to undertake the conduct and government of the people; (see x. 11.) for if he had done it without a Divine warrant, the Spirit of the Lord would not have come upon him, as we read it did, ver. 29.

In Mizpeh.] Where the children of Israel had gathered themselves together to oppose the Ammonites, x. 17. and where Jephthah chose to fix his habitation, after the conquest of them, ver. 34. of this chapter; for that Mizpeh, where all the tribes, we often read, met before the Lord, was on this side Jordan, not far from Jerusalem, either in the tribe of Judah, or of Benjamin. It is thought probable, by some learned men, that there was some proseucha, a praying-place, or place of Divine worship, here at Mizpeh, (see Josh. xxiv. 26.) where Jephthah uttered his words; which otherwise, they think, could not be said to be done before the Lord: but this is not a sufficient ground for such an opinion; for the Divine presence (as Rasi here observes) was in that place where all the people assembled upon a public concern. (See 1 Sam. xi. 15.) Kimchi observes the same upon the twentieth chapter of this book, ver. 1. where his words are, "In every place, in which Israel, or a great part of it, is assembled, the Divine presence dwells." (See my notes there.)

Ver. 12. And Jephthah sent messengers to the king of the children of Ammon.] Now he plainly acts as a chief governor, in appointing an embassy to go from him to the king of the Ammonites; which power he would not have assumed, if it had not been given him by God.

Saying, What hast thou to do with me.] That is, what is the ground of thy quarrel? Or, for what reason is this invasion made?

That thou art come to fight against me in my land?] This is the language of the supreme governor of the country, unto whom all were subject, as their lord; and demonstrates him to have been a most pious prince, that would first debate matters fairly, before he came to blows, according to the sense of a number of great men in future times, mentioned by Grotius at large, lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 23. sect. 7. Unto which he was not bound, having taken arms only in his own defence; yet, to prevent the effusion of blood, he argues the case with the king of the Ammonites, who ought rather, if he thought himself injured by the Israelites, to have sent, before he took arms, to require satisfaction.

Ver. 13. And the king of the children of Ammon answered to the messengers of Jephthah, Because Israel took away my land when they came out of Egypt.] This is a mere colour and pretence, the land being none of theirs, when the Israelites conquered it, but the land of Sihon king of the Amorites: for, as to the country of the Ammonites, God expressly charged the Israelites not to meddle with it, (Deut. i. 19.) for he would give them none of it. It is true, this land, which they now claimed, had formerly belonged to the Moabites, but Sihon had made a conquest of it, and driven them out of it, as we read Numb. xxi. 26. The king of Ammon, therefore, could not call it his land, unless he was also king of Moab at this time, which is not improbable: whence it is, that, in the following dispute between him and Jephthah, there is a promiscuous mention of the Moabites, together with the Ammonites, as if they were but one people, (ver. 15. 17, 18.) and Chemosh, which was the god of the Moabites, is called (ver. 24.) the god of the king of Ammon: unto which may be added, that the land which Sihon conquered did not entirely belong to the Moabites, but some of it to the children of Ammon, as is expressly said, Josh. xiii. 25. where we read, that to the Gadites was given half of the land of the children of Ammon; therefore some part of Sihon's kingdom (where the Gadites were settled) had formerly belonged to the Ammonites.

From Arnon even unto Jabbok, and to Jordan.] These are the bounds of the country to which they laid a claim; the river Arnon on the south, and the brook Jabbok on the north (which we may call the length of the country), and Jordan on the west; unto which afterward is added the eastern bounds, when it is said, ver. 22. from the wilderness unto Jordan; which is the wilderness through which the Israelites entered into the territories of Sihon.

Now therefore restore these lands.] Which belonged to the Moabites and Ammonites.

Again peaceably.] The messengers of Jephthah had declared that he desired not war, but peace; which the king of Ammon tells him he must not expect, unless he resigned these countries to him.

Ver. 14. And Jephthah sent messengers again to the king of the children of Ammon.] This is an argument of a very peaceable disposition, and a high commendation of a warlike spirit, that he was still desirous to end this controversy by reason, and not by the sword.

Ver. 15. And said unto him, Thus saith Jephthah.] This is his reply; which seems to be delivered as from a man in authority.

Israel took not away the land of Moab, nor the land of the children of Ammon.] He denies the matter of fact upon which they grounded the war: for the Israelites found this country in the possession of Sihon.

Ver. 16. But when Israel came out of Egypt.] He proves the truth of what he affirmed, by a short history of what passed after they came out of Egypt; when the king of Ammon said (ver. 13.) they took this land from him.

And walked through the wilderness unto the Red Sea, and came to Kadesh.] This is not to be understood of Kadesh-barnea, but of that Kadesh mentioned Numb. xx. 1. 14. which was in the borders of Edom; unto which they came directly from the Red Sea: nor of their coming to the Red Sea, in the first year after they passed through it, mentioned Numb. xxxiii. 10. but of their last coming to it, in that station they made at Ezion-geber (after many stations in other places), which was upon the shore of the Red Sea; from whence they immediately marched to this Kadesh, (Numb. xxxiii. 35, 36.)

Ver. 17. Then Israel sent messengers to the king of Edom, saying, Let me, I pray thee, pass through thy land.] This shews, they were so far from invading any body's country, that they humbly begged leave to pass through Edom, engaging to do no violence, but to pay for every thing they wanted. (See Numb. xx. 14, &c.)

But the king of Edom would not hearken thereto.] Notwithstanding which, they were not provoked by their inhumanity to quarrel with them.

And in like manner they sent to the king of Moab, but he would not consent.] We do not read of such a message sent to the Moabites: but when they came from Ezion-geber into the wilderness of Moab, we find a command of God to them not to distress the Moabites, nor to contend with them in battle: which intimates there was some occasion for it; which was their refusal to grant them a common civility.

And Israel abode in Kadesh.] Put up all these affronts, and abstained from all violence, continuing quiet in the place where they had pitched their tents.

Ver. 18. Then they went along through the wilderness, and compassed the land of Edom, and the land of Moab.] When they were denied a passage the direct way, they chose rather to fetch a great compass, and travel many miles with great labour and toil, (see Numb. xxi. 4.) than give others the least disturbance.

And came by the east side of the land of Moab, and pitched upon the other side of Arnon.] See Numb. chap. xxi. 13.

But came not within the border of Moab: for Arnon was the border of Moab.] This is a demonstration that they did no injury to the Moabites, into whose country they did not enter. For they went no further than Arnon, which divided their country from the Ammonites.

Ver. 19. And Israel sent messengers unto Sihon king of the Amorites, the king of Heshbon.] Where his royal palace was. (See Numb. xxi. 25, 26.)

And Israel said unto him, Let us pass, we pray thee, through thy land unto my place.] Being denied passage through Edom and Moab, they sent a friendly message unto him, craving the favour of being permitted to go through his country unto Canaan. (Numb. xxi. 21, 22.)

Ver. 20. But Sihon trusted not Israel to pass through his coast.] Was jealous they would seize on his country.

But Sihon gathered all his people together, and pitched in Jahaz, and fought against Israel.] He contented not himself to refuse (as his neighbours had done) to grant a passage through his country, which they could not demand, but raised all his forces, and proudly marched to drive them away from his borders, (Numb. xxi. 23, 24.)

Ver. 21. And the Lord God of Israel delivered Sihon and all his people into the hand of Israel, and they smote them.] It was plainly an act of God to give the Israelites the victory; for they were unprepared for war, and tired with a long march about the land of Edom and Moab.

So Israel possessed all the land of the Amorites, the inhabitants of that country.] They did not dispossess the Moabites, but the Amorites, who then inhabited that country, which became the possession of the Israelites, by the right of a just war, in their own defence.

Ver. 22. And they possessed all the coasts of the Amorites, from Arnon even unto Jabbok, and from the wilderness even unto Jordan.] This is a description of the length and breadth of the land, from south to north, and from east to west: (see above, ver. 13.) None of which was then in the possession of the Moabites or Ammonites; who could not therefore charge the Israelites with taking any of their land from them.

Ver. 23. And so now the Lord God of Israel hath dispossessed the Amorites from before his people Israel.] This is a new title to this land; which they not only took in a just war, but was also given them by God, who made them victorious, and then bestowed it upon them.

And shouldest thou possess it?] It was absurd to think that they should take the pains to conquer it, and God should give it to them, that they might put the Moabites again in the possession of it, with whom they had no alliance; but, quite contrary, they had denied them the common right of mankind.

Ver. 24. Wilt not thou possess that which Chemosh thy god giveth thee to possess?] He doth not call Chemosh a god; but only argues from the opinion that they had of him, which all nations had of their gods, that they owed their conquests to them, to whom therefore they gave thanks for all their victories. Now he appeals to them, whether they would not keep what their god had given them, and look upon it as rightfully possessed by them.

So whomsoever the Lord our God shall drive out from before us, them will we possess.] By the very same title whereby the Moabites possessed the country wherein they now lived; from whence they drove out the ancient inhabitants. (Deut. ii. 10, 11.)

Ver. 25. And now, art thou any thing better than Balak the son of Zippor, king of Moab?] This is a third argument, that when this conquest was newly made by the Israelites, the then king of Moab (as potent as the present) laid no claim to this country, nor demanded to have it restored to him; but only was afraid they should invade the land he still possessed.

Did he ever strive against Israel.] Dispute their title with them.

Or did he ever fight against Israel.] Endeavour by force of arms to recover this country, as not belonging to them but to him.

Ver. 26. While Israel dwelt in Heshbon and her towns, and in Aroer and her towns, and in all the cities that be along by the coast of Arnon, three hundred years, &c.] In the last place he pleads prescription, and that for three hundred years; in which long space of time none of the kings of Moab pretended a right to this country, much less contended it with them; which argument was irrefragable. For if such a long undisputed possession cannot make a right to a country, it is impossible there should be any end of wars between kings and princes. But all mankind look upon those wars as unjust, which are made for recovery of countries wherein people have settled quietly for many ages; though, perhaps, in the first acquisition of them, their title was not good. Therefore it is not necessary to examine, whether Sihon had a just cause of war when he conquered this country; nor is it of importance, with respect to this, to examine whether the Israelites had held this conquest just three hundred years; for if a few be wanting, it is not material: but with respect to something else it is of great consequence, for the explaining of what we read 1 Kings vi. 2. that Solomon began to build the temple in the four hundred and eightieth year after they came out of Egypt. Which space is divided by these words of Jephthah into two intervals: the first of which contained three hundred and forty years; for they had possessed this country three hundred years, and they came out of Egypt forty years before its conquest: during which time they had been slaves to the Mesopotamians, Moabites, Canaanites, and Midianites. Now, if the years wherein they were oppressed by these four nations, and the years of peace and quiet which they enjoyed, be put together, from the first year of Chushan-Rishathaim to the last year of Jair, they produce a little more than three hundred years; so that no time is left for Joshua's conquest of Canaan, and his life after it, and for the generation that outlived him. But, by supposing that some of these things fell out in the very same time (as for example, during the fourscore years' rest in the eastern parts of the land after Eglon's death, they were oppressed twenty years in the north by Jabin), this difficulty is removed, and all comes right; as Sir John Marsham hath demonstrated in his Canon Chronicus: where he shews, that, from the death of Moses to this invasion of the Ammonites, there were three hundred years; allowing five-and-twenty years (as Josephus computes) for Joshua's government after they came into Canaan, and thirty-five years to the following generation that survived him. (See Seculum xi. Æra Exodi. And concerning the other interval, see here, xii. 14.)

Why therefore did ye not recover them within that time?] This question could not be answered, that in so long a time they should hear nothing of their claim till now.

Ver. 27. Wherefore I have not sinned against thee, but thou dost me wrong to war against me.] Upon all these reasons he concludes, the Ammonites had no cause to make this war; but were injurious in it to the Israelites.

The Lord the Judge be judge this day between the children of Israel and the children of Ammon.] The meaning is, that if they were not moved by these reasons, but the controversy must be decided by arms, he committed his cause to God, the righteous judge of the whole world, who, he doubted not, would do him right. By this day he doth not mean that God would determine the right, by giving him the victory then, when he spake these words (for he was not yet ready to give them battle), but that God would judge of the justice of his present plea, and accordingly give sentence, when the matter came to be tried in a battle.

Ver. 28. Howbeit the king of the children of Ammon hearkened not to the words of Jephthah which he sent him.] He would not yield to arguments, being obstinately resolved to fight it out.

Ver. 29. Then the Spirit of the Lord came upon Jephthah.] The people had chosen him for their leader, and promised to continue him their chief governor, as they had already made him; and now God publicly declares his approbation of their choice; and made him their judge, as he had done others before, (iii. 10.) by endowing him with an extraordinary measure of courage and wisdom, and all other qualities necessary to render him fit to be the ruler of his people.

And he passed over Gilead and Manasseh.] Went through the whole country of Reuben and Gad (which are comprehended in Gilead), and likewise the half tribe of Manasseh, and levied what men he could among them.

And passed over Mizpeh of Gilead.] Went to the extreme part of the country northward, where Mizpeh was, towards Mount Lebanon and Hermon.

And from Mizpeh of Gilead he passed over unto the children of Ammon.] He marched from thence, with such forces as he had gathered, towards the enemy's country.

Ver. 30. And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into my hand.] He did not make a doubt of it, but thought he might be more assured of victory, if he made a religious vow beforehand, of being very grateful to God for it. Which was the custom of the ancient Romans, as we find in Livy; who frequently tells us, that their generals were wont to vow to Jupiter, or Apollo, or others, part of the spoil they should take in war; or to build temples in their honour. And thus the Israelites, when king Arad came against them, as they were going towards Canaan (a little before the conquest of this country now in controversy), vowed to make his country a cherem, if God would deliver it into their hands. (See Numb. xxi. 2.)

Ver. 31. That it shall be, that whatsoever.] This comprehends all sorts of creatures, as the Hebrew doctors commonly observe.

Cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me.] The Vulgar adds the word first, which must be understood; otherwise he would have been obliged to devote many things to the Lord, which might possibly come out of his house.

When I return in peace from the children of Ammon.] Come back victorious.

Shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering.] If it was a thing fit to be offered: for if a dog or a swine should have happened to come out first to meet him, that was not lawful to be offered. But the great question is, Whether it was not as unlawful to offer his daughter, who seems to be comprehended in this vow? And it is said afterward, (ver. 39.) that he did unto her according to it. Josephus, and the Chaldee paraphrast, and several famous rabbins, think that he did offer her, being deceived by a mistake of the sense of that law, Lev. xxvii. 28. And though he might have been absolved from his vow by the high-priest, yet they tell an idle story, that they stood so much upon a punctilio of their dignity, that he would neither go to Phinehas, nor Phinehas vouchsafe to wait upon him. Which is a tale not to be found in the Talmud, but in some lesser writer, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 11. where he shews, that the two Kimchis, father and son, with R. Levi ben Gersom, and others, interpret these words quite otherwise; and take the particle (which we translate and) to be a disjunctive; that is, as much as or. So Kimchi's words are, It shall be consecrated to the Lord, if it be not fit for a burnt-offering; or it shall be offered for a burnt-offering, if it be fit for it. And so they think she was devoted to God, and separate from all secular affairs, that she might give herself continually to prayer and holy exercises. Which opinion hath several difficulties in it, as he there observes; and it must be confessed, the stream of interpreters runs the quite contrary way: for though they call this votum temerarium, as Tertullian doth, a rash vow, or a foolish incautious vow, as Theodoret, St. Austin, and others; yet very great numbers (and indeed most of the ancient Christian writers) think that he did really offer her: though it cannot be denied, that there are great difficulties in this interpretation also; no such thing having ever been done in Israel; but such sacrifices declared abominable unto God: which it is a wonder he should not know, nor the people neither; who, one would have expected, should have hindered such a barbarous sacrifice. All that can be said in answer to this is, that they having been long accustomed to idolatrous worship, and he having lived out of his own country, and being a soldier, had forgotten their law, or retained but a very imperfect knowledge of it. But they that would see this matter largely discussed, may consult Ludovicus Capellus, who hath a long dissertation on purpose about it; and I shall say something more of it upon the latter end of this chapter.

Ver. 32. So Jephthah passed over unto the children of Ammon to fight against them.] He was not far from them before, (ver. 29.) but now he drew his army up to them, and engaged them.

And the Lord delivered them into his hand.] And thereby declared the Ammonites were in the wrong, (ver. 27.)

Ver. 33. And he smote them from Aroer.] Which was a city upon the banks of the river Arnon; or rather in the river, being encompassed with it.

Till thou come to Minnith.] Another city up in the country.

Even twenty cities, and unto the plain of the vineyards.] They chased them a great way, and destroyed their cities as they went along, till they came to the plain here mentioned. Or, as it is in the margin, unto Abel; a city, perhaps, which was very strong, called Abel-Keramim, as the LXX. understand it.

With a great slaughter.] Both in the field and in the cities.

Thus the children of Ammon were subdued before the children of Israel.] So that they infested their country no more.

Ver. 34. And Jephthah came to Mizpeh unto his house.] From which he went forth when he began this expedition, (ver. 29.)

And, behold, his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and dances.] She was the first person of his family whom he saw at his return, who came, accompanied with some of her neighbours, to welcome him home, and congratulate his victory with music and dancing. So the old manner had been, Exod. xv. 20. and continued afterward, 1 Sam. xviii. 6.

And she was his only child: beside her he had neither son nor daughter.] In the Hebrew the words are, he had not from himself either son or daughter; intimating, perhaps, that though his wife had children by another husband, or he had adopted children, yet he had none descended from his own body but this only daughter, which made her the dearer to him.

Ver. 35. And it came to pass, that when he saw her, he rent his clothes.] As the manner was when any great calamity befel them. (See Lev. x. 6.)

And said, Alas! my daughter, thou hast brought me very low.] Quite spoiled my triumph.

And thou art one of them that trouble me.] Which was the more afflictive, because he expected from her the greatest comfort and pleasure.

For I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I cannot go back.] That is, made a vow which he could not retract. It is likely he told her what it was, though that be not here expressed; or by his deep sorrow at the first sight of her, she understood it was upon her account: but in this he was grossly mistaken, which way soever we interpret this vow; whether of separating her from company, or of offering her for a burnt-offering; for he was bound to neither, yea, he was bound not to offer her in sacrifice, which was a thing abominable. As for the other, there was no such power by their law granted to parents, to shut up their children, and separate them from all society with men, as Mr. Selden observes, there being not the least footstep of any such thing in the whole body of their Talmud, or in their lawyers.

Ver. 36. And she said unto him, My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to that which hath proceeded out of thy mouth; forasmuch as the Lord hath taken vengeance for thee of thine enemies, even of the children of Ammon.] A rare instance of religion, courage, obedience to her parents, and love to her country.

Ver. 37. And she said unto her father, Let this thing be done for me.] Grant me only one request; which was not inconsistent, she thought, with his vow; for he did not say he would execute it immediately.

Let me alone two months.] Leave me at liberty so long.

That I may go up and down upon the mountains.] Which were fit places for her purpose, being solitary, and far from company.

To bewail my virginity.] For it was accounted a great infelicity in that nation to die without issue.

I and my fellows.] Other virgins, her companions. This some take for an argument, that she was not to be sacrificed; for then she would have bewailed her death, rather than her want of posterity. But this is no concluding argument; for she might possibly look upon it as an honour to be a sacrifice unto God.

Ver. 38. And he said, Go. And he sent her away for two months, and she went with her companions, and bewailed her virginity upon the mountains.] They that think she knew she was to be offered, infer from hence, that she looked upon it as a greater calamity to die without issue, than merely to die.

Ver. 39. And it came to pass, at the end of two months, she returned to her father.] Having had time to bring her mind unto a perfect resignation to her father; or rather, to confirm herself in the resolution she had at first, cheerfully to submit unto whatsoever he had vowed.

Who did with her according to his vow which he had vowed.] That is, saith Kimchi, he made her a house, and brought her into it, and there left her secluded from the company of all men, and from all secular affairs. That is the meaning, he thinks, of the first part of his vow, It shall surely be the Lord's. And so Ralbag, a little more fully, She was separated from the company of men; for if she had had a husband, she could not have served the Lord alone, but must have served her husband also, as all wives are bound to do. Selden indeed saith, that he doth not see what law gave him this power to keep her from marriage; there being nothing of it in all their books, as was said before. But there is something like it in 2 Sam. xx. 3. where David shut up his concubines, and made them live in widowhood till their death. And he might take the liberty to do this (though no law gave him such power) rather than take away the life of his daughter, which was against law; for it condemned such sacrifices. But the truth is, there was no necessity of doing either, if he had understood or considered the law; for he might have paid a price for her to the priest, which the law prescribed, when a son or daughter was consecrated to God, (Lev. xxvii. 2, 3, &c.) Nay, they who consecrated themselves, might redeem themselves: and about this very case of Jephthah there was anciently a dispute between two famous doctors, Simeon ben Lakish and R. Johanan; the former of which maintained, that he ought to have paid the price or value of her according to the law; but the other maintained, he was not bound to do so much as that, because the vow was to offer a burnt-offering, in which his daughter could not be comprehended. For other animals only were capable of being offered in sacrifice. As for those words, Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. upon which Lud. Capellus hath founded his opinion that she might be sacrificed, Maimonides hath better restrained them to the sons and daughters of the Canaanites, devoted by God to destruction. But who can think that God would have the Hebrew children so devoted as those slaves were, upon whom a curse was denounced before they entered into Canaan? Beside, if Jephthah was bound to offer his daughter, who should be employed in that work? Should the priests? But their business was rather to persuade and deter him from what he had imprudently vowed. Should the magistrates? But they could not be ignorant that God had forbidden such sacrifices. Should Jephthah himself? But this would have argued him as void of common sense, as of natural affection. And who can think (as Theodoricus Hackspan goes on) that since God allowed cities of refuge, whither a manslayer might flee and be safe, when he had unwittingly killed a man, that the same privilege might not have been allowed to a son or a daughter, who was perfectly innocent (as this virgin was), viz. to save their lives by flight, or by paying a ransom?

The Jews are very doubtful in this matter; for some say Phinehas lost his priesthood, and it was translated to the family of Ithamar, because he did not absolve Jephthah from this vow: but others of the eastern writers say, he was forbid to release him by the spirit of prophecy; and Jephthah, when he was admonished by his friends to go and advise with him how to save his daughter, was forbid by an angel to go. (See Selden, lib. i. de Succession. ad Pontificatum, cap. 2. fol. 117, &c.) But the Targum upon this verse blames Jephthah for not consulting Phinehas; for if he had, he would have redeemed her for a sum of money.

And she knew no man.] This is looked upon, by those who think she was only consecrated to the Lord, as an argument of it; that after the performance of his vow, it is said, she knew no man; that is, as long as she lived, she continued a virgin.

And it was a custom in Israel.] They that think she was sacrificed, take these words as separate from those that follow, and interpret them, upon this a sanction was made, that none should hereafter, by the like error, offer human sacrifices. So the Targum. (See Selden in the place forenamed.) But there was no need of this statute; nor is it likely that the fable among the Greeks, concerning the sacrifice of Iphigenia by Agamemnon, was devised out of this sacred story, as Lud. Capellus conjectures; who fancies also this Jephtigenia, that is, the daughter of Jephthah (from whence might come Iphigenia), was not sacrificed upon the altar, but only slain; though the vow was, he would offer a burnt-offering. But we refer these words to what follows in the next verse.

Ver. 40. That the daughters of Israel.] They of that country.

Went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite.] Some interpret the Hebrew word thannoth to signify they went to discourse with her, or to comfort her; though the most ancient interpreters (as Bochartus observes, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. i. cap. 9.) translate it as we do, θρηνεῖν, as the LXX. have it, to make lamentation. But quite contrary the learned Lud. de Dieu, different from the rest (except Sixtinus Amama, who hath the same notion), interprets it to praise her. Which signification he plainly derives out of the Arabic language; and beside, we ourselves in this very book (ver. 11.) seem to follow it, by translating it rehearse. And thus that excellent man explains this whole matter:—"She was not slain; but, as appears sufficiently from the foregoing words, was devoted to perpetual virginity; in which she deserved greater commendation than her father. For he, as soon as he saw her come to meet him, repented of the vow he had rashly made, and tore his clothes, lamenting the miserable condition into which he had brought himself and her: but she most courageously comforted her father, and, congratulating his victory, desired him not to be troubled about her, for she was ready to submit to what he had vowed. Upon the account of which heroic virtue, whereby she obliged the whole country, they could do no less than celebrate her praise every year."

Four days in the year.] One day in every quarter of the year they went to celebrate her fame with verses composed in her praise, as Grotius supposes. But whether they went to the place where she was retired, and there sang them before her, or in some other public place; and whether while she lived, or after her death, is uncertain, as De Dieu observes.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. AND the men of Ephraim gathered themselves.] In the Hebrew, were called, by a public cry, or proclamation, to arm themselves.

And went northward.] To the country of Manasseh, on the other side Jordan. For this sufficiently shews that Mizpeh was in that country, and in the northern part of it, towards Lebanon and Hermon, as I observed before, xi. 29. Pet. Martyr thinks they did not march orderly thither, being not gathered together (as far as appears) by the authority of the magistrate, but in a tumultuous manner, as seditious people are wont to do.

And said unto Jephthah.] By this, and by what follows, it appears they came to Mizpeh, where Jephthah dwelt.

Wherefore passedst thou over.] They do not mean over Jordan, for there he was already; but from hence to the coast of the Ammonites. (See xi. 30. 32.)

To fight against the children of Ammon, and didst not call us to go with thee?] Their pride made them take it ill, that they had not a share in the glory of the late victory. Just as formerly they quarrelled with Gideon upon the like occasion, (viii. 1.) which shews they were a haughty tribe.

We will burn thine house upon thee with fire.] Their pride put them into such a strange rage, that they seem to threaten to burn him as well as his house.

Ver. 2. And Jephthah said unto them, I and my people were at great strife with the children of Ammon.] He answers their furious language with great mildness; and first tells them, that he did not undertake this war till he was forced to it by the Ammonites, who sorely distressed them, (x. 9.)

And when I called you, ye delivered me not out of their hands.] In the second place he denies their charge, and affirms the contrary, that he had begged their assistance, but they refused to give it him: yea (as the word we translate called signifies), he had cried aloud to them with earnest importunities to help them in their distress.

Ver. 3. And when I saw that you delivered me not.] That there was no hope of your help to preserve us from ruin.

I put my life in my hand.] Exposed myself to the utmost hazard; for he had but a small part of the people of Israel with him to fight with their powerful oppressors. This phrase seems peculiar to the Hebrews and the eastern writers; for among all the Greek and Roman writers, Isaac Casaubon saith he never met with it but once in Xenarchus; whom Athenæus alleges, introducing in one of his plays a man full of fear and trembling—ἐν τῇ χειρὶ τὴν ψυχὴν ἔχοντα.

And passed over against the children of Ammon.] With such forces alone as he could get on his side Jordan, (xi. 29, 30.)

And the Lord delivered them into my hand.] God approved his undertaking by giving him a great victory.

Wherefore then are ye come up unto me this day to fight against me?] Who had defended and preserved them. For if the Ammonites had vanquished Jephthah, they would soon have passed over Jordan and fallen upon the Ephraimites, as they had before attempted, (x. 9.)

Ver. 4. Then Jephthah gathered all the men of Gilead, and fought with Ephraim.] When he saw they were not pacified by this fair and peaceable apology, but still continued their menaces, he betook himself to arms, and raised as many men as he could to oppose them.

And the men of Gilead smote them.] Put them to flight, and made a great slaughter of them.

Because they said, Ye Gileadites are fugitives of Ephraim.] That which provoked them to kill so many of them was their scoffing language (added to their threats), whereby they reproached the men of Gilead, (who were the chief managers of the late war, xi. 29.) as if they were but the scum and dregs of the tribe of Ephraim; i. e. of those descended from Joseph, among whom they were the principal.

Among the Ephraimites, and among the Manassites.] That is, that dwelt in the land of Canaan; who looked upon the Gileadites, and the rest of the Manassites, on the other side Jordan, and in the most northerly part of it, as the refuse of their nation. But it must be acknowledged, that the words in the Hebrew are capable of another sense, and may be thus translated: Therefore (so the particle ki is often translated) they said, Fugitives of Ephraim are ye; that is, having smote them, the Gileadites called the Ephraimites run-aways. And the truth is, thus they (not the Gileadites) are called in the next verse: and then the following words may be thus translated, Gilead got between the Ephraimites and the Manassites. It is very probable, that the Manassites in Canaan joined with the Ephraimites in this presumptuous attempt upon the Gileadites; who being well acquainted with their own country, got between them and the river Jordan, to intercept their passage over it, as we read in the following verse.

Ver. 5. And the Gileadites took the passages of Jordan before the Ephraimites.] So that none could pass over at these fords, without their leave.

And it was so, that when those Ephraimites who were escaped.] They are the very same words in the Hebrew, which are used in the foregoing verse, The fugitives of Ephraim.

Said, Let me go over; that the men of Gilead.] Who were set to guard the passages.

Said, Art thou an Ephraimite.] They examined him what countryman he was; whether a Reubenite, Gadite, Manassite, on their side Jordan, or one of the Ephraimites on the other.

If he said, Nay.] For fear would make him deny it.

Ver. 6. Then said they unto him, Say now Shibboleth.] To find the truth, they put him to this test; whether his pronunciation of some words was like that of the Gileadites: for people of the same nation, who speak the same language, differ very much in their pronunciation of it, in several parts of the country: as in Greece, all spake Greek; but the Ionians, Attics, Dorians, and Æolians, spake it very differently. And so they did among the Romans; for at Prænestе, which was not far from Rome (as Pet. Martyr observes out of Plautus), instead of Ciconia, they said Konia. And so the Ephraimites said sibboleth, but could not pronounce shibboleth. There were many other words like this which they could not frame their mouths to speak, as the Gileadites did; but this was chosen, it is likely, because it was very fit for the purpose; shibboleth signifying not only an ear of corn, but also floods of water, (Psal. lxix. 2.) so that the test they put them unto was this, to bid them say, Let me pass over the water.

And he said Sibboleth; for he could not frame his mouth to pronounce it right.] If he was an Ephraimite, he presently discovered himself; for he could not pronounce the letter schin; which proceeded, I suppose, from the long use and custom of that people to pronounce otherwise, so that they could not frame the organs of speech to pronounce as the Gileadites did: which we see at this day among all nations; who, in different provinces, very much differ in their speech, though they use the very same language.

Then they took him, and slew him at the passages of Jordan.] Otherwise they let him go; for they used this mark of distinction on purpose, lest they should kill any of another tribe.

And there fell at that time of the Ephraimites forty and two thousand.] In the fight, and at the passages of Jordan, this number perished: which was a just punishment to take down their pride and insolence, in despising so great a man as Jephthah, and threatening to destroy his house, after so glorious a victory, whereby he had saved all the people of Israel; and reproaching their brethren also, whom they invaded without any cause, and seem to have intended to drive them out of their country.

Ver. 7. And Jephthah judged Israel six years.] After this humiliation of the Ephraimites, all the tribes, whom the Ammonites had oppressed (on the other side Jordan, perhaps, in the land of Canaan, as well as the Gileadites, and the rest on their side), submitted themselves unto him as their judge; and he continued six years in the government.

Then died Jephthah the Gileadite, and was buried in one of the cities of Gilead.] The Jews have several foolish conceits concerning his death and burial; because it is said, he was buried in the cities of Gilead, as the words are in the Hebrew: which they would have understood, as if he rotted (as a punishment for offering his daughter), and one piece of him, when it dropped off, was buried in one city, and another in the next city, &c.; when the plain meaning is expressed in our translation, that he was buried in one of the cities, that is, in Mizpeh, where he lived. (See Gen. xix. 29.) And so Aben Ezra and Ralbag interpret it: though the latter of these rabbins could not forbear to incline to one of the Talmudical fables; that he having no issue to propagate his name, ordered his body to be cut into several pieces, and buried in so many cities of Gilead; that every one might preserve his memory. Other fancies there are, in which men indulge themselves; and Peter Martyr hath thought fit to interpose his conjecture, that the word Iram, which we translate cities, may possibly be the proper name of a city in Gilead, wherein he was buried.

Ver. 8. And after him Ibzan of Beth-lehem judged Israel.] It is not said upon what occasion he was made judge; for, perhaps, he was raised up by God immediately after Jephthah's death, only to preserve them in the true religion, which was in some measure restored. Some of the Jews fancy him to have been the same with Boaz, who married Ruth the Moabitess, but without any ground at all that I can find.

Ver. 9. And he had thirty sons and thirty daughters.] A numerous issue was accounted a great blessing in those days: and though we read of no memorable act that this judge did, yet this is set down to shew that he was a person eminently favoured by God.

Whom he sent abroad.] The Vulgar refers this to his daughters, for whom he provided husbands, and sent his daughters to their houses, as the manner was, (Gen. xxiv. 67. xxxi. 50.)

And he took in thirty daughters from abroad for his sons.] This completed the blessing of God in the gift of so many children; who all lived to the state of men and women, and were all disposed by him in marriage, for that was in the power of parents. (See Gen. xxiv.)

And he judged Israel seven years.] Not all the Israelites, but those that Jephthah had judged; and none disputed his authority, but he ruled over them thus long.

Ver. 10. Then died Ibzan, and was buried at Beth-lehem.] There were two Beth-lehems, one in the tribe of Zebulun, and the other in the tribe of Judah; the latter of which, it is generally thought, is here meant, where he was born and buried.

Ver. 11. And after him Elon, a Zebulonite, judged Israel: and he judged Israel ten years.] It is observed by many, that Eusebius, in his Chronicon, passes by this judge, because he saith the LXX. do not mention him, though the Hebrew text doth: but, as all our present copies of the LXX. now mention him; so did those whom a very ancient writer used, viz. Theophilus Antioch. lib. i. ad Autolicum; and, which is more to be wondered at, those copies also which Eusebius himself followed in his tenth book, de Præpar. Evang. cap. 14. as our primate Usher hath observed in his Chronologia Sacra, par. i. cap. ult.

Ver. 12. And Elon the Zebulonite died, and was buried in Aijalon in the country of Zebulun.] These last words were added to distinguish this Aijalon here mentioned from another in the tribe of Dan, (i. 35.)

Ver. 13. And after him Abdon the son of Hillel, a Pirathonite, judged Israel.] The place where he was born shews that he was of the tribe of Ephraim, whom God at last honoured with a judge of their own country, after their pride had been humbled by Jephthah: for Pirathon is expressly said, ver. 15. to be in the land of Ephraim.

Ver. 14. And he had forty sons, and thirty nephews.] That is, grandsons.

That rode on threescore and ten asses' colts.] See ver. 10. This is said, to shew that God blessed him not only with a numerous posterity, but let them all grow up to be men. (See x. 4.)

And he judged Israel eight years.] The intention of this book is chiefly to shew how God punished them for their sins, and delivered them upon their repentance: but nothing remarkable of this kind falling out in the time of these three last mentioned judges, he omits to relate their other acts, which was beside his purpose.

Here it may be fit to note, that the other interval of the two mentioned upon xi. 26. consisting of a hundred and forty years, (which, added to three hundred and forty, in the foregoing interval, make up the four hundred and eighty years mentioned 1 Kings vi. 2.) it is evident that the latter part of them, viz. eighty-four years, was made up by the reigns of Saul and David, who each reigned forty years, (2 Sam. v. 4. Acts xiii. 21.) and the four first years of Solomon: therefore the remaining fifty-six years are made up of part of the eighteen years wherein the Ammonites oppressed Israel after the death of Jair, and the years wherein these four last named persons and Samuel judged Israel.

Ver. 15. And Abdon the son of Hillel the Pirathonite died, and was buried in Pirathon, in the land of Ephraim, in the mount of the Amalekites.] Some think this mount retained the name of Mount Amalek (as the words are in the Hebrew) from ancient times; the Amalekites having possessed it heretofore, when the Canaanites were the inhabitants of this country; but it may as well be thought (since all that is said is but conjecture) that it was so called from some famous overthrow, which the children of Ephraim gave the Amalekites in this place; for in the time of the judges they more than once joined with others against the Israelites. (See iii. 13. vi. 3. but especially see what I have noted upon v. 14.)

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. AND the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord.] As he complained before, x. 6. when he began to speak of what befel them thereupon.

And the Lord delivered them into the hand of the Philistines forty years.] This is the sixth oppression, and the longest that they ever lay under: which is thought, by a great man I have often mentioned, to have ended seven months after the death of Eli, when the ark was brought back out of the land of the Philistines; and, by the same reason, it began so many months after he entered upon the government, after the death of Abdon. (See Usherii Annales, ad A. M. 2848. and his Chronologica Sacra, p. 1. cap. 12, 13.) But, I think, Sir John Marsham hath since that more rightly judged, that this oppression by the Philistines is not different from that mentioned x. 7, 8. but one and the same; they vexing and oppressing the Israelites in the west, when the Ammonites oppressed them in the east: for though the oppression of the Philistines lasted longer, yet it began at the very same time with the other; which made their distress the greater: and therefore that preface (x. 7.) belongs not only to what immediately there follows, concerning the Ammonites and Jephthah, but to what is here related concerning the Philistines and Samson: which the holy writer could not speak of both together without confusion; and therefore first relates the issue of the war with the Ammonites, and then relates the other part of the history concerning the Philistines, which he here begins: and by this synchronism all difficulties may be solved, and the years, which seem redundant, brought within their true compass. (See his Canon Chronicus, sect. 11. p. 293.)

Ver. 2. And there was a certain man of Zorah.] See Josh. xix. 40, 41.

Of the family of the Danites.] Sometimes the word family is used for a tribe. (See Josh. vii. 17.) Or, the meaning may be of a family among the Danites: from among whom it was very proper to have a deliverer raised up to them, for the Danites were near neighbours to the Philistines, who oppressed them.

Whose name was Manoah; and his wife was barren, and bare not.] Was not likely to have any children.

Ver. 3. And the angel of the Lord appeared unto the woman.] As he did to Gideon, (vi. 12.) in human shape; as the relation shews in the following verses, 5. 8, &c.

And said unto her, Behold now, thou art barren, and bearest not; but thou shalt conceive, and bear a son.] The greatest men of this nation were born of barren women; as Isaac was anciently, and Samuel and John the Baptist in future times.

Ver. 4. Now therefore beware, I pray thee, and drink not wine nor strong drink.] She was to live as the Nazarites did, (Numb. vi. 2, 3.) while she carried him in her womb, and, perhaps, while she nursed him; because, as it follows in the next verse, he was to be a perpetual Nazarite unto God, from his conception to his death, (ver. 7.) which he could not have been if she had drank wine or strong drink; because a child in the womb and its mother live by the same nourishment.

And eat not any unclean thing.] It is likely they were too negligent in those days, in observing the precepts about meats; otherwise there would have been no need to mention this.

Ver. 5. For, lo, thou shalt conceive, and bear a son; and no razor shall come on his head: for the child shall be a Nazarite unto God from the womb.] See upon Numb. vi. 4.

And he shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Philistines.] He did not perfectly deliver the Israelites from the yoke of the Philistines, but it was done after his death by Samuel; who put an end to this forty years' tyranny, by his famous victory at Eben-ezer, (1 Sam. vii. 13.) as the same Sir J. Marsham observes: who supposes Eli to have died in the midst of this servitude; that is, twenty years before this victory. Samson therefore only sorely galled the Philistines, but they still continued to oppress the Israelites, as they did when he was born; for it appears by these words, that when the angel spake to them, they were under the hand, that is, the power of the Philistines, and so continued all his days: for it is said, xv. 20. that he judged Israel twenty years, in the days of the Philistines; that is, while they tyrannized over Israel: from which tyranny he was so far from being a complete deliverer, that he himself was taken and bound by them; nor had he ever any command over the Israelites.

Ver. 6. And the woman came and told her husband.] The angel seems to have appeared to her in the field, and she acquainted her husband with it when she came home.

Saying, A man of God came unto me.] So they called prophets.

And his countenance was like the countenance of an angel of God, very terrible.] That is, venerable, or full of majesty; for so the men of God, I suppose, sometimes appeared; as may be gathered from the story of St. Stephen, who, being full of the Holy Ghost, when he stood before the council of Jerusalem, his face shone as if it had been the face of an angel, (Acts vi. 15.)

And I asked him not whence he was, neither told he me his name.] The lustre of his countenance struck such an awe into her, that she made no inquiry who he was, nor whence he came, and he was not pleased to tell her. Though the Vulgar (against both the Hebrew text, the Chaldee, and the LXX.) hath it, She asked him who he was, and whence he came, and what was his name, but he would not tell her.

Ver. 7. And he said unto me, Behold, thou shalt conceive and bear a son; and now drink no wine, nor strong drink, &c.] She recites the words of the angel unto her husband; who, as Josephus fancies, hearing her highly commend the person who appeared to her for his beauty and majesty, began to suspect her chastity; which is a conceit for which there is no ground, but much against it.

Ver. 8. Then Manoah entreated the Lord, and said, Oh, my Lord, let the man of God whom thou didst send come again unto us.] To make good the forenamed conceit, Josephus makes this to be the prayer of his wife, that he might satisfy the jealousy of her husband; directly contrary to what is here expressly said, that Manoah made this request. (See lib. v. Antiq. cap. 10.)

And teach us what we shall do unto the child which shall be born.] He did not in the least question his wife's chastity; no, nor blame her credulity, but desired himself to see the person (if God pleased) who had brought this good news to them, and to be informed how they should educate the child.

Ver. 9. And God hearkened to the voice of Manoah.] Who, it appears by this, desired only further satisfaction in that which he already believed.

And the angel of God came again unto the woman as she sat in the field.] Where, I suppose, (ver. 6.) he appeared to her before: and, I think, all interpreters agree, that it was on the very same day.

And Manoah her husband was not with her.] This is no sign of his jealousy, but rather quite contrary, that he had a great opinion of her virtue.

Ver. 10. And the woman made haste, and ran, and shewed her husband, saying, Behold, the man hath appeared unto me that came unto me the other day.] The word other is not in the Hebrew, but it may be translated, to-day. And, perhaps, he appeared to her at the first in the morning, and now in the evening.

Ver. 11. And Manoah arose, and went after his wife.] Who led him the way, to shew him where the man was.

And came to the man.] Whom his wife had desired to stay a while, till she called her husband to him, as Josephus probably enough conjectures: but I cannot imagine how he came to add, that when her husband saw him, οὐ δ' οὕτως ἐπαύετο τῆς ὑπονοίας, he was not instantly rid of his suspicion; for there is nothing like it in the following words.

He said unto him, Art thou the man that spakest unto the woman?] And told her, she should have a son.

And he said, I am.] The same Jewish writer adds, that Manoah prayed him to tell him what he had said to his wife; but the angel replied, it was enough that he had told it her.

Ver. 12. And Manoah said, Now let thy words come to pass.] These words may be no more than a wish, that what he foretold might prove true; though some look upon them as a prayer to God to make them good.

How shall we order the child? and how shall we do unto him?] The Hebrew word mischpat, which we translate order, signifies here the rule whereby he should live.

Ver. 13. And the angel said unto Manoah, Of all that I said unto the woman let her beware.] This general answer might have been sufficient; but that they might be the more careful, he adds, in the next verse, all the particulars he had mentioned to his wife, ver. 4. and something more largely.

Ver. 14. She may not eat of any thing that cometh of the vine.] i. e. Neither grapes nor raisins.

Neither let her drink wine nor strong drink, nor eat any unclean thing.] This seems to lay a charge upon him as well as her, to see this abstinence observed.

All that I commanded her let her observe.] Breed him up a Nazarite all the days of his life.

Ver. 15. And Manoah said to the angel of the Lord, I pray thee, let us detain thee until we have made ready a kid for thee.] He desired him to stay and accept an entertainment from them, which was anciently given to strangers, especially when they appeared like more than ordinary persons, (Gen. xviii. 3, 4, &c.) and was continued to these days, (Judg. vi. 18.) Some think he intended to offer a sacrifice of peace-offerings, and feast the man of God with that part which belongs to him that brought it to be offered.

Ver. 16. And the angel of the Lord said unto Manoah, Though thou detain me, I will not eat of thy bread.] He was persuaded to stay, but not to taste of his meat; for the word bread comprehends all provision of food.

And if thou wilt offer a burnt-offering, thou must offer it unto the Lord.] Or, But if thou hast a mind to express thy thankfulness, offer a burnt-offering, which must be wholly sacrificed unto the Lord. A prophet (as Manoah took this to be) might warrant men to sacrifice, though they were not priests, nor at the tabernacle, as Elijah did at Mount Carmel.

For Manoah knew not that he was an angel of the Lord.] As he did shortly after, when he appeared to be more than an angel.

Ver. 17. And Manoah said unto the angel of the Lord, What is thy name, that when thy sayings come to pass we may do thee honour?] He desired they might shew themselves grateful to him, by making him some present, which they could not do, unless they knew his name, and where he dwelt. So Josephus interprets doing him honour, ἵνα χάριν αὐτῷ καὶ δωρεὰν παράσχωσι, that they might give him thanks, and bestow some gift upon him.

Ver. 18. And the angel of the Lord said unto him, Why askest thou after my name, seeing it is secret?] Or rather (as it is in the margin) it is wonderful; so the LXX. θαυμαστὸν, admirable. Whose essence (for that is meant by name in Scripture) is to be admired, but cannot be comprehended. This shews it was the Lord himself; that is, the Word of the Lord, who was to be the Messiah; unto whom the prophet Isaiah gives the same name of Pele, the wonderful, (Isa. ix. 6.)

Ver. 19. And Manoah took a kid with a meat-offering.] Which usually attended the burnt-offering, as we read in the book of Leviticus.

And offered it upon the rock unto the Lord.] He did not offer it, properly speaking, but laid it upon the rock, as on an altar, to be offered unto the Lord. And so the LXX. προσήνεγκε, he brought it to be offered; he laid τοὺς ἄρτους καὶ τὰ κρέα ἐπὶ τῆς πέτρας, he laid the bread and the flesh upon the rock.

And the angel of the Lord did wondrously.] The word angel is not in the Hebrew, and therefore this is to be referred unto Jehovah, immediately foregoing, who appeared in the form of an angel, and now acted suitable to his name Pele, wonderful; unto which the word maphli (did wondrously) plainly alludes; that is, he brought fire, it is probable, out of the rock, as in the days of Gideon. So Josephus; for we read of no fire that Manoah brought, and yet there was a flame, in which the angel went up into heaven.

And Manoah and his wife looked on.] Which shews that Manoah was only a spectator of what was done, but did not offer the sacrifice.

Ver. 20. And it came to pass, when the flame went up towards heaven from off the altar.] So that part of the rock is called where the flesh and the bread were laid, being, I suppose, a very great stone, flat at the top like an altar.

That the angel of the Lord ascended in the flame of the altar.] In which he went up ὥσπερ ὀχήματος (as Josephus speaks), as in a chariot.

And Manoah and his wife looked on it, and fell on their faces to the ground.] Being astonished when they saw him, whom they took only for a prophet, to be an angel of the Lord; and, perhaps, worshipping the Divine Majesty, who had appeared in such an illustrious manner to them, and praying him to preserve their lives, which they thought in danger by such a sight.

Ver. 21. But the angel of the Lord did no more appear to Manoah and his wife.] There being no further occasion for it.

Then Manoah knew that it was an angel of the Lord.] By the wonderful things that he did, and ascending up to heaven in a flame, which demonstrated his celestial nature, which could not be hurt by fire.

Ver. 22. And Manoah said unto his wife, We shall surely die, because we have seen God.] This has been an old opinion among the Israelites. (See upon vi. 22.)

Ver. 23. And his wife said unto him, If the Lord were pleased to kill us, he would not have received a burnt-offering and a meat-offering at our hand.] She seems to have had a better consideration of the thing than her husband, and strongly argues him out of his fears, as altogether unreasonable: and, first, she makes God's acceptance of a sacrifice from them a plain demonstration of his favour to them; and his acceptance of it appeared by his kindling a fire himself, whereby it was consumed; and by the ascension of the angel in the flame, as if he went to carry the sacrifice unto God, and present it to him in heaven.

Neither would he have shewed us all these things.] Concerning the birth of a son, and the manner of his education, and his beginning the deliverance of Israel from their oppressors, of which there was no hope, if God intended to take away their lives from whom this son was to issue.

Nor would he at this time have shewn us such things as these.] Appeared again and again unto them, to acquaint them with these things, at a time when such visions were rare, and when they were in such distress, that God seemed to have abandoned them to the will of their enemies. These were two unanswerable arguments that they had no reason to think God would take away their lives, but continue them, for the fulfilling his promise.

Ver. 24. And the woman bare a son.] We have no direction whereby to know the time of his birth, but only this, that the angel said before he was conceived, (ver. 5.) that he should begin to deliver Israel from the hands of the Philistines. Which is a plain indication they were then under their power; that is, the forty years' oppression of the Philistines was begun; and, consequently, since his twenty years' judicature was in the days of the Philistines, (xv. ult.) that is, during their tyranny, he was born in the beginning of it: for we cannot well suppose that he began to be their deliverer before the eighteenth year of his age, as primate Usher observes in his Annal. ad A. M. 2849.

And called his name Samson.] Which, Josephus saith, signifies ἰσχυρὸν, strong, or robust; but whence he derived it I cannot imagine. Some think from Shemesh, which signifies the sun, which is a body of mighty force. So St. Jerome, who thinks Samson is as much as their sun; a great light of Israel, as David is called.

And the child grew, and the Lord blessed him.] As he grew up there plainly appeared in him extraordinary endowments of body and mind, which the Lord bestowed on him.

Ver. 25. And the Spirit of the Lord began to move him.] To do some unusual things, beyond mere human power, which were specimens of an heroical virtue. The Targum translates it, the spirit of fortitude or courage, &c.

At times.] Upon certain occasions, when it would be visible to the people, that God intended to work deliverance by him.

In the camp of Dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol.] See chap. xvi. 31. There was no army of the Danites encamped where Samson displayed his valour; but this is the name of a place, called Machana-Dan (the camp of Dan), in which, perhaps, Samson lived. The reason of this name is given afterward in the eighteenth chapter, ver. 12. where there is a history of an expedition of the Danites; which, though placed after this, yet was really before the times of Samson. But this camp, it appears by that place, did not lie between Zorah and Eshtaol, but in the tribe of Judah, or in the very borders of it: therefore the word and must be here supplied; in the camp of Dan, and between Zorah and Eshtaol, towards which that camp lay. If this be not allowed, we must suppose, that the six hundred men mentioned xviii. 11. made their encampment between Zorah and Eshtaol, before they marched out of their own country, and gave that place the same name which the other had near Kirjath-jearim, where they encamped the first night.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. AND Samson went down to Timnath.] A city in his own tribe, as we read Josh. xix. 47. (see there) but fallen, it is probable, into the possession of the Philistines, near to whose country it lay, who, at this time, oppressed the Israelites, and made them their tributaries, which did not hinder, but rather promote, all manner of commerce between them.

And saw a woman of Timnath, of the daughters of the Philistines.] That is, he fell in love with her; according to the vulgar saying among the Greeks, ἐκ τοῦ ὁρᾶν τὸ ἐρᾶν, from looking comes loving.

Ver. 2. And he came up, and told his father and his mother.] This was a part of the honour they thought was owing to their parents, to advise with them about their marriage, of which they did not treat, but left it to their parents. So it seems, by this, to have been in ancient times, though their children were of age (as Samson is now supposed to be), and, according to the later doctors among the Jews, fit to contract marriage themselves. (See Selden, lib. ii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 3. and see above, xii. 9.)

And said, I have seen a woman in Timnath of the daughters of the Philistines; now therefore get her for me to wife.] This was when Samson was about twenty-two years old, as primate Usher computes it, who thinks Eli judged Israel at this time in civil affairs; but Sir J. Marsham makes account, as I observed, he died in the middle of this servitude.

Ver. 3. And his father and his mother said unto him, Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren.] That is, in their own family.

Or among all thy people.] In the whole tribe of Dan.

That thou shouldest go to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines?] Which was against the law of Moses, in Exod. xxxiv. 16. Deut. vii. 3. For though they were none of the seven nations of Canaan, yet they were under the same condemnation, and their land was given to the Israelites.

And Samson said unto his father, Get her for me; for she pleaseth me well.] His mother, some think, expressed such dislike to the motion, that he applied himself wholly to his father, and beseeched him to favour his choice, because he was deeply in love with her.

Ver. 4. But his father and his mother knew not that it was of the Lord.] He felt some Divine motion in him, which carried him to this place to seek a wife; but his parents knew not of it till he told them (as some think), and then readily consented.

That he sought an occasion against the Philistines.] Which he knew this treaty of marriage would give him, whether it succeeded or miscarried.

For at that time the Philistines had dominion over Israel.] They were still, as they had been several years, under the power of the Philistines, who treated them, it is likely, with such scorn and contempt, as if they had been their slaves.

Ver. 5. Then went Samson down, and his father and his mother, to Timnath.] He overcame them by his importunity; or, perhaps, told them, as I said before, what a motion he felt from God to desire this match.

And came to the vineyards of Timnath.] Unto which he turned aside, upon some occasion not here mentioned.

And, behold, a young lion roared against him.] Came with full mouth (as we speak) to devour him. By this, and many other places, it appears, there were lions in Judea, from whence several places had their names, as Lebaoth, Josh. xv. 32. and Beth-lebaoth, xix. 6. Every one also knows, that a young lion, come to his full strength, was the fiercest of all other. And so cephir (Kimchi observes) is used for a lion grown bigger than gur, which signifies a lion's whelp.

Ver. 6. And the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him.] The same Spirit mentioned in the last verse of the foregoing chapter; which endued him with extraordinary courage and undauntedness of mind, together with a supernatural strength of body.

And he rent him as he would have rent a kid.] That is, as easily and speedily. The Hebrew word certainly signifies to tear in pieces, and therefore, if it be true what Josephus saith, (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 10.) that he throttled him with his hand (ἄγχει ταῖς χερσὶ), the meaning is, that, after he had strangled him, he rent him in pieces.

And he had nothing in his hand.] If he had encountered him being armed with some weapon, it had been a bold action; but when he was naked to receive his assault, was a miraculous resolution: by which he was encouraged to undertake greater things, as David was by the same power given him.

But he told not his father nor his mother what he had done.] Being afraid, perhaps, that this action might come to the ears of the Philistines, which might make them jealous of him.

Ver. 7. And he went down and talked with the woman.] Discoursed with her about marriage, which he propounded to her.

And she pleased Samson well.] All things were agreed, and she was espoused to him: but before the espousals she was converted to the Jewish religion, and made an entire proselyte, as R. Levi ben Gersom, and Moses Mikotzi, and other Hebrew doctors say; and then it was not unlawful to marry a stranger, as Joshua, they say, did Rahab. (See Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 15. and Buxtorf, de Sponsalibus et Divortiis, sect. 31.)

Ver. 8. And after a time.] In the Hebrew it is after-days; that is, a year, as that phrase often signifies, and is so translated by us, Exod. xiii. 10. where mijamim jamim is rightly translated from year to year. (See also Gen. iv. 3. and chap. xi. of this book, ver. 4.)

He returned to take her.] To complete his marriage: which was not wont to be celebrated between a man and a young virgin till twelve months after the espousals (as the Hebrew doctors say), that she might have so much time to adorn herself, and make herself every way fit for marriage. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Uxor. Hebr. cap. 8.) But if in that twelve months' time she lay with any other man, it was accounted adultery, and punished with death, because she was really his wife.

And he turned aside to see the carcass of the lion.] Which was now a mere skeleton, the flesh being all consumed: and so the Syriac interpreter here renders it.

And, behold, there was a swarm of bees and honey in the carcass of the lion.] Bees are observed, by Aristotle and others, to abhor stinking smells, and to abstain from flesh; which hath made some think it strange that a swarm of bees should breed in the carcass of a lion: but they did not consider that time had consumed the flesh, or it was eaten up by birds and beasts, and nothing but the bare bones remained; in which the bees did not breed, but settled themselves, when they swarmed, as they have done sometimes in dead men's sculls and in their tombs. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, p. 2. lib. iv. cap. 10. and Vossius de Orig. et Progressu Idolol. lib. iv. cap. 72.)

Ver. 9. And he took thereof in his hand.] Or, as the Syriac translates it, it dropped into his hands, from the combs, that is, which they had made either in the belly, as St. Ambrose thinks, or in the breast, as Josephus, or (which Vossius rather thinks) in the head, or in the mouth of the lion, as the LXX. and Vulgar understand it: though Bochartus thinks that, instead of ἐν στόματι, in the mouth, it should be read in the LXX. ἐν σώματι λέοντος, in the body of the lion.

And went on eating.] Which was not unlawful, in case of hunger, though it was found in a carcass; because such ceremonial laws, as forbid such things, were not observed in cases of necessity: as appears by David's eating the shew-bread, and Elijah's eating food brought him by ravens.

And came to his father and mother.] From whom he had turned aside for a while, as he did when they first went to Timnath, (ver. 5.)

And he gave them, and they did eat.] Wild honey being delicious food in that country, as many places shew, (Deut. xxxii. 13. and Psal. lxxxi. 16.)

But he told them not that he had taken the honey out of the carcass of the lion.] For then, perhaps, they would not have eaten it.

Ver. 10. So his father went down unto the woman.] (Together with his wife and his son) to demand her, who was espoused to Samson, to consummate the marriage.

And Samson made there a feast; for so used the young men to do.] According to the custom of all countries: which feast was called by the Jews the nuptial joy, with which no other was to be intermixed; and all labour ceased, as long as it lasted. (See Selden, lib. ii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 11. p. 172.)

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, when they saw him.] What a goodly person he was.

That they brought thirty companions to be with him.] Her friends, out of respect to him, brought this great number of bridemen to honour his nuptials: but some of the Jews think they had a further end in it, that they might serve as a guard to him, if he should attempt any disturbance; of which, they fancy, the Philistines were afraid, when they saw he was a man of might.

Ver. 12. And Samson said unto them, I will now put forth a riddle unto you.] This shews how ancient the custom was (which we find afterward among the Greeks), of proposing questions to be resolved in their compotations and feasts; that they might not be spent merely in dull eating and drinking, but there might be something to exercise and whet the wits of the company: and they called such riddles as these, which were contrived to puzzle men's thoughts, by the name of γρίφος, which the scholiast upon Aristophanes defines to be παροίνιον ζήτημα, a question put among their cups. Athenæus discourses largely of such problems, as they also called them, in his Deipnosophists. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, p. 2. lib. iv. cap. 12.)

If you can certainly declare it within the seven days of the feast.] So long the nuptial solemnity was wont to continue in ancient times, (Gen. xxix. 27.) They could not shorten the days, as the Jewish doctors tell us, but they might lengthen them; as they did at Tobit's marriage, when the solemnity continued fourteen days, though according to custom they were bound to keep but three, she being a widow, as Selden observes in the forenamed book, p. 185. and Buxtorf in his Synagoga Judaica, cap. 35.

And find it out, then I will give you thirty sheets, and thirty change of garments.] The Greeks followed this example, and gave rewards to him who resolved the question proposed, but set a mulct on those that could not.

Ver. 13. But if you cannot declare it, then you shall give me thirty sheets, and thirty change of garments.] Most take sidinim (from whence the word sindon seems to come) for such linen cloths as the whole body may be wrapped in; and therefore properly translated sheets: and change of garments signify new robes, which they might change for the old: but of the word sindon, see Braunius de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 7. n. 7.

And they said unto him, Put forth thy riddle, that we may hear it.] They agreed to the conditions, and bade him propound it.

Ver. 14. And he said unto them, Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness.] The opposition is manifest in the first part of the riddle, but not in the second; for weakness is opposed to strength, not sweetness, whose opposite is bitterness, or sharpness: but Bochartus hath ingeniously observed, that these two words are sometimes confounded; for, in the Arabic language, the word mirra, which signifies strength, comes from marra, which signifies to be bitter: and so it is among the Latins, where acer, a sharp man, is as much as a valiant man, who eagerly (as we speak) engaged his enemies: and this very word (as he and others have noted) is used of lions, whom Ovid in his Fasti calls

"—— Genus acre leonum."

And therefore the riddle is truly this: Food came from the devourer, and sweetness from that which is eager and sharp; i. e. fierce.

And they could not in three days expound the riddle.] Whereupon (it appears by what follows) they applied themselves to his wife, and desired her (with good words, it is likely, at first) to try what she could do by her caresses, to persuade him to unriddle it to her.

Ver. 15. And it came to pass, that on the seventh day.] Which was the last day of the feast; when they were in danger to lose their wager.

They said unto Samson's wife, Entice thy husband, that he may declare to us the riddle.] By letting her know it; who they expected would tell it them.

Lest we burn thee and thy father's house with fire.] From entreaties they now betake themselves to threatenings, and those very terrible; which they concluded would make her as pressing upon them as they were upon her.

Have ye called us.] This signifies that they were invited by her friends to the feast.

To take what we have?] To make us pay very dear for our good cheer.

Is it not so?] Will not your kindness conclude in rudeness, by stripping us of our raiment?

Ver. 16. And Samson's wife wept before him.] She added tears to her entreaties.

And said, Thou dost but hate me, and lovest me not: thou hast put forth a riddle unto the children of my people, and hast not told it me.] This was prudent enough, to pretend to doubt of his affection, because he concealed this secret from her; for a new married couple are usually so kind as freely to unbosom themselves one to another.

And he said unto her, Behold, I have not told it my father and my mother.] With whom he had been long acquainted.

And shall I tell it thee?] Whom he did not yet so well know as to be sure she could keep a secret.

Ver. 17. And she wept before him the seven days, while the feast lasted.] That is, the rest of the seven days of the feast which remained after the third, she importuned him continually with tears, and upbraided him, I suppose, with want of kindness to her, as the foregoing verse imports.

And it came to pass, on the seventh day, that he told, because she lay sore upon him.] Made him very uneasy by her importunity, which he could not resist, though he had conquered the lion.

And she told the riddle to the children of her people.] For whom she had more affection than for her husband, or feared their displeasure more than his.

Ver. 18. And the men of the city said unto him on the seventh day, before the sun went down.] Just before the time was expired, which was prefixed for the solution of the riddle.

What is sweeter than honey? and what is stronger than a lion?] This is a compendious answer to the latter part of the question, which sufficiently comprehends the first: and St. Ambrose thinks, that, as soon as this answer was out of their mouth, Samson immediately interposed and said, What is more perfidious than a woman? which he had out of Josephus, who saith the same; and something like it follows in the next words.

And he said unto them, If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle.] The meaning is, that without the assistance of his wife (whom he compares to a young heifer, which is not yet subdued to the yoke of obedience) they had continued still as ignorant as they had been all the time of the feast. Ralbag, indeed, and some others, take the word ploughed in a lascivious sense; as if he meant that they had lain with his wife, or otherwise they had not got the secret out of her. But the words will not bear this interpretation; for he doth not say, If ye had not ploughed my heifer (which might have been so interpreted), but, If ye had not ploughed with my heifer; which plainly implies using her help to find out what they desired. (See Bochart. par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 41.)

Ver. 19. And the Spirit of the Lord came upon him.] Which he had not always; but at special seasons it moved him, and gave him power to do extraordinary things, which otherwise had not been warrantable. (See ver. 6. and xiii. ult.)

And he went down to Askelon.] A city of the Philistines.

And slew thirty men of them.] As they were making merry, it is probable, either in the field, or the city, at some public solemnity, when great companies used to be gathered together, and to appear in their best apparel.

And took their spoil.] Whatsoever they had about them;

And gave change of garments unto them that expounded the riddle.] Together with the sheets he promised; which he purchased, perhaps, with the spoil.

And his anger was kindled.] Against his wife for betraying him, and against his companions for their underhand dealing.

And he went up to his father's house.] Left his wife with her own relations, and went to live at home with his father. It is plain by the whole story, that Timnath lay low, there being a descent from his father's house to it, unto which they went up from thence, (ver. 1, 2. 5. 7. 10.)

Ver. 20. And Samson's wife was given to his companion.] She it seems was as angry as he; and looking upon herself as forsaken, was easily persuaded to marry one of his bridemen.

Whom he used as his friend.] With whom he was more familiar, and treated him with greater kindness than he did the rest that honoured him with their company. For he, I suppose, was the principal brideman, who was called by the name of the friend of the bridegroom, as we read in the gospel of St. John, iii. 29. (See Selden, lib. ii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 16. p. 200, &c.) This usage, no doubt, incensed Samson the more afterward against them; for he saw there was no faith in any of them.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass within a while after.] In the Hebrew the word is mijamim; which in other places signifies after a year, (see xiv. 8.) when his anger was appeased.

In the time of wheat-harvest.] Which was about the feast of Pentecost; a time of great joy.

That Samson visited his wife with a kid.] Which was no contemptible present, as appears by the story of Judah and Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 17. For it was a delicious food, not only in Judea, but in other countries, as Bochartus hath shewn in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 2.

And he said, I will go in unto my wife into the chamber.] He attempted, with the usual freedom which husbands have with their wives, to go into her apartment, and enjoy her company.

But her father would not suffer him to go in.] For the reason following in the next verse.

Ver. 2. And her father said, I verily thought thou hadst utterly hated her.] He thought he had good grounds to conclude he would never come near her more, having not heard from him a whole twelvemonth.

Therefore I gave her to thy companion.] Whom it is likely she loved, having contracted an acquaintance with him by the friendship he had with her husband, (xiv. ult.) For though she was (as the Hebrew doctors suppose) a proselyte to the Jewish religion, yet she was not so well instructed as to know that it was not lawful, by their law, to marry another, till Samson had given her a bill of divorce; which he had not done, intending to return again to her.

Is not her younger sister fairer than she? take her, I pray thee, instead of her.] He had no mind to quarrel with Samson; and therefore endeavoured to assuage his anger with the offer of his other daughter, who was more beautiful than her who had forsaken him. This, indeed, was contrary to the law of Moses; but the Philistines, it seems, continued their old abominable customs, which God intended, by giving his law, to abolish, (Lev. xviii. 24. 27. 30.)

Ver. 3. And Samson said concerning them, Now shall I be more blameless than the Philistines, though I do them a displeasure.] He seems to have turned away in scorn and indignation, without making a reply to his father-in-law; but told the next persons he met, that he would be revenged of the Philistines for the wrong that had been done him; and that they might blame themselves for the mischief he intended them. By which it appears, that the people of that place approved of this marriage, and perhaps honoured it by their presence; whom Samson resolved therefore to chastise, not as a private person, but as appointed by God to vindicate the oppression of the Israelites. Which Grotius thinks he did ex naturali jure, as a piece of natural justice. (See lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. sect. 8. n. 3.)

Ver. 4. And Samson went and caught three hundred foxes.] Some make a difficulty to believe this, because foxes are subtle creatures, and not easily caught: but they should consider such things as these, which Bochartus hath represented, that this country abounded with foxes, from whence several places had their names, particularly one in the tribe of Dan, (see chap. i. 35. and Josh. xix. 42.) and that under this name of foxes may be comprehended a creature very like a fox, called thoes, which go together in herds; so that two hundred (as good authors report) have been seen in a company together. And next, it is not said he caught these at one time, or in a day and a night; but there might be a week or a month's time allowed for the accomplishment of his design; in which his servants, and neighbours, and friends, no doubt, assisted him, if he desired it; so that such a number might be caught in a short time: for they were not caught, as some imagine, only by hunting, but in snares and nets, as he demonstrates in his Hierozoicon, lib. iii. cap. 13. where, in answer to such as ask why he chose foxes rather than dogs, or some other creatures, he thinks it is sufficient to say, that he brought about two ends; by the same means freeing the country from a great many noxious animals, by which he did much hurt unto their enemies.

And took firebrands, and turned tail to tail.] Which he tied together with a cord; yet not close, but at a distance, that they might run the better.

And put a firebrand in the midst between two tails.] Which he so fastened, that it should not fall off by their motion.

Ver. 5. And when he had set the brands on fire, he let them go into the standing corn of the Philistines.] Near unto which he let them loose; and they naturally ran into it to hide themselves from the fire; of which they are observed to be afraid. Beside, being coupled, they could not run into their holes.

And burnt up both the shocks, and also the standing corn.] By this it appears, that it was in the midst of wheat-harvest when this was done; some corn being cut, and other still standing; but all consumed. For the fire being once begun, the foxes were the more affrighted, and desiring to run from it, this still carried it to another place, where there was corn left, till they had burnt it quite up: beside, it is observed by the same author, that foxes do not run straight forward, but they make many turnings, by which means they destroyed the more.

With the vineyards and olives.] Foxes are observed to love grapes, and Solomon speaks of them as noxious to vineyards, (Cant. ii. 15.) whither they ran to satiate their hunger, after they had been long kept up by Samson. Some think, that as part of the three hundred foxes were sent among the corn, so the other part among the vines and olives: or, perhaps, being all let into the corn, and finding the flame increasing there, they went to seek shelter in the vineyards, whither they carried the fire.

Bochartus observes a very famous monument of this fact of Samson's, in Ovid's fourth book of his Fasti; where he saith, the Romans were wont every year, in the middle of April, to let loose some foxes in the Circus, with burning torches fastened unto their backs. The original of which custom, he justly thinks, could not be from so small an occasion as Ovid mentions, from the report of an old man he met withal. But that it was derived from hence, may well be questioned; because, though it fell out at the same time of the year that Samson did this thing, yet one can give no reason why the Phœnicians (from whom the Romans must be supposed to borrow it) should celebrate the memory of this mischief which Samson did them, in such a representation of it. (See him, in the place beforementioned, p. 856, 857, &c.)

Ver. 6. Then the Philistines said, Who hath done this?] The owners of the corn, or perhaps the country in general, made an inquiry after the author of this mischief.

And they answered, Samson, the son-in-law of the Timnite, because he had taken his wife, and given her to his companion.] Some of those who heard Samson's threatening words, (ver. 3.) it is likely, gave this information.

And the Philistines came up, and burnt her and her father with fire.] I suppose they burnt their house, and them in it. Whereby that very calamity came upon her, which she sought to avoid by betraying her husband, (xiv. 15.)

Ver. 7. And Samson said, Though you have done this.] The words in the Hebrew are a concise form of speech, If ye had done after this manner; that is, punished them sooner for the injury done him, it might have seemed love of justice; but now they did it only out of love to themselves.

Yet will I be avenged of you.] Or, but I will surely take a farther revenge of you. Unto which, no doubt, he was moved not by his own private spirit, but by that Spirit which raised him up to deliver God's people from their oppressors.

And then I will cease.] That is, unless they gave him further occasion, there should be an end of this quarrel.

Ver. 8. And he smote them hip and thigh.] It is hard to understand the meaning of this; of which Josephus only saith, that he slew many of them, ἐν πεδίῳ τῶν Παλαιστινῶν, in a field of the Philistines; but saith not a word concerning the import of hip and thigh. But the Chaldee paraphrast interprets it, He smote both footmen and horsemen, the one resting on their legs (as the Hebrew word schock signifies), and the other on their thighs, as they sat close to their horses. They that think this to be forced, take the meaning to be, that he smote them both on their legs and their thighs, as they fled away, so as to disable them from any service, though he did not kill them. I omit other interpretations.

With a great slaughter.] The word is with a great stroke, and so the LXX. translate it, which agrees well with the last interpretation, that he sorely wounded them.

And he went down.] With respect to the country of the Philistines he went up (as appears by the next verse), but from the mountainous part of Judea, where he was, he first went down.

And dwelt in the top of the rock Etam.] A strong place in the tribe of Judah (as Josephus relates), to the top of which no more than one man could come abreast, as we speak. By all this, and by what follows in the rest of his history, it is plain that Samson had no commission from God, nor was moved by him to raise an army, and make open war (as Gideon, and Jephthah, and others did), for the deliverance of Israel from the yoke of the Philistines, but only to weaken them, and to keep them in awe, that, out of dread of him, they might be less cruel in their oppression. And this, no doubt, he understood to be all that God intended to do by him, from the words of the angel, (xiii. 5.) "He shall begin to deliver Israel."

Ver. 9. Then the Philistines went up and pitched in Judah.] With a great number of men, as if they intended an absolute conquest of their country.

And spread themselves in Lehi.] A place so called afterward, from the jaw-bone wherewith Samson smote them.

Ver. 10. And the men of Judah said, Why are ye come up against us?] Since they paid their tribute (as Josephus observes) and had committed no offence against them, not having taken part with Samson in any thing he had done, they might well expostulate with them about this invasion.

And they answered, To bind Samson are we come up.] They soon satisfied them that they had no quarrel with them, but only with Samson, whom, if they would deliver up bound to them, they would withdraw their army.

To do to him as he hath done to us.] Punish him for the injuries he had done them; or rather, put him to death, as he had killed many of them.

Ver. 11. Then three thousand of the men of Judah went to the top of the rock Etam.] In the Hebrew it is went down; i. e. into the cave where he was in the top of the rock: for it is said, ver. 13. that they brought him up to the Philistines, whereas from the top of the rock it was down.

And said unto Samson, Knowest thou not that the Philistines are rulers over us?] And therefore not to be offended by us.

What is it that thou hast done unto us?] To provoke them to come against Judah.

And he said unto them, As they did unto me, so I have done unto them.] He saith nothing of any motion he had from God to do what he had done, but only tells them, that he had merely requited the wrong he had received from the Philistines.

Ver. 12. And they said unto him, We are come down to bind thee, that we may deliver thee into the hands of the Philistines.] They came with a little army, to shew they could by force take him; but they rather desired he would quietly resign himself to them, that they might deliver him bound to the Philistines.

And Samson said unto them, Swear unto me, that ye will not fall upon me yourselves.] He doth not upbraid them with their base cowardice, in coming so many against one man, and that to give up their deliverer into their enemies' hands, but consents to their desire, on condition that they would solemnly engage to do him no hurt themselves; for he was unwilling to shed the blood of his brethren, as he might have done, if they had attempted any thing against him.

Ver. 13. And they spake unto him, saying, No, but we will bind thee fast, and deliver thee into their hands; but surely we will not kill thee.] They promised to do as he desired, if he would submit to be bound and delivered unto the Philistines, who would not be otherwise satisfied.

And they bound him with two new cords, and brought him up from the rock.] To put him absolutely into the power of the Philistines: for two cords, and those fresh and new, wherewith they bound him, were sufficient to shew their real desire to comply with their demands.

Ver. 14. And when they came unto Lehi.] Where the Philistines had spread themselves, (ver. 9.)

The Philistines shouted against him:] As soldiers used to do, when they had gotten a great victory, their mischievous enemy being fallen into their hand.

And the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him.] Or, But the Spirit of the Lord, &c. Their joy was instantly quashed; for, by the mighty power of God, the cords immediately snapped in sunder.

The cords that were upon his arms became as flax that was burnt with fire.] Which is consumed in a moment.

And his bands loosed from his hands.] The Hebrew, to express how speedily and easily they were loosed, saith, they melted, or were dissolved, as wax is by the fire.

Ver. 15. And he found a new jaw-bone of an ass.] Of an ass that had not been long dead. So the word terijah signifies, which Kimchi here saith is an Arabic word, signifying moist and fresh, and, therefore, not so brittle as one that is dry, and hath laid long in the air and the sun. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 15.)

And put forth his hand and took it.] The providence of God laid it in his way, that he might not be wholly unarmed, when he had a numerous company of enemies to deal withal.

And slew a thousand men therewith.] The Philistines, no doubt, were strangely amazed to see the cords fall so easily, and suddenly, from his hands, and to see him come boldly, or rather furiously, towards them, which put them in a confusion, and gave him such advantage against them, that he made this great slaughter among them; wherein was fulfilled the promise of Moses, Lev. xxvi. 8. where he saith expressly, "One man of you shall chase a thousand." It is not unlikely, also, that the Philistines might fear the men of Judah, on this occasion, would join with him, which made them turn their backs and expose themselves to slaughter. But it was by a wonderful strength which God infused into him, that he was able to pursue them so long, till he had done such execution, which is incredible only to those who do not consider the power of God, who can raise our powers to what degree he pleases, and enfeeble the spirits of those who oppose his designs: so that they shall have no power to help themselves. It may not be amiss also here to note, that there are instances of men, who, by their natural courage, have made great havoc among their enemies: for Flavius Vopiscus reports, that Aurelian, in the Sarmatic war, slew forty-eight men with his own hands in one day; and in divers days, nine hundred and fifty: upon which the boys made a song, and shouted in their dances, after a military manner, Mille, Mille, Mille, Mille, Mille, Mille, decollavimus. Unus homo, Mille, Mille, &c. Mille, Mille, vivat, qui Mille, Mille occidit. And, upon another occasion, another little song was made of him, which Salmasius found thus disposed in ancient MS.

Mille Sarmatas, Mille Francos
Semel et Semel occidimus
Mille Persas quærimus.

Ver. 16. And Samson said.] Then he composed a triumphant song.

With the jaw-bone of an ass, heaps upon heaps; with the jaw-bone of an ass have I slain a thousand men.] This seems to have been the beginning, and, perhaps, the end of the song. In which words, Belehi hachamor chamorcha morathaim, every one may observe a graceful allusion; chamor signifying both an ass, and also a heap.

Ver. 17. And it came to pass, that when he had made an end of speaking.] Of reciting the song beforementioned, which contained more than these few words, as this phrase seems to import.

That he cast the jaw-bone out of his hand.] Which he held there while he was speaking.

And called that place Ramath-lehi.] That is, the projection, or casting away, of the jaw-bone, as the Chaldee and Kimchi interpret it, for so the word rama signifies, to throw any thing from one. It is called, ver. 9. and 14. simply Lehi; it being usual to leave out the beginning of names, as I have often observed, Salem being put for Jerusalem, and Shittim for Abel-Shittim, &c.

Ver. 18. And he was sore athirst.] By his great toil in the fight, and by his speaking so long, and so earnestly, as it is likely he did afterward.

And he called on the Lord, and said, Thou hast given this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant.] This is an express confutation of the fancy of Josephus, that God sent this thirst upon him, as a punishment for not giving him the glory of his victory, but ascribing it to his own strength; for which I can see no colour: for though God be not mentioned in his song, but only the jaw-bone, yet that was in itself so weak an instrument, that his acknowledging twice it was the only thing wherewith he slew so many, was a sufficient signification, that he ascribed not the victory to human power, but to the power of God, whose Spirit he felt come mightily upon him, when he set upon them: but what is there tacitly insinuated, is here in so many words expressed.

And now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hands of the uncircumcised?] It seems he was very faint, for want of some refreshment, which made him so earnestly implore relief from God, who, he knew, would not fail to supply him in so great a necessity: for the remembrance of former benefits, when we thankfully acknowledge them, is a mighty support to faith, in the expectance of future; beside, he represents himself to God as a servant of his, who had taken all this pains, not to satisfy his own revenge, but by his instigation, and for the deliverance of his people.

Ver. 19. And God clave a hollow place that was in the jaw.] The Hebrew word mactes properly signifies the socket in which the great teeth in the jaw are fastened, (as Bochartus evidently proves, par. i. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 16.) one of which teeth he made drop out, and then caused water to come forth out of that hollow place: but our great primate follows those who think God made a cleft in some part of the earth, in that place called Lehi, from whence he made a fountain of water to spring up. And so Josephus saith, he brought it, κατά τινος πέτρας, out of a certain rock.

And there came water thereout.] From this cavity he caused water to issue (whereas blood is wont to flow when a tooth is plucked out), just as he brought water out of a rock in the wilderness, and made the meal and the oil to multiply in the widow of Sarepta's vessels.

And when he had drunk.] It is probable he took up the jaw, when he saw the water bubble out of it, and let it run into his mouth till he had quenched his thirst.

His spirit came again, and he revived.] He was so spent, it seems, that he was ready to die, till God sent him this water, unto which his power gave such a spirit, that it was as reviving as a draught of wine.

Wherefore he called the name thereof En-hakkore, which is in Lehi.] Or, as Bochart, I think, more truly renders it, Enhakkore-asher Belehi; that is, the fountain of him that called, which is in the jaw. (See him in the abovementioned place, p. 205.)

Unto this day.] Some have imagined, that the fountain continued in Lehi unto the time that this book was written: but Bochart there observes, that these words, unto this day, are not to be joined with those next before; for they are separated by an accent which divides them; and therefore the meaning is, that it is called to this day by the name forementioned.

Ver. 20. And he judged Israel in the days of the Philistines twenty years.] All his time they remained under the power of the Philistines, who, they confess, (ver. 11.) were their rulers, as they continued to be for forty years together, (xiii. 1.) of which these twenty were a part. In which he was not able to perfect their deliverance, but only began it by several small defeats he gave the Philistines, and several damages he did them: but, after all, he left the Israelites under their dominion; nor was there any deliverer arose till Samuel, who, I observed before, completed what Samson began, (1 Sam. vii. 13.)

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. THEN went Samson to Gaza.] His late victory made him despise the Philistines, as Josephus thinks (καταφρονῶν τῶν Παλαιστινῶν), and adventure to go, in a bravery, into one of their principal cities, which lay in the south part of their country, towards Egypt. But it seems to me more likely, that he went thither secretly and unobservedly, in the dusk of the evening, or in a disguise, that he might the better spy in what posture they were, and what advantage he might possibly have of them.

And saw there a harlot.] Who kept, it is likely, a public-house to entertain strangers; but was as public herself; which had been the condition of Rahab. So Josephus ἐν τινὶ τῶν καταγωγῶν διέτριβε, he took up his lodging in one of the public inns of the city.

And went in unto her.] Was ensnared by her beauty to lie with her.

Ver. 2. And it was told the Gazites.] The magistrates of the city.

Saying, Samson is come hither.] By this it appears his coming thither was not publicly known; but by some means or other discovered: perhaps by the woman herself, into whose house he went, who gave private information of his being there.

And they compassed him in.] The meaning is not that they beset the house; for the next words shew the contrary; that they intended to seize him as he went out of the city.

And laid wait for him all night at the gate of the city.] Especially in that gate which led to his own country.

And were quiet all night.] Made no noise, for fear he should be alarmed, and contrive some way of escape; or desperately set upon them, and break through the guards.

Saying, In the morning, when it is day, we shall kill him.] He would fall into their hands they imagined, having no apprehension of danger.

Ver. 3. And Samson lay till midnight.] When he was admonished, perhaps by a dream, to be gone; or had some intelligence from his servants (whom he set to watch) that they lay in wait for him.

And arose at midnight.] In the dead time of the night, when nobody was stirring; and the soldiers themselves, perhaps, asleep: imagining he would lie till morning.

And took the doors of the gate of the city, and the two posts, and went away with them, bar and all.] He did not stay to break them open, but plucked up the posts out of the ground, with the doors hanging upon them fast barred; which so astonished the guards, that they had no heart to follow him.

And put them upon his shoulders.] He seems to have carried them a little way in his hands, and then lifted them up to his shoulders, and carried them before their faces in triumph. Which argued a mighty strength, and no less confidence in God.

And carried them up to the top of a hill that is before Hebron.] Some take this hill to have been near Hebron; which was twenty miles from this place. But it is more probable (as Peter Martyr conjectures) it lay between Gaza and Hebron; within the view of both: that inhabitants of the one city might behold them to their confusion; and they of the other to their encouragement to hope for deliverance.

Ver. 4. And it came to pass afterward.] How long after is not known.

That he loved a woman in the valley of Sorek, whose name was Delilah.] It is certain that Sorek was a place in the land of Judea; famous for choice vines, (as Bochart observes, from Gen. xlix. 11. Isa. v. 2. Jer. ii. 21.) and not above a mile and a half from Eschol; whence the spies brought a bunch of grapes, for a sample of the fruitfulness of the country. Unto this place Samson retired to refresh himself, perhaps, after his labours, with the delights of it; and there saw a woman, with whom he fell in love. But whether she was a woman of Israel, or one of the daughters of the Philistines, (who now were rulers of the country of Judah, xv. 11.) and whether he loved her as his wife, or kept company with her as a harlot, is not here signified. St. Chrysostom and others are of opinion, that he was married to her. But then, one would think, there should have been some brief mention of their wedding solemnities; or of his bringing her home to his own house. And the Philistines would not have been so bold as to attempt to draw her into their party, and bribe her to betray him into their hands. Which argues she had not the affection of a wife to him; but was a mercenary woman, that would do any thing to get money. And so Josephus understands it, Παρέβαινε δὲ ἤθη τὰ πάτρια, &c. He forsook the institutions of his country, and followed the degenerate manners of strange people, ἐρασθεὶς γυναικὸς ἑταιριζομένης, being enamoured with a harlot among the Philistines: which was the beginning of all the evils that befel him. For he did not keep her company for a night; but dwelt with her, and gave up himself so entirely to her, that he doated on her.

Ver. 5. And the lords of the Philistines came up unto her.] There were five of them in all, (as we read, iii. 3.) who, it is likely, all joined together to make a purse (as we speak) wherewith to corrupt her; and sent their agents to make large offers to her, if she would come into their interests.

And said unto her, Entice him, and see wherein his great strength lieth, and by what means we may prevail against him.] It is probable, that he had often declared that the source of his strength was a secret, known only to himself; which they hoped he might, with her blandishments, entice him to reveal unto her.

That we may bind him, and afflict him.] That she might not startle at the proposal, they tell her, they had no intention to kill him; but only to keep him fast in chains, and afflict him; so as to make him humble, and bring him low, that he might not be able to do them more mischief.

And we will give thee, every one of us, eleven hundred pieces of silver.] By which is commonly understood so many shekels; which made in all five thousand five hundred, which make almost two Hebrew talents. For the Jews make it a rule, that where pieces of silver are mentioned, the meaning is shekels. (See Gen. xxiii. 15.)

Ver. 6. And Delilah said unto Samson, Tell me, I pray thee, where thy great strength lieth.] She did not bluntly ask him this question, but, as Josephus very probably tells the story, the next time they were eating and drinking together, and he was caressing her, she fell into an admiration of all his wonderful deeds, and highly extolled them; desiring him to tell her how he came so much to excel all other men in strength.

And wherewith thou mightest be bound to afflict thee.] So that he should not be able to help himself.

Ver. 7. And Samson said unto her, If they bind me with seven green withes that were never dried, then shall I be weak, and be as another man.] Her last words, perhaps, made him suspect something. However, ἔτι φρονεῖν ἰσχυρὸς ἦν (as Josephus speaks), he was yet strong in his understanding, and not perfectly besotted on her; and therefore did not trust her with this important secret, but answered her deceitfully. Which cannot be excused from being a downright lie; unless we suppose he only jested with her, not believing she would take such an improbable thing for a truth.

Ver. 8. Then the lords of the Philistines brought up to her seven green withes which had not been dried.] It seems they lurked somewhere thereabout, that they might be informed speedily of what passed. And they took care to provide the withes themselves, that there might be no defect in them.

And she bound him with them.] Καθεύδοντα μεθύοντα, &c. She bound him hard with the withes, when he was asleep, and full of drink, as Josephus speaks.

Ver. 9. Now there were men lying in wait, abiding with her in the chamber.] In another room of the house, near to that where Samson slept, she had placed a band of soldiers (as Josephus also interprets it), who were ready, upon notice, to seize him. This is an argument that Delilah was not his wife; for in his own house, where he had his servants about him, it had not been possible for her to have placed soldiers secretly in any room without their knowledge.

And she said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson.] One would think they might have set upon him when he was in a deep sleep. But the plot was otherwise laid between them and Delilah; and they thought it not safe to come near a sleeping lion, for fear he should chance to awake, and tear them in pieces.

And he brake the withes as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire: so his strength was not known.] They found he was as subtle as he was strong; having deluded both her and them.

Ver. 10. And Delilah said unto Samson, Behold, thou hast mocked me, and told me lies: now tell me, I pray thee, wherewith thou mightest be bound.] The Hebrew writers rightly observe, that she did not say this to him immediately after the other; but at the next opportunity she took occasion to complain of his want of kindness in not acquainting her with what she desired to know; as if she was not able to keep the secret of a friend, which it was not fit for any body else to understand, as Josephus expresses it.

Ver. 11. If they bind me fast with new ropes that were never occupied, then shall I be weak, and be as another man.] He persists in his resolution to delude her.

Ver. 12. Delilah therefore took new ropes, and bound him therewith.] This looked more like truth than the former, and she took care, no doubt, to have the strongest ropes that they could get. And then made him a new entertainment, where he ate and drank till he was heavy with sleep; and then she took the opportunity to bind him as she had done before.

And said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson (and there were liers in wait in the chamber).] In the inner room, where they were formerly disposed so secretly, that Samson knew not of it; for if he had, he would have discovered her treachery.

And he broke them from off his arms like a thread.] Which deterred them from breaking out upon him.

Ver. 13. And Delilah said unto Samson, Hitherto thou hast mocked, and told me lies; tell me wherewith thou mightest be bound.] She prays him now to deal sincerely with her; for she persisted as resolutely in her attempts to draw the secret from him as he did in concealing it; which he still continued to do.

And he said unto her, If thou weavest the locks of my head.] The Nazarites being bound never to cut their hair, did not, I suppose, let it hang loose, but curled it up in locks, or plaited and broidered it after the manner of a chain: and Samson's hair was distributed into seven of these plaited locks. (See Dr. Spencer concerning this, lib. iii. cap. 6. dissert. 1. p. 585.)

With the web.] He seems to direct her to wrap these seven locks about a weaver's beam (as the Chaldee understands it), or to weave them one within another, so that they should be but one lock, and then he should be like another man, which is here to be understood. And in this he comes a little nearer to the truth, but still deceives.

Ver. 14. And she fastened it with a pin.] That they might keep tight and not be unloosed.

And said, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awaked out of his sleep.] This shews that she had taken the former advantages of him in his sleep.

And he went away with the pin of the beam, and with the web.] And thereby appeared as strong as ever he was. For, as the Vulgar understands it, she fixed this pin in the earth; or, as the LXX. in the wall. But there is nothing like it in the Hebrew text.

Ver. 15. And she said, How canst thou say, I love thee, when thy heart is not with me? Thou hast mocked me these three times, and hast not told me wherein thy great strength lieth.] She now uses her utmost art to overcome him; by telling him, I suppose, she would cast him off, because he did but pretend to love her; as appeared by his not trusting her: but, notwithstanding her importunate desire to be gratified in a small request, he had no less than three times put a cheat upon her.

Ver. 16. And it came to pass, when she pressed him daily with her words, and urged him.] Repeated this often, from day to day, most earnestly pressing him to give her a proof of his real affection, by disclosing this secret.

So that his soul was vexed unto death.] He was upon such a rack by two contrary passions struggling in him, love to her, and care not to lose his strength, that he was weary of life. That is, very melancholy, and unconcerned what became of him.

Ver. 17. That he told her all his heart.] God having forsaken him, because he had abandoned himself to sensual pleasure, his love of the harlot prevailed over his care of himself.

And said unto her, There hath not come a razor upon my head; but I have been a Nazarite from my mother's womb.] These words were spoken with a greater seriousness than any of the former; which made her conclude he had given her a true account. For thus Josephus paraphrases, I am under the care of God; by whose providence being born, I nourish my hair; for God forbade that I should ever have it cut off. All my strength lying in the increase and continuance of this hair, (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 10.)

If I be shaven, then will my strength go from me, and I shall become weak, and be like any other man.] There have been men of wonderful strength, whose memory is preserved in history; particularly by Pliny, lib. xii. Natural. Histor. cap. 20. and more are collected by Caspar Schottus, in his Mirabilia Naturæ et Artis, lib. iii. cap. 36. And now, at my present writing of this, there is more than one person in this city of extraordinary strength. But there is a demonstration that Samson's strength wholly depended upon the power of God, and was not inherent in himself; but came upon him when there was need, as long as he preserved himself consecrated unto God, by not shaving his head, and observing all other things belonging to the vow of a Nazarite. Which was a thing so notorious, that the heathens were not ignorant of it; but from hence devised (as learned men have observed), the fable of Nisus, the king of Megara; upon whose hair the fortune of his kingdom depended. (See Huetius, in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12. sect. 28. and our Dr. Jackson, in his first book on the Creed, chap. 15. parag. 3.)

Ver. 18. And when Delilah saw that he had told her all his heart.] Which she perceived, as I said, by the manner of his speaking.

She sent and called the lords of the Philistines.] Who still, it seems, waited thereabouts, to see what would be the success of their design; which she gave them hopes she should at last accomplish. This could not but have been discovered by some of Samson's servants, if he had had a family there, as he would if he had been married. I look upon this, therefore, as a proof that this woman was not his wife.

Saying, Come up this once, for he hath shewn me all his heart.] She was afraid they would not have hearkened to her any more, having been so often deluded; which made her give them this full assurance.

Then the lords of the Philistines came up unto her, and brought money in their hands.] Which they never did before; but now shewed her the reward was ready, if she performed her work.

Ver. 19. And she made him sleep.] Having given him, as Delrio thinks, a sleeping potion. Others think she had drawn him in to drink wine (which Josephus supposes she had done in former entertainments), unto which he not being accustomed, he was intoxicated with it. And having broken the law of the Nazarites in this point, was justly delivered up by God to suffer all that followed.

Upon her knees.] Resting his head, I suppose, upon her knees. Or, perhaps, she set him upon her knees, and with her arms about his neck, expressed the greatest affection to him, and care of him.

And she called for a man, and she caused him to shave off the seven locks of his head.] Which he did so gently, being a man of art, as not to awake him.

And she began to afflict him.] Not by any sensible pain; but by weakening him, and bringing him low (as the Hebrew word is often interpreted). For as soon as the razor touched his head, his strength began to be diminished.

And his strength went from him.] When all the locks were shaved off, his strength quite failed him.

Ver. 20. And she said, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awoke out of his sleep.] She cried so loud, and also shook him so much (out of pretended kindness to him, that he might escape the danger), that she roused him out of his sleep.

And he said, I will go as at other times before, and shake myself.] She had so often said those words, that he was in no fear; but thought to do as he had done before, that is, prepare himself to fall upon them.

And he wist not that the Lord was departed from him.] Being newly awakened out of a profound sleep, and scarce come to himself, he did not miss his hair; and so had no apprehension that God had deserted him.

Ver. 21. But the Philistines took him.] But he soon found he had no power at all left to resist his enemies; who laid hold on him, and took him prisoner.

And put out his eyes.] By a just judgment of God, as the Mischna observes in the title Sota, cap. 8. where they say he followed the delight of his eyes, and so he was punished with the loss of them. Which the Jews are wont to call measure for measure. They did not put him to death, much less cut him in pieces, as their hatred and fury might have provoked them to do; for they had promised Delilah they would only bind him, and afflict or humble him, (ver. 5.) and in those days all men made some conscience of keeping their word.

And brought him down to Gaza.] To be exposed there to scorn, where he had exposed them to shame, by carrying away the gates of their city. It was a place also of great strength, where he would be kept secure; and it was remote also from his own country.

And bound him with fetters of brass.] Put very strong and heavy fetters upon his legs.

And he did grind in the prison-house.] As slaves were wont to do. See upon Exod. xi. 5. and St. Jerome, Isa. xlvii. 2. where this is turned to another sense, according to the conceit of many of the Jewish doctors; but without any ground, for it is threatened there as a punishment to Babylon, and so it was inflicted here as a piece of drudgery, unto which Samson, as other prisoners, was condemned.

Ver. 22. Howbeit the hair of his head began to grow again, after he was shaven.] Or (according to the marginal translation), As when he was shaven. That is, grew in time to the same length it was of before Delilah cut it off: so that though his Nazariteship was interrupted by the shaving of his head, yet it was renewed, by letting his hair grow, and observing all other rules belonging to it. He could not offer sacrifice indeed for his expiation (as the law was in case of an interruption), but repented, no doubt, of his folly, and began his Nazariteship again, with prayer to God for a pardon of his former violation of it: and in this state of penitence he continued some time; for his hair would be a good while in growing again to its former length: when, being restored to the condition wherein he was before he lost the favour of God, together with his hair, the Divine Majesty was reconciled to him, and restored his former strength; which grew and increased, as his hair did.

Ver. 23. Then the lords of the Philistines gathered themselves together.] Not immediately after the taking of Samson, but after he had been some time in prison, as appears by the verse foregoing: for it is likely they made great preparation for the solemnity mentioned in the next words,

For to offer a great sacrifice to Dagon their god, and to rejoice.] To give thanks to their god at a festival, which they appointed, I suppose, on purpose to express their joy for their taking Samson prisoner: or, as Josephus thinks, ἑορτῆς οὔσης τοῖς Παλαιστινοῖς δημοτελοῦς, there being a public festival kept among the Philistines (which all nations had at certain seasons), they made it more famous, by greater sacrifices than ordinary, and by greater feasting and rejoicing, which were expressions of their thankfulness to their god; who is called Dagon, because, as R. Solomon, and many others think, he was in the form of a fish (for dag signifies a fish) from the navel downward, and upward in a human shape. Certain it is, this god had a human shape in the upper parts, for we read 1 Sam. v. 4. of his head, and the palms of his hands; though nothing is there said of his feet. It is certain, also, that the Syrians abstained from fish, as Porphyry notes; at least from the fish of that lake hard by which the temple of the famous goddess Derceto stood, not far from Askelon: in which, as Lucian saith, in his Dea Syria, ἰχθύες ἱεροὶ τρέφονται, sacred fishes were bred. This Derceto was the same with Venus, as many learned men think, whom the Sidonians called Atarge, and others Artage; but most commonly Astarte, which, in the Scripture, is Ashtaroth, the goddess of the Sidonians, (1 Kings xi. 5. 33. 2 Kings xxiii. 13.) and of the Philistines also, (1 Sam. xxxi. 10.) whom the Israelites imitated, (1 Sam. vii. 3, 4.) And, worshipping the gods of those who ruled over them, no wonder they followed their wicked manners, and gave themselves over to fornication: which is the best account that can be given of Samson's living in this sin, without reprehension; the nation being depraved, and having lost their ancient discipline, which corrected this vice; for their law permitted no harlot to be in Israel.

For they said, Our god hath delivered Samson, our enemy, into our hands.] All nations had this sense, that they owed all they enjoyed unto God: and especially made their acknowledgments to such gods as they worshipped, for the victories they got over their enemies.

Ver. 24. And when the people saw him.] For he was publicly exposed to all men's view, in his fetters, I suppose, and grinding in the prison.

They praised their god.] Some hymns, perhaps, were composed on this occasion; which they sang in praise of Dagon.

And said, Our god hath delivered into our hands the destroyer of our country, which slew many of us.] This was part of their song, which the Greeks call Pæan: and they give the very same epithet to Samson, that Homer doth to Hector, whom he frequently calls ἀνδροφόνον, the slayer of men.

Ver. 25. And it came to pass, when their hearts were merry.] As they used to be with good cheer, music, and such-like entertainments, at their festivals.

That they said, Call for Samson.] The lords of the Philistines ordered him to be sent for.

That he may make us sport.] It is uncertain whether they meant, that they would make themselves sport with him, by flouts and jeers; or that they would have him make them sport, by ridiculous gestures and speeches: Josephus takes it in the first sense.

And they called for Samson out of the prison-house, and he made them sport.] Perhaps they made him dance in his chains, or played with him at some such sport as we call blind-man's buff: but it is hard to believe that such a generous spirit as his would submit to do any thing that should make them laugh; therefore they made themselves all the sport they could, by their abuses of him, which he was forced to suffer.

And they set him between the pillars.] That he might be the more visible to every one in the place.

Ver. 26. And Samson said unto the lad that held him by the hand.] And led him about, as he was directed.

Suffer me that I may feel the pillars upon which the house standeth.] Which supported the roof of it, as appears from ver. 29.

That I may lean upon them.] To rest himself, pretending he was weary, as Josephus expounds it.

Ver. 27. Now the house was full of men and women, and the lords of the Philistines were there.] Some think this house was one of their temples, wherein they met to praise their god, and then to feast, as the manner was, upon the sacrifices which were offered on such occasions. (See ix. 27.) And, indeed, no private house can be thought to have had a room wide enough to contain such a number of people: but their temples were, in many places, large enough, and made so on purpose that a vast number might assemble in them; particularly that of Diana at Ephesus is celebrated for its greatness, as well as for its beauty and riches; (see Pliny, lib. xxxv. Nat. Hist. cap. 14.) all the people round about, from all parts, running thither at several solemnities, as many have noted: but others think it was some theatre, like those in aftertimes, built by the Romans, some of which were of a prodigious bigness: see Pliny, in the same book, cap. 15. where he mentions two theatres built by C. Curio, who was killed in the civil wars, on Cæsar's side. They were made of wood, so ample as to contain all the Roman people (as he speaks), and contrived with such art, that each of them depended upon one hinge: which moved Pliny to admire at the madness of the people of Rome, who would venture into a place, for their pleasure, where they sat "tam infida instabilique sede," in such an uncertain and unstable seat; for if that hinge had slipped, there had been a greater slaughter, than at the battle of Cannæ. This I mention, to silence the cavils of those who fancy no such capacious building could be made, as relied only on two pillars; which is not so strange as this admirable fabric of Curio.

And there were upon the roof about three thousand men and women, that beheld while Samson made sport.] Every one knows that the roof of their houses and temples were flat, so that men might stand or walk there: but how they should see Samson from thence, we cannot conceive, unless we suppose there were windows to open upon occasion, whereby to look into the house; or perhaps there were battlements at the top, in the inside (as in our cathedrals), where this great company of men and women stood: by whom we are to understand the vulgar sort; for the lords of the Philistines, and persons of quality, were in the body of the house.

Ver. 28. And Samson called upon the Lord, and said, O Lord God, remember me, I pray thee, and strengthen me, I pray thee, only this once, O God.] A most ardent prayer, proceeding from the anguish of his soul, as Josephus observes; nothing being more grievous than to be mocked, and exposed to public scorn, which he calls δεινότερον τῶν κακῶν, the sorest of all evils: but whether he spake these words within himself, or, as some think, with an audible voice, cannot be determined.

That I may be at once avenged of the Philistines for the loss of my two eyes.] If this had proceeded from a spirit of private revenge, God would not have heard his prayer (for he doth not love to gratify men's passions); but that is a proof that this desire proceeded from God, (as St. Austin understands it, lib. i. de Civ. Dei, cap. 21.) who intended to punish the Philistines for oppressing Israel, as well as abusing Samson, and depriving him of his eyes.

Ver. 29. And Samson took hold of the two middle pillars upon which the house stood, and on which it was borne up, &c.] On which the weight of the roof relied.

Ver. 30. And Samson said, Let me die with the Philistines.] He is not to be thought properly a self-murderer; for he was moved by an heroical spirit from God himself, to make himself a sacrifice (as I may call it) for the good of his country: and it is no more than great soldiers do, who are content to lose their lives, in defence of a post where they are placed, for the preservation of the army to which they belong. (See Grotius, in his book de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 19. sect. 5. n. 4.)

And he bowed himself with all his might; and the house fell upon the lords, and all the people that were therein.] But it was not by his might, but by a miraculous power of God, that this house was subverted, whereby all their mirth and jollity was extinguished in a moment.

So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life.] This last act was the greatest of his whole life: for he not only slew more, but persons of greater note (their principal rulers and governors), and destroyed one of their temples (as most authors take this house to have been), together with their god: which must needs put those that survived into the greatest consternation and confusion.

This was a thing known to the heathen; for it is a very probable conjecture of some great men, that hence the Greeks framed the fable of their Hercules, who lived about his time, and whose name is the same with Samson's, if it be derived from Schemesh, the sun: for Hercules is as much as Or-chol, that which enlightens all, i. e. the sun. Of him it is reported, by Herodotus, That being bound in Egypt, he was brought in a pompous manner to be sacrificed to Jupiter; and resting awhile, till he could be placed on the altar, he broke out and slew all that were present.

Ver. 31. Then his brethren, and all the house of his father.] By brethren are commonly meant in Scripture the nearest kindred; and by the house of his father is meant, all the rest of his relations: or, perhaps, after the birth of this child, God bestowed the blessing of other children upon Manoah and his wife; as he did upon Hannah, after the birth of Samuel.

Came down, and took him.] By the permission of the Philistines, who had so much humanity (as all nations anciently had) as not to prohibit enemies from burying their dead: but the Israelites were now in subjection to the Philistines, and did not join with Samson in any of his enterprises; which he performed solely by himself: and beside, the Philistines were much humbled and mollified, no doubt, by this late disaster.

And brought him up.] With some pomp, or solemnity, it is likely; he being a very great man, and famous for his wonderful exploits.

And buried him between Zorah and Eshtaol.] These were two cities in the tribe of Dan, (Josh. xv. 33.) but on the frontiers of the tribe of Judah, as some gather from Nehem. xi. 29.

In the burying-place of Manoah his father.] To be buried in the sepulchres of their ancestors was accounted a great blessing by all nations, as Ezekiel Spanhemius notes upon Callimachus's hymn to Diana, ver. 131, 132. And we have examples of it in Scripture, Gen. xlvii. 29, 30. Nehem. ii. 3. 5. as the contrary was accounted a curse, 1 Kings xiii. 22.

And he judged Israel twenty years.] This was said before, xv. 20. and here mentioned again to shew that he continued to judge Israel (that is, to vindicate them from their oppressors, for we read of no other act of a judge) till he died. When he did as great an act as any he had done all the time of his judicature (or rather greater) for the humbling of the Philistines, who domineered over the Israelites, and restoring them to their liberty: which, though he could not effect, yet he did so much towards it, by the many mischiefs he did them, that not many years after his death they had the courage to betake themselves to their arms, and fight the Philistines, whom they overthrew, and subdued; so that they came no more to molest the Israelites all the days of Samuel, under whose government, as I observed before, they recovered their liberty from the long oppression of this people, (1 Sam. vii. 10. 13.)

CHAP. XVII.

HERE begins the second part of this book, which gives an account of several memorable transactions in or about the time of the Judges; whose history the author would not interrupt by intermixing these matters with it, but reserved them to be related apart by themselves, in the five following chapters: wherein he first gives an account how idolatry crept into the tribe of Ephraim; which he doth in this chapter: and then, secondly, how it was propagated among the Danites, in an expedition they made, wherein they sacked Laish: (chap. xviii.) and then, thirdly, he relates a most foul adultery committed in the tribe of Benjamin: (chap. xix.) after which follows the destruction of that tribe for countenancing that fact: (chap. xx.) and, lastly, the restoration of it, (chap. xxi.)

Ver. 1. AND there was a man of Mount Ephraim, whose name was Micah.] When this man lived, and did what follows, we may with some certainty gather from ver. 6. which tells us, there was no king in Israel at this time; that is, no supreme governor, with a power to keep the people to their duty. Which anarchy happened (as primate Usher and other great men observe) between the death of those elders who survived Joshua, and the first oppression of Israel by Chushan: in which space of time, it is manifest, the Israelites first fell from the worship of God, and polluted themselves with idolatry, see ii. 13. iii. 7. where we read the "children of Israel forsook the Lord, and did evil in his sight," i. e. committed idolatry: the beginning of which defection from God is described briefly in this chapter.

Ver. 2. And he said unto his mother.] Who seems to have been a rich widow, that lived with her son Micah.

The eleven hundred shekels of silver.] There is no mention of shekels in the Hebrew; but our interpreters followed the rule I mentioned, that where pieces of silver, or silverings, are spoken of, the meaning is shekels.

That were taken from thee.] Of which she was robbed: or, as the Vulgar understands it, which she had separated, or set apart; that is, devoted and consecrated to a holy use, but somebody had stolen and perverted to their own use.

About which thou cursedst.] Adjured all her family to discover the money; with some sort of curse upon them, if they knew where it was, and concealed it. (See Dr. Hammond upon St. Matt. xxvi. annot. 1.)

And spakest of also in my ears.] He was present, when she made this solemn adjuration.

Behold, the silver is with me; I took it.] He confessed the truth, for fear the curse should light upon him.

And his mother said, Blessed be thou of the Lord, my son.] She prayed the curse might be turned into a blessing upon him for his ingenuous confession.

Ver. 3. And when he had restored the eleven hundred shekels of silver to his mother, his mother said, I had wholly dedicated the silver unto the Lord.] This, some think, is the meaning of her cursing beforementioned. She confirmed, with an oath, the consecration of the money to God, after the manner of those who vowed any thing unto him, (Lev. xxvii. 28.)

From my hand.] Resolving not to keep it for my own use: or, thou shalt have it as a gift from me.

For my son, to make a graven image, and a molten image.] For the convenience of Micah and his family; that he might make some resemblance of God, whereby to worship him at home, without the trouble of going, upon all occasions, to the tabernacle at Shiloh. For it appears by the name Jehovah, to whom she consecrated the silver, that she did not intend to forsake the Lord God of Israel, but only to worship him by an image; unto which the Israelites had very early inclined, (Exod. xxxii.) and afterward generally relapsed into it in the days of Jeroboam.

Some are of opinion that her meaning was, her son might make either a graven or a molten image, which he pleased; but it is manifest he made both, from xviii. 18. where they are evidently mentioned as distinct. But that these were a representation of the two cherubims which covered the ark, I dare not affirm; for they being of different kinds, one a graven, the other a molten image, seems to import the contrary; for the cherubims were both alike. But see our most learned Dr. Spencer, lib. iii. cap. 3. dissert. 7. sect. 4.

Now therefore I will restore it unto thee.] She resolved to return it into his hands, for the use beforenamed.

Ver. 4. Yet he restored the money to his mother.] These words seem to signify, that at the first he only brought the money to her, offering to restore it; but she bid him keep it: which he refused to do; but would have her take it again into her hands, which she did.

And his mother took two hundred shekels of silver.] Some think she reserved the rest for her own private use, contrary to her vow: but it is more probable, that she gave them to her son, to make the ephod and teraphim, and other things belonging to that Divine service, which they intended to set up in their house.

And gave them to the founder, who made thereof a graven image, and a molten image.] It is not certain whether this silver was melted, and then the images made of it; or that for this sum of money the founder sold these images to him, made perhaps of brass, silvered over. And this is most probable, because they would have been very small, if they had been made only of two hundred shekels of silver.

And they were in the house of Micah.] Placed in some room of his house, where he intended to worship, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 5. And the man Micah.] This seems to import, that hereupon he looked upon himself, and was accounted, a very considerable person.

Had a house of gods.] The Hebrew words beth Elohim may well be translated a house of God; as Peter Martyr here understands it. And so the phrase is used in other places, Gen. xxviii. 22. and in the next chapter of this book, ver. 31. For his intention was to make an imitation of the house of God at Shiloh at his own home; which may also be truly called a house of gods (as we translate it), because, whatsoever his intention was, to worship God by images, was accounted by him the worshipping of other gods.

And made an ephod.] That the Divine service in his house might be performed with a greater resemblance of what was done at the tabernacle in Shiloh, he made priestly garments, as Peter Martyr understands it: who takes the ephod to comprehend not only the breast-plate adjoining to it, but the rest of the vestments used by the high-priest; for he intended, it appears by the next words, to set up an oracle in his own house. But whatsoever resemblance this ephod had in its shape and form to the ephod of the high-priest, it had none of that rich work in it which the high-priest's ephod had, nor no girdle or breast-plate belonging to it; being no more such a garment as that golden ephod, than his Levite was a priest; or his teraphim, an urim and thummim.

And teraphim.] Of this word I have said enough, upon Gen. xxxi. 19. where I have shewn, they were images whereby the eastern people consulted God, and hoped to receive answers from him. And therefore I take Micah's meaning to have been, to set up a holy oracle in his house, where the priest wearing an ephod, and other sacred habiliments, should consult God by these teraphim. But, as Mr. Selden well observes, (in his Syntagma i. de Diis Syris, cap. 2.) the worship of the true God, and of idols, were here blended together by him. For the ephod and the Levite (whom he afterward provided) were intended, no doubt, for the service of the true God; but the graven and molten image, and the teraphim, belonged unto demons (as he speaks), by which the children of Dan, in the next chapter, desire the Levite to inquire of God for them; for they neither trusted to the ephod alone, which related to God, nor to their teraphim alone, which were an invention of their own; but thought it necessary to join both together in Divine worship. And thus began idolatry in Israel, by the superstition of an old woman, who put this into her son's head. Many of the Jews fancy she was Delilah; who having got so much money of every one of the lords of the Philistines, thought it was fit to employ some of it to express her devotion. But this is an idle conceit, which hath no ground, but only her being named in the foregoing chapter; which relates a history of things long after Micah's time.

And consecrated one of his sons, who became his priest:] In the Hebrew it is, filled the hand of one of his sons; that is, as many think, the eldest son of his family, into whose hands he put sacrifices to be offered unto God. For that was the rite of initiating priests, as we find Exod. xxxi. 24. Lev. viii. 27

Ver. 6. In those days there was no king in Israel.] That is, this was before the time of the judges, when these things fell out; in whom there was a sovereign power to correct abuses, and especially to suppress idolatry; which power being now wanting, it was the reason Micah took upon him to make himself a private temple in his own house; because the ways (as Grotius conjectures) were dangerous when there was no supreme governor, being infested with thieves, or not kept in good repair, which made travelling uneasy. This last is more probable than that robbers infested the country; for it was now a time of peace, when the Levite travelled from one part of the land to the other securely enough; and the Danites sent spies a long way to search out the country of Laish without danger; and afterward marched with a great body to seek a new settlement; which, one would think, should rather have been employed in clearing their country where they were from such pestilent cut-throats, as some suppose to have infested it.

As for the name of king, it was given to the judges; just as it was to Moses, who was their supreme governor; but was not properly a king, as Hermannus Conringius observes, in his book de Rep. Hebr. sect. 49, &c.

But every man did that which was right in his own eyes.] And there can be no worse state of things (as Pet. Martyr here observes) than for every one to be left unto his own will and pleasure; as they were now, when they left the Lord their God: for being without the true God, they were also without a teaching priest, and without law, as the prophet Azariah's words are, 2 Chron. xv. 3. where he seems, in that and the following verses, to describe the lamentable state of things in these times, after the death of Joshua, and the elders that outlived him, to the days of Samuel.

Ver. 7. And there was a young man came out of Bethlehem-Judah.] There was another Beth-lehem in the tribe of Zebulun, (Josh. xix. 15.) and therefore this is called Beth-lehem-Judah, to distinguish it from that.

Of the family of Judah, who was a Levite.] By his mother's side he was of the tribe of Judah. Which is the most easy explication, notwithstanding what Kimchi saith to shew that genealogies are not derived from the mother. For here is no account of his genealogy, which is mentioned afterward, xviii. 30. from his father; but it is noted that his mother was of the tribe of Judah, to shew how he came to live at Beth-lehem, which was no Levitical city.

And he sojourned there.] Lived there as a stranger (for so the word gour signifies in the next verse), not as a citizen, and inhabitant of the place.

Ver. 8. And the man departed out of the city from Bethlehem-Judah, to sojourn where he could find a place.] By this it appears he was a kind of vagabond, who rambled about from place to place to find a subsistence; for though there was sufficient provision made for the Levites, by the tithes of the land, yet we may well think they were not duly paid in a time of such confusion, that every man did what he list; there being no judge to see them do their duty.

And he came to Mount Ephraim, to the house of Micah, as he sojourned.] As he travelled about the country, he came hither, to beg an alms, perhaps, or, at best, to seek for some employment.

Ver. 9. And Micah said unto him, Whence comest thou?] He examined him, as the manner was, unto what country he belonged, and what was his business.

And he said unto him, I am a Levite of Beth-lehem-Judah, and I go to sojourn where I may find a place.] He was looking out for a maintenance somewhere or other, to support him in his necessitous condition.

Ver. 10. And Micah said unto him, Dwell with me.] He desires him to seek no further, but stay there, and settle with him in his house.

And be unto me a father and a priest.] The prophets, and other great men, were called anciently by the name of father, as Elisha calls Elijah, 2 Kings ii. 12. and the king of Israel calls Elisha, 2 Kings vi. 21. and the king of Syria is represented as speaking to him in the same language, 2 Kings viii. 9. and king Joash, xiii. 14. Therefore Micah's meaning is, he would make him the director and governor of his family, and reverence him accordingly, if he would undertake to perform all sacred offices among them.

And I will give thee ten shekels of silver by the year.] Next to honour, he promises him money, and all things needful for his support.

And a suit of apparel.] Or, as it is in the margin, a double suit. For so the LXX. and the Vulgar, ζεῦγος ἱματίων, a couple of garments. And there being something of order signified in the word herech, which we translate suit, many understand hereby a winter and a summer suit of clothes: and De Dieu hath justified this interpretation of a double garment out of the Ethiopic language, where this word signifies a companion; whence it may be probably concluded, that here is intended not one suit only, but two at least. With whom agrees Hottinger in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 5. p. 88. where he observes, that all, in a manner, are of opinion, that more suits of apparel than one are signified by this word; but whence to fetch that signification is not to be found but in the Ethiopic language, where it signifies a companion, a friend, another self, as his words are.

And thy victuals.] His constant diet at his table.

And the Levite went in.] Accepted of his offer, so far as to go into his house, and see how he liked every thing.

Ver. 11. And the Levite was content to dwell with the man.] After some time he resolved to settle in his house.

And the young man was unto him as one of his sons.] He treated him with such affection, that he was the more willing to stay there.

Ver. 12. And Micah consecrated the Levite; and the young man became his priest.] A wonderful presumption in them both; Micah having no authority to consecrate, nor the Levite (who was not of Aaron's family) being capable of the priestly office. But such was the confusion of those times, for want of a judge, that Micah's superstition had no check upon it; and the Levite's poverty and ambition tempted him to accept of the preferment proffered to him: his youth also made him the more ignorant.

And was in the house of Micah.] Continued with him to execute the priest's office.

Ver. 13. Then said Micah, Now I know that the Lord will do me good, because I have a Levite for my priest.] Who he thought had more right to the office, and would be more acceptable to God, than his own son, whom he had consecrated before, ver. 5.

By this it is evident, that he did not intend to forsake the Lord; but his mind was so blinded, that he took one small benefit for a sufficient sign of his favour, when he was guilty of so many heinous offences against the Divine Majesty: first, in making idols, and then in making one of his sons a priest; and after that, in drawing a poor young man into the same crime with him; and in taking upon him to consecrate a base Levite to be a priest; of which office he was not capable, if he had had power to consecrate one, which he had not. But both of them were intruders into that which belonged not to them; and thereby drew upon themselves a curse, rather than a blessing.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. IN those days there was no king in Israel.] These words seem to be repeated, to suggest the reason of such enormous practices as are before mentioned, and here follow in this chapter.

And in those days.] When there was no judge in Israel. That is, saith the author of Tzemach David, in the interval between the government of Jair and Jephthah. Which is an idle opinion; and yet he saith he should be of it, did he not reverence his masters, who are of another mind; which is the truer: that these days were before there was a judge in Israel, between the death of Joshua and the elders that survived him, and the time of Othniel, who was the first judge that God raised up unto them. So Josephus, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 2.

The tribe of the Danites.] Or rather, a tribe, &c. For so the word schebet is sometimes used for a family in a tribe; as in the twentieth chapter of this book, ver. 12. it is said, "the tribes of Israel sent messengers to all the tribes of Benjamin," i. e. to all the families of the tribe of Benjamin; and in Isa. xix. 13. De Dieu observes the same: who also truly notes, that when the whole tribe is spoken of, it is not said Schebet hadani, as it is here, but Schebet Dan. Therefore hadani here, and in other places, signifies a family derived from that tribe.

Sought them an inheritance to dwell in.] Some of that tribe, which was very much straitened by the old inhabitants of the land (who pent them up in a narrow compass, which was not sufficient for them), inquired where they might find a commodious settlement in some other place.

For unto that day all their inheritance had not fallen unto them among the tribes of Israel.] They had an inheritance allotted them, as well as the rest of the tribes, (Josh. xix. 40, &c.) but by their sloth, and for want of that brotherly assistance which other tribes should have afforded them, they could not get possession of a considerable part of it; but were forced by the Amorites to content themselves with the mountainous part of their country, leaving them none of the champaigne (as Josephus observes), nor all the mountains neither. (See the first chapter of this book, ver. 34, 35.) Wanting room therefore for all their people and cattle, and being unable to deal with the Amorites, they sent some, as it here follows, to seek for a dwelling somewhere else.

Ver. 2. And the children of Dan sent of their family five men from their coasts.] It is no improbable conjecture of Arius Montanus, that there were five families of the Danites; out of each of which one man was chosen to make the following discovery.

Men of valour.] Who could not be daunted if they were taken for spies. Some think also men of quality; such as those whom Moses sent to spy out the land of Canaan.

From Zorah, and from Eshtaol.] Which places are the first named in the account of the lot of their inheritance, (Josh. xix. 41.)

To spy out the land.] They were sent εἰς μεσόγειον (as Josephus speaks) into the midland country (for the Danites were seated near the Philistines towards the sea-coast), to see if they could find out a convenient place for them.

And to search it.] To inquire into the condition of it, and of the inhabitants.

And they said unto them, Go, search the land.] They had a commission from their elders to go whither they directed them, in the plain country wherein Laish stood, (ver. 14.)

And when they came to Mount Ephraim.] These two tribes joined, as I observed upon i. 35.

To the house of Micah.] To the place where his house stood.

They lodged there.] Not in Micah's house, but in some place of Mount Ephraim, not far from it; as we may guess by the next verse.

Ver. 3. And when they were by the house of Micah.] Near to which, it is probable, there was a public inn, for the entertainment of such as came from the neighbouring parts to worship, or to ask counsel of the oracle at Micah's house.

They knew the voice of the young man the Levite.] Having been acquainted with him heretofore, when, it is probable, he was in their country; for he had led a wandering life.

And they turned in thither.] Went into Micah's house, at his invitation, or to salute him, and inquire of his welfare.

And said unto him, Who brought thee hither?] Far from that city of the Levites, I suppose, to which he belonged.

And what makest thou here?] What business hast thou in this place?

And what hast thou here?] How dost thou live and maintain thyself? For they knew he had been poor.

Ver. 4. And he said unto them, Thus and thus dealeth Micah with me, and hath hired me, and I am his priest.] He told them the agreement between Micah and him, mentioned in the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 5. And they said unto him, Ask counsel, we pray thee, of God, that we may know whether our way we go shall be prosperous.] They were as ignorant, it seems, as he; and thought God would give an answer there, as well as at his own house.

Ver. 6. And the priest said unto them, Go in peace.] Whether he had any answer from the teraphim, or feigned it out of his own head, is not certain; but he encouraged them to proceed in their design.

Before the Lord is your way, wherein you go.] He pretended to have this answer from the Lord, who, he assures them, would direct, guide, and protect them in their proceedings; for that is the meaning of their way before the Lord: under his eye; that is, his care and providence, who would dispose all things for their good success. Now, if the Levite did not devise this answer, which he thought would please them, but heard a real voice from the teraphim, which promised them prosperity, then it was permitted by God, to serve the ends of his providence, just as Nebuchadnezzar was encouraged by his diviners, to undertake the siege of Jerusalem, (Ezek. xxi. 21, 22.)

Ver. 7. Then the five men departed, and came to Laish.] Called Leshem in Josh. xix. 47. where this story is briefly told, by way of anticipation: see my notes there. It was a city which lay at the foot of Libanus, near the fountain of Jordan, as Josephus saith in the place abovenamed.

And saw the people that were therein, how they dwelt careless, after the manner of the Zidonians.] Had no fear of any enemy, no more than the Zidonians, who were a powerful people, in a strong city; whose customs, I suppose, they imitated.

Quiet and secure.] Because they knew nobody of whom they had any fear.

And there was no magistrate in the land, that put them to shame in any thing.] To punish them for any thing they did, which made them live as they pleased. There are very various interpretations of these words, of which De Dieu hath given the best account.

And they were far from the Zidonians.] Who might have otherwise come to their assistance, upon any sudden invasion, they following the manners and customs of that people; but they were a day's journey from them, as Josephus there saith.

And had no business with any man.] No traffic or commerce with any of their neighbours, nor they with them. This disposition laid them open to be a prey to any resolute invader.

Ver. 8. And they came unto their brethren in Zorah and Eshtaol.] From whence they were sent, ver. 2.

And their brethren said unto them, What say ye?] They asked them what account they brought of their journey.

Ver. 9. And they said, Arise, that we may go up against them.] This shews, that they were particularly directed to make a discovery of Laish.

For we have seen the land, and, behold, it is very good.] Γῆν ἀγαθὴν καὶ πάμφορον, as Josephus expresses it, a goodly country, and very fertile.

And are ye still?] Their brethren did not seem at first to believe them, which makes them stir them up by this question, and the following exhortation.

Be not slothful to go, and to enter to possess the land.] They speak as if they had no more to do, but to march thither, and take possession of the country.

Ver. 10. When ye go, ye shall come unto a people secure, and to a large land.] They use two arguments to excite them to the enterprise; that it was easy, and would be very advantageous.

And God hath given it into your hand.] They add the encouragement the priest had given them, (ver. 6.) which was the greatest of all.

A place where there is no want of any thing that is in the earth.] This magnifies the goodness of God to them, in discovering a country to them abounding with all manner of good things, which they very much wanted in the mountains wherein they were pent up. (See ver. 1.)

Ver. 11. And there went from thence of the family of the Danites, out of Zorah and Eshtaol.] Either family is here put for a tribe, or the singular number for the plural; there going out of some of the families of the Danites, the following number.

Six hundred men, appointed with weapons of war.] Carrying their wives, and children, and household-stuff with them; for they nothing doubted of making a settlement there. (See ver. 21.)

Ver. 12. And they went up, and pitched in Kirjath-jearim, in Judah.] Not in the city itself, but in the fields belonging to it, as appears from the last words of this verse. See concerning this place Josh. xv. 9. 60. which lay in the north part of the tribe of Judah, and so lay in the road to Laish.

Wherefore they called the place Mahaneh-Dan, unto this day.] See xiii. ult.

Behold, it is behind Kirjath-jearim.] On the west of it, towards the Mediterranean Sea, which is called the hinder most sea, Deut. xi. 24. as, on the contrary, the east is called Kedem, which imports as much as before. Here the Danites encamped the first night, after they came from Zorah and Eshtaol.

Ver. 13. And they passed thence unto Mount Ephraim.] The second day's march was to this place, still more northward.

And they came to the house of Micah.] Unto the town or village where Micah lived; for they did not yet come to his house, but afterward, (ver. 15.)

Ver. 14. Then answered the five men that went to spy out the country of Laish.] In the Hebrew language he is said oft-times to answer who speaks first, as in 1 Kings i. 28. and many other places.

And said unto their brethren.] Who knew, perhaps, that they called at this place by the way, and asked them, who dwelt there?

Do ye know that there is in these houses.] i. e. In that town or village, viz. in Micah's house, which was the chief in the town. (See ver. 12.)

An ephod, and teraphim, and a graven image, and a molten image?] Which the Levite had shewn them, or told them were in the house.

Now therefore consider what ye have to do.] Whether it might not be expedient to carry those sacred things along with them, which they fancied would be an assurance of the Divine presence with them: for from thence they had received an answer of peace, when they went to spy the country whither they were now going, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 15. And they turned thitherward, and came to the house of the young man the Levite, even unto the house of Micah.] To that part of the house where the Levite had his apartment, not to the sacred place where the forenamed idols were.

And saluted him.] Or, asked him of his health and welfare, as the Hebrew phrase signifies, Asked him of peace.

Ver. 16. And the six hundred men appointed with their weapons of war, which were of the children of Dan, stood by the entering of the gate.] Whither the five men brought the Levite out to them, or he, hearing there was such a company there, came out to view them, after the salutation was over.

Ver. 17. And the five men that went to spy out the land went up, and came in thither.] Having brought him out, they returned back to the place where they knew the images, &c. were.

And took the graven image, and the ephod, and the teraphim, and the molten image: and the priest stood in the entering of the gate, with the six hundred men, &c.] That is, while the Levite was discoursing with them, and wishing them, perhaps, good success, they robbed the chapel, and took away all the furniture of it. Some think Micah, also, was with him at the gate, entertaining them with meat and drink. But that is confuted by what follows.

Ver. 18. And these went into Micah's house, and fetched the carved image, the ephod, and the teraphim, and the molten image.] They not only took them, as is said before, but brought them out openly before the Levite's eyes, who saw them in their hands, and thereupon expostulated with them.

Then said the priest unto them, What do ye?] Will you be guilty of such a sacrilege; or, will you thus requite me, who have been very kind to you?

Ver. 19. And they said unto him, Hold thy peace, lay thine hand upon thy mouth.] Keep silence, and make no noise. So this phrase is used thrice in the book of Job, xxi. 5. xxix. 9. xxxix. 37. and in the book of Proverbs, xxx. 32. and the prophet Micah, vii. 16.

And go with us, and be unto us a father and a priest.] They invite him to serve them in the same quality as he did Micah, promising him the same authority, reverence, and affection that he had from him: and, moreover, they represent to him, in the next words, how much more advantageous it would be to minister unto so great a part of a tribe than to one private person.

Is it better for thee to be a priest unto the house of one man, or that thou be a priest unto a tribe and a family in Israel?] They were not a tribe, but only a part of it; yet so considerable a part being a great family, they are called a tribe and a family; that is, a whole family in that tribe.

Ver. 20. And the priest's heart was glad.] To think he should so very much mend his condition; for the same arguments which prevailed with him to dwell with Micah, were far stronger now (viz. covetousness and ambition) to move him to go along them.

And he took the ephod, and the teraphim, and the graven image.] Under which is comprehended also the molten image, which the five men brought out of the house with the other, (ver. 17, 18.)

And went in the midst of the people.] Who undertook to guard him from any assault that might be made on any side to bring him back: or he went, perhaps, with those sacred things (as they accounted them) in the midst of the people, in imitation of the ark, which was so placed when the camp of Israel marched, (Numb. x. 21.)

Ver. 21. And so they turned and departed.] From his house.

And put the little ones, and the cattle, and the carriage before them.] Both for safety, if any should pursue them, and that they might march no faster than they were able to bear it.

Ver. 22. And when they were a good way from the house of Micah.] Who did not immediately miss the Levite and his idols, and spent some time in assembling his neighbours.

The men that were in the houses near to Micah's house.] If there was not a town there before, it is likely the place of worship which Micah set up made many resort thither, and settle their habitation there.

Gathered together, and overtook the children of Dan.] Hoping to recover what they had taken away.

Ver. 23. And they cried to the children of Dan.] Desiring them to stop their march till they had spoken with them.

And they turned their faces, and said unto Micah, What aileth thee, that thou comest with such a company?] Accordingly they made a stand, and faced about, asking him what he would have, and what he meant to bring a little army with him, as if he intended an assault.

Ver. 24. And he said, Ye have taken away my gods which I made, and the priest, and ye are gone away.] By gods he means the symbols of the Divine presence; for he was not so sottish as to believe that he could make his god, he being a worshipper of Jehovah, (xvii. 3. 13.)

And what have I more? and what is this that ye say unto me, What aileth thee?] He thought it a strange question to ask what he ailed, when they had taken away that which he valued above all things in the world.

Ver. 25. And the children of Dan said unto him, Let not thy voice be heard among us.] They that were next to him advised him not to say a word more, lest, if the whole army should hear his reproaches, mischief might follow.

Lest angry fellows run upon thee, and thou lose thy life, and the life of thy household.] There are always such fierce and furious men among soldiers, who are incensed to bloody executions upon the least provocation; and these being men going to make their fortune (as we speak) it is likely were generally of such a violent temper.

Ver. 26. And the children of Dan went their way.] Turned about again, and pursued their march, with neglect and scorn of Micah.

And when Micah saw that they were too strong for him, he turned and went back to his house.] His zeal was not so great for his gods, but he loved his life better.

Ver. 27. And they took the things which Micah had made, and the priest which he had.] i. e. They kept them and carried them along with them.

And came unto Laish.] They seem to have made three days' march in this expedition, encamping first at Kirjath-jearim, and the next night at Micah's house, and coming the next day to Laish.

Unto a people that were at quiet, and secure.] Whom they found in the posture the spies had described them, ver. 10. having no scouts abroad to bring them notice of any approaching danger, nor any guards of the passes to their city, or at its gates; so that they were easily surprised.

And they smote them with the edge of the sword, and burnt the city with fire.] Killed the people of the country and city, unto which they set fire, when they had taken, I suppose, the spoil of it. Thus was fulfilled the prophecy of Moses concerning this tribe, Deut. xxxiii. 22. (See there.)

Ver. 28. And there was no deliverer, because it was far from Zidon.] See ver. 7.

And they had no business with any man.] Which deprived them of all intelligence.

And it was in the valley that lieth by Beth-rehob.] A city near to Hamath, in the most northerly part of the country. (See Numb. xiii. 21.)

And they built a city, and dwelt therein.] Larger, perhaps, than the former; which being not big enough to contain them, they thought fit to burn it and build a better.

Ver. 29. And they called the name of the city Dan, after the name of their father Dan, who was born unto Israel.] They gave it this name, that it might be remembered they belonged to the people of Israel, though they lived at a great distance from their own tribe, in the very extremity of the north of Judea (whereas the tribe of Dan had their lot in the south-west); from whence came the common saying afterward, when they would express the whole length of the country, from Dan to Beer-sheba.

Howbeit the name of the city was Laish at the first.] This seems to signify, that they did not burn the whole city, but so much as might strike a terror into the inhabitants, and make their conquest more easy; for he speaks of it as still the same city, though it lost its old name.

Ver. 30. And the children of Dan set up the graven image.] Together with the molten, no doubt, and made use of the ephod and teraphim here, as Micah had done in his house; fancying, I suppose, it was by a Divine direction from this oracle, that the five men had such good success, when they went to spy out this land, (ver. 5, 6.)

And Jonathan.] This was the name of the Levite who came along with them.

The son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh.] So not only the Hebrew, but the Chaldee, and the LXX. (both in the Roman edition, and in that of Basil, and in the Palatine MS. as Hottinger observes), which will not let us doubt it is the true reading: though the Vulgar hath put Moses instead of Manasseh, according to an idle conceit of some of the rabbins, who say, the letter nun, in the middle of the word, is not written even with the rest, but suspended above the rest of the letters, to shew, that though he was indeed the son of Moses, yet he should rather be called the son of Manasseh, because he did the works of Manasseh, and not of Moses; that is, was an idolater. So Kimchi (as the same Hottinger observes), who therein follows the Talmudists, in Bava Bathra. (See his Thesaurus Philologicus, lib. i. cap. 2. quæst. 4. and Bartoloccius, in his Kirjath-sepher, tom. i. p. 114.) And thus they made this Jonathan to be the grandchild of Moses, for Gershom was his son: but it is not likely he would have been left in so poor a condition, if he had been so nearly related to their great lawgiver; nor would he have had so ill an education. And, being now but a youth, it is not probable that he was the son of that Gershom, but of some other, who had the name of his famous ancestor given him, though his father's name was Manasseh: but it is wholly uncertain from what family of the Levites this man was derived; and these names, no doubt, were common to more than those who first bare them.

He, and his sons, were priests of the tribe of Dan.] Of that part of the tribe who settled here at Laish.

Until the day of the captivity of the land.] Some cavillers have endeavoured to frame an argument from hence, that this book was written in later times, after the ten tribes were carried away by Salmanassar; or, as some of the Jews in Seder Olam interpret the captivity of the land, to signify that by Nebuchadnezzar: but Kimchi and Ralbag very well object against this, that it is altogether unlikely these images should have been suffered to continue in the days of David; who was a man after God's own heart, and set himself to advance true religion to the utmost of his power, all the country over, from Dan to Beersheba: therefore Kimchi, with great reason, concludes, that by the captivity of the land is meant the taking of the ark by the Philistines, and carrying it captive into the temple of Dagon: which is confirmed, as our famous Selden observes (Syntag. i. de Diis Syris, cap. 2.) by the next verse, which saith, that, till Shiloh was destroyed, these images remained. And this taking of the ark, the Psalmist expressly calls a captivity, when he saith, Psal. lxxviii. 60, 61. "He forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, &c. and delivered his strength into captivity, his glory into the enemy's hand." As for the interpretation of Ralbag, who takes this captivity to have been in the days of Jabin, king of Canaan, it is not worth confuting.

Ver. 31. And they set up Micah's graven image, which he made, all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh.] Which was all the time of the judges mentioned in this book; who, though zealous reformers, could not, it seems, extend their authority to the very skirts of the country, where idolatry still lurked in this corner of the land: for scarce any one of the judges ruled over the whole country of Israel; but only over such tribes as they delivered from imminent danger. This appears by the armies which Barak and Gideon raised; and in the double oppression they lay under, at the same time, in the west and in the east, by the Philistines and the Ammonites; when Jephthah was raised up against the latter, and Samson against the former: no wonder therefore that none of them could make a general reformation, nor abolish the idolatry in this place: but God used the Philistines as instruments to put an end to it; for when they destroyed Shiloh, where the true house of God was, they destroyed this house of gods, (as they esteemed it, see xvii. 5.) being a resemblance of it: and perhaps, as they brought the ark into the field against the Philistines, so the Danites brought these images, with the ephod and teraphim, and the priest, who was slain with Hophni and Phinehas; or, as Huetius thinks, carried captive into the land of the Philistines, with a great many other Israelites. But this place remained still so famous for the resort of people thither to worship, that when Jeroboam set up his golden calves, he erected one of them here in Dan, as another in Beth-el: where, there having been a real appearance of God, in ancient time, to Jacob, the people were easily made to believe there had been the like in Dan, in the time here mentioned.

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass in those days, when there was no king in Israel.] In the time beforementioned, xvii. 6. xviii. 1. (See there.)

That there was a certain Levite sojourning on the side of Mount Ephraim.] He seems to have been a stranger in this country, as the other Levite was, who sojourned in the land of Judah, (xvii. 7.)

And he took him a concubine out of Beth-lehem-Judah.] That is, a wife of the secondary sort, without such solemn espousals, or a dowry, as those called wives had. So the Talmudists generally think. But Abarbinel, following Rasi, thinks, that a concubine was taken with espousals, and only wanted a dowry, or a jointure (as we speak). Certain it is, such persons were really wives; and it was adultery in any other person that lay with them, but he who had married them. As this man had this woman, for he is expressly called her husband in the next chapter, (xx. 4.) and her father is called his father-in-law in this chapter, (ver. 47.) See Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 7. and Buxtorf, de Sponsal. et Divortiis, p. 11, &c. where the opinion of Abarbinel is largely represented.

Ver. 2. And his concubine played the whore against him.] Was false to his bed, into which she admitted some other person.

And went away from him unto her father's house in Beth-lehem-Judah.] To escape the punishment unto which she was liable as an adulteress: but there are those who, by the word tizneh, which we translate played the whore, will have no more to be meant, but that she was froward and contumaciously disobedient; so that she could not endure his company, but forsook him: the Chaldee plainly inclines this way; and the LXX. translate it ὠργίσθη αὐτῷ, She carried herself like a fury to him; and Josephus ἀλλοτρίως εἶχε, She behaved herself untowardly.

And was there four whole months.] Or, as others take it, A year and four months. For days in Scripture frequently signify a year: but the LXX. and Josephus take it for so many days as made four months.

Ver. 3. And her husband arose, and went after her.] His anger was over by this time, and his affection to her revived: perhaps also he heard she repented, and was become a better woman.

To speak friendly to her.] In the Hebrew, To speak to her heart; that is, to make her sensible of his kindness to her, notwithstanding her offence, and to assure her of his pardon.

And to bring her again.] To his own habitation, from whence she went away.

Having a servant with him, and a couple of asses.] And for that end came attended with a servant, to carry her and her baggage (as we now speak), with necessary provisions.

And she brought him into her father's house.] She seems to have been as ready as he for a reconciliation.

And when the father of the damsel saw him, he rejoiced to see him.] Embraced him with great affection and joy.

Ver. 4. And his father-in-law, the damsel's father, retained him.] Would not let him go away, as soon as he desired.

Ver. 5. And it came to pass on the fourth day, when they arose early in the morning, that he arose up to depart.] With an intention to leave him, and return to his own house.

And the damsel's father said unto his son-in-law, Comfort thy heart with a morsel of bread, and afterward go your way.] Her father had no mind to part with him so soon, hoping, by keeping him longer in his house, their conjugal love and affection would be more confirmed: and devising this way to detain him, by desiring him to take a short repast with him, before he began his journey; for this is meant by a morsel of bread, under which all sort of provisions are comprehended: wherewith he desired him to comfort, or, as the word literally signifies in the Hebrew, support his heart; which in English we express exactly by stay his stomach with a morsel, &c. For, in many authors, the heart signifies the stomach, as several have observed, particularly Gataker, in his Cinnus, lib. ii. cap. 16.

Ver. 6. And they sat down, and did eat and drink both of them together.] He made him a great feast, at which they sat a long time.

For the damsel's father had said unto the man, Be content, I pray thee, and tarry all night, and let thy heart be merry.] For he was earnest with him not to think of going away that day, but to spend it joyfully with him and with his daughter.

Ver. 7. And when the man rose up to depart, his father-in-law urged him; therefore he lodged there again.] He pressed his stay so hard, that when he offered to be gone, he prevailed with him to lodge there another night.

Ver. 8. And he arose early in the morning on the fifth day to depart: and the damsel's father said unto him, Comfort thy heart, I pray thee.] Stay till after dinner.

And they tarried till afternoon, and they did eat both of them.] He prolonged the entertainment, so that the sun began to decline before they had done.

Ver. 9. And when the man rose up to depart, he, and his concubine, and his servant.] Who had made all ready for their journey.

His father-in-law, the damsel's father, said unto him, Behold, now the day draweth towards evening, I pray you tarry all night: behold, the day draweth to an end.] In the Hebrew the words are, It is the pitching time of the day; that is, when men pitch their tents, to take their rest.

Lodge here, that thine heart may be merry.] He prays him that they may rejoice together one night more.

And to-morrow get you early on your way, that thou mayest go home.] He promises not to detain them longer than this night, but to let them go away as early as they pleased next morning, without any entertainment.

Ver. 10. But the man would not tarry that night.] Suspecting his father would use still the same kind artifice, or some other, to keep him longer with him.

But he rose up and departed, and came over against Jebus (which is Jerusalem), and there were with him two asses saddled, and his concubine also was with him.] He carried away all that he brought, (ver. 3.) and his wife also, whom he went to invite again to dwell with him.

Ver. 11. And when they were by Jebus, the day was far spent; and the servant said unto his master, Come, I pray thee, and let us turn in unto this city of the Jebusites, and lodge in it.] The famous city of Jerusalem (anciently called Jebus) had been taken by the children of Judah, (i. 8.) but the Jebusites still kept the strong fort of Sion, till the time of David, and thereby so commanded the lower town, that they forced the children of Judah and Benjamin to let them dwell with them there; (i. 21. Josh. xv. ult.) and it appears by this place, that they were the ruling party, and therefore it is called this city of the Jebusites. (See Josh. x. 1.)

Ver. 12. And his master said unto him, We will not turn aside hither into the city of a stranger, that is not of the children of Israel.] This is an argument that he was not like the other Levite, mentioned in the seventeenth chapter; for he would not take up his lodging among idolaters: and it also shews, that the greater part of the inhabitants were Jebusites, and the children of Israel had little or no power there; yea, it is possible that this happened so long before the days of the judges, that Jerusalem was not yet taken by the children of Judah.

We will pass over to Gibeah.] Which was possessed by the children of Israel, viz. the Benjamites.

Ver. 13. And he said unto his servant, Come, and let us draw near to one of these places to lodge all night, in Gibeah, or in Ramah.] The servant, I suppose, made some objection against Gibeah, and therefore he put him to his choice, either to go thither, or to Ramah; which was also a city belonging unto Benjamin, both of them lying northward of Jerusalem, and not far from it.

Ver. 14. And they passed on, and went their way; and the sun went down upon them when they were by Gibeah, which belongeth to Benjamin.] This is noted, to distinguish it from another Gibeah which belonged to Judah, (Josh. xv. 57.)

Ver. 15. And they turned aside thither, to go in and to lodge in Gibeah.] Being unable to reach Ramah, unless they would have travelled in the night, which had not been safe.

And when he went in, he sat him down in a street of the city.] There being, I suppose, no public inn in the town, unto which strangers might resort.

For there was no man that took them into his house to lodging.] They were grown so lewd in this place, that there was no humanity left among them; but the ancient custom of hospitality, in entertaining strangers, was quite abolished: or, if any had so much goodness remaining as to be inclined to it, they durst not make any invitation of a stranger to their houses, for fear of drawing mischief upon themselves, from their debauched neighbours.

Ver. 16. And, behold, there came an old man from his work out of the field at evening.] Before it was quite dark, which was also of Mount Ephraim, where this Levite dwelt, and he sojourned in Gibeah. Being but a sojourner himself, he had the more compassion on a stranger.

But the men of the place were Benjamites.] This was one of the cities given to the priests, Josh. xxi. 17. But the priests did not inhabit them alone, especially now when they were but few, and therefore let other persons, who were not priests, dwell there together with them.

Ver. 17. And when he had lifted up his eyes, he saw a way-faring man in the street of the city.] Who looked as if he was at a loss for a lodging.

And the old man said, Whither goest thou? and whence comest thou?] These were the usual questions made to travellers.

Ver. 18. And he said unto him, We are passing from Beth-lehem-Judah towards the side of Mount Ephraim; from thence am I: and I went to Beth-lehem-Judah.] This is a full answer to one part of his question, giving him an account where he commonly lived; though his occasions carrying him to Beth-lehem-Judah, he now immediately came from thence.

But I am now going to the house of the Lord.] This is an answer to the other part of his question: for Shiloh, where the house of God was settled, was in the tribe of Ephraim; (Josh. xviii. 1.) and thither, like a good man, he intended first to go, and give thanks to God, for restoring his wife to him; and, perhaps, to offer an expiation for her sin; and then to return to his own home, on the side of Mount Ephraim.

And there is no man that receiveth me to house.] Whereby he was in danger to lie in the street all night.

Ver. 19. Yet there is both straw and provender for our asses; and there is bread and wine for me, and for thy handmaid, and for the young man which is with thy servant.] He uses very civil and humble language, and also signifies he did not desire to be chargeable to any body; being so well provided with all things necessary, that he need not be a burden to him that would entertain him.

There is no want of any thing.] But only of a lodging.

Ver. 20. And the old man said, Peace be with thee.] He saluted him kindly, after the usual manner that friends and neighbours greeted each other.

Howsoever.] Do not speak of that.

Let all thy wants be upon me; only lodge not in the street.] I had rather entertain thee at my charge, than suffer thee to lie in the street.

Ver. 21. So he brought him into his house, and gave provender for their asses.] Took care both of them and of their beasts, at his own costs, as the words seem to import.

And he washed their feet.] As the custom was in those countries after travelling.

And did eat and drink.] Sat down to supper.

Ver. 22. And, as they were making their hearts merry.] Eating and drinking very freely.

Behold, the men of the city, certain sons of Belial.] See Deut. xiii. 13.

Beset the house round about.] That none might go out; and beat at the door; as if they would force their entrance: which made the master of the house come to ask them what they would have.

And they spake to the master of the house, the old man, saying, Bring hither the man that came into thy house, that we may know him.] These last words are capable of a good meaning, as if they designed only to examine him, and know who he was, and whence he came, &c. but the old man being acquainted with their wicked manners, understood their lewd intentions, and accordingly gave them the following answer. (See Gen. xix. 5.)

Ver. 23. And the man, the master of the house, went out unto them, and said unto them, Nay, my brethren, nay, I pray you, do not so wickedly; seeing this man is come into my house, do not this folly.] He endeavours to divert them from their purpose with kind words and humble entreaties; urging withal, the title the man had to his protection by the laws of hospitality, and the greatness of the sin they were about to commit.

Ver. 24. Behold, here is my daughter, a maiden, and his concubine, them will I bring out now, and humble ye them, and do with them as seems good unto you: but unto this man do not so vile a thing.] His earnest desire to preserve the laws of hospitality from violation (which was a thing very sacred in those days), made him forget the care he ought to have had to preserve his daughter's purity. He hoped also, perhaps, that they were not grown yet so wicked as to offer this injury to a neighbour, though they regarded not what they did to strangers, which made him offer them the man's concubine also, supposing it better than to let them do violence to her husband. He must be considered as in a confusion of thoughts, (like Lot, see Gen. xix. 8.) and so not to have minded so much what was right, as what was least wrong.

Ver. 25. But the men would not hearken to him.] And the Levite also, I suppose, absolutely refused to have the old man's daughter or his concubine exposed to their lust: whence arose a quarrel, insomuch that they threatened and designed to kill him, (as he himself tells the story, xx. 5.) which, it is likely, moved the old man to persuade him not to be so obstinate; but for the preservation of his life, which was in great danger, to yield a little to them: and persuading the men of the city not to be so furious, they came at last to compound the matter; and finding the Levite so resolutely bent to defend himself, were content only to have his concubine (whose beauty they admired, as Josephus saith, when they saw her come into their city), and to let him and the old man's daughter alone. Unto this they agreed, of two evils choosing the least.

So the man took his concubine, and brought her forth unto them.] With her own consent, it is probable; for she thought her husband would lose his life, and she not preserve herself.

And they knew her, and abused her all night until the morning: and when the day began to spring, they let her go.] Lest the light should discover who they were that had been so villanously wicked.

Ver. 26. Then came the woman, at the dawning of the day, and fell down at the door of the man's house where her lord was, till it was light.] She fell down dead, ὑπὸ λύπης καὶ αἰσχύνης (as Josephus speaks), with grief at what she had suffered, and shame to look upon her husband; and, it may be added, with the excessive abuse of her body.

Ver. 27. And her lord rose up in the morning.] So the women in these old times called their husbands, out of reverence to them, as the head of the wife. (See 1 Pet. iii. 5.)

And opened the door of his house, and went out to go his way.] Imagining, perhaps, that they intended to keep her, and he did not know where to find her, but must seek somewhere else by what means to recover her.

And, behold, the woman his concubine was fallen down at the door of the house, and her hands were upon the threshold.] She being stretched out at length; as people are sometimes, when they fall down with weariness upon their faces into a profound sleep.

Ver. 28. And he said, Up, and let us be going.] Supposing her to be only in a deep sleep, he began to rouse her up, and to speak comfortably to her (as Josephus takes it), knowing she was under a force, and did not willingly submit to their filthiness.

But none answered. Then the man took her up upon an ass, and the man rose up, and gat him into his place.] When he saw she was dead he made no outcry; but (as Josephus observes) prudently carried her away, as fast as he could, to his own home.

Ver. 29. And when he was come to his house, he took a knife, and laid hold upon his concubine, and divided her, together with her bones.] In the Hebrew the words are, according to her bones; that is, some of the pieces were bigger, some lesser, according as the joints would suffer her body to be divided.

Into twelve pieces.] That every tribe might have a limb of her, Benjamin not excepted. Among whom it was to be hoped there were some who would resent so foul a fact, though committed by their own brethren.

And sent her into all the coasts of Israel.] Giving the messengers a charge (as Josephus observes) to relate how she had been abused, which was the cause of her death. He knew not what other course to take to have justice done; for, as Josephus there observes, (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 2.) there was no settled court of judicature established according to the law. Which is the reason he gives (chapter the fifth of that book) why Eglon attempted to subdue the Israelites, because they were all in disorder, the laws being not put in execution.

Ver. 30. And it was so, that all that saw it said, There was no such deed done nor seen, from the day that the chil- dren of Israel came up out of the land of Egypt.] They not only condemned the fact, but were highly incensed at it, as a crime beyond all that had been heard of since they were a people: for it was a mixture of adultery and murder, with an attempt of sodomy, and that upon a Levite; a person consecrated to the Divine service, in some lower ministries.

Consider of it, take advice, and speak your mind.] These are either the words of the messenger, or rather of the people themselves, who exhorted one another not to pass over this deed, only with expressing their abhorrence of it; but to consider, and consult one with another what was to be done, and to declare their opinion freely, how so heinous a crime was to be punished. And accordingly we find, in the beginning of the next chapter, that, by common consent, the whole body of the people met together to advise about this matter.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. AND all the children of Israel went out of their cities.] The principal persons, who were appointed to represent the rest.

And the congregation was gathered together.] This congregation consisted of the captains of thousands and hundreds, &c. which had been established by Jethro's advice, together with the principal citizens, as Corn. Bertram probably thinks, whom they called to this assembly.

As one man.] Except the people of Jabesh-Gilead, (xxi. 5. 8.) and they of the tribe of Benjamin, who had no sense of this wickedness. For there was a general summons, no doubt, issued out by command of their rulers, to require every one to meet at a certain place, mentioned in the following words, or otherwise to forfeit their lives.

From Dan even to Beer-sheba, with the land of Gilead.] That is, all Israel on this side Jordan, and on the other, were of the same mind in this matter.

Unto the Lord to Mizpeh.] There was a place of this name in the land of Gilead, as we read, xi. 11. but this Mizpeh here mentioned was in the confines of Judah and Benjamin, for which reason it is sometimes ascribed to the former, Josh. xv. 38. and sometimes to the latter, Josh. xviii. 26. being a place very conveniently situated for a general meeting of all the people, who often assembled there in future times, (1 Sam. vii. 5—7. 16. x. 17.) And it was not far from Shiloh, which made it the more convenient; because from hence they might, upon any occasion, immediately go to consult the Divine Majesty; which they intended to do now, when they had dispatched the business for which they met here, which was to examine the crime of which the Benjamites were accused; and if there were good proof made of it, to consider how to punish it as it deserved. Whence it is that Josephus saith, this congregation met in Shiloh, Εἰς τὴν Σιλοῦν συλλεγέντες καὶ πρὸ τῆς σκηνῆς ἀθροισθέντες, as if it were the same with Mizpeh. And, indeed, in this history, there is a little difference made, because they were so near one to another. (See ver. 26. xxi. 2.) But Mr. Mede thinks that here was a famous place of prayer, which is the house of God mentioned in those two verses. For so the author of the first book of Maccabees saith, (iii. 46.) That when the holy city and sanctuary lay desolate, by the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes, the people assembled together at Maspah, to make their supplications unto God, Ὅτι τόπος προσευχῆς εἰς Μάσφα τὸ πρότερον τῷ Ἰσραὴλ, because at Maspah had been, in former times, a place of prayer, for Israel; and therefore some of the Jewish doctors say, the first synagogue was built here, and make this the original of all those which were so frequent in aftertimes: for here, say Kimchi and Abarbinel, all the remaining kings of Canaan assembled (after the battle at Gibeon) to fight with Israel, (Josh. xi. 3.) And here Joshua finished his victories over the Canaanites, (ver. 8.) and therefore here, it is probable, he built an altar unto the Lord, in memory of so great a deliverance. But this conjecture is founded upon a plain mistake; for the land of Mizpeh, where Joshua completed his victories, was far from this, in the most northern parts of Canaan, near Lebanon, beyond the fountains of Jordan.

Mr. Mede, also, and Corn. Bertram think, that hither they brought the ark upon this great occasion, and so might properly be said to be gathered unto the Lord. But this seems to me improbable, that they should remove the ark hither, when it was so near them in Shiloh, to which they might as well go, as bring it to them. And as for that phrase, unto the Lord, it is no argument that either the ark was here, or so much as a place of prayer; for where all the people of God were assembled in any place, there God was in a special manner present; as when they all assembled to make David their king, it is said he made a league with them in Hebron before the Lord, though there was no ark nor altar there, (2 Sam. v. 3.)

I see no reason therefore to believe, that the Israelites were now gathered to Mizpeh as a place of prayer (for Shiloh was appointed for that purpose, which was very near it), but as a fitting place for such a great assembly to meet, and consult what was to be done in the present case. That was their business here; and when they had occasion to inquire of God, and to fast (and pray, no doubt), they went to Shiloh, to the house of God. (See ver. 26. and 28.)

Ver. 2. And the chief of all the people, even of all the tribes of Israel, presented themselves in the assembly of the people of God.] The word we translate chief, is in the Hebrew the corners, who were the strength and support of the people, as the corner-stones are of a building; viz. the heads of their tribes, rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, fifties, and tens; who kept the people in some kind of order (now that they wanted a supreme governor, and the courts of justice were unsettled), and, it is likely, brought them along with them to this general assembly; which, in all probability, met in the open air, as they anciently did among the Romans, Athenians, and other people, as many learned men have observed. And Lycurgus, as Plutarch tells us, gave this reason for it, that noble rooms, adorned with pictures and statues, and such-like ornaments, did not contribute εἰς εὐβουλίαν, to right counsels, but rather did hurt, by distracting their minds, and turning them from their business: but the true reason was, because vast multitudes met together, which no house would contain, and therefore they assembled in the field; as Livy tells us, when the cause of Appius Claudius was heard, the people were cited to come into the campus Martius. (Lib. vi. cap. 20.)

is, together with so many of the people (for there could not be so many chieftains), that came ready armed, to do as they should be directed. I have often observed, that the armies of the Jews were all infantry, there being no horses bred in their country. There are those, who, by the corners of the people, understand, not their chiefs, but all the tribes of Israel (making the next words the explication of these), who made up this great number of four hundred thousand; because, saith Cocceius, all the people, gathered together, is like a house that hath corners. But I shall not trouble the reader with various interpretations.

Ver. 3. Now the children of Benjamin heard that the children of Israel were gone up to Mizpeh.] They could not be ignorant of such an universal concourse of the whole nation, except themselves, nor of the cause of their meeting; but when they were told of it, would take no notice of it, being stupidly insensible of the crime that had been committed among them, or foolishly confident of their own strength; or rather, imagining their brethren would attempt nothing by war against them.

Then said the children of Israel, Tell us, how was this wickedness?] The Hebrew word dabru (tell) being in the plural number, denotes, that they spake to more than one; and therefore, in all probability, not only the Levite, but the good old man (his host) and his servant were there, to give an account of the fact.

Ver. 4. And the Levite, the husband of the woman that was slain, answered and said, I came into Gibeah that belongeth to Benjamin, I and my concubine, to lodge.] He relates from the beginning how it was; and they confirmed it, by their testimony to the truth of it. He being called her husband, it proves she was his legal wife.

Ver. 5. And the men of Gibeah rose up against me.] A great number of them, who were not restrained by the rest; and therefore he imputes the crime to them all.

And beset the house round about me by night, and thought to have slain me.] For he resolved to lose his life, as Ralbag here observes, rather than submit to their abominable desires.

And my concubine have they forced, that she is dead.] But though he preserved himself, he could not deliver her from them; but they abused her to death.

Ver. 6. And I took my concubine, and cut her in pieces, and sent her throughout all the country of the inheritance of Israel: for they have committed lewdness and folly in Israel.] Such a very heinous crime, as he thought the whole nation was bound to censure.

Ver. 7. Behold, ye are all children of Israel; give here your advice and counsel.] They all detested, he presumed, such foul wickedness, and therefore desires them to consider and resolve how to punish it. This could not be debated by all the multitude; therefore some of the principal persons, I suppose, were deputed to sit in council, and hear the cause, and then report their opinion to the several tribes.

Ver. 8. And all the people arose as one man, saying, We will not any of us go to his tent, neither will we any of us turn into his house.] The report being made from the great council, and their opinion declared, the people all agreed to keep in a body till they saw justice done, according to their resolution.

Ver. 9. And now, this shall be the thing we will do to Gibeah; we will go up by lot against it.] This seems to be a popular motion, who are in love with equality, and therefore desire, by their officers, that it may be determined by lots who shall go to war, and who shall stay at home to make provision for the army; for they did not know how long they should continue abroad, and it was not easy to provide for such a multitude.

Ver. 10. And we will take ten men of a hundred throughout all the tribes of Israel, and a hundred out of a thousand, and a thousand out of ten thousand, to fetch victuals for the people.] So one man took care that nine of his brethren wanted nothing; and ten took care of ninety, &c. In the whole, there were forty thousand of the four hundred thousand who went out to forage for the army.

That they may do, when they come to Gibeah of Benjamin, according to all the folly that they have done in Israel.] That the rest might be wholly intent upon punishing the inhabitants of Gibeah according to their deserts.

Ver. 11. So all the men of Israel were gathered together against the city, knit together as one man.] Nothing could contribute more to their good success, than this unity and concord among the officers and soldiers, who all agreed to put this resolution in execution.

Ver. 12. And the tribes of Israel sent men through all the tribe of Benjamin.] But first it was thought prudent and just, by the rulers of the people, to send an embassy to their brethren, to desire them to hearken unto reason; and therefore there was a select number chosen out of every tribe, who went to every city of Benjamin (it is probable), to offer such terms of peace as might prevent the war upon Gibeah. Or, they sent this message to every family in Benjamin, which were originally ten, for Benjamin had so many sons; from whom sprang such a number of people, that it made R. Solomon say, From Rachel were descended twelve tribes: for there were two sons of Joseph which made two tribes, besides these ten families of Benjamin, who were so powerful and valiant, that it puffed them up with pride, and was the cause of their ruin.

Saying, What wickedness is this that is done among you?] In the first place, they were ordered to represent the greatness of the crime that had been committed among them.

Ver. 13. Now therefore deliver us the men, the children of Belial, which are in Gibeah.] This was agreeable to the law of nations, by which the Philistines had thus demanded Samson of the Israelites, who had done them mischief, (xv. 10.) See Grotius, who gives a great many other examples of it out of Pausanias, Strabo, and other authors. (Lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 21. sect. 4.)

That we may put them to death.] If the Benjamites themselves would not do justice upon them.

And put away evil from Israel.] According to the direction Moses had given in his law, (Deut. xiii. 5.) For the sin is taken away when it is duly punished.

But the children of Benjamin would not hearken to the voice of their brethren the children of Israel.] They seem to have been as unanimous in the defence of this wickedness, as the rest of the tribes were in their endeavours to have it punished. For, quite contrary to all their brethren, who, upon the hearing of this crime, met together, examined into it, sent messengers to desire the malefactors might be delivered to be punished, before they would enter upon a war, they most perversely refused to come to their assembly, or deliver up the malefactors, or so much as excuse the fact, much less deny it, but prepare themselves to protect such lewd criminals with all their power. One can scarce think that there were no good men left among them, but they were so few, that they had no authority; and the generality were so depraved, that they took part with the evil-doers. Perhaps they took it ill that the other tribes should meddle with the concerns of theirs; but if they had had any goodness in them, they would have saved them this labour, by calling the offenders to an account themselves: which they not doing, made the whole tribe guilty of the crime of a few, and provoked God justly to give them up to pursue their own destruction.

Ver. 14. But the children of Benjamin gathered themselves together out of the cities unto Gibeah, to go out to battle against the children of Israel.] Instead of hearkening to their brethren, or giving any reason of their refusal to satisfy their desires, they prepare themselves to fight with them.

Ver. 15. And the children of Benjamin were numbered at that time, out of the cities, twenty and six thousand men that drew sword.] So the Chaldee expressly mentions twenty-six thousand, but the Vulgar saith only twenty-five thousand, and the LXX. of the Roman edition twenty-three thousand; but other copies have twenty-five thousand, as Josephus also hath: who imagined, I suppose, that the number of twenty-six thousand would not agree with the account which follows, of twenty-five thousand and one hundred slain in the last battle and in the pursuit of them, (ver. 35. 45.) and six hundred only escaped, (ver. 47.) which make the number of twenty-five thousand seven hundred. But they should have considered, that the two former battles could not be fought without loss on the Benjamites' side, when so many fell of the Israelites, (ver. 21. 25.) And the other thousand men may well be supposed to have then perished, or some of them to have been left to defend their cities, where they were afterward slain, (ver. 48.)

Beside the inhabitants of Gibeah, which were numbered seven hundred chosen men.] Who were left, it is likely (or at least part of them), to defend that city, while the rest beforementioned went out to battle.

Ver. 16. Among all this people there were seven hundred chosen men left-handed.] Who could use their left hand as well as their right in any exercise. (See iii. 13.)

Every one could sling stones at a hair's breadth, and not miss.] Such excellent marksmen there have been in other countries; particularly in the islands called Baleares, where they were bred from children to hit a mark with a stone slung out of a sling, or else to lose their breakfast, as Strabo relates. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 10.) This extraordinary skill in their arms (for it is likely they handled other weapons with the like dexterity) and their natural courage emboldened them, with such a small number, to undertake a war against such a vast multitude of their brethren. Which warlike disposition of theirs was prophesied of by Jacob, when he saith, "Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf;" which is an undaunted fearless creature, (Gen. xlix. 27.)

Ver. 17. And the men of Israel, beside Benjamin, were numbered four hundred thousand that drew sword: all these were men of war.] This is mentioned again, to shew that they all persisted steadfast in their resolution, (ver. 2. 8.) to see justice done upon the men of Belial before they would return to their own home.

Ver. 18. And the children of Israel arose, and went up to the house of God.] In Shiloh, which was not far from Mizpeh, and asked counsel of God, by urim and thummim, as they did, i. 1. The Targum hath it, They asked counsel by the Word of the Lord. Some of their principal persons, that is, were sent to desire God to direct them, as he was wont to do in all great affairs concerning the safety of their commonwealth. For so God himself ordained, that the high-priest should appear before him with the breast-plate of judgment, to ask counsel of him for them in all their weighty concerns. (See Exod. xxviii. 30. Numb. xxvii. 21.)

And said, Which of us shall go up first against the children of Benjamin? And the Lord said, Judah shall go up first.] The same question and answer which we read in the beginning of this book; there being a pre-eminence, we may observe all along, given to the tribe of Judah.

Ver. 19. And the children of Israel rose up in the morning, and encamped against Gibeah.] These words seem to tell us, that Judah was only to lead the van (as we now speak), and stand in the front of the battle, to make the first assault; but that all the rest went up with them.

Ver. 20. And the men of Israel went out to battle against Benjamin.] When the Benjamites heard that Israel were encamped against Gibeah, they came to the relief of it; and the Israelites marched out of their camp to engage them.

And the men of Israel put themselves in array to fight against them at Gibeah.] The battle was near that city.

Ver. 21. And the children of Benjamin came forth out of Gibeah.] Those forces which were left in Gibeah for its defence issued out upon the Israelites in their rear, as their brethren fought them in the front.

And destroyed down to the ground of the Israelites that day twenty and two thousand.] Since God bade them go up, it may seem strange that they should receive such a defeat. But it is to be observed, that he did not promise them success; of which the Jews give these reasons: some of them say, that they sought him imperfectly, and therefore he gave them an imperfect answer. So D. Kimchi—they did not ask him if he would favour their enterprise, as they did at the last, when they said, Shall we go up, or shall we desist? That is, if we shall not succeed, we will cease the war. And then a clear and full answer is returned, Go up, for to-morrow I will deliver them into thy hand, (ver. 28.) But Abarbinel thinks they did not ask counsel in a due place, nor by the proper person; but by some other than Phinehas the high-priest, of whom there is no mention till the third time they went to consult the oracle, (ver. 28.) But a better reason is given in Pirke Eliezer, where they say, God was angry with the Israelites for their neglect of him, in suffering spiritual adultery among them, while they were very earnest to punish carnal. So they make God's answer to have been, when they inquired of him the reason of the miscarriage, Ye are zealous against the adultery of the tribe of Benjamin, but not against the idol of Micah, (cap. 38.) And, indeed, they fell early into idolatry after the death of Joshua, and the elders that survived him (as we read in the second chapter of this book), with which, though the Benjamites were defiled as well as others, yet he used them as scourges to punish the rest; intending, in due time, to take a terrible vengeance on them, both for that and all their other sins.

Ver. 22. And the people, the men of Israel, encouraged themselves.] Exhorted one another, not to be disheartened by their loss, but to renew the fight; for they knew they had a good cause, which made them the bolder to hope for victory.

And set their battle again in array, in the place where they put themselves in array the first day.] They were not so superstitious as to imagine the place wherein they fought was unlucky, and that with the change of it they should change their fortune (as they now speak), but confidently resolved to encounter them in the same spot of ground where they were overthrown before. Though there are those that think the ground was not well chosen, and that they were the more easily defeated, because they fought so near Gibeah; whose name imports, that it was situated on high, which gave them greater advantages to annoy the Israelites.

Ver. 23. And the children of Israel went up, and wept before the Lord until even.] They seem to have been sensible that this was one cause of their loss, that they had not more solemnly sought the Lord, as they now do; but with greater grief for their loss than for their sin.

And asked counsel of the Lord.] The Targum here uses again the same phrase; Asked counsel by the Word of the Lord, saying, Shall I again go up to battle against the children of Benjamin my brother? They seem to imagine that God did not approve of their going to war among themselves, who were all brethren.

And the Lord said, Go up against him.] Here is a leave to go up, but without any promise of success; which they should have desired.

Ver. 24. And the children of Israel came near against the children of Benjamin the second day.] Near to Gibeah.

Ver. 25. And Benjamin went forth against them out of Gibeah the second day, and destroyed down to the ground of the children of Israel eighteen thousand men; all these drew sword.] They had now destroyed forty thousand, which was a much greater number than the Benjamites had in their whole army.

Ver. 26. Then all the children of Israel, and all the people, went up.] Not only all the warriors, but other people.

And came unto the house of God, and wept, and sat there before the Lord.] Upon the bare ground, as they used to do in very great sorrow.

And fasted that day before the Lord until even.] Afflicted their souls for their sins, which they had not done before; at least, not with such seriousness as now they did.

And offered burnt-offerings.] This had not been done before. That is, they had not made such solemn supplications to God, as now they did by these offerings. (See upon Lev. i. 3.) And in particular, it is evident, that, in ancient time, burnt-offerings were offered as prayers for forgiveness of sins, that so they might obtain God's blessing, (Job i. 5.) And Balaam (who, no doubt, understood the ancient rites of religion) offered these offerings to obtain power from God to help Balak, and destroy the Israelites, (Numb. xxiii. 3. 15, &c.)

And peace-offerings before the Lord.] These were offered to acknowledge benefits received (which ought to accompany our prayers), and some of them also were a kind of prayer to God for the benefits they hoped still to receive. (See upon Lev. vii. 16.)

Ver. 27. And the children of Israel inquired of the Lord.] The same expression is again in the Targum, by the Word of the Lord.

For the ark of the covenant of God was there in those days.] They had inquired of the Lord before, but not as they ought to have done; and therefore no mention is made till now of the presence of God continuing among them. For, confiding in the justice of their cause, and their vast forces, they seem to have made but slight and perfunctory addresses to God before they undertook the war.

Ver. 28. And Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, stood before it in those days.] To stand before it, is as much as to minister unto God before the ark, where he resided. (See upon Deut. x. 8. xviii. 7.) Some think this is here set down to direct us to the time when this war was made, which was not long after the death of Joshua, (as I said before, xix. 1.) otherwise Phinehas must have been now (if this were after the time of the judges) above three hundred years old, which is far beyond the age to which men then lived; for it was above so many years since he did that noble fact mentioned in Numb. xxv. Saidus Batricides, therefore, more justly makes him to have been high-priest only twenty-five years; and the Chron. Alexandr. mentions three other priests between him and Eli, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. i. de Succession. in Pontif. cap. 2.

Saying, Shall I yet again go out to battle against the children of Benjamin my brother, or shall I cease?] This is a plainer query than either of the former (as Pet. Martyr here observes); for at first they only asked what tribe should first go up, presuming the war was fit to be made, (ver. 18.) and the second time only, whether God would have them renew the fight, (ver. 23.) But now they ask, whether they should proceed in the war, or desist from any further attempt? that is, saith he, they leave it wholly to God's pleasure; desiring to do no more, if he did not think good to accompany them with his blessing.

And the Lord said, Go up; for to-morrow I will deliver them into thy hand.] Accordingly he condescended to give them a gracious answer, assuring them of a speedy victory.

Ver. 29. And Israel set liers in wait round about Gibeah.] This seems to intimate, that, in the former onsets, they had relied too much upon their numbers: but now, though they were encouraged by God himself, they grew more humble and less audacious in their enterprise, laying ambushes secretly in several places on several sides of the city.

Ver. 30. And the children of Israel went up against the children of Benjamin on the third day, and put themselves in array against Gibeah, as at other times.] I suppose they appeared in the same place mentioned ver. 22. as if they intended to renew the fight there. And this was, perhaps, the third day after the last battle; one having been spent in going to Shiloh, and another in fasting and prayer there. Or, by the third day may be meant the third day of battle.

Ver. 31. And the children of Benjamin went out against the people, and were drawn away from the city.] The children of Israel pretending to avoid fighting, and to flee from them; as we read in the next verse they had agreed.

And they began to smite of the people, and to kill, as at other times.] In the two former battles.

In the highways, of which one goeth up to the house of God.] That is, to Shiloh.

And the other to Gibeah in the fields.] So called, to distinguish it from this Gibeah; which, as I said, stood upon a hill, as the other did in lower ground.

About thirty men of Israel.] Whom they killed in the rear of their army, as they retreated.

Ver. 32. And the children of Benjamin said, They are smitten down before us, as at the first.] From this flight they presumed they should get a new victory over such cowards.

But the children of Israel said, Let us flee, and draw them from the city into the highways.] But this was only a stratagem of the Israelites, to draw them away from Gibeah into a more advantageous place of setting upon them.

Ver. 33. And all the men of Israel.] All that were posted in a certain place, whither they designed to draw the Benjamites.

Rose up out of their place, and put themselves in array at Baal-Tamar.] The sight of such a body of men appearing unexpectedly ready to encounter them, must needs be a great surprise to the Benjamites, who thought of nothing but pursuing those that run away from them.

And the liers in wait of Israel came forth out of their places.] At the same time, they that were placed in ambush behind them, rose up to assault the city.

Even out of the meadows of Gibeah.] Whether it be translated the meadows, or the plains, or the flat ground, that lay before the city, it is not material; for the sense is the same. (See Lud. de Dieu.)

Ver. 34. And there came against Gibeah ten thousand chosen men out of all Israel.] Some look upon these as a detachment (as they now speak) from the main body at Baal-Tamar, who marched to assault the city on one side, while the liers in wait assaulted it on the other.

And the battle was sore; but they knew not that evil was near them.] The Benjamites fought stoutly; but were not sensible of the danger they were in to be destroyed.

Ver. 35. And the Lord smote Benjamin before Israel: and the children of Israel destroyed of the Benjamites that day twenty and five thousand and a hundred men: all these drew the sword.] This is a general account of the fight, and of the Benjamites' loss; the particulars of both are related in the following verses.

Ver. 36. So the children of Benjamin saw that they were smitten.] There was an apparent overthrow given them by the Israelites: the manner of which is described from the beginning of the action of this day, to the conclusion, in the following part of this chapter.

For the men of Israel gave place to the Benjamites.] Seemed to flee before them; as was before related.

Because they trusted to the liers in wait, which they had set beside Gibeah.] Resolving not to fight till they saw their ambush had executed what was commanded against the city.

Ver. 37. And the liers in wait hasted, and rushed upon Gibeah.] Which they did with all speed, as soon as they saw the Benjamites withdrawn a good way from the city; and fell upon the inhabitants on a sudden.

And the liers in wait drew themselves along, and smote all the city with the edge of the sword.] Having entered the city, they spread themselves into the several parts of it, and killed all they found therein.

Ver. 38. Now there was an appointed sign between the men of Israel and the liers in wait, that they should make a great flame with smoke to rise up out of the city.] They had agreed beforehand, that when the city was taken by the liers in wait, they should set it on fire; whereby the Israelites might know when it was time to face about, and fight with the Benjamites.

Ver. 39. And when the men of Israel retired in the battle, Benjamin began to smite and kill of the men of Israel about thirty persons; for they said, Surely they are smitten down before us, as in the first battle.] Till that sign was given, they retreated as if they were beaten, and lost some men; whereby the Benjamites were deceived into secure hopes of a new victory.

Ver. 40. But when the flame began to arise out of the city with a pillar of smoke, the Benjamites looked behind them, and, behold, the flame of the city ascended up to heaven.] It is likely the Israelites shouted when they turned about to fall upon the Benjamites; which made them look back to see what unexpected supplies they had received.

Ver. 41. And when the men of Israel turned again, the men of Benjamin were amazed.] At this sudden change from flight to fighting.

For they saw that evil was come upon them.] They being beset by the Israelites both behind and before.

Ver. 42. Therefore they turned their backs before the men of Israel.] Whom they had pursued; but now ran away from them.

Unto the way of the wilderness.] For they were beset on all other sides.

But the battle overtook them.] That is, the men of war pursued them so closely that they could not escape.

And them which came out of the cities they destroyed in the midst of them.] Or, they that came out of the cities, viz. of Israel, helped to cut them off.

Ver. 43. Thus they inclosed the Benjamites round about, and chased them, and trode them down with ease.] For they made no resistance, but only sought where they might flee for safety.

Over against Gibeah towards the sun-rising.] There is another translation of the latter part of this verse, in the margin of our Bibles, with which I shall not trouble the reader, because it makes no alteration in the sense, which is to shew where the greatest slaughter of them was made.

Ver. 44. And there fell of Benjamin eighteen thousand men.] In the wilderness, eastward of Gibeah.

All these were men of valour.] Stout soldiers, as appears by the two defeats they had given to the numerous army of the Israelites.

Ver. 45. And they turned, and fled towards the wilderness, unto the rock of Rimmon.] The remainder of the army of Benjamin endeavoured to save themselves, by flying to a strong inaccessible place which was in that wilderness.

And they gleaned of them in the highways five thousand men.] They could not flee thither in a body, but scattered up and down in the highway; where they picked up five thousand more, and slew them.

And pursued hard after them to Gidom, and slew two thousand of them.] And following them very close, as far as to a place called Gidom, they killed two thousand more.

Ver. 46. So all which fell that day of Benjamin were twenty and five thousand men that drew sword.] For they slew in the first conflict eighteen thousand; and in several parties, as they fled towards the rock Rimmon, seven thousand more, which make up this sum. (See ver. 15.)

All these were men of valour.] Who would not surrender themselves, but chose rather to be killed.

Ver. 47. But six hundred men turned, and fled to the wilderness unto the rock Rimmon.] These seem to have turned into some nearer way unto the strong hold than the rest: or, being with the foremost, and more nimble than others (for it was accounted a rare quality in a soldier to be swift of foot), got thither before the Israelites could overtake them.

And abode in the rock Rimmon four months.] From whence they durst not adventure to stir, unless it were to fetch provisions; which they might easily do, the rage of the Israelites being in a little time slaked by so great a destruction, and turned into compassion.

Ver. 48. And the men of Israel turned again upon the children of Benjamin.] Left their pursuit of them in the wilderness, and turned towards the country of Benjamin.

And smote them with the edge of the sword, as well the men of every city as the beast.] Those beforementioned were men that drew the sword; that is, soldiers. But there were a great many husbandmen, and shepherds, and others; whom, in their fury, they also slew.

And all that came to hand.] Even women and children. For they had devoted to destruction all that came not up to Mizpeh, when they were summoned, (xxi. 5.) which none of the Benjamites did; for which reason they slew the men, women, and children, of Jabesh-Gilead, (xxi. 10.)

Also they set on fire all the cities that they came to.] This was as terrible an execution, as if they had been gross idolaters, whom they were commanded thus to punish. (See Deut. xiii. 15, 16.)

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. NOW the men of Israel had sworn in Mizpeh.] When they first assembled there, before they began the war against Benjamin, (xx. 1, &c.)

Saying, There shall not any of us give his daughter unto Benjamin to wife.] They did not think of destroying the whole tribe when they took this oath; but only obliged themselves not to marry with them, no more than with the seven wicked nations of Canaan, because they refused to punish that villanous fact which had been committed among them, and resolved to defend the malefactors. This made the Israelites to abominate them, as people with whom it was not fit to contract an affinity.

Ver. 2. And the people came to the house of God.] Went up to Shiloh.

And abode there till even before God, and lifted up their voices, and wept sore.] Some days after their fury was over, and they coolly considered what they had done in the heat of war, their joy and triumph for their victory was turned into mourning and lamentation for the loss of so many of their brethren; for instead of a feast, they seem to have kept a fast; as they did before the last battle, (xx. 26.)

Ver. 3. And said, O Lord God of Israel, why is this come to pass in Israel, that there should be this day one tribe lacking in Israel?] This is an usual way of expressing great grief, wherewith they bewail the loss of a whole tribe, which they saw no means how to repair, because there were no women left in the tribe of Benjamin, with whom they in the rock of Rimmon might marry; and they had sworn that none of the other tribes should give their daughters to them; so that they must either marry with strange people, which was against the law, or remain unmarried, whereby the tribe would be extinct. They seem also to lament their own excessive wrath; for why should the women be destroyed with the men, who had no share in the management of public affairs; nor could be supposed guilty of refusing to make satisfaction for the injury done to the Levite's concubine?

Ver. 4. And it came to pass on the morrow, that the people rose early, and built there an altar.] There seems to have been no need of this, there being one settled altar at the house of God, according to the law of Moses; and then it was unlawful to build another. But some think it was gone to decay in those bad times; which is very improbable, for they lately offered sacrifices there, (xx. 26.) And the daily sacrifice, no doubt, was continued in Israel, either to the Lord, or the other gods they joined with him. It is more likely, therefore, that they erected a new altar upon this present occasion, when such a multitude of sacrifices were to be offered by all the people of Israel, that the ordinary altar was not sufficient to contain them. Thus Solomon did when he dedicated the temple, 1 Kings viii. 64. And by the direction of God, it was frequently done in other places; and not only at the house of God, as by Samuel, 1 Sam. vii. xi. xiv. and David, 2 Sam. xxiv. and Elijah, 1 Kings xviii.

And offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings.] As they had done before the last battle. For God having made them victorious, they thanked him for it, and prayed him to continue his mercy to them; particularly begging his direction, it is probable, in the present strait wherein they were, about restoring the tribe of Benjamin.

Ver. 5. And the children of Israel said, Who is there among all the tribes of Israel that came not up with the congregation unto the Lord?] When summons went out to call them together, under a great penalty upon those who absented themselves. (See xx. 1.)

For they had made a great oath concerning him that came not up to the Lord to Mizpeh, saying, Surely he shall be put to death.] This great oath was in the nature of a cherem, as the Hebrews call it; whereby it was lawful for the whole congregation to devote those to destruction, who did not obey public orders in time of war, or great distress. (See upon Lev. xxvii. 29.)

This oath, I take it, was made by the great assembly of their rulers (called the whole congregation) before they summoned the people to Mizpeh; as the other oath (mentioned ver. 1.) was made after the people were come thither, upon the Benjamites' refusal to do justice.

Ver. 6. And the children of Israel repented them for Benjamin their brother, and said, There is one tribe cut off from Israel this day.] They still continued to lament their too great severity against Benjamin, and begin to consult how to repair the breach they had made.

Ver. 7. How shall we do for wives for them that remain, seeing we have sworn by the Lord.] The Targum continues its usual style, by the Word of the Lord.

That we will not give them of our daughters to wives?] This was the question debated in their common council, (see ver. 16.) how to bring themselves out of this difficulty, into which they were brought by their oath, which, being rashly made, it might be thought ought not to be kept. But they had such a reverence to a solemn oath, that they resolved to do all that was possible to find a way to keep their oath, and yet not to let the Benjamites be without wives.

Ver. 8. And they said, What one is there of the tribes of Israel that came not up to the Lord to Mizpeh?] Some in the council proposed to make an inquiry into all their tribes, whether they could find any that had not regarded the other oath they had made, (ver. 5.) And it appeared (as the next words tell us) that, Behold, there came none to the camp from Jabesh-Gilead to the assembly.

Ver. 9. For the people were numbered, and, behold, there were none of the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead there.] A rare instance of piety, that none of the whole congregation of Israel (who were now numbered) departed home, till they had been at the house of God, to give thanks for the victory he had given them.

Ver. 10. And the congregation sent thither twelve thousand men of the valiantest, and commanded them, saying.] This was the first result of their consultations.

Go and smite the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead with the edge of the sword.] This was a city on the other side of Jordan, in the tribe of Manasseh; who were ordered to be slain, as public enemies, because they had not obeyed the order of the whole congregation; and, by refusing to join with them against the Benjamites, had made themselves partakers of their crimes.

With the women and the children.] In this, their anger transported them again beyond reason; for these had not offended. And if it be said they were all under the cherem, I do not see how they could justify their sparing all virgins, as we find they did by a public decree; unless we suppose, that God (before whom they now were) dispensed in this case, because of the public necessity.

Ver. 11. And this is the thing that ye shall do, Ye shall utterly destroy every male, and every woman that hath lain by man.] The Hebrew doctors here raise a difficult question, as they account it, how they could know those who had lain with man, from those that had not: D. Kimchi fancies, that all the women were ordered to pass before the ark, and they who were stopped there, and could go no further, were taken for virgins. Others, that they passed before the crown of the high-priest, and they who had known a man, turned yellow or pale. But these are idle conceits, and I will mention no more of them, which are still more extravagant; when the plain account is, That they slew such as were not commonly reputed to be virgins, and saved those that were. (See Wagenseil, in his Confutation of Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 400.)

Ver. 12. And they found among the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead four hundred young virgins, that had not known man by lying with any male; and they brought them unto the camp to Shiloh.] Which shews, that the making them pass before the ark is a foolish conceit; for they were looked upon as virgins before they came to Shiloh, where the ark was.

Which is in the land of Canaan.] Which the city of Jabesh-Gilead was not; but in the land taken from the two kings of the Amorites, Sihon and Og.

Ver. 13. And the whole congregation sent some to speak to the children of Benjamin that were in the rock Rimmon, and to call peaceably to them.] To give them the public faith, that they might safely return, and be received kindly by the Israelites.

Ver. 14. And Benjamin came again at that time.] All the six hundred men, who had saved themselves in that fortress.

And they gave them wives, which they had saved alive of the women of Jabesh-Gilead.] Which they thought they might lawfully do, notwithstanding their oath, because it obliged those only who were present in the assembly where it was made, not the absent, as they of Jabesh-Gilead were.

And yet so they sufficed them not.] For still two hundred wanted wives.

Ver. 15. And the people repented themselves for Benjamin.] This gave occasion to a new lamentation, whereby they testified to the Benjamites how sorry they were for what had been done.

Because that the Lord had made a breach in the tribes of Israel.] For the punishment of their crime was approved by God, though they executed it with too much severity.

Ver. 16. Then the elders of the congregation said, How shall we do for wives for them that remain, seeing the women are destroyed out of Benjamin?] This made them enter into a new deliberation in the council of the elders, how to get wives for the two hundred men remaining, since there were none in the tribe of Benjamin, and no more to be found among themselves, without breaking their oath.

Ver. 17. And they said, There must be an inheritance for them that are escaped of Benjamin, that a tribe be not destroyed out of Israel.] These words, there must be, are not in the Hebrew, where the words run thus, The inheritance of them that are escaped, is for Benjamin, &c. That is, the children of Benjamin must have that part of the country which was given them by the Divine lot for their inheritance, and we must not give it to any other persons; for then a tribe would be lost in Israel. This was all that some in the council said, who proposed no means whereby this tribe should be restored, but only asserted it must be done, leaving others to consider how.

Ver. 18. Howbeit we may not give them wives of our daughters: for the children of Israel have sworn, saying, Cursed be he that giveth a wife to Benjamin.] These persons, who spake next in the council, only increased the difficulty, by putting them in mind not to think to help their brethren by breaking their oath.

Ver. 19. Then they said.] Then some rose up in the council, after a long debate, and gave the following advice.

Behold, there is a feast of the Lord in Shiloh yearly.] All the three great festivals were to be observed in the place where God settled his habitation, which was now at Shiloh, where all the people assembled to praise God, and to feast one with another. And though some think the feast of the Passover to be here meant, yet it is more commonly, and with more reason, concluded, to be the feast of tabernacles, which was a time of exceeding great joy, because they had newly gathered their vintage; and then they dwelt in booths, behind which the Benjamites might conveniently lurk, and watch their opportunity to carry away the virgins. This feast of tabernacles, also, was the only season wherein the Jewish virgins were allowed to dance.

In a place which is on the north side of Beth-el.] This is not a description of Shiloh, whose situation was better known than any other (being the place where all Israel went to worship), but of the place where they met to dance, which was not in the city, but in the fields, where they had more liberty, and a freer air.

On the east side of the highway that goeth up from Beth-el to Shechem, and on the south of Lebonah.] This place is thus particularly described, that the Benjamites might know exactly where they might most advantageously lie concealed, to obtain their purpose.

Ver. 20. Therefore they commanded the children of Benjamin.] They had some authority who made this order; and Josephus calls them the γερουσία, the senate of the elders, whom Bertram makes bold to call the Seventy, as if the great Sanhedrin (as the Jews call them) was now settled: but I have shewn elsewhere that is not probable, though it be certain, from ver. 16. that there were some chief persons in every tribe, whom the people obeyed when there was no judge in Israel, who all seem to have been assembled on this occasion.

Saying, Go and lie in wait in the vineyards.] Which were nigh to the place beforementioned, and, it is likely, encompassed the place where they danced.

Ver. 21. And see, and, behold, if the daughters of Shiloh come out to dance in dances.] As they supposed they would, because it was the custom to express their joy in this manner: and though the women were not bound to come up to these solemn feasts, but only the men, yet some devout women did voluntarily frequent them, as we learn from the story of Hannah. And they that lived at Shiloh, and the places adjacent, no doubt, observed such times, as the men did, being near to the house of God; though it must be confessed, that parents were not wont to bring young virgins unto these feasts.

Then come ye out of the vineyards.] When they saw them so engaged.

And catch ye every man his wife of the daughters of Shiloh.] By the daughters of Shiloh, perhaps, are not meant only such as lived in that city, but thereabouts, who all met on this occasion.

And go ye to the land of Benjamin.] Carry them away to your own country; which they might the more easily do, because men and women did not, in those days, dance together, but women by themselves. Thus they thought they kept their oath, because they did not give them wives, but only suffered them to take them, and to keep them when they had them. The great Grotius endeavours to acquit them of violating their oath by this rule, That the signification of an oath is not to be extended, "ultra receptum loquendi morem," beyond the received manner of speaking; therefore they were not perjured, who, when they had sworn not to give wives to the Benjamites, permitted those who were stolen to live with those that carried them away. "Aliud enim est dare; aliud amissum non repetere:" For it is one thing to give, another not to demand that which is taken away to be restored. (See lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 13. sect. 5.) But this seems to me to be far from justifying them in this matter; for they did not merely permit them to take these virgins, but advise and direct, nay, order and command (as the word is in the foregoing verse), to take and carry them away. And, therefore, what Josephus saith to salve this business is not true, that it was done, οὔτε προτρεπομένων οὔτε κωλυόντων, the Israelites neither exhorting to it, nor prohibiting it.

Ver. 22. And it shall be, when their fathers or their brethren.] Any of their nearest kindred.

Come unto us to complain.] Desiring them to do them right; which shews they were men of authority.

That we will say unto them, Be favourable unto them for our sake.] Do not prosecute them for what they have done, because it was by our advice, who did not know otherwise how to provide them with wives.

Because we reserved not to each man his wife in the war.] If there be any fault it is ours, whose rage carried the slaughter too far, and left no women to preserve their tribe. They advise them therefore to let their anger cease now (as Josephus speaks), because they had let it break out ἀμέτρως, beyond all bounds already.

For ye did not give unto them at this time, that ye should be guilty.] They put them in mind, that if there was any guilt, it was not in them that had kept their oath, and did not give wives to the Benjamites, nor could help their taking them. How Josephus came here to add to this speech, that they said they would tell them, they should have taken care to set a better guard upon their daughters, I cannot imagine; for, at such time of mirth, they always thought themselves secure from danger.

Ver. 23. And the children of Benjamin did so, and took them wives, according to their number, of them that danced, whom they caught.] That is, they carried away two hundred, for so many they wanted. With this is commonly compared, by interpreters, the rape of the Sabine virgins by Romulus: but there was a great deal of difference; for those were strangers, over whom Romulus had no power, and therefore was the cause of a war; but these were Israelites, subject to the authority of the elders, and was done to make peace and quiet. Though the truth is, the elders, in advising this, did wrong to those parents, whose children were taken away without their consent; but this they thought better than directly breaking their oath, or letting the title perish; for the preservation of which they were constrained to do some hard things: but in one thing they did very well, that they permitted them to take wives only according to their number; that is, every man a wife, and no more. So that though polygamy was tolerated, yet they did not advise or countenance it; no, not for the more speedy restitution of a tribe. It might happen, some of these young virgins were heiresses, and so their estates would be translated into another tribe: but the Jews say, that law against marrying into another tribe, and inheriting land in another tribe, did not belong to future ages, but only to that wherein the division of the land was made. (See our great Selden, de Success. ad Leges Hebr. cap. 18. where he alleges this very example of it, fol. 59.)

And they went and returned unto their inheritance.] In the land of Benjamin.

And repaired their cities, and dwelt in them.] And tilled the land, as Josephus adds; so that in time this tribe was restored, εἰς προτέραν εὐδαιμονίαν, to its former flourishing condition.

Ver. 24. And the children of Israel departed thence at that time, every man to his tribe, and to his family; and they went out from thence, every man to his inheritance.] To look after his own private affairs, the public concerns being now at an end.

Ver. 25. In those days there was no king in Israel.] There were elders, (ver. 16.) who had some authority, and there was a high-priest; (xx. 28.) yet for want of a king (as our great primate Usher observes, in his book of the Power of the Prince) all things went to wreck, and were in great confusion: and by a king, as Corn. Bertram observes, (de Rep. Jud. cap. 9.) is meant a supreme governor, such as Moses and Joshua were, and after them the judges: so this word is used Deut. xxxiii. 5. The meaning of these words therefore is, That in those days there was none who had so much power over all the Israelites as to keep them in order, and not only admonish them of their duty, but make all their tribes observe it, by punishing all public wrongs, and all whoredoms, and idolatries: and, consequently, there was no great Sanhedrin, as the Jews speak of in future times, which they would fain find in all ages foregoing.

Every man did that which was right in his own eyes.] For want of such a supreme authority, every tribe, and every city; nay, which is more, every private man (as Bertram there glosses) committed many horrid things, which were not publicly punished. This was the cause of Micah's idolatry, as was noted before, (xvii. 6.) and of the Benjamites' filthiness, (xix. 1.) and now of these enormous things done by all the Israelites, in killing all the Benjamites without distinction, when the law required the children should not suffer for their parents' offence; in binding themselves by such a rash oath, to give them none of their daughters to be their wives; in killing all the women of Jabesh-Gilead, who were not virgins; and now in permitting, nay, ordering this rape, rather than break a rash oath; which should teach men to be thankful for that authority which is over them, to preserve them from such-like enormities: for which end (as the same primate there observes) the custom was, among the ancient Persians, to let the people loose to do what they list, for five days after their king died, that, by the disorders which were then committed, they might see the necessity of having a king to govern them, and when they had one, to be more obedient to him.

BOOK OF RUTH.

THIS book is a kind of appendix to the book of Judges, and a manuduction to the book of Samuel; and therefore fitly placed between them. It hath its title from the person whose story is here principally related; which, indeed, is wonderful. For she left her own country, kindred, and relations, which the Jews say (though I confess without any good proof of it) were not only honourable, but royal, out of her great affection to her mother-in-law, and her religion; to live with her in the land of Israel, in a poor and mean condition. It is very probable, the same person who wrote the book of Judges was the author of this also, viz. Samuel; who, by adding this to the end of that book, brought down the history unto his own times; and gave us withal, the genealogy of David, from Pharez the son of Judah, that it might evidently appear Christ sprang out of that tribe, according to Jacob's prophecy, Gen. xlix. 10. but by a gentile woman (that all nations might hope in his mercy), full of faith, and of earnest desire to enter into that family; which made her despise the pride of her own nation, and choose to live despicably among the people of God.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass, in the days when the judges ruled.] These words direct us to the time when the things contained in this book fell out, though we cannot certainly tell what judge then ruled. David Ganz will have it to have been in the days of Ibzan, mentioned Judges xii. 8. because he was the only judge born at Beth-lehem; from whence he concludes him to have been the same with Boaz. But that is so weak a reason, that Guil. Vorstius, in his annotations upon him, thinks rather it was in the days of Deborah and Barak. I shall not mention his arguments, there being a great man of our own (the most learned Usher) who places this history in the times preceding; either in the days of Ehud, when the Moabites oppressed Israel, or rather of Shamgar, who succeeded him. Which is the opinion likewise of Du Pin, who takes these things to have been done about twenty-eight years after the death of Joshua. (See Usserii Chronol. Sacra, par. i. cap. 12.)

That there was a famine in the land.] This inclines me to think these things came to pass in the days of Gideon, for that is the only time that we read of a famine in the days of the judges; when the Midianites, Amalekites, and the children of the east, "came and destroyed the increase of the earth, and left no sustenance for Israel, nor for their cattle." (Judg. vi. 3, 4.)

And a certain man of Beth-lehem-Judah.] There were two Beth-lehems, as I have often noted: one in the land of Judah, the other in the tribe of Zebulun; (Josh. xix.

15.) They had their name from the great fruitfulness of the place where they were situated; which argues this famine to have been very sore, that even in these places there was a scarcity of provision.

Went to sojourn in the land of Moab, he, and his wife, and his two sons.] He carried his whole family with him into the neighbouring country of Moab, which was near to the land of Judah, at the end of the salt sea; and it seems had now plenty in it, when the land of Israel was famished.

Ver. 2. And the name of the man was Elimelech.] Who, if we may believe many of the Jewish doctors, was a noble and potent person in his country.

And the name of his wife Naomi.] They make her also of a noble extraction, she being (as the Talmudists say in Baba Bathen) the niece of Naasson, prince of the tribe of Judah, and daughter of his brother Salmon.

And the name of his two sons Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Beth-lehem-Judah.] The name of Ephrathites is given them, because they were not only born, but, I suppose, bred up, and lived in the same place with their father; which, from its great fruitfulness, was called Ephrata, as well as Beth-lehem.

And they came into the country of Moab, and continued there.] Settled their habitation in that country, which had not been lawful, unless it had been in a public calamity, or some great private necessity, as Maimonides observes. (See Guil. Schickard, in his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 3. Theor. 10.)

Ver. 3. And Elimelech, Naomi's husband, died; and she was left, and her two sons.] She a widow, and they fatherless. This, Josephus thinks, was after he had been there ten years; but the most, if not all others, think he died a little after he came into this country.

Ver. 4. And they took them wives of the women of Moab.] Which was not lawful, unless they had first become proselytes to the Jewish religion; as Aben Ezra concludes they were, from those very words from whence others prove the contrary, ver. 15. where it is said, Orpah returned unto her people, and unto her gods. This is a testimony, saith he, that she had been converted to Judaism. But the Chaldee paraphrast is quite of another opinion, and saith they transgressed the commandment of the Lord, by taking to them strange wives. And so the Midrasch upon Ruth, as Buxtorf observes in his book De Sponsalibus et Divortiis, sect. 31.

The name of the one was Orpah, and the name of the other Ruth.] Who do not seem to have been of such great quality, as the Talmudists fancy, but of the common rank; otherwise they would not have been bestowed upon strangers.

And they dwelt there about ten years.] After their marriage.

Ver. 5. And Mahlon and Chilion died also both of them.] For their days were cut short, saith the Chaldee paraphrast, because they married strange women; and for the same reason (if it be true) they may be thought to have died without issue, for there is not the least intimation that either of them had any.

And the woman was left of her two sons and her husband.] In a very melancholy condition, being in a country of strangers.

Ver. 6. Then she arose with her daughters-in-law, that she might return from the country of Moab.] She packed up her goods, and made herself ready to leave the country of Moab, and her daughters accompanied her, it being the custom to conduct those whom they loved, some part of their way when they went a long journey.

For she had heard in the country of Moab how that the Lord had visited his people, in giving them bread.] They were such near neighbours, that they soon had intelligence in Moab what was done in the land of Israel.

Ver. 7. Wherefore she went forth out of the place where she was.] The necessity which forced her thither no longer remaining.

And her two daughters-in-law with her.] Who loved her as their own mother.

And they went on the way to return unto the land of Judah.] This relates unto Naomi, for her daughters had never been there.

Ver. 8. And Naomi said unto her two daughters-in-law.] When they were come to the borders of the country of Moab, she said the following words.

Go, return each to her mother's house.] She desires them to accompany her no further, but go back to their own home. And it seems it was usual in Moab, as well as in Israel, for widows to dwell with their parents. And the women here also had apartments distinct from the men, where the daughters lived with their mothers, as the sons with their father.

The Lord deal kindly with you, as you have dealt with the dead, and with me.] She dismissed them with her blessing, praying God would be as good to them, as they had been good wives to their husbands, and good daughters to her.

Ver. 9. And the Lord grant that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband.] And that they might be happily settled in houses of their own, with good husbands; whom she wishes they might long enjoy in peace and quietness.

Then she kissed them.] As was usual, when friends took their leave one of another, or when they met together.

And they lifted up their voice, and wept.] Were all extremely grieved to think of parting.

Ver. 10. And they said unto her, Surely we will return with thee unto thy people.] They resolved to accompany her to Beth-lehem.

Ver. 11. And Naomi said, Turn again, my daughters; why will you go with me? Are there yet any more sons in my womb, that they may be your husbands?] This shews, that the custom of men's marrying their brother's widow, when he left no issue (which was before the law of Moses, Gen. xxxviii.) was so ancient, that it was derived into other countries, who were not descended from Abraham.

Ver. 12. Turn again, my daughters, and go your way; for I am too old to have a husband. If I should say, I have hope, if I should have a husband also to-night, and should also bear sons,

Ver. 13. Would you tarry for them till they were grown? Would you stay from having husbands?] She persists in the same argument, and presses it home, that she was too old to marry, and they too young not to marry again: but should she marry immediately, and be sure she should have children, nay, sons, it would be unreasonable for them to wait till they were fit to be their husbands.

Nay, my daughters; for it grieveth me very much for your sakes, that the hand of the Lord is gone out against me.] She would have them by no means think of any such thing; and likewise represents to them, what a mean condition God had reduced her unto, which was the more heavy, because she was able to do nothing for them.

Ver. 14. And they lifted up their voices, and wept again.] It gave them great trouble, whether they thought of going with her, or of parting from her.

And Orpah kissed her mother-in-law.] Took her leave of her. The Jews observe three sorts of kisses, which were usual and commendable among them, all others being wanton: one in token of reverence to any person's dignity, (1 Sam. x. 1.) A second at the meeting of friends, (Exod. iv. 27.) A third at their parting, of which they give this as an example. Unto which R. Tanchuma adds a fourth, saluting of near relations, (Gen. xxix. 11.) which is, in a manner, the same with the second. Drusius thinks there was another, which he calls the kiss of prayer, which was in use in the primitive church, and taken, he thinks, from the Jews: but Buxtorf saith, he can find no such thing in all their books. (See Lex. Talmud. in the word Nesikah, fol. 1408.)

But Ruth clave to her.] Would not part from her, but steadfastly resolved to go with her to her own country.

Ver. 15. And she said, Behold, thy sister-in-law is gone back to her people, and to her gods.] The principal of which was Chemosh, as we read Numb. xxi. 29. 1 Kings xi. 7. By this it appears, Orpah was not made a proselyte to the Jewish religion, but still continued to worship the gods of her country. Yet this did not make such a difference in the family (as diverse religions commonly do now), but that she loved her husband entirely, and had a great affection to his mother, even after his death.

Return thou after thy sister-in-law.] This may seem strange, that she should, in effect, press her to go and worship idols; but her intention was to try her, and to persuade her to do nothing rashly, especially not to change her religion, without due consideration, and weighing well her reasons for it: for if she had been led merely by her affection to her, to embrace also her religion, she might have revolted from it when she died, or when she saw her condition very desolate.

Ver. 16. And Ruth said, Entreat me not to return from following thee: for whither thou goest I will go, and where thou lodgest I will lodge.] Be content, that is, with any condition in her company.

Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God.] This is a resolution to embrace the Jewish religion entirely, so as to be incorporated with the Israelites, as if she had been a native among them.

Ver. 17. Where thou diest I will die, and there will I be buried; the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me.] She resolves that nothing but death shall make a separation between them, and not that neither, wholly, for she would lie by her in the same sepulchre: and this she confirms with an oath, or solemn imprecation upon herself, that worse might befal her than any thing Naomi could suffer, if she did not faithfully adhere to her: which form of speech we find afterward in many places, (1 Sam. iii. 17. xiv. 44. xx. 13. 2 Sam. iii. 9. 35, &c.)

Ver. 18. And when she saw that she was steadfastly minded to go with her, she left speaking to her.] She said not a word more to her of her leaving her, when she saw she had a settled and well-grounded resolution to become a proselyte to the true religion. So the Chaldee paraphrast explains it, representing Naomi as declaring to her at large, that there was a great number of precepts (no less than six hundred and thirteen) to be observed by those who would be of her religion. In particular, the rest of the sabbath, to which they were obliged, and to worship one God alone, &c. Unto all which she answered, Whatsoever thy people observe, I will do the same, as if I had been one of them from the beginning.

Ver. 19. So they two went until they came to Beth-lehem.] Which shews they were but in a mean condition, having no servant to wait on them, nor an ass to carry them.

And it came to pass, when they were come to Beth-lehem, that all the city was moved about them; and they said, Is this Naomi?] It being reported by them who knew Naomi that she was returned, all the people ran out of their houses to see her, and beholding a great change in her garb and countenance, they could scarce believe it was she. But the Arabic and Syriac versions take it quite otherwise, that all the city rejoiced, and said, This is Naomi. And the LXX. whom they follow, to the same purpose, ἤχησε ἡ πόλις, the city rang with the news, and they asked if this were Naomi; for several had never seen her before, or did not remember her, but had only heard much of her.

Ver. 20. And she said unto them, Call me not Naomi, call me Mara.] She told them her old name was not suitable to her present condition, which required she should rather be called by a contrary; from whence some gather, that Naomi was not the name given her at first by her parents, but a popular name commonly given her by her neighbours, because of her comely presence and courteous behaviour.

For the Almighty hath dealt bitterly with me.] This is the reason of the new name of Mara, whereby she would be called, which signifies bitter. Josephus saith that Naomi, in their language, signifies εὐτυχίαν, prosperity, and Mara ὀδύνην, grief and pain.

Ver. 21. I went out full, and the Lord hath brought me home again empty.] The Targum takes this to relate unto her husband and children, with whom she went out to the country of Moab, which now were taken away from her; but it is reasonable to extend it to the estate they carried along with them for their support in a strange country, where they lived to spend it all.

Why then call ye me Naomi, seeing the Lord hath testified against me, and the Almighty hath afflicted me?] God is said to testify against any persons when he passes sentence upon them, and judges them, by sending afflictions upon them; at which Naomi doth not murmur, but only humbly acknowledges God had inflicted grievous punishments upon her, which she thought testified his displeasure.

Ver. 22. So Naomi returned, and Ruth her daughter-in-law with her, which returned out of the country of Moab.] As much as to say, This is a brief account of Naomi's return to her own country, together with her daughter-in-law, who would accompany her.

And they came to Beth-lehem in the beginning of barley-harvest.] The time of their return is also noted, which was about the Passover; for after the offering of the sheaf, mentioned Lev. xxiii. 10, 11. on the second day of unleavened bread, they began to cut barley: whence the Chaldee paraphrast thus explains these words, They came to Beth-lehem in the entrance of the Passover; and on that day the children of Israel began to mow the sheaf that was to be waved, which was of barley.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND Naomi had a kinsman of her husband's, a mighty man of wealth.] So gibhor chail is well translated; for riches make men mighty and powerful. Though the Chaldee would have it signify a man mighty in the law, by which they do not mean a man of great wisdom and goodness, but, as that paraphrast explains it upon 1 Chron. iv. 22, 23. after the manner of the Jews (whose heads are full of their Academies and Sanhedrins), he was the rab or chief ruler of the academy of wise men at Beth-lehem.

Of the family of Elimelech; and his name was Boaz.] Whose ancestors are mentioned in the conclusion of this book, and his descendants also, who lived at Beth-lehem as he did.

Ver. 2. And Ruth the Moabitess said unto Naomi, Let me go into the field, and glean ears of corn.] This is a great argument of her modesty and dutiful affection to her mother-in-law, that she would not go any whither, no, not to earn something for their support, without her leave.

After him in whose sight I shall find grace.] Either she did not know that poor strangers had a right to glean, as well as the poor of Israel, (Lev. xix. 9, 10.) or out of her great piety she would not challenge it as a right, but as a favour, which she would thankfully acknowledge.

And she said, Go my daughter.] This is a sign of Naomi's low condition, otherwise she would not have suffered her to go and seek for a supply of their needs among the poorest sort of people.

Ver. 3. And she went, and came.] Into a field, where she saw some reapers.

And gleaned in the field after the reapers.] Gathered up the scattered ears of corn, which fell from them, and were left behind them.

And her hap was to light on a part of a field belonging to Boaz, who was of the kindred of Elimelech.] By the direction of God's good providence (not by any man's guidance) she came into a piece of ground which belonged to the great man beforementioned.

Ver. 4. And, behold, Boaz came from Beth-lehem.] It is remarkable, that he followed her into the same field.

And said unto the reapers, The Lord be with you. And they answered him, The Lord bless thee.] Such was the piety of ancient times, that they were wont to pray God to prosper the honest labours of those that they saw employed, who made a return of the like prayers for them, which the gentiles themselves practised, especially in harvest-time, which they would not begin, by putting the sickle into the corn, till Ceres had been invoked, as Virgil informs us in his Georgics, lib. i. ver. 347, 348.

This is the first time that we meet with this religious salutation, The Lord be with you; which we afterward find was familiar, and was continued even to our Saviour's days, when the angel saluted the blessed Virgin after this manner, (Luke i. 28.)

Ver. 5. Then said Boaz unto his servant that was set over the reapers.] To see them do their work, and that they had provision fit for them; and, it is likely, to pay them their wages. Josephus calls him ἀγρονόμος, and the Chaldee calls him rab, the master, ruler, or governor of the reapers.

Whose damsel is this?] Either she did not appear, when all the city came to see Naomi; or Boaz did not take so much notice of her, as to know her again.

Ver. 6. And the servant that was set over the reapers answered and said, It is the Moabitish damsel that came back with Naomi out of the country of Moab.] He did not know her name, perhaps, but he describes her as a stranger, that, out of love to her mother-in-law, and her religion, had left her own country, and come to dwell among the Israelites. So the Chaldee paraphrast makes him answer, She is become a proselyte.

Ver. 7. And she said, I pray you, let me glean and gather after the reapers among the sheaves.] What she might have demanded by the law as her right, she asks a courtesy, which, no doubt, moved the man to be the more obliging to such a modest and well-bred woman.

So she came.] That is, he admitted her; for, perhaps, they were not bound to let the poor come immediately into the fields, as soon as the reapers had cut down the corn, and bound it up in sheaves, but when it was carried off. They might choose also, among the poor, whom they thought most worthy, or most necessitous.

And hath continued even from the morning until now.] That is, all the day; for I suppose it was in the afternoon, when the heat of the day was over, that Boaz came to visit his reapers. So the servant describes her as a very diligent woman, who had not intermitted her labour, but only for a little time, to eat, or to rest herself.

That she tarried a little in the house.] The meaning is, she went and stayed awhile in the tent which was pitched in the field, for such as were weary to refresh themselves; or for other necessary occasions. So Aben Ezra expounds the word house; in which some think Boaz found her resting herself, and wondering to see a stranger there, inquired who she was.

Ver. 8. Then said Boaz unto Ruth, Hearest thou not, my daughter?] A form of speech calling for attention to what is said.

Go not to glean in another field, neither go from hence.] He would not have her go to glean in any other field, nor to stir from thence to supply any of her wants, as appears by what follows.

But abide here fast by my maidens.] Who reaped as well as men (as the next verse shews), and their company was the fittest for her on all accounts. Some think this was a labour too hard for women, and therefore they will have it, that his maidens only came to bring provisions for the men, as Virgil describes Thestylis to have done, in his second Eclogue, ver. 10.

Ver. 9. Let thine eyes be on the field that they do reap, and go thou after them.] Observe their motions, and follow them.

Have I not charged the young men that they touch thee not?] Give thee no molestation, as the Vulgar understands it. And so the word touch sometimes signifies, to do harm to others, (Psal. cv. 15.) But the Chaldee paraphrast extends it further, that they should not come near her, but keep at a distance from her, and consequently offer no incivility or rudeness to her, which was too common among rustics, especially when they were full of mirth, in harvest and vintage-time.

And when thou art athirst, go unto the vessels, and drink of that which the young men have drawn.] There was excellent water at Beth-lehem, (2 Sam. xxiii. 15.) which either the reapers, or some that attended them, had brought in vessels into the field, to quench their thirst when they were dry.

Ver. 10. Then she fell on her face, and bowed herself to the ground.] A posture of the greatest reverence and submission, either in civil or religious worship, and was used when they would express their most grateful sense of any favour done them. (See Gen. xxiii. 7. 12. xxvii. 29, &c.)

And said, Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou shouldest take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger?] To take knowledge of any person, is to shew kindness, in the Scripture language, and is the effect of finding grace, that is, favour with any one; which was the greater in Boaz, because he had never seen her before, or was not acquainted with her.

Ver. 11. And Boaz answered and said unto her, It hath been fully shewn me all that thou hast done unto thy mother-in-law since the death of her husband.] Naomi had related to some friends, who had informed Boaz at large of her great affection to her mother.

And how thou hast left thy father and thy mother, and the land of thy nativity, and art come unto a people whom thou knewest not heretofore.] To be a proselyte to their religion (as the Chaldee paraphrast explains it), upon which account the greatest kindness was due to her.

Ver. 12. The Lord recompense thy work, and a full reward be given thee.] He looked upon it as a very high act of faith and virtue in her, to leave all that was dear to her in this world to become a member of their church; which he prays God amply to requite. The Chaldee paraphrast makes her say here, "That she was come from a strange people, who were made unworthy to be admitted into the congregation of the Lord:" but he answers to her, "Our wise men say, That the men of Moab only, not the women, are excluded from our society," &c. (See what I have noted upon Deut. xxiii. 5.)

Of the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust.] To seek for protection, and commit thyself unto his care and good providence; which was a pious confidence so pleasing to God, that the Chaldee paraphrast makes Boaz say, "In this thy righteousness thou shalt be delivered from the judgment of hell, and thy portion shall be with Sarah, Rebekah, Leah, and Rachel;" that is, she should have an eternal recompence. This phrase, of trusting under the wings of the Divine Majesty, is often used by the Psalmist, Psal. xvii. 8. xxxvi. 7. lvii. 1. lxi. 4. lxii. 7. xci. 4. All which places speak of the shadow, or the covert of his wings, which seem to be a metaphor taken from the cherubims, who spread their wings from one side of the holy place unto the other, upon which the Divine Majesty sat; which protection and safeguard was represented in the cloud which covered the Israelites in the wilderness, (Numb. xiv. 14.)

Ver. 13. Then she said, Let me find favour in thy sight, my lord; for that thou hast comforted me, and for that thou hast spoken friendly unto thy handmaid.] She humbly begs the continuance of his good opinion of her (though she acknowledges herself, in the next words, to be very unworthy of it), for it had given the greatest consolation to her in her desolate condition.

Though I be not like to one of thy handmaidens.] So obscure she means, being a stranger, and of a country under an ill character among them, that she was not equal to one of his meanest servant maids.

Ver. 14. And Boaz said unto her, At meal-time come thou hither.] He enlarges his favour to her, and orders her at the time of repast to come and eat among his servants. I cannot devise how the ancient Jews came to apply these words to the kingdom of the Messiah, and to his suffering condition here in this world; but so it is, that the Midrasch, upon this place, makes these words, Come thou hither, to signify as much, as come to thy kingdom; and the morsel dipped in vinegar, to denote the reproaches and torments of the Messiah: which is an argument that they expected such a king, as should be exposed to such sufferings as our blessed Saviour endured, who saith, in the Psalmist, "They gave me vinegar to drink," (lxix. 21.) which, perhaps, was the original of this application of Boaz's words to the Messiah, whose coming they longed for, and found it foretold in more places than we are aware of.

And eat of the bread, and dip thy morsel in the vinegar.] Under the name of bread is comprehended all the provision which was made for the reapers, with which they had vinegar for sauce, it being very cooling and refreshing in hot seasons, as the time of harvest was. So Pliny observes, lib. xxiii. cap. 1. "Aceto summa vis est in refrigerando;" which cooling quality is taken notice of by Rasi, and others, upon this place.

And she sat beside the reapers.] With the women, that is, who reaped.

And he reached her parched corn.] This seems to signify, that Boaz himself ate with them, or stood by them, to see they were well provided; and took a particular care of her, unto whom he reached some parched corn, which was an usual, and no mean food in those countries, as appears from 2 Sam. xvii. 28. But it may be understood of the servant set over the reapers, (ver. 5.) or some of them, who, observing her modesty, that she did not carve for herself, reached to her some of the provision made for them.

And she did eat, and was sufficed, and left.] There was such plenty (Boaz being a great and a good man), that more was set before them than they could eat; at least, she left some of that which was carved to her. This meal, I suppose, was after the heat of the day was over, in the afternoon; for then they dined, but their best meal was a supper.

Ver. 15. And when she was risen up to glean, Boaz commanded his young men, Let her glean even among the sheaves, and reproach her not.] For that looked something like filching, to come among the sheaves. But Josephus takes the sense to be, that she should be permitted, if she pleased, to cut down corn herself for her own use, which is not likely.

Ver. 16. And let fall also some of the handfuls on purpose for her, and leave them that she may glean them, and rebuke her not.] As if she was too bold, in gathering what belonged not to her.

Ver. 17. So she gleaned in the field until even, and beat out that she had gleaned.] It seems they did not in those days carry home their gleanings as they gathered them in the ears, but beat the corn out with a rod; and freeing it from the chaff, carried it away pure, with less trouble than otherwise it would have given them.

And it was about an ephah of barley.] An ephah is commonly taken to be about a bushel of our measure. See my notes on Exod. xvi. 36. where it appears, that an ephah contained ten omers, and that an omer was sufficient for one person's food for a whole day; therefore Ruth now had gathered as much as would keep her and her mother five days.

Ver. 18. And she took it up, and went into the city; and her mother-in-law saw what she had gleaned.] That is, wondered at the quantity.

And she brought forth, and gave to her that she had reserved, after she was sufficed.] Josephus thinks this is spoken of Naomi, that set before her daughter-in-law some remainders of the victuals that her neighbours had brought her in Ruth's absence; but it rather signifies Ruth's care of her mother-in-law, whom she had in mind, when she was feasted with the reapers with more than she could eat, (ver. 14.) and therefore brought what she left home for her refreshment.

Ver. 19. And her mother-in-law said unto her, Where hast thou gleaned to-day? and where wroughtest thou? blessed be he that did take knowledge of thee.] For she concluded, that without the special favour of some person to her, it had not been possible for her to have made such a day's work.

And she shewed her mother-in-law with whom she had wrought, and said, The man's name with whom I wrought to-day is Boaz.] Whose near relation to them Ruth did not yet know.

Ver. 20. And Naomi said unto her daughter-in-law, Blessed be he of the Lord.] Or rather, Let him be most blessed; for lamed prefixed to Jehovah increases the sense, as in Gen. x. 9. (See there.)

Who hath not left off his kindness to the living, and to the dead.] Continued to be kind to the relicts of Elimelech and his son, as he had been to them when they were alive.

And Naomi said, The man is near of kin to us, one of our next kinsmen.] In the Hebrew, one of our goels, to whom of right it belonged to redeem the land, and raise up the name of his dead brother, by marrying his widow, according to the command, Lev. xxv. 25 Deut. xxv. 5. (See upon the fourth chapter of this book, ver. 5.)

Ver. 21. And Ruth the Moabitess said, He said unto me also, Thou shalt keep fast by my young men.] Though the word nearim be of the masculine gender, yet it signifies all young people, and particularly the maidens, to whom he bid her keep close, (ver. 8.) And so both the LXX. and the Chaldee here expound it; and so Naomi, it appears by the next verse, understood it.

Until they have ended all my harvest.] Not only the barley-harvest, in which they were now employed, but the wheat-harvest, which followed it. (See ver. 23.)

Ver. 22. And Naomi said unto Ruth her daughter-in-law, It is good, my daughter, that thou go out with his maidens, that they meet thee not in any other field.] She advises her to accept his kindness, and not to be found gleaning in any other field, where she might not be so welcome; and beside, it would look like a distrust of his kindness, if not a despisal of it, should she not do as she was invited.

Ver. 23. So she kept fast by the maidens of Boaz to glean, unto the end of barley-harvest, and of wheat-harvest.] Which continued many days; and in all that time she found, no doubt, the same kind entertainment, which is not here repeated.

And dwelt with her mother-in-law.] Constantly came home to her at night, after she had done her labour. Or the meaning is, when harvest was ended, she did not gad abroad, but kept her mother company at home; for so the Hebrew, she sat with her mother-in-law.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. THEN Naomi her mother-in-law said unto her, My daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee.] A settlement in a house of her own, with a good husband.

That it may be well with thee?] That she might live more comfortably than she could do with her. The Chaldee understands it, as if she confirmed it with an oath, that she would give herself no rest till she had married Ruth.

Ver. 2. And now is not Boaz of our kindred, with whose maidens thou wast?] She puts her in mind of what she had told her before, (ii. 20.)

Behold, he winnoweth barley to-night in the thrashing-floor.] The corn being gathered, thrashed or trodden out, it was next of all winnowed, to separate it from the chaff; and this was commonly done in the evening, when the heat of the day was over, and cool breezes began to rise. (See Gen. iii. 8.)

Ver. 3. Wash thyself therefore, and anoint thee.] Frequent bathings were necessary in those countries, where they continue to this day for cleanliness; and anointing for smoothing their skin, and making them appear more amiable.

And put thy raiment upon thee.] Her best clothes, as the Vulgar expresses it; or her ornaments, as the Chaldee.

And get thee down to the floor.] To some place near it, where she might see, and observe what was done.

But make not thyself known unto the man.] She would have her conceal herself, so that Boaz might not see her; nor, as some understand it, any man else.

Until he shall have done eating and drinking.] Upon such occasions they made feasts for the labourers in the harvest.

Ver. 4. And it shall be, when he lieth down, thou shalt mark the place where he shall lie.] To sleep, after the feast was done, and the guests were gone.

And thou shalt go in.] To the thrashing-floor, where he lay down, as we read ver. 7.

And uncover his feet, and lay thee down.] She was not to lie by his side, for that had been immodest; but at his feet, in the posture of an humble supplicant.

And he will tell thee what thou shalt do.] Either he presently understood her meaning, when she told him who she was, or explained it unto him; and Naomi did not doubt he would comply with her desires, and put her into a legal way of accomplishing them.

Ver. 5. And she said unto her, All that thou sayest unto me I will do.] She put a great confidence in her mother's prudence and piety, and trusted God would give good success to her design; which seemed not very modest, but had no other intentions than what was agreeable to the law of God, and accordingly prospered.

Ver. 6. And she went down unto the floor, and did according to all that her mother-in-law bade her.] Concealed herself, but observed when he came into the thrashing-floor, and where he lay down to sleep.

Ver. 7. And when Boaz had eaten and drunk, and his heart was merry.] This is a sign he had made a great feast, that he and his reapers, and perhaps other neighbours, might rejoice together; and (as the Targum understands it) praise God for his goodness in giving them plenty, after the famine that had been in the land. For so the words there are, His heart rejoiced, and he blessed God, who had heard his prayer, and removed the famine from the land of Israel.

He went to lie down at the end of the heap of corn.] Such was the plain way of living in those ancient times, that the most wealthy persons looked after their own business, both in the field and at home; which made Boaz not go to his house, but lie perhaps upon the straw in the floor where his corn had been winnowed, to secure it from thieves, till it could be laid up in his barns. These thrashing-floors were covered at top to keep off rain, but lay open on all sides, that the wind might come in freely for the winnowing of the corn; which being done, I suppose they were shut up at night with doors fitted to them, that, if any body lay th (r he might be kept warm; and the corn, as I said, be secured from the danger of robbers.

And she came softly, and uncovered his feet, and laid her down.] Before the doors were shut up, she came in so softly, that none perceived her, and when he was asleep, lay down at his feet, not naked, as it is supposed she was, but in her clothes, which we do not find she put off; for she had no intention of lying with him, but only of giving him an opportunity to consider what the law required of him. This, indeed, looks like a dangerous practice, which her mother-in-law put her upon, exposing both her and him to great temptations, and therefore many have condemned it as a very perilous adventure; but the known piety both of Boaz and Ruth, who were not now in their youthful years (at least Boaz was of a great age), made Naomi confident no sin would be committed by them.

Ver. 8. And it came to pass at midnight, that the man was afraid.] It is a sign he went to bed sober, though merry, in that he waked so soon, and was not drowsy, but apprehensive of something extraordinary; for going to sleep alone, he perceived another in bed with him. Or, all this is to be ascribed to a Divine motion, which secretly suggested such thoughts to Naomi, and awaked Boaz at a time when men used to sleep most soundly.

And turned himself.] Being much troubled, he turned himself about to feel who or what it was. The Hebrew word jilaphet, which we translate turned himself, is variously interpreted, and hath an unusual signification put upon it by the Targum, and the Gemara Sanhedrin, (cap. 2. n. 4.) where the modesty and chastity of Boaz is highly extolled, and compared with that of Joseph.

And, behold, a woman lay at his feet.] He perceived by her clothes, and (when she spake) by her voice, that it was a woman.

Ver. 9. And he said, Who art thou?] He had no thoughts of abusing her, as the Targum observes, but only inquires who she was, and what her business was there.

And she answered, I am Ruth thy handmaid.] She humbly acknowledges her meanness, and then acquaints him with her business.

Spread therefore thy skirt over thine handmaid.] In the Hebrew, Spread thy wing; which is a phrase importing taking a person into one's protection and tuition; and here not a common one, but such as was matrimonial. Therefore the Chaldee plainly renders it, Let thy name be called upon thy handmaid, by taking me for thy wife. See of this phrase upon Deut. xx. 30. From hence, at this day, when two persons are married among the Jews, the man throws the skirt of his talith over his spouse, and covers her head with it, as Buxtorf observes in his Synagoga Judaica, cap. 39.

For thou art a near kinsman.] This is the reason of her address to him; which may be rendered, as we translate it in the margin, one that hath right to redeem; for so the word goel signifies. (See the foregoing chapter, ver. 20.)

Ver. 10. And he said, Blessed be thou of the Lord, my daughter.] He was so far from being incensed at her boldness, that he wishes her all happiness.

For thou hast shewed more kindness in the latter end than at the beginning.] He doth not condemn her as immodest, but commends her true kindness both to her mother and to her husband, which appeared now more than before, by her endeavours to preserve his name and family.

Inasmuch as thou followedst not young men.] This is a high commendation, that she did not seek a husband to satisfy her lust, but to preserve the memory of him who was dead.

Whether poor or rich.] That is, of any sort.

Ver. 11. And now, my daughter, fear not.] He would not have her think he had an ill opinion of her because she took this course, or be in doubt whether her motion was acceptable to him; or that, being a stranger and poor, he would despise her.

I will do unto thee all that thou requirest.] That is, take her to be his wife.

For all the city of my people doth know that thou art a virtuous woman.] She had behaved herself so, as to gain a general report of extraordinary virtue, as the Hebrew word chajil imports; which signifies one that doth things strenuously. The words we translate, all the city of my people, in the Hebrew are, all the gate of my people: by which we rightly understand, all that entered in at the gate; that is, the whole city. But the gate being the place where justice was wont to be administered, the Chaldee paraphrast interprets it, It is manifest unto all that sit at the gate of the great Sanhedrin of my people, that thou art a just woman, &c. This shews that Boaz was truly a very excellent person, who thought great virtue to be a great portion.

Ver. 12. And now, it is true that I am thy near kinsman: howbeit there is a kinsman nearer than I.] This, I suppose, was well enough known to Naomi; but she understood his disposition so well, that she thought it would be in vain to make any application unto him.

Ver. 13. Tarry this night, and it shall be in the morning, that if he will perform unto thee the part of a kinsman, well; let him do the kinsman's part.] He resolved to make no longer delay than was absolutely necessary; but promises in the morning she should have right done to herself, and to her deceased husband, either by the next kinsman, or by himself. Some of the Jews take the word Tob, which signifies good, and we rightly translate well, to have been the name of the other kinsman, who was called Tob: and indeed, it is likely, this was a name among that people, from whence, by the addition of iah to it (which was very common) came Tobiah. Rasi saith he was the brother of Elimelech; but there is no reason to believe this: for, when it had been proper to mention his name in the next chapter, ver. 1. we only read that Boaz called him Peloni almoni (Ho, such a one), which were words used when they called any one indifferently.

But if he will not do the part of a kinsman to thee, then will I do the part of a kinsman to thee, as the Lord liveth.] He confirms his promise to her with an oath, that, if the other person refused, he would marry her.

Lie down until the morning.] Having given her this security, and thereby quieted her mind, he bids her take a little bodily rest; which was very needful, having been, no doubt, full of restless and anxious thoughts, what would become of her all the former part of the night.

Ver. 14. And she lay at his feet until the morning.] In the same place where she lay down at first; having no other design, but only humbly to implore his justice and kindness unto her deceased husband.

And she rose up before one could know another.] That is, before it was light; so that if any body had seen her, they could not have known who she was.

And he said, Let it not be known that a woman came into the floor.] Some think he spake this to his servants: but they were not yet stirring; and if they were, they could not discover whether she was man or woman. It was spoken therefore to her, whom he would have to be careful both of her own fame and of his; for, as Josephus here notes, Great caution is to be used to prevent such rumours, especially when there is some ground for them, καὶ μάλιστ' ἐπὶ γεγονόσι.

Ver. 15. Also he said, Bring the veil that thou hast upon thee, and hold it.] The Hebrew word mitpacath is variously interpreted, it signifying any kind of covering. The LXX. translate it περίζωμα, by which they seem to have meant that which we call an apron, or a kirtle, which is bound about one. The Vulgar, pallium; but it is by us most properly rendered a veil; which modest women were wont to throw over their heads, to cover their faces.

And when she held it, he measured six measures of barley, and laid it on her.] He would not let her go away without some token of his love to her; and nothing was more ready at hand in the thrashing-floor than the corn that lay there. It is not certain how much this measure contained, but, no doubt, in the whole, he gave her as much as she could well carry; and was so kind also, as himself to lay it upon her shoulder. Some fancy that this load was too heavy for her, but barley is far lighter than wheat: and the Chaldee paraphrast here saith, "Strength was given her from before the Lord to bear it." And then adds, "Immediately there was a prophecy, that from her should proceed six righteous persons;" each of which should be blessed with six benedictions; "David, Daniel, his three companions, and the king Messiah."

And she went into the city.] The Chaldee saith, Boaz went into the city; and the Hebrew favours this interpretation. For the word for went is in the masculine gender, as in the next words it is in the feminine.

Ver. 16. And when she came to her mother-in-law, she said, Who art thou, my daughter?] It was so early in the morning when she returned home, that Naomi could not well discern who it was that desired the gate might be opened; but perceived it was a woman, whom she calls her daughter, as they used to do in civility, it appears, by Boaz's language, ver. 10. But the Vulgar takes it quite otherwise, that she asked her, What hast thou done, my daughter? That is, how hast thou succeeded? And, indeed, the answer favours this; and the Hebrew words will bear it, if mi be interpreted not who, but what.

And she told her all that the man had done to her.] How kindly he had treated her; and what promises he had made her.

Ver. 17. And she said, These six measures of barley gave he me.] Then she shewed her the present he made her.

For he said to me, Go not empty unto thy mother-in-law.] Without some token of my affection. Some imagine barley (which is not so valuable with us as wheat) was too mean a thing to bestow upon her. But they do not consider, that in those countries it was a better sort of corn than it is in these parts of the world; for bread was commonly made of it, and that not only by the poor, but the better sort: of which we find examples, both in the Old Testament and the New. See 2 Sam. xvii. 28. 2 Kings iv. 42. And in the gospel we read of barley-loaves, wherewith Christ fed the multitude; particularly John vi. 9. And, indeed, Pliny saith this was the most ancient food. (Antiquissimum in cibis Hordeum, lib. xviii. Nat. Hist. cap. 7.)

Ver. 18. Then said she, Sit still, my daughter.] She bids her trouble herself no farther, for she had done enough.

Until thou know how the matter will fall.] But wait and expect, till she saw the issue: which the Targum expresses piously, in this manner, Till thou knowest how this matter will be determined from heaven, and wonderfully disposed.

For the man will not be in rest till he have finished the thing this day.] She knew him so well to be a man of his word, that he would immediately go about the business, according to his promise, (ver. 14.)

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. THEN went Boaz up to the gate.] Where there was a great concourse of people; and where the judges sat. So the Chaldee paraphrast, He went to the gate of the house of judgment, where the Sanhedrin sat. (See my note upon Deut. xvi. 18.)

And sat him down there.] Among the elders, as the forenamed paraphrast will have it: but that is not likely, for he called the other kinsman to come and sit down by him.

And, behold, the kinsman of whom Boaz spake came by.] See iii. 12.

Unto whom he said, Ho, such a one! turn aside, sit down here.] When they could not think of a man's name, or did not think fit to name it, they used these words, Peloni almoni; which Daniel contracts into one word, Palmoni, (viii. 13.) and is the same with the Greek ὁ δεῖνα.

And he turned aside, and sat down.] Supposing Boaz had some business with him, he did not go on his way, but turned aside to speak with him. This was about noon (as Josephus saith), when greater multitudes were wont to be assembled in such public places, than at other times of the day.

Ver. 2. And he took ten men.] He would have a sufficient number of witnesses of what he did; which, as Maimonides observes, was very necessary in the espousal of a person to one's wife. For, saith he, if it had been enough to do it privately, many would have taken a harlot into their houses for a time, and pretended she was their wife; therefore it was ordained, that, after any man had espoused a woman, he should marry her publicly, after the example of Boaz, of whom we read, he took ten men, &c. (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49.)

Of the elders of the city.] How many elders there were in every city, is not certain; insomuch that Bertram conjectures, there were as many as there were captains of thousands, of hundreds, of fifties, and tens, in every city. Josephus, indeed, saith, there were seven, (lib. iv. Antiq. cap. 6.) which perhaps was the determinate number in his time. But anciently, one would think, there were more, because here Boaz mentions ten elders (who were the same with judges) in the city of Beth-lehem, which made Bertram (de Republ. Judaica, cap. 9.) the more confident, that, as the captains of thousands, &c. in every city, were the elders of that city, so there were as many in every city, of the one as of the other. As for what the Talmudists say, that there were three judges in pecuniary causes, and three-and-twenty in capital, it must belong, if it be true, to later times.

And said, Sit you down here. And they sat down.] To hear the cause he intended to bring before them.

Ver. 3. And he said unto the kinsman, Naomi, that is come out of the country of Moab, selleth a parcel of land, which was our brother Elimelech's.] He calls him their brother, because he was near of kin to them. And he mentions Naomi's return out of the country of Moab, to intimate, that her poverty constrained her to sell her estate, which her husband left her. That interest she might part withal, to supply her necessities, but it could not take away the right of redemption; for, as Mr. Selden observes in his book de Successionibus, cap. 16. both Elimelech the father, and Mahlon the son (unto both which Boaz was of kin), gave this patrimony to their wives before they died (for otherwise they could not have had the possession of it): or rather, the former gave his interest to Naomi, and the latter his to Ruth; which, how it was done, Maimonides shews in his treatise de Donationibus, cap. 6.

Ver. 4. And I thought to advertise thee of it, saying, Buy it before the inhabitants, and before the elders of my people.] Before those that sat in the gate of the house of judgment, and before these elders, as the Targum expounds it; that is, the ten elders beforementioned, that the bargain might be firmly made, and the estate legally passed over to him.

If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it; but if thou wilt not redeem it, then tell me, that I may know.] That is, understand thy mind in this matter.

For there is none to redeem it besides thee, and I am after thee.] That is, no other kinsman remaining of that family but they two.

And he said, I will redeem it.] For it is likely it lay convenient for him.

Ver. 5. Then said Boaz, What day thou buyest the field of the hand of Naomi, thou must buy it also of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead.] For they both had an interest in it; but Boaz prudently conceals the name of Ruth, till he had consented to buy the land, and then tells him whom he must take along with it.

To raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance.] According to the law mentioned Deut. xxv. 5, &c. as it is commonly interpreted. But it was rather (in Mr. Selden's opinion) the fulfilling of the law, mentioned Lev. xxv. 24, 25. lib. de Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 15. where he observes, that this phrase, to raise up the name of the dead, (which is mentioned also, ver. 10.) is quite different from that mentioned in Deuteronomy; being no more, as R. Solomon notes, (upon iii. 9.) than if he had said, that the name of her dead husband may be had in remembrance, so that when she came into that field, men might say, This is the wife of Mahlon. There is a long discourse also in Abarbinel, upon Deut. xxv. to prove, that this doth not belong to that law, of a man's raising up seed to his brother. (See Buxtorf, de Sponsal. et Divortiis, sect. 27.) But if it do, Grotius thinks that law only obliged ὁμοπάτριοι, brethren by the same father to marry the brother's widow; but custom, in process of time, obliged the next of kin to do it. (See upon Matt. xxii. 24.)

Ver. 6. And the kinsman said, I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar my own inheritance.] He had a wife and children already, which made him afraid to marry a poor woman with a small parcel of land, which would not provide for the children he might have by her, without diminishing his own inheritance of which he was possessed. To which the Chaldee paraphrast adds, that it might have made great contentions in his family: for thus he makes him speak, I cannot redeem it (viz. on that condition), for I have a wife already; and it is not fit for me to bring another into my house, for fear brawling and quarrelling arise in it, and lest I hurt my own inheritance. In like manner the Midrasch, upon this book, makes him discourse. But Rasi interprets the words, as if the meaning was, that he should bring a blot upon his posterity, by marrying a Moabitish woman (which he thought was forbidden by the law), for children are called a heritage, Psal. cxxvii. 3. But in this he acknowledges the man was mistaken, as many of their ancient doctors were, for the law did not forbid the marrying a woman of that country. But the plainest sense is (as Mr. Selden observes), that many inconveniences might arise in his family by this marriage, not only by the disagreement of his wives, but by the difficulty of providing for so many children as she might bring him, and of giving them good education, and by distracting his inheritance, and such-like things; which he prudently considered as good reasons of his refusal. (See lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 9.)

Redeem thou my right to thyself; for I cannot redeem it.] Which is thus paraphrased by the Targum, Do thou therefore redeem it, because thou hast no wife, which hinders me from redeeming.

Ver. 7. Now this was the manner in former times in Israel, concerning redeeming, and concerning changing.] There was no law, that we can find, about the following rite, but only custom, which had long prevailed; when men redeemed lands that had been alienated, or gave possession of them to another person.

For to confirm all things.] To make the bargain valid.

A man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbour; and this was a testimony in Israel.] A sufficient evidence, that he transferred all his right unto that person to whom he delivered his shoe. It is not easy to give an account of the original of this custom; but the reason of it is plain enough, it being a natural signification that he resigned his interest in the land, by giving him his shoe, wherewith he used to walk in it, to the end that he might enter into it, and take possession of it himself.

The Targum, instead of his shoe, hath the right-hand glove; it being the custom, perhaps, in his time, to give that in room of the shoe. For it is less troublesome to pull off a glove than a shoe, and deliver it to another, though it hath the same signification; as now the Jews deliver a handkerchief to the same purpose. So R. Solomon Jarchi affirms, We acquire, or buy, now by a handkerchief, or veil, instead of a shoe.

Ver. 8. Therefore the kinsman said unto Boaz, Buy it for thee.] After the accustomed manner.

So he drew off his shoe.] And gave it Boaz, in token that he parted with all his right to him. The Jewish doctors, indeed, differ very much about this matter; for some say, he that parted with his right to redeem the land pulled off his shoe, and gave it to him that bought it; but others, that he who bought it, gave his shoe to him that sold it. The truth is, the text may be either way understood, but it seems to me most reasonable to think, that he who parted with his right parted with his shoe also. See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Disciplin. Hebr. cap. 5. where he observes again, how different this was from the rites used, when one renounced his brother's wife. And Abarbinel looks upon this as a demonstration, that the plucking off the shoe here mentioned, is not the same with that in Deut. xxv. For Ruth doth not here appear to loose his shoe, (as the brother's wife is there ordered to do, ver. 9.) much less did she come to spit in his face; of which there is not one word in this ceremony; which he shews wholly belongs to the sale of lands, or to their redemption, and bringing them back again into the family to which they belonged. This appears from the following words, where mention is made of nothing but of a purchase of Elimelech's estate.

Ver. 9. And Boaz said unto the elders, and to all the people, Ye are witnesses this day, that I have bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi.] She had the first right in the land after the death of her husband, and her two sons after her; which she entirely parted withal by this contract unto Boaz, to whom the other kinsman had passed over his right of redemption, by the political ceremony of plucking off the shoe.

Ver. 10. Moreover, Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, have I purchased to be my wife.] He had her by the right of the same purchase, and did not succeed into the right of a brother, mentioned in Deut. xxv.; for he was not brother to Elimelech, but only a remote kinsman of the same family, as Abarbinel there observes, who could not enjoy the land, while she lived, unless he would take her with it; to whom it belonged as long as she lived, and was to go to her issue when she died.

To raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance.] That the parcel of land which he bought, might still be called by the name of Mahlon, whose wife Boaz married.

That the name of the dead be not cut off from his brethren, and from the gate of his place.] That his name hereby might be remembered, not only in his own family, but in all the city of Beth-lehem; for by the gate of his place, is meant all the people that entered in at the gate.

Ye are witnesses this day.] Both that he bought the land, and Ruth together with it, at such a time.

Ver. 11. And all the people that were in the gate, and the elders, said, We are witnesses.] After this open declaration, there was no need of any instrument in writing to confirm the purchase.

The Lord make the woman that is come into thy house like Rachel and like Leah.] Such a solemn benediction of those who were going to be married was very ancient, as we learn from Gen. xxiv. 60. and the Jews continue it to this day, which, they say, was always in the presence of ten grave persons, at the least, (as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 12.) conformable to this example of Boaz, (ver. 2.) and the eldest of them pronounced the benediction, which was a ratification of what was agreed: so our Mr. Thorndike excellently observes, that the benediction, which we Christians use in marriage, is a sign of the allowance of the church presupposed, as this benediction of Boaz and Ruth presupposeth the act to be allowed by the elders, or consistory, who sat in the gate of Bethlehem. See Rites of the Church in a Christian State, p. 241. In the Review of which he observes, that this seems to be confirmed by the opinion of Epiphanius, who saith, Our Lord was invited to the marriage of Cana in Galilee, that, as a prophet, he might bless the marriage; which, it is certain, the church hath always practised, to signify, that the marriage was approved to be made according to the laws of God. And therefore Conradus Pellicanus (an eminent man at the beginning of the Reformation) here well notes, that prayers and benedictions are never to be omitted in marriage.

Like Rachel and Leah.] That is, very fruitful.

Which two did build up the house of Israel.] Were blessed with a numerous posterity. They do not mention the two handmaids, because these were Jacob's principal wives (and Rachel chosen first, as she is here placed), whose servants bare children, not for themselves, but their mistresses. (See Gen. xxx. 3.)

And do thou worthily in Ephratah, and be famous in Bethlehem.] These two are but different names of the same place, where Boaz and Ruth also lived, who seems now to have been present, as Josephus represents her, and who they prayed might be a great example of all virtue in that city.

Ver. 12. And let thy house be like the house of Pharez (whom Tamar bare unto Judah), of the seed which the Lord shall give thee of this young woman.] Both Boaz, and all the Beth-lehemites, derived their original from Pharez, whose family was very illustrious in Israel; and therefore they could not have wished Boaz a greater blessing, than to have as noble an issue as he was to Judah.

Ver. 13. So Boaz took Ruth.] Carried her home to his own house, with all the solemnity, it is likely, which was usual in such cases.

And she was his wife.] And all other rites, which were observed in those days, being performed, they were completely made man and wife.

And when he went in unto her, the Lord gave her conception, and she bare a son.] A year after their marriage, as Josephus saith

Ver. 14. And the women said unto Naomi.] After Ruth's delivery.

Blessed be the Lord, who hath not left thee this day without a kinsman.] The Hebrew name of goel (which we translate kinsman) properly belonged to Boaz, and not to his son, who was now born: and yet the child seems to be here meant, which made the Arabic translator render it, hath not left thee without an heir, who being to succeed his father, what he had done might be ascribed to his son.

That his name may be famous in Israel.] They hoped God would make him an eminent person among them.

Ver. 15. And he shall be unto thee a restorer of thy life.] Such a comfort, as to make her, in some sort, young again.

And a nourisher of thine old age.] And in old age take care of her, and support her.

For thy daughter-in-law, which loveth thee, which is better to thee than seven sons, hath borne him.] For they hoped he would inherit his mother's virtues, and particularly her affection to Naomi, which was so surpassing, that it made her a greater blessing to her, than a great many sons of her own body would have been; for they would scarce have been able, out of so small a fortune, to maintain themselves; whereas this being the son of a rich father, could afford her also a plentiful maintenance.

Ver. 16. And Naomi took the child, and laid it in her own bosom, and became nurse unto it.] Brought it up with a most tender affection, for his mother gave him suck: and then Naomi took him from her, and educated him as her own child.

Ver. 17. And the women her neighbours gave it a name.] It did not belong to the neighbours, but to the father or mother, to name the child; but they advised Naomi to call it by a name suitable to their foregoing discourse. (See Luke i. 39, &c.)

Saying, There is a son born unto Naomi.] Unto whom they had promised such great comfort from this child, that it moved them to desire it might have the following name.

And they called his name Obed.] That is, one who should be very serviceable unto her; for Obed signifies δουλεύων, a servant, as Josephus interprets it. By which name, saith he, Naomi called the child κατὰ συμβουλίαν γυναικῶν, by the advice and counsel of the women, ἐπὶ γηροκομίᾳ αὐτῆς τραφησάμενον, as one appointed to take care of her in old age. The Targum thus paraphrases upon this name, Who served the Lord of the world with a perfect heart; a piece of which service consisted in giving due honour unto parents. Some make it a question, why this child was not called Mahlon, according to the law which seems to require it? But this hath been answered already, that what Boaz did, was not in obedience to the law in Deut. xxv. for he was not the brother of Mahlon (in which case the child must have borne Mahlon's name), but only a remote kinsman.

He is the father of Jesse, the father of David.] For whose sake this whole book seems to have been written, that it might be certainly known from whom he was descended, the Messiah being to spring from him; which is the reason why the following genealogy is annexed for the conclusion of this book.

Ver. 18. Now these are the generations of Pharez.] He begins no higher, because every one knew that Pharez was the grandson of Jacob, and he the son of Isaac, &c.

Pharez begat Hezron.] In the land of Canaan, before they went down into Egypt, as we read Gen. xlvi. 12.

Ver. 19. And Hezron begat Ram.] So he is called in 1 Chron. ii. 6. but in the New Testament, Aram, (Matt. i. 3. Luke iii. 33.)

And Ram begat Amminadab.] These two were born in the land of Egypt, where Amminadab also begat Nahshon.

Ver. 20. And Amminadab begat Nahshon.] Who was prince of the children of Judah, when they came out of Egypt, as the author of the book of Chronicles observes, (1 Chron. ii. 10.) which is confirmed by Moses, in his words, Numb. i. 7. vii. 12. x. 14. where we find, that, in the second year after their coming out of Egypt, he was the principal person in his tribe.

And Nahshon begat Salmon.] Who was born in the wilderness, in all probability, and was called also Salma, (1 Chron. ii. 11.)

Ver. 21. And Salmon begat Boaz.] Of Rahab, whom he took to be his wife after the taking of Jericho, (Matt. i. 5.)

And Boaz begat Obed.] Here the Targum makes Boaz the same with Ibzan, Judg. xii. 8. (which is altogether improbable), in whose days he saith the famine, spoken of in this book, happened; from which they were delivered by the prayers of Boaz.

Ver. 22. And Obed begat Jesse.] Who was also called Nahash, as some think, and is expressly affirmed by the Targum, because Zeruiah and Abigail are said to be David's sisters, 1 Chron. ii. 16. and Abigail is said to be the daughter of Nahash, 2 Sam. xvii. 25. But David's mother, perhaps, had a former husband, whose name was Nahash, by whom she had these daughters.

And Jesse begat David.] Unto whose time there being but four generations; and Salmon, the first of the four, married Rahab, after their entrance into Canaan; from thence, to the fourth year of king Solomon, there being four hundred and forty years, (as appears from 1 Kings vi. 2.) it must necessarily follow, that, unless we suppose some other coming between (for which we have no good warrant), these four persons, Salmon, Boaz, Obed, and Jesse, begat a child in their old age. And, indeed, Boaz supposes himself to be no young man, when he spake those words to Ruth, iii. 10. And Jesse was counted an old man, when David his son was a youth, (1 Sam. xvii. 12.) and therefore, that account which primate Usher hath given of this matter, in his Chronologia Sacra, par. i. cap. 12. seems very reasonable, that taking out of that number of four hundred and forty, the seventy years that David lived, and the four first years of Solomon's reign; then, from their coming into the land of Canaan, to the nativity of David, there remain three hundred sixty and six, as Aben Ezra observes in the conclusion of this book. Now these years may be thus commodiously distributed, if we suppose Rahab to have borne Boaz in the forty-second year after they entered Canaan; and if we assign a hundred and two years before he begat Obed; and a hundred and eleven to Obed, before he begat Jesse; and as many to Jesse before he begat David; which make the just sum of three hundred sixty and six. And this is nothing strange; for long after this time, we read of very old men who might be capable to beget children at the age now mentioned; particularly Jehoiada the high-priest, who lived a hundred and thirty years, (2 Chron. xxiv. 15.) And in our days, Thomas Parr lived a hundred and fifty-two years, and begat a child when he was a hundred and five years old, as the same primate there observes, and produces a great many other examples of persons who lived to a great age, very vigorous. And, if we could believe the Jewish doctors, they tell us in Juthasm, that Ruth lived to the time of Solomon, and sat with Bath-sheba, when he caused a seat to be set for her at his right hand, (1 Kings ii. 19.) I shall only add, that Bonfrerius hath largely confirmed this opinion of these persons begetting the children here mentioned in their old age, and confuted those who explain this otherways, by supposing three Boazes, and other devices, in his commentary upon the first verse of this book. Only he (and Serrarius, also, who before him was of the same mind) has made a different distribution of the three hundred sixty-six years beforementioned, by supposing other years of their age, wherein these four persons begat their sons; which is not at all material.

I shall end all with the Targum's paraphrase on the last words of this book; which are, Jesse begat David king of Israel. Which some Latin copies following, from thence Cardinal Cajetan concludes, this book was written not only after the birth of David, but after he was made king of Israel; that is, after he was anointed by Samuel to be king of Israel.

FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL.

THE two books which bear the name of SAMUEL, are thought by the Talmudists, in Bava Bathra, to have been composed, in part, by himself (that is, the first twenty-four chapters of the first book), and the rest by Gad and Nathan the prophets. And so Procopius Gazæus saith, that this book is called by the Syrians the Prophecy of Samuel. This opinion the Talmudists found upon the 1 Chron. xxix. 29. where it is said, "Now the acts of David, first and last, behold, they are written in the book of Samuel the seer, and in the book of Nathan the prophet, and in the book of Gad the seer." By which words it is evident, that Samuel did write a book, and that it contained some of the acts of David, which, it is very probable, are these that we read in this book. Besides which there were two other books, written by two other prophets, who continued his history to the end of his life. It must be confessed, indeed, that three distinct books are mentioned in that place of the Chronicles; and we cannot be sure that we have in those two books all that was contained in those three; but only an extract of the substance of them, which perhaps might be made by some following prophet, and divided into two books, which were called by the name of Samuel, because he was the most eminent person of the three, and his acts are here recorded in the first place. Certain it is, this work was extant before the book of the Kings was written; for mention is there made, of what we read in this history, 1 Kings ii. 27. And in the book of the Chronicles several things are repeated, which we find here, in the very same words. It is highly probable, also, that Samuel having undertaken to write the history of the Judges (to which as an appendix he added the book of Ruth), would not leave it imperfect; but added in this book what concerned Eli and himself; who were the last judges of that nation.

See the preface to the book of Judges.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. NOW there was a certain man of Ramathaim-zophim.] Either he was born at this place, or lived there (perhaps both), which is called Ramah, ver. 19. of this chapter; and here Ramathaim (in the dual number, as the grammarians speak), because it was built upon two hills, which made it appear like a double city. The title of Zophim seems to be added to it, because it being a high place, there was a watch-tower in it: where, upon occasion, men were set to observe who approached from all parts round about. Or, as St. Jerome, and others think, because here was a school of the prophets, who were wont to seat themselves in such places as were remote from company, and fit for contemplation; which made Elijah and Elisha frequent Mount Carmel. And thus the Chaldee paraphrase translates these words, There was a man of Ramathaim, a disciple of the prophets. Who in the book of Ezekiel are called watchmen: and from hence some think came the Greek word Σοφός: which was the title of astronomers at the first, who from high places contemplated the stars.

Of Mount Ephraim.] This is added to distinguish this from other places, which had the name of Ramah, in other tribes; particularly in that of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 25.

And his name was Elkanah, the son of Jeroham, the son of Elihu, the son of Tohu.] It appears by this genealogy, that Samuel was a Levite, of the family of the Kohathites; as we read 1 Chron. vi. 33, 34, &c. See Mr. Selden, in his book de Succession. in Pontif. lib. i. cap. 18. where he confutes those who fancy Samuel was a priest, yea, the high-priest, as Petavius himself imagined.

The son of Zuph, an Ephrathite.] Ephrata is the same with Beth-lehem, which was in the tribe of Judah. Therefore Zuph is not called an Ephrathite, because he was descended from the Beth-lehemites (for he was a Levite), but because he dwelt in that place; as the Levites were dispersed through all the tribes. So Mr. Selden there speaks (from the Hebrew doctors, and the Targum), "Domicilii ratione, non sanguinis;" he is called an Ephrathite, on the account of his habitation, not of his blood.

Ver. 2. And he had two wives; the name of the one was Hannah, and the name of the other Peninnah, &c.] Hannah seems to have been his first wife, who proving barren, his earnest desire of children moved him to take another, as Abraham had by Sarah's consent; which was not in those times disallowed by God; who saith himself, that he had given to David many wives, (2 Sam. xii. 8.) which shews it was not then a sin in them to have more than one. (See Grotius, in his book de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 5. sect. 9, 10.)

Ver. 3. And the man went up out of his city.] For though Ramah stood high, yet Shiloh stood higher: and he first went down the hill from Ramah, before he could go up to the other.

Yearly to worship, and to sacrifice to the Lord of hosts in Shiloh.] Where the tabernacle now was, and where all sacrifices were to be offered, and no where else. Hither all the people were bound to resort, at the three great festivals, (Deut. xvi. 16.) and not to appear before the Lord empty. Accordingly Elkanah not only worshipped God, with prayers and thanksgivings, but offered such sacrifices as were suitable to the festival: and it is likely presented other gifts, according to his ability, as is there required, ver. 17.

And the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, the priests of the Lord, were there.] Ready to offer such sacrifices as were brought to the altar. Whose service Elkanah did not refuse to use, because they were notoriously profane; but reverenced their office, as still priests of the Lord, from whose impure hands he vouchsafed to accept the offerings of pious people.

Ver. 4. And when the time was that Elkanah offered.] His peace-offerings, which were wont to accompany others at the great festivals. For instance, at the Passover, they offered not only the paschal lamb, but several other sacrifices, as I noted upon Deut. xvi. 7; all the seven days of unleavened bread having peculiar sacrifices belonging to them. (See Numb. xxviii.) And so there were on the seven days of the feast of tabernacles, (Numb. xxix.) Now, on some of these days, Elkanah offered such sacrifices as might make a feast for his family and friends, according to the law, Deut. xii. 12.

He gave to Peninnah his wife, and to all his sons and daughters.] The males only were bound to appear before God at these festivals; but devout persons were wont to bring their wives also with them, and their daughters as well as sons; especially when they dwelt so near the house of God as Elkanah did, whose habitation at Ramah was not above seven miles from Shiloh. It doth not appear that there was any peculiar court at the tabernacle (as there was afterward at the temple) for the women to worship in by themselves; but they came in with their husbands, and performed their duty close to them.

Portions.] Of that part of the peace-offerings which belonged to him that offered them. Which was the whole, except the fat which belonged to the Lord, and the breast and right shoulder which belonged to the priest. (Lev. vii. 34.) With the rest the sacrificer made a feast for himself, his family, and friends; giving to every one a portion of the sacrifice; whereby they had communion with the Lord, by partaking with him of his sacrifice, which had been offered to him at his altar.

Ver. 5. But to Hannah he gave a worthy portion.] Or a double portion; in token of his extraordinary respect and kindness to her.

For he loved Hannah: but the Lord had shut up her womb.] Or, though the Lord, &c. Her barrenness did not make him love her less, but rather more; because he would support and comfort her under that affliction.

Ver. 6. And her adversary also provoked her sore, to make her fret, because the Lord had shut up her womb.] It added to her affliction, that Peninnah set herself against her; and was wont to twit her with her barrenness, saying, when her husband sent her a more liberal portion of the holy things than she received, Though he be so kind to you, yet you bring him no children, as I do; which gave her great vexation.

Ver. 7. And as he did so year by year, when she went up to the house of the Lord, so she provoked her.] She constantly took this occasion to upbraid her with her barrenness, when her husband expressed such extraordinary kindness to her.

Therefore she wept, and did not eat.] Her grief was so great, that it made her turn the festival into a fast. So Tertullian understands it, who (in his book de Jejuniis, cap. 7.) saith, God rewarded her fasting and prayers with what she desired, vouchsafing, "inanem cibo ventrem filio implere, et quidem propheta;" to fill her belly empty of meat with a son, and he a prophet.

Ver. 8. Then said Elkanah her husband to her, Hannah, why weepest thou? and why eatest thou not? and why is thy heart grieved? am not I better to thee than ten sons?] In him we have an example of a most excellent husband, who patiently tolerated the insolent humour of Peninnah, and comforted dejected Hannah with words full of tender affection. Which was truly, in St. Peter's language, to dwell with his wives, κατὰ γνῶσιν, according to knowledge, as Victorinus Strigelius here observes. We cannot from the last words of this verse conclude (as some of the Hebrew doctors do) that Peninnah had ten sons (which was not such a pleasure to her as the affection he had for Hannah would have been), for they may signify, according to the common language of holy Scripture, only a great many sons.

Ver. 9. And Hannah rose up after they had eaten in Shiloh, and after they had drunk.] The kind words of Elkanah seem to have persuaded her to eat and drink cheerfully. In whom we have an example of an excellent wife; who, sensible of her husband's kindness, endeavoured to please him by complying with his desires, and avoiding all things that might be grievous to him.

Now Eli the priest.] He was both the high-priest and also the judge at this time of the Israelites, being born in the end of Gideon's judicature, and died in the middle of the Philistines' tyranny over the Israelites, twenty years before the great victory Samuel got over them at Eben-ezer, as Sir John Marsham computes, who rightly observes, that whensoever his judicature began (which is not recorded) it consisted only in hearing and judging causes by his pontifical authority. For he wrought no deliverance for Israel that we read of: but was such a judge as Samuel's sons were, (viii. 1.) and as Samuel himself was after Saul began to reign. When all the days of his life he continued to go about the country and do justice, which he administered also when he came home at his own house, (vii. 15. 17.)

Sat upon a seat by a post.] The Hebrew word is upon a throne; it being a seat raised up to some height to make him conspicuous to all that entered into the house of God, where he sat at the door of it. The Jews, in Seder Olam, and in Jalkut, have a conceit that Eli was this very day, when Hannah came to pray, made judge of Israel: so that from hence they date the beginning of his judicature. But this is a weak conjecture, built merely on this phrase, sat on his seat. Where, as Abarbinel observes, he sat as the high-priest, and not as a judge. And this was no new thing, but according to custom, that he might preserve good order there; give his advice to those who had occasion to consult him; resolve their doubts, and give them his blessing. And he thinks that Samuel was born ten years or more before the judicature of Eli.

In the temple of the Lord.] It is not unusual to call the tabernacle by the name of a temple: as the temple, when it was built, is called a tabernacle. (See Jer. x. 20. Lament. ii. 6.) Yet the Talmudists, from the Hebrew word hachil (which is here used), say, that when the tabernacle was removed from Gilgal to Shiloh, the sides of it were built of stone, and covered at the top with curtains, having no solid roof. And from hence they fancy it is called beth, the house of the Lord, (ver. 24.) which Maimonides interprets a house of stone. But there is no certainty of this: for such words as these have a larger sense. And indeed we are taught as much by the 1 Kings iii. 2. where it is expressly said, that there was no house built unto the name of the Lord, until the days of Solomon: and 2 Sam. vii. 6. where Nathan speaks in God's name to David, in these words, " I have not dwelt in a house since I came out of Egypt." (See L'Empereur, in his preface to Codex Middoth.)

From the first words of this verse, it appears that Hannah rose up to go to the temple at the time of the evening sacrifice, for it was after they had dined.

Ver. 10. And she was in bitterness of soul, and prayed unto the Lord, and wept sore.] Her grief returned when she was alone, and thought of her barrenness; which made her pray with great vehemence, and many tears, for a child.

Ver. 11. And she vowed a vow.] As was usual, when they earnestly longed to obtain what they sought with prayers and tears.

And said, O Lord, if thou wilt indeed look upon the afflictions of thy handmaid, and remember me, and not forget thy handmaid.] These are three various expressions of the same thing: whereby she declares, though with great humility, how much she was concerned, to obtain her request, of being delivered from her barrenness: for that is the meaning of looking upon her affliction, and remembering her. (See Gen. viii. 1. Exod. iii. 7. 16.)

But wilt give unto thy handmaid a man-child.] She thrice calls herself his handmaid, out of a profound sense of her meanness and his majesty: and desires a man-child, because only such could wait upon the Lord in the service of the tabernacle; as she intended her son should do, if God bestowed one upon her.

Then will I give unto the Lord all the days of his life.] The Levites were not bound to serve at the tabernacle until they were twenty-five years old; and not after they were fifty: but she devoted him to the ministry there from his childhood, as long as he lived.

And there shall no razor come upon his head.] She vowed he should be a Nazarite; part of whose description this is, (Numb. vi. 5.) And so the best of the Jewish doctors interpret it; for the exposition of the Chaldee paraphrast is very forced: but from hence the opinion of the Talmudists is confuted, who say, (in the Mischna, in the title Sota, cap. 3.) that a man might devote his child to be a Nazarite before he was of age; but a woman could not. Nor doth any of them take notice of this example of Hannah; which hath made some think, that possibly they looked upon this as done by an extraordinary motion, and therefore not to be a rule to others; especially since she did it before her child was born. (See J. Wagenseil, in his learned notes upon that book, p. 448.)

Ver. 12. And it came to pass, that as she continued praying before the Lord, that Eli marked her mouth.] The inward anguish of her soul, it is probable, made the motions of her mouth and her countenance very different from what is usual.

Ver. 13. Now Hannah, she spake in her heart; only her lips moved, but her voice was not heard; therefore Eli thought she had been drunk.] Hearing her say nothing, but only seeing her lips move a long time; with such gestures, it is likely, of her body, hands, and eyes, as argued a very great commotion; he took her to be disordered with the wine she had drunk liberally at the forenamed feast. For it is apt to make one talk much, and the great agony wherein she was might something distort her face.

Ver. 14. And Eli said unto her, How long wilt thou be drunken? Put away thy wine from thee.] He seems to bid her go to bed and sleep; and then come and pray to God.

Ver. 15. And Hannah answered and said, No, my lord; I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit: and have drunk neither wine nor strong drink.] Of the difference between wine and strong drink, see Numb. vi. 3. 5. Great affliction of spirit makes one distaste meat and drink

But have poured out my soul before the Lord.] An usual expression for sincere and fervent prayer.

Ver. 16. Account not thy handmaid for a daughter of Belial.] This is a phrase signifying the most lewd persons, that regarded neither God nor men. (See Deut. xiii. 13.)

For out of the abundance of my complaint and grief have I spoken hitherto.] The accusation against her being very foul, she purgeth herself from it very earnestly; but in a modest manner, and with due respect to the office which Eli held in the church.

Ver. 17. And Eli answered and said, Go in peace: and the God of heaven grant thee thy petition that thou hast asked of him.] Her sober and respectful answer convinced the old man of his error; and moved him to dismiss her with his blessing, and a solemn prayer to God that he would grant her request.

Ver. 18. And she said, Let thy handmaid find grace in thy sight.] For which she returned him most humble thanks, and desired the continuance of his prayers.

So the woman went her way, and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad.] She departed from the temple with such satisfaction and assurance her own prayers and his would be heard, that there remained no more any token of sorrow and grief; but she ate her meat, and looked cheerfully.

Ver. 19. And they rose up in the morning early, and worshipped before the Lord, and returned, and came to their house in Ramah.] I suppose she acquainted Elkanah with her prayer and with Eli's blessing: and it is likely that he now made a solemn vow to God if he would be pleased to fulfil her petition. (See ver. 21.)

And Elkanah knew Hannah his wife; and the Lord remembered her.] According to her prayer, (ver. 11.)

Ver. 20. And it came to pass, when the time was come about, after Hannah conceived.] The usual time that women go with child before they be delivered.

That she bare a son, and called his name Samuel.] Sometimes fathers, and sometimes mothers, gave the name to their children. (See upon Gen. iv. 26.)

Saying, Because I have asked him of the Lord.] This was the reason of his name: which she gave him, that he as well as she might keep in mind the interest God had in him; from whom she obtained him by ardent prayers. For Saulmeel (which is contracted into Samuel) signifies asked of God, as we translate this word in the margin of our Bibles. He was born (as Sir John Marsham computes with great probability) in the time when the Philistines domineered over Israel for forty years together, (see Judges x. 7. xiii. 1.) but in what year cannot certainly be determined.

Ver. 21. And the man Elkanah, and all his house, went up to offer unto the Lord the yearly sacrifice.] At the feast of the Passover, or some other of the three great festivals. He is a great example of piety; who carried his whole family to worship God with him at those solemn times which the law enjoined.

And his vow.] Which it is likely he made, either when he saw his wife was with child, or, perhaps, before, when she told him what hope she had her prayer would be heard, and he worshipped God, (ver. 19.)

Ver. 22. But Hannah went not up; for she said unto her husband, I will not go up till the child be weaned, and then I will bring him, that he may appear before the Lord, and there abide for ever.] She was not bound by the law to go up with her husband: and, therefore, though she was wont to go, she resolved, as became a prudent woman, to stay at home till the child was strong enough, not only to accompany her, but to be left at the house of the Lord, and be capable of being instructed in the service of God.

Ver. 23. And Elkanah her husband said unto her, Do what seemeth thee good: tarry until thou hast weaned him.] Interpreters here note the sweet agreement that ought to be (according to the example of this happy couple) between husband and wife.

Only the Lord establish his word.] We do not read of any thing the Lord had spoken about this child: unless Elkanah looked upon what Eli had said as spoken by God, because he was God's high-priest. Or the Hebrew words may be translated, the Lord establish his work; i. e. perfect what he hath begun, by making the child grow till he was fit for his service. For the word dabar signifies any matter or thing as well as word.

So the woman abode.] At home.

And gave the child suck till she weaned him.] She herself was his nurse, and suckled him, after the example of Sarah. (See upon Gen. xxi. 7.) And, it is likely, continued to do so (out of her great affection to him) several years. Some think three; but it is not improbable six or seven, as Lyra conjectures. And so long I remember one to have sucked, in the place where I was born.

Ver. 24. And when she had weaned him, she took him up with her, with three bullocks, and one ephah of flour, and a bottle of wine.] As they were not to appear before the Lord empty; so, upon this occasion, they brought an ample offering to him; to testify their gratitude to the Divine Majesty. And it is highly probable, that one of these bullocks was wholly offered to God as a burnt-offering, and the other two were peace-offerings; or, as some will have it, one a sin-offering, and the other a peace-offering. Which had a large measure of flour for a meat-offering, and of wine also attending it; that they might rejoice together before the Lord, when they feasted with him upon the peace-offering.

And brought him unto the house of the Lord in Shiloh: and the child was young.] In the Hebrew the words are, hanaar-naar, the child was a child, i. e. wholly at their disposal.

Ver. 25. And they slew the bullock, and brought the child to Eli.] They first performed their duty to God, by offering a whole burnt-offering to him; reserving the rest, I suppose, till they had acquainted Eli with God's goodness to them, that they might all rejoice together.

Ver. 26. And she said, Oh, my lord! as thy soul liveth, my lord, I am the woman that stood by thee here, praying unto the Lord.] Many take these words, as thy soul liveth, for an oath; whereby she assures him, that, as certain as he was alive, she was the person whom he saw in that place praying, and took for a distempered woman. But others (particularly D. Kimchi) think there is nothing of an oath in them, they being only a form of well-wishing to him; as if she said, I wish thee a long life, that thou mayest educate my son.

Ver. 27. For this child I prayed; and the Lord hath given me my petition which I asked of him.] She had told him nothing of what she prayed for, when he reproved her, but only in general, that she was extremely afflicted for want of something, which she earnestly begged of God. But now she acquaints him with it, and with her vow she made, if God granted her desire; which she was now come to accomplish.

Ver. 28. And therefore also I have lent him unto the Lord.] Or, restored him to the Lord (as the Targum expounds it), from whose gift she received him.

As long as he liveth he shall be lent unto the Lord.] Or, as the words may be translated, all the days that he shall be desired for the Lord. That is, as long as God should think fit to employ him in his own house; which was till he made him a judge, (vii. 15.) Then he was not fixed at Shiloh, but went about the country to Beth-el, and Gilgal, and Mizpeh; and then settled at his own house in Ramah, as we read there, ver. 17.

And he worshipped the Lord there.] This shews that Elkanah was with Hannah, and gave his consent to this dedication of their child, to such service as God should think fit to employ him in: which he humbly prayed God to accept.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND Hannah prayed, and said.] Hymns are wont to be comprehended under the name of prayers, (Psal. lxxi. 20.) to the composition of which holy souls were sometimes raised by Divine inspiration, in their devout meditations upon the extraordinary goodness of God to them. And, indeed, it was the most ancient way, as I have observed heretofore, of preserving the memory of things to posterity: poets being more ancient than historians, or orators, as Lactantius observes, lib. vii. Div. Instit. cap. 23. Nor were the western people less famous for this than the eastern: the Germans, for instance, having their most ancient annals in verse; as Hermannus Conringius hath shewn out of a great many authors, in his preface to Corn. Tacitus, de Germanorum Moribus.

My heart rejoiceth in the Lord.] She was acted by the same spirit which moved St. James to give this direction, chap. v. ver. 13. "Is any afflicted, let him pray, (as she did, i. 10.) is any merry, let him sing psalms," as she now doth: for she was lately extremely sad and sorrowful, and could not eat: but now, by the goodness of God, is filled with joy; which made her burst out into this thanksgiving.

My horn is exalted in the Lord.] She who was bowed down and dejected, now lifts up her head and triumphs: for exalting the horn signifies the height of glory.

My mouth is enlarged over my enemy.] She was now furnished with a full answer to Peninnah, who upbraided her with her sterility.

Because I rejoice in thy salvation.] All this joy and triumph arose from the goodness of God to her; who had delivered her from the reproach of barrenness: which raised her, as appears by the sequel, to the expectation of far greater things.

Ver. 2. There is none holy as the Lord.] The holiness of God signifies his peerless perfections; as Mr. Mede hath shewn in many parts of his works. (See p. 11.)

For there is none besides thee.] Which perfections are peculiar to himself: for though the Scripture vouchsafeth sometimes unto the gentile demons the name of gods, yet it never calls them holy ones.

Neither is there any rock like our Rock.] See upon Deut. xxxii. 31.

Ver. 3. Talk no more so exceeding proudly.] This was good advice to Peninnah, and such-like persons; not to insult over others who are not so happy as themselves.

Let not arrogance come out of your mouth.] Or, as the Targum interprets it, forbear reproaches. For so the Hebrew word atat signifies, hard words.

For the Lord is a God of knowledge.] None knows what he intends, who perhaps will exalt those who are now abased. Or, he knows how to bring to pass such things as men think to be impossible.

And by him acts are weighed.] Or, by him works are prepared: even when there is no disposition in nature to them.

Ver. 4. The bows of the mighty men are broken, and they that stumbled are girt with strength.] Now the great sense she had of God's power branches out itself into an humble acknowledgment of this glorious attribute, in divers instances. And, first, in vanquishing the most victorious: for bows were a principal part of warriors' weapons, (Psal. xliv. 6.) and their girdles being a principal part of the military habit, is elegantly translated to signify strength and warlike prowess. Whence Virgil calls feeble persons unmeet for war, discinctos, ungirt, as Servius observes. (See Bochart, in Canaan, lib. ii. cap. 13.) Whence the apostle, among the spiritual armour, exhorts the Ephesians to be girt about with truth, (Ephes. vi.) For to gird and to arm, to be girt and to be armed, are the same thing in Greek and Latin authors. (See also Psal. xviii. 39. lxv. 6.)

Ver. 5. They that were full have hired themselves for bread; and they that were hungry ceased.] To complain of hunger. This vicissitude of human affairs, especially the sudden turns there are sometimes, from a great height of prosperity to a very low condition, and on the contrary, are very wonderful, and seriously to be pondered; that no man may be proud, nor any man despair. The instances of these in history are to be found in a great many authors, besides what our own experience may furnish us withal.

So that the barren hath born seven.] That is, many children. She reflects upon the great change which God had made in her own condition. And Procopius Gazæus notes, that here, "Hymno prophetiam admiscet;" she mingles prophecy with her hymn of praise, and foretells the fecundity of the church: for the number seven denotes a multitude.

And she that hath many children is waxen feeble.] The Jews fancy, that every time Hannah bare a child, two of Peninnah's children died. But this seems rather to have a general respect to those that have been fertile, and grow barren when God pleaseth.

Ver. 6. The Lord killeth, and maketh alive; he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up.] The same thing is repeated in different words; and the sense is, the power of life and death is in the hands of God: whom he pleases he takes out of the world, and whom he pleases he continues in it; raising men up even from the grave, when they were dropping into it. (See Deut. xxxii. 39. Psal. xxx. 3.)

Ver. 7. The Lord maketh poor, and maketh rich; he bringeth low, and raiseth up.] She acknowledgeth the power and wisdom of God, in making men of different eruditions; some poor, and others rich; yea, in making the same men who were very poor to become very rich; and they who were mean and contemptible become great and eminent. Theodoret treats excellently of the wise providence of God, in not making men all alike; but some of a lower, some of a higher rank: Oration vi. against the heathens.

Ver. 8. He raiseth the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill; to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory.] Instances of this kind in the Holy Scriptures are Joseph and Daniel; the one a prisoner, the other a captive: but preferred to the highest dignity, by the kings of Egypt and Babylon. And in these later ages, Victorinus Strigelius observes a memorable instance of the truth of these words, in Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary; who was brought out of prison, and set on the throne, not by sedition, nor by civil war; but by the unanimous consent of all the estates of the realm, in grateful memory of the benefits they had received by his father, the great Hunniades.

For the pillars of the earth are the Lord's, and he hath set the world upon them.] These words contain the reason of all that precedes in the five foregoing verses: for the very earth being founded, upheld, and supported by the Lord, no wonder that all the inhabitants of it are in his power, to dispose of them as he thinks good.

Ver. 9. He will keep the feet of his saints, and the wicked shall be silent in darkness.] Pious affections in those days rose up, many times, to the height of prophecy: whereby God continued in that nation his true religion, in the midst of their idolatrous inclinations. Accordingly, here Hannah begins to predict the deliverances of the Israelites (who were God's holy ones, or saints, by being peculiarly separated to him and his service) from the hand of the Philistines, and other enemies: who she prophesies should stumble and fall, as men do in the dark, when the Israelites, by God's direction, succeeded in their enterprises.

For by strength shall no man prevail.] As appeared afterward in Goliath.

Ver. 10. The adversaries of the Lord shall be broken in pieces; out of heaven shall he thunder upon them.] As he did literally when Samuel fought with the Philistines, (vii. 10.) and when David also vanquished them, (Psal. xviii. 13.) Procopius Gazæus applies this to the assumption of Christ, with the mission of the Holy Ghost, and the happy success of the apostles' preaching, and to Christ's second coming.

The Lord shall judge the ends of the earth.] As he did when he subdued the Philistines, who lived in the extremity of the country of Judea westward: and now sorely oppressed the Israelites.

And he shall give strength unto his King.] That is, to David. Of whom she prophesies; who was most properly God's king, whom he appointed in the room of Saul; who by his disobedience forfeited his kingdom and was rejected by God.

And exalt the horn of his Anointed.] God commanded Saul to be anointed by Samuel, x. 1. but it was upon condition, which he not fulfilling, the same person was commanded to anoint David, xv. 29. xvi. 1. Upon which the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul and rested on David, xvi. 13, 14. Whom God so wonderfully protected, that all the subtlety and power of Saul could not destroy him: and when he came to the throne, God wonderfully exalted him, as she here speaks: by enlarging his dominion very far, and making him such a glorious prince (higher than the kings of the earth), that he was the most eminent type of the great King of all, our Lord Christ, to whom these words in the fullest sense belong. "For who doth not see, (saith St. Austin, in his seventeenth book, de Civitate Dei, cap. 4.) that the spirit of this woman (whose name was Anna, which signifies grace) prophesied of the Christian religion, the city of God, whose king and founder is Christ; and of the grace of God, from which the proud are estranged, that they may fall; but the humble are filled with it, that they may rise:" which is the chief import of this hymn. And, indeed, this is the first time that the name of Messiah (or Anointed) is found in Scripture: there being no such word in all the foregoing books of Moses, Joshua, the Judges, or Ruth. And therefore it is the more to be remarked: this prophetess being the first that mentions the Messiah, in this song: with which the song of the blessed Virgin hath such a perfect resemblance, that one cannot but think Hannah had a respect to something higher than the quarrel between her and Peninnah, and the son which God had given her, or the great acts of David: for the words are too magnificent to be confined to so low a sense. And therefore Kimchi upon these words ingenuously acknowledges the King here mentioned is the Messiah, of whom Hannah spake either by prophecy or tradition. For there was a tradition among them, that there should a great King arise in Israel: and she seals up this song, with the mention of that King, who should save them from all their enemies.

It may be thus paraphrased:

1. Great is the goodness of God to me, which makes my heart leap for joy; great is the honour he hath done me: so that my mouth, which had nothing to answer when my enemy upbraided me, now boasts of the favour of God to me, who to my exceeding great joy hath bestowed a son upon me.

2. For the Lord is incomparable in all perfections, which none have but himself alone: whose excellences are so transcendent, that there is none in whom we can find so secure a sanctuary in all our troubles as we have in him.

3. Do not vaunt and brag therefore any more on this fashion, nor speak contemptuously of others: for as nothing can be hid from him, so he knows how to bring to pass the strangest things: nor can any man hinder it (let their pride, and confidence, and power, be ever so great), but his counsel shall stand.

4. The strength of armed forces is good for nothing, if not prospered by him: who brings down those who were mighty conquerors; and advances those who were their miserable slaves.

5. The rich have been seen to fall into such decay, as to want their necessary food: and poor starved wretches have come to great plenty. As likewise barren women, as I, have had a numerous offspring, and they that had many children lost them all.

6. No man can keep himself alive when God calls him away from hence: and he unexpectedly restores men to life, when they were in the very jaws of death.

7. It is according as he orders, that some men are rich, others poor: and the very same men who now are in a low condition, he raises up to greatness and splendour; and, on the contrary, abaseth those that walk in pride.

8. They that are in the most sordid plight he advances, when he pleases, to the most glorious state: for what can hinder him from shaking the very foundations of the earth, and overturning all things, which are upheld and supported only by his almighty power?

9. The best way therefore is, by piety, to secure the favour of God; who, by preserving all his faithful servants from falling, will fill their mouths with his praises: but confound the wicked, who now boast themselves, when with amazement they are thrown down into a miserable condition. For let not any man be so vain as to imagine, that by his strength he can maintain himself in his high station; or keep down good men from rising up to glory.

10. They that oppose God shall be broken in pieces; he will strike a terror into them, and make them fall flat before him. For it is he that is the Judge of the world; and there is no corner of it where men can hide themselves from his sentence. He will advance the king whom he shall choose, even the Lord Christ; and make him great in spite of all opposers: who shall not be able to hinder his exaltation, or the growth and increase of his kingdom.—

Ver. 11. And Elkanah went to Ramah to his house.] When the festival was ended.

And the child did minister unto the Lord.] As soon as he was capable.

Before Eli the priest.] According as he appointed him.

Ver. 12. Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial.] Very wicked men, (see Deut. xiii. 13.) being impious, covetous, guilty of violence, and filthy lusts.

They knew not the Lord.] They were not professed atheists; but they minded not the Divine service, nor took any care to do God honour; being ignorant (as Kimchi expounds it) of his law.

Ver. 13. And the priest's custom was, when any man offered sacrifice.] Brought his peace-offerings to be offered at the altar.

That the priest's servant came, while the flesh was seething, with a flesh-hook of three teeth in his hand.] The person who brought the peace-offerings having the largest share in these sacrifices, there were certain rooms, when the temple was built, both in the court of the women, and of the men, wherein they had liberty to boil the flesh, in order to feast with God at his own house: which Christians afterward imitated in their feasts of charity. The like rooms there were at the tabernacle, in the outward court of it. (See L'Empereur, in his Annot. upon Codex Middoth, cap. 2. sect. 6. p. 80, 81.)

Ver. 14. And he struck it into the pan, or kettle, or cauldron, or pot.] There were several sorts of vessels for this use; according as the flesh to be boiled was little or much.

All that the flesh-hook brought up the priest took for himself.] This was a new custom, which they profanely introduced: for, not content with the right shoulder and the breast, which were theirs by the law, (Lev. vii. 32.) they would take what they pleased of the rest, that belonged to the people: at least, so much as a fork with three teeth brought up, when they struck it into the pot where the flesh was boiling.

So they did in Shiloh, unto all the Israelites that came thither.] This aggravated their crime, that they made a constant practice of it: and did not only on some occasions commit such wickedness.

Ver. 15. And before they burnt the fat.] Which entirely belonged unto God, (Lev. ii. 16. vii. 23. 25.)

The priest's servant came, and said to the man that sacrificed, Give flesh to roast for the priest.] This was a high contempt of God, to demand their part before God had his. For the noblest guests at feasts were always served first.

For he will not have sodden flesh of thee, but raw.] The flesh-hook did not always bring up the best; therefore, as soon as the sacrifice was cut up, they came and took the choicest pieces.

Ver. 16. And if any man said unto him, Let them not fail to burn the fat presently, and then take as much as thy soul desireth: then he would answer, Nay; but thou shalt give it me now: if not, I will take it by force.] This argues the very height of imperious impiety, that such submissive language should not prevail with them to have so much respect to God, as to let him have his portion in the first place: though they offered the priest more than his share, after God was served. None knows to what pitch of wickedness a man may arrive, when once the sense of God is extinguished, and gone out of his mind.

Ver. 17. Wherefore the sin of the young men was very great before the Lord.] Having many grievous aggravations.

For men abhorred the offering of the Lord.] Nothing brings religion so much into the contempt of the people, as the open profaneness of those who are the ministers of it.

Ver. 18. But Samuel ministered before the Lord, being a child.] Though very young, yet he carefully performed such offices at the tabernacle as he was capable to discharge: and did not follow the bad example of his familiars and domestics, as we may suppose Hophni and Phinehas were.

Girded with a linen ephod.] We do not read any where of any peculiar garments appointed for the Levites in their ministration, but only for the priests; and this was none of them, as appears from Exod. xxviii. 40, 41. And therefore the ephod which the priests are said to wear in chap. xxii. of this book, ver. 18. were quite different from the ephod ordered in Exod. xxviii. for Aaron the high-priest alone: which had a curious girdle belonging to it, and the breast-plate with precious stones inseparable from it; and was wrought with gold, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, (Exod. xxviii. 6.) But the ephod which the priests, or any other persons are said to wear, is (for distinction's sake) always called ephod bad, an ephod made of fine linen: which was not a sacred but an honorary vestment (as I may call it), being a short garment hanging upon the shoulders down to the middle of the back, but without any girdle or curious work in it; which having some likeness to that of the high-priest's, was used by the inferior priests to make them more respected as special ministers of God; and by other great persons upon some solemn occasion, as David did, (2 Sam. vi. 24.) and Eli (seeing such a great appearance of God in him) ordered Samuel to do; though it was not a habit appertaining to the Levites, much less to him who was not of age, according to the exact rules of the law, to serve in the tabernacle. Thus Kimchi and Ralbag understand it. And the LXX. in 2 Sam. vi. 15. translate it στολὴν ἑξαλλον, an eximious garment. (See Jo. Braunius de Vest. Sacerd. lib. ii. cap. 6. p. 602.)

It seems no improbable conjecture of Fortunatus Scacchus, that from hence was derived the latus clavus among the Romans, which was a vestment proper to their senators and presidents. It was first brought from the Etruscans, by Tullus Hostilius, when he conquered them: whose ancient language agrees so much with the Hebrew, that one may well think they had many things from them. (See Myrothec. cap. iii. 43.)

Ver. 19. Moreover, his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice.] The ephod being used, I suppose, only in the service of God, it was provided at the public charge. But for his ordinary wearing, Hannah took care, at her charge, to provide him a coat, and other things, it is likely, suitable to it, that she might still express her piety in contributing to his maintenance at the house of God. And it is very probable, that this little coat was woven with her own hands; as the ancient tradition is, that Christ's seamless coat was woven by the blessed Virgin. And so in Joma the doctors say, (cap. 3.) that a priest might use a garment in his ministry, which was made by his mother. (See Braunius, lib. i. cap. 17.)

Ver. 20. And Eli blessed Elkanah and Hannah his wife, and said, The Lord give thee seed of this woman, for the loan which is lent unto the Lord.] He gave them this benediction by a Divine suggestion; and thereby verified what she uttered in her prophetical song, (ver. 5.)

And they went to their own home.] Their affection to their son did not make them stay there, and neglect their domestic affairs.

Ver. 21. And the Lord visited Hannah, so that she conceived, and bare three sons and two daughters.] None are losers by what they lend unto the Lord.

And the child Samuel grew before the Lord.] Not only in stature, but in wisdom also and virtue, (see ver. 26.) Of so great moment it is to season the minds of children early with a sense of God and of religion: which is likely to continue with them, and improve, as they grow in years.

Ver. 22. Now Eli was very old.] Which made him listless and unactive.

And heard all that his sons did unto all Israel.] Yet wanted not information of all the forementioned enormous practices of his sons.

And how they lay with the women that assembled.] Whose impiety and luxury proceeded so far, as to move them to debauch those women who came to worship God. Of the word assembled, see Exod. xxviii. 8. Unto which may be added, that the Hebrew word tzaba signifies not only a great many gathered together, but also a station: that is, stated times of attendance, which devout women observed for fasting and prayer. For that was their business at the temple; unto which they resorted at certain times for these ends.

At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] These words sound as if they committed this lewdness in the presence of all the people. But such beastiality would not have been suffered: and therefore this refers to their assembling at the door of the tabernacle: from whence they led them to some private room about the tabernacle (as there were many afterward about the temple), where they defiled them.

Ver. 23. And he said unto them, Why do you these things?] Beforementioned, ver. 14—16. 22.

For I hear of your evil doings by all this people.] Their wickedness was so notorious, that there was a general complaint of it; which should have moved him to greater severity, than merely to reprove and chide them with such gentleness and lenity, as these and the following words import. Which proceeded partly from the coldness of old age; partly from his too great indulgence to his children; and partly (as Corn. Bonavent. Bertram conjectures) from his being more intent upon the defence of their civil liberties, than the restoring ecclesiastical discipline.

Ver. 24. Nay, my sons; it is no good report that I hear: ye make the Lord's people to transgress.] By making them neglect and despise the service of God, (ver. 17.) and tempting them to lewdness, (ver. 22.) This is the language of a tender father, not of a zealous judge; who ought to have passed a public censure upon them, for their public crimes, by turning them out of their office, or some sharp punishment; which his office gave him authority and power to inflict upon such infamous offenders.

Ver. 25. If a man sin against another, the judge shall judge him; but if a man sin against the Lord, who shall entreat for him?] If one neighbour do an injury to another, the business may be composed by the judge; who, interposing his authority, either takes up the difference, or sees the person satisfied who was offended. But if one injure the judge himself (which was the present case), who shall take the confidence to speak in his behalf? Was it ever heard that any one interceded for a man to his prince, when he intended to kill the prince himself? Eli argued well; but he should not have referred their punishment unto God, when it was in his power to punish them himself.

Notwithstanding, they hearkened not unto the voice of their father; because the Lord would slay them.] The words may be rendered out of the Hebrew, But they would not hearken to the voice of their father; therefore the Lord resolved to slay them. But, according to our translation, the sense is right enough: for when men have long sinned grievously against many admonitions (which it may be supposed their father had given them), whereby they become incurable; God deprives them of that prudent consideration and discretion, which would save them from destruction. So Rasi upon these words, The sentence of judgment was already sealed against them.

Ver. 26. And the child Samuel grew on, and was in favour both with the Lord and with men.] The words in the Hebrew are, he went on, or grew great and tall, and was good, that is acceptable, both to God and men. The meaning is, he made a great progress in wisdom and goodness, as well as increased in stature: so that God was well pleased with him, and he was well esteemed by the people. The same is said of our Saviour, Luke ii. 52. where Theophylact thus glosses, Τουτέστι, καὶ τῷ Θεῷ εὐάρεστα ἔπραττε, καὶ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις ἐπαινετά; i. e. He did those things that were well-pleasing to God, and were praised by men.

Ver. 27. And there came a man of God unto Eli.] That is, a prophet, who was divinely inspired to deliver the following message to him. Some say this was Phinehas, others Elkanah; without any ground.

And said unto him, Thus saith the Lord.] This is the constant language of prophets.

Did I plainly appear.] In the Hebrew, manifestly reveal myself.

Unto the house of thy fathers.] Unto Aaron, who was the head of the family of priests. (See Exod. iv. 27.)

When they were in Egypt, in Pharaoh's house?] In miserable bondage. As much as to say, Have I conferred such favours upon you, and do you thus requite me? It is the way of the prophets, when they call men to repentance, to aggravate their sins by an enumeration of God's great benefits unto them. (See Isaiah i. 2, &c. and Micah vi. 3—5.)

Ver. 28. And did I choose him out of all the tribes of Israel to be my priest.] The highest dignity in the nation.

To offer upon mine altar, to burn incense, to wear an ephod before me?] These were the several parts of the priest's office: and the last contains the greatest of them all, which belonged only to the high-priest; who alone appeared before God to consult him by urim and thummim, when he wore the golden ephod, with the breast-plate annexed to it; for they were inseparable, (Exod. xxviii. 6. 12. 28.)

And did I give unto the house of thy father all the offerings made by fire of the children of Israel?] There were none of the sacrifices offered at the altar of which the priest had not some share, (see Numb. xviii. 8—10, &c.) For even of the burnt-offerings, which were wholly consumed on the altar, the skin was, by an express law, given to the priest, (Lev. vii. 8.)

Ver. 29. Wherefore kick ye at my sacrifice, and at my offerings, which I have commanded in my habitation.] As refractory oxen were wont to do, when they were pricked with a goad, to stir them up to work at the plough: which signifies the highest irreverence and contempt of God's authority. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 29. latter end.)

And honourest thy sons above me, &c.] By suffering them to continue in the priest's office, and profanely to feast themselves with the best of the sacrifices, before God was served.

Ver. 30. Wherefore the Lord God of Israel saith, I said, indeed, that thy house, and the house of thy father, should walk before me for ever: but now saith the Lord, Be it far from me.] God revokes the decree he had made in favour of him and his family, of being high-priests throughout all generations. Which office was first settled upon Eleazar, the eldest son of Aaron, and upon his posterity; for the very same promise is made to Phinehas the son of Eleazar, (Numb. xxv. 15.) which is here said to be made to Eli, who was descended from Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron: unto whom the high-priesthood was translated from the family of Eleazar, for some sin or other: as now it was resolved it should be translated back again from the family of Ithamar, to that of Eleazar; because of the horrid sins of the sons of Eli. For what cause Phinehas, or his posterity (for there are various opinions about the time), lost the priesthood, and how they recovered it in the time of David, see Mr. Selden, lib. i. de Success. ad Pontificat. cap. 2, 3. and Constant. L'Empereur, in his annot. on Bertram de Repub. Jud. p. 411. Some think, that after Phinehas, those three persons mentioned in 1 Chron. vi. 50, 51. Abishua, Bukki, and Uzzi, succeeded in the priesthood; and then came in Eli: but of this there is no certainty. Procopius Gazæus here observes, that this verse, "Latenter totius Judaici sacerdotii finem innuit;" doth secretly intimate the abolishing of the whole Jewish priesthood. For this promise, saith he, Thy house, and the house of thy father, shall walk before me for ever, was not made to Ithamar, but to Aaron; and, therefore, he shews here what should befal the whole tribe. Such conditional decrees are frequent in Scripture; particularly in Jer. xviii. 7—10.

For he that honoureth me I will honour, and he that despiseth me shall be lightly esteemed.] A remarkable instance of which we have in the records of the Christian church: for Eusebius tells us, in the time of that persecution which he mentions in the eighth book of his Ecclesiastical History, some of the pastors of the church, who had not governed the flock of Christ as they ought to have done, were condemned to be keepers of camels, and of the Emperor's horses (a punishment among the Romans in those days, as Valesius observes), ἡ θεία κατακρίναση δίκη, &c. The Divine justice judging them worthy of no better employment. (Cap. 12. de Martyribus Palestinæ.)

Ver. 31. Behold, the days come, that I will cut off the arm of thy father's house.] Our arm being the instrument whereby we perform all things; this threatening signifies, that not long hence God would utterly take away all power and authority from him, and from his family; both as he was a priest, and as he was a judge.

That there shall not be an old man in thy house.] But his posterity should die, as it follows, (ver. 33.) in the flower of their age, which was accounted a great judgment in that nation. So Manasseh ben Israel, who observes, in his book de Termino Vitæ, p. 87. that the Gemara upon Jebamoth mentions a certain family in Jerusalem, none of which commonly lived above eighteen years. Of which they inquiring the reason of R. Johanan ben Zachæi, he bade them search, if they were not of the family of Eli, upon which God had passed this sentence, that they should die in the flower of their age: and it was discovered that they sprang from him.

Ver. 32. And thou shalt see an enemy in my sanctuary.] The marginal translation seems most literal, Thou shalt see the affliction of the tabernacle. As he did, for he saw the tabernacle deprived of the ark, which was the glory of it; and lived to hear the ark was taken by the Philistines, (iv. 4. 11.) But his family was not thrown out of the priesthood till the days of Solomon.

In all the wealth which God shall give Israel.] The Hebrew words may be translated, After all the good God hath done to Israel.

And there shall not be an old man in thy house for ever.] He repeats the foregoing threatening, to shew the certainty of it. But some by an old man understand an elder. So the Talmudists in the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 1. where they make the meaning to be, that if any of his family did live long, they should never come to honour. For so they tell the story; that R. Johanan missing of some preferment that was designed and endeavoured for him, and taking it very heavily, the doctors that were his relations prayed him not to be troubled; For we are (said they) of the family of Eli, of whom it is said, there shall be no old man of thy house for ever; that is, none be promoted to any dignity.

Ver. 33. And the man of thine, whom I shall not cut off from my altar, shall be to consume thy eyes, and to grieve thy heart.] It was not a favour to let any of them live, but a punishment to those who were grieved to see the high-priesthood taken from their family, and those that belonged to it reduced to great poverty. It is usual in Scripture, to say that of the parents, which properly belongs to their posterity.

And all the increase of thy house shall die in the flower of their age.] This doth not belong to all the posterity of Ithamar, but only to the family of Eli.

Ver. 34. And this shall be a sign to thee, that shall come upon thy two sons, Hophni and Phinehas; that in one day they shall die both of them.] See iv. 11. 17.

Ver. 35. And I will raise me up a faithful priest, that shall do all that is in my heart, and in my mind.] This seems to be meant of Zadok, who was anointed in the room of Abiathar, (1 Chron. xxix. 22.)

And I will build him a sure house.] The high-priesthood continued in his line till the captivity of Babylon, as appears from Ezek. xl. 16. and a long time after it, as Josephus shews, lib. x. cap. 4. and our famous Selden, lib. i. de Success. in Pontif. cap. 5, 6. where he shews their perpetual succession till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. But Procopius Gazæus here notes, that though this, according to the history, is meant of Zadok, who was put into the priesthood by Solomon, and in whose line it continued; yet it belongs to none, in the highest sense, but to our Lord Jesus Christ, who offered himself to the Father for us, and is our great high-priest for ever.

And he shall walk before mine anointed for ever.] By the anointed of God here is meant the king; for whom the high-priest consulted God on great occasions: and therefore is said to walk before him; because he directed him in his proceedings, and shewed him what he ought to do, in all difficult cases.

Ver. 36. And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left in thy house.] The remainder of his family, who were not cut off.

Shall come and crouch to him for a piece of silver, and for a morsel of bread.] The Hebrew word which we translate crouch, signifying to bow and to worship, the Vulgar understands these words, as if they were spoken not of their coming to beg of the high-priest, but to pray to God in so poor a condition, as not to be able to bring more than a farthing, or mite, to the treasury, and nothing but a bit of bread (not so much as a bird, much less a sheep or bullock) for a sin-offering. But the Chaldee takes the words as we do, for humbling himself to the priest beforementioned, begging a small relief of his great poverty, to which he was reduced. The Hebrew word for a piece of silver is agorah, which signifies a minute piece of silver, in the very derivation of the word, as many think. So the meaning is, he should humbly beg, though ever so small a relief.

Put me, I pray thee, into one of the priests' offices, that I may eat a piece of bread.] Begging of the high-priest that he might enjoy the meanest pension that was allowed to those priests who were prohibited to officiate. For so the words may be translated, Somewhat belonging to the priesthood. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 9. Ezek. xliv. 13.) This seems to have been fulfilled in the days of Abiathar, who, for treason, was not only put out of his office, but sent to live upon his own farm in the country; and not suffered to live upon the portion given to priests at the temple, (1 Kings ii. 26, 27.) By this means his posterity fell into extreme want; in which the just judgment of God may be observed; that the children of those who were so wanton, that they would not be content unless they had the choicest parts of the sacrifice for their portion, should fall into so low a condition, as to beg their bread.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. AND the child Samuel ministered unto the Lord before Eli.] Performed such services at the tabernacle as Eli directed, being now about twelve years old, as Josephus thinks.

And the word of the Lord was precious in those days.] God did very rarely in those days reveal his mind to any person. (See ver. 21.)

There was no open vision.] Here vision includes all the ways whereby God revealed himself to men. Which he did then so seldom, that whatsoever revelation there might be privately to some pious persons, there was none then publicly acknowledged to be a prophet, unto whom the people might resort to know the mind of God. Which was the cause that Samuel, being twice called by God to attend unto him, thought it had been Eli who called him: for they were so unacquainted in these days with the prophetical spirit, that we read of no more than two prophets in all the days of the Judges, (iv. 4. vi. 8.)

Ver. 2. And it came to pass at that time.] After the man of God mentioned in the foregoing chapter (ver. 27.) had been with Eli; perhaps that very night after he had delivered his message.

When Eli was laid down.] To sleep.

In his place.] In the court of the tabernacle, where there were divers rooms for several uses of the priests; as there were afterward at the temple.

And his eyes began to wax dim, that he could not see.] Clearly to do his duty, after it grew duskish: which made him, it is likely, go to bed betimes, and leave directions with Samuel what to do, until it was time for him to repose himself. And this might be the reason that Samuel ran so hastily to him, when he thought he called for him, that he might know what he wanted, men of his age, and dim-sighted, being less able to help themselves.

Ver. 3. And ere the lamp of God went out in the temple of the Lord, where the ark of God was.] The lamp in the great shaft of the golden candlestick, which bent towards the most holy place (called the western lamp), never went out; but some other of them did go out when it was morning. (See upon Exod. xxvii. 20, 21.) The meaning therefore is, that, ere it was day, the Lord called Samuel. (See Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, chap. 14. sect. 4.)

And Samuel was lain down to sleep.] In the court of the Levites, as the Targum explains it; or in some other place near to Eli, that he might be ready to assist him on any occasion. The words seem to import, that he had watched most of the night, (for so some were to do, Psal. cxxxiv. 1.) and towards morning went to repose himself. For thus the words run in the Hebrew, and in the LXX. and Vulgar: Before the lamp of God went out, and Samuel lay down to sleep in the temple of the Lord, &c. Insomuch, that Victorinus Strigelius translates the words thus, And Samuel went to lie down in the temple of the Lord, where the ark of God was, before the lamp of God went out.

Ver. 4. That the Lord called Samuel.] Out of the most holy place. So the Targum: A voice was heard out of the temple of the Lord.

And he said, Here am I.] It is likely Eli lay nearer the tabernacle than Samuel did, and yet heard nothing: but the voice passing him by, was directed to Samuel, who alone heard it. These words, Here am I, are a form of speech, signifying attention to what was said, and readiness to do what should be commanded.

Ver. 5. And he ran unto Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou calledst me.] He thought Eli had some ministry wherein to employ him, and therefore started up presently, and ran to know what his pleasure was. Which shews the great readiness and promptness of his obedience, which made him come, yea, run at his first call.

And he said, I called not; lie down again. And he went and lay down.] He thought he might dream.

Ver. 6. And the Lord called yet again, Samuel. And Samuel rose, and went to Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou didst call me, &c.] He was sure there was nobody yet come to the temple, it being night and the doors shut, and therefore concluded it could be none but Eli that called him: and it is probable, the voice was like that of Eli's.

Ver. 7. Now Samuel did not know the Lord.] He had not yet learned to know discipline from before the Lord, as the Targum interprets it: that is, how God was wont to teach and instruct men in his will; which the next words explain.

Neither was the word of the Lord yet revealed unto him.] He was unacquainted with the way wherein God made known his mind unto the prophets, because he had never spoken to him before: so that he did not know how to distinguish between the voice of God and of a man. Maimonides expounds it, He did not understand that the Lord was wont to speak with a soft, whispering voice; which was therefore called Bath-col.

Ver. 8. And the Lord called Samuel again the third time. And he rose, and went to Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou didst call me. And Eli perceived that the Lord had called the child.] This repetition of the voice so oft, awakened Eli to think that this was no fancy of the child's; and, therefore, since he knewtha t he did not call him, he concluded the Lord did; and by this means he was disposed to give credit to what Samuel should tell him, as an oracle of God.

Ver. 9. Therefore Eli said unto Samuel, Go, lie down: and it shall be, if he call thee, that thou shalt say, Speak, Lord; for thy servant heareth.] He tells him, in effect, that it was the voice of God which he heard; and instructs him how to behave himself, when he called again; and to answer, that he was ready to perform whatever he commanded.

So Samuel went and lay down in his place.] Which was not far, as I said, from the place where Eli lay.

Ver. 10. And the Lord came, and stood.] This word stood (Kimchi thinks) denoteth some glorious appearance of God to him; because this is the same word which is used in Numb. xxii. 22, 23. 31. where the angel is said to stand to oppose Balaam's proceedings. And so the Targum: The Lord was revealed, and stood and called, &c.

And called as at other times, Samuel, Samuel!] Only he repeats his name, to move the greater attention.

Then Samuel answered, Speak; for thy servant heareth.] He omits the name of the Lord, in his answer which Eli directed him to make: either out of fear, or uncertainty, whether it was the Lord that spake to him, or not.

Ver. 11. And the Lord said unto Samuel, Behold, I will do a thing in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle.] Which in our language we express thus: It shall stun all that hear it: as a man is, when a clap of terrible thunder strikes his ears, which even deafens him, so that he can hear nothing else. This was fulfilled, when the doleful news came that the ark was taken, and both Eli's sons slain, and he fell down and brake his neck, &c.

Ver. 12. In that day I will perform against Eli all the things that I have spoken concerning his house.] By the man of God in the foregoing chapter.

When I begin, I will also make an end.] He doth not mean that he would begin and make an end at once; but that he would persevere in his punishments, and not desist when he began, till all his threatenings were fulfilled, viz. in the death of Eli, and of his sons; and the slaughter of eighty-five priests of this family by Doeg, and the thrusting Abiathar (who escaped that slaughter) out of his office, and so depriving that family of its dignity and honour.

Ver. 13. For I have told him, that I will judge his house for ever, for the iniquity which he knoweth.] For he could not be ignorant of the crimes committed so publicly; and of which there was such a general complaint.

Because his sons made themselves vile.] Or, they made light of God and of his people; having no regard to either of them. Or, they made the service of God vile in the eyes of the people; as the words may be translated, and as the LXX. understand them.

And he restrained them not.] He did not frown upon them, as it is in the Hebrew. Which doth not signify, that he shewed no sign of displeasure against their wickedness (for he did chide them, though too gently, for it), but he did not severely reprove them; and when that would not restrain them, turn them out of their office, or suspend them until they were reformed. For which cause God passed this severe sentence upon the whole family; that they should lose the dignity of the high-priesthood, and be made as vile and contemptible as they had rendered God's service.

Ver. 14. And therefore I have sworn unto the house of Eli, that the iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged with sacrifice nor offering for ever.] By iniquity is meant the punishment of iniquity; which he threatens should not be removed, or mitigated, by any sort of sacrifices, or oblations, that could be brought to the altar; but only (as the Gemara upon Rosch Hashanah ventures to say) by the law, and by the retributions of the saints. By the law, they mean not merely the study of the law, but the practice of it, by observing God's commands; and by retributions of the saints, works of charity, bounty, and liberality, beyond what the Divine law required. (See Dr. Windet, de Vita functorum Statu, p. 193.)

Ver. 15. And Samuel lay down until the morning, and opened the door of the house of the Lord.] This was one of the works of the Levites, to open and shut the door of the court of the Lord's house.

And Samuel feared to shew Eli the vision.] Having no commaud from God to do it; and being loath to grieve the old man by telling him bad news.

Ver. 16. Then Eli called Samuel, and said, Samuel, my son. And he answered, Here am I.] The old man being so solemnly threatened by the late message from God to him, was afraid he was concerned in what the Lord had now said to Samuel.

Ver. 17. And he said, What is the thing that the Lord hath said unto thee? I pray thee hide it not from me: God do so to thee, and more also, if thou hide any thing from me, &c.] He adjures him to declare to him all that he had heard, and conceal nothing; which obliged him to satisfy his desire, as Micaiah and our blessed Saviour did in the like case.

Ver. 18. And Samuel told him every thing, and hid nothing from him. And he said, It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good.] This sentence being denounced by a child, who had his dependance upon Eli, far from any secular cunning, being unable to discern between the voice of the Lord and the voice of his tutor, till he instructed him, was a great deal more terrible to Eli than the message of the prophet had been, and wrought a greater effect upon him. For he humbly acknowledged the justice of God, and submitted to his sentence (as many of the fathers think) with a truly penitent heart. For now he knew (as our Dr. Jackson observes), that the sentence was irreversible, being confirmed by an oath, (ver. 14.) and the humility and modesty of Eli's answer, persuaded that excellent person, that the fearful sentence denounced against him extended no further, than to the irreversible deposition of him and his family from the priesthood, unto a poor and mean estate, wherein they were to live hereafter. (Consecration of the Son of God, chap. 18. parag. 5.)

Ver. 19. And Samuel grew, and the Lord was with him.] There were manifest tokens that God favoured him, as he did Joseph, (Gen. xxxi. 2.) The Targum hath it, Memra, the Word of the Lord was his help: or he revealed more and more of his mind to him: so that Israel knew God intended him for the office mentioned in the next verse.

And did let none of his words fall to the ground.] A metaphor from arrows shot out of a bow, which hit the mark. And they may refer either to the words of Samuel, or of God; which is the same. This proved him to be a prophet, or a man divinely inspired.

Ver. 20. And all Israel, from Dan even to Beer-sheba.] The whole country of Judea. (See Judg. xx. 1.)

Knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord.] Settled to be a constant prophet, who supplied the want of urim and thummim, when the ark was taken from them.

Ver. 21. And the Lord appeared again in Shiloh: for the Lord revealed himself to Samuel in Shiloh by the word of the Lord.] Having begun to appear in Shiloh, he continued this great favour: for he revealed himself to Samuel, not by dreams and visions, but by speaking to him in an audible voice, as he had done, ver. 4, &c. And indeed he seems to have been the first prophet, that was raised up to be a public instructor and governor of God's people. Others there had been before him; but not with so high an authority, and public approbation. And therefore St. Peter saith, (Acts iii.) "All the prophets from Samuel spake of those days:" as if he was the first eminent prophet whom the Lord raised up to them after Moses.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. AND the word of Samuel came unto all Israel.] The revelation of God's mind and will, which had been very scarce among them in former days, (iii. 1.) now grew very plentiful: for, as Samuel himself was ready to instruct every one that came to him, so he set up colleges of the prophets (as we read in the following parts of this book), who in time were settled in divers parts of the country, for the better preserving and spreading the knowledge of God among the people, (x. 5. xix. 18—20, &c.) Which made Abarbinel discourse in this manner, upon the foregoing words: "In the days of Eli the word of the Lord was scarce, and vision was seldom: but when Samuel appeared, not only he prophesied frequently, but many of the Israelites, by his means, were endued with the same spirit, according to these words, And the Lord appeared more frequently in Shiloh (so he understands them), because the Lord was revealed to Samuel in Shiloh. Which signifies, that the influence of the spirit which descended upon Samuel in Shiloh, reached unto others, because of its abundance, who were disposed to receive it: so that they also prophesied."

And Israel went out against the Philistines to battle.] This was in the middle of that forty years' dominion that the Philistines had over the Israelites, mentioned Judg. xiii. 1. unto which they were encouraged, perhaps, by the death of the lords of the Philistines; and the great slaughter which Samson had made of them at his death, (Judg. xvi. 27. 30.)

And pitched besides Eben-ezer.] Thus this place was called when this book was written; and so denominated from the famous battle which Samuel fought with the Philistines, twenty years after this, (vii. 12.)

And the Philistines pitched in Aphek.] In a place in the tribe of Judah, as we read Josh. xv. 53. upon the confines of the Philistines' country. But see xxix. 1. of this book.

Ver. 2. And the Philistines put themselves in array against Israel: and when they joined battle, Israel was smitten before the Philistines, &c.] Though Samuel was established a prophet, and it was so publicly known, that all Israel came to consult with him (as the foregoing verse seems to import), yet the elders did not take his advice about this war; as Ralbag thinks. Whose opinion is more probable than theirs, who think they did advise with him, and that he bade them fight, on purpose that the sentence upon Eli's sons might be fulfilled.

Ver. 3. And when the people were come into the camp, the elders of Israel said, Wherefore hath the Lord smitten us to-day before the Philistines?] They thought the justice of their cause was sufficient to entitle them to the favour of God, though they themselves were wicked. Thus Brutus cried when he fell, "O Jupiter! what is the cause of so great calamity?" not reflecting upon his horrible exactions in Cyprus; and his great ingratitude to Cæsar, whom he slew in the senate.

Let us fetch the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of Shiloh, that when it comes among us, it may save us out of the hands of our enemies.] This was as foolish as the other, to confide in God's help, when they lived in open disobedience to him.

Ver. 4. So the people sent to Shiloh, that they might bring from thence the ark of the covenant of the Lord.] This being done without any warrant from God, provoked him, rather than procured his presence with them. But they seem to have done it in imitation of Joshua marching with the ark against Jericho; for which he had a Divine authority, but they had none. Strigelius, therefore, well applies to this the observation of Polybius, that "many not studying to imitate the lives of excellent men, but only some of their extraordinary actions, have done nothing but expose their own folly to the world."

Which dwelleth between the cherubims.] Or, upon the cherubims, as the Chaldee, the LXX. and the Vulgar here translate it. But Lud. de Dieu is not satisfied with this sense; for he thinks the Divine Majesty did not sit upon the wings of the cherubims, but under them; in the space between them and the ark, which was his footstool: and therefore he translates these words, who inhabiteth the cherubims; which were as a canopy over the Schechinah.

But I have followed the ancient translation, in my notes upon Exod. xxv. 22.

And the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were there with the ark of the covenant of God.] Which they were ordered to bring out of its place (into which the Levites might not enter), and to accompany it unto the army.

Ver. 5. And when the ark of the covenant of the Lord came into the camp, all Israel shouted with a great shout.] As if they had already gotten the victory.

So that the earth rang again.] It was so loud, that it might be heard a great way off. (See 1 Kings i. 40. and what I have noted there.)

Ver. 6. And when the Philistines heard the noise of the shout, they said, What means the noise of this great shout in the camp of the Hebrews? And they understood that the ark of the Lord was come into the camp.] They sent to get intelligence, or were informed of it by some deserters.

Ver. 7. And the Philistines were afraid: for they said, God is come into the camp.] The symbol of God's presence; which perhaps they imagined the Israelites worshipped as their God.

And they said, Woe unto us, for there hath not been such a thing heretofore.] In all their battles that they or their neighbours had fought with the Israelites, they never heard of such a thing as this; which they thought must produce some extraordinary effect.

Ver. 8. Woe unto us! who shall deliver us out of the hand of these mighty Gods?] They fought with men before, but now with God, before whom none could stand. The Hebrew words Adirim Elohim, which we translate mighty Gods, are translated by Theodoret, the strong God: which agrees with what goes before, God is come into the camp: and with the Targum, Who shall deliver us out of the hand of the Word of the Lord, &c.

These are the Gods.] Or, this is the God.

That smote Egypt with all the plagues in the wilderness.] They seem not to have perfectly understood the sacred story; but thought all those plagues which are there spoken of had fallen on the Egyptians, while the Israelites were in the wilderness; where they were when their last plague befel them, by their being drowned in the Red Sea: but Jonathan thus paraphrases it: Who smote the Egyptians with all manner of plagues; and did wonders for his people in the desert.

Ver. 9. Be strong, and quit yourselves like men, ye Philistines!] These words were spoken by their great commanders, as the foregoing words in all likelihood were; who understood what had been done in foreign countries.

That ye be not servants unto the Hebrews, as they have been to you: quit yourselves like men, and fight.] When they were recovered out of the fright, which seized on them at first, they considered, that notwithstanding the power of their God, they had made the Israelites subject to them, and also overthrown them in a late battle; and therefore their present danger should only raise their courage, and make them fight more valiantly.

Ver. 10. And the Philistines fought.] They gave battle to the Israelites.

And the Israelites were smitten, and they fled every man unto his tent.] They were so routed, that they did not flee to their camp with an intent to renew the fight, (as they did before, ver. 3.) but dispersed themselves to their own home. And hitherto many of them dwelt in tents, as I observed before. (See Josh. xxii. 14. Judg. vii. 8. xx. 8.)

And there was a very great slaughter; for there fell of Israel thirty thousand footmen.] There fell but four thousand in the former battle, before the ark came among them, (ver. 2.) so little did the bare presence of the ark profit wicked men, that it rather did them hurt.

Ver. 11. And the ark of God was taken; and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were slain.] It is likely that (as Josephus saith) Eli parted with the ark from the tabernacle very unwillingly; but when he could not help it, he charged his sons, who went along with it, to lose their lives rather than lose it.

Ver. 12. And there ran a man of Benjamin out of the army, and came to Shiloh the same day.] Some of the Jews have a fancy that this man was Saul: for no other reason, that I can find, but because he was of that tribe, and a proper man, who, it is likely, could run swiftly. How far Shiloh was from Aphek, or from Eben-ezer (both which were in the tribe of Judah, as Shiloh was in Ephraim), near to which this battle was fought, is not certain; but not so distant but that a man might run the same day from the one to the other.

With his clothes rent, and with earth upon his head.] According to the manner of those who bewailed any great calamity. (Josh. vii. 6. Job ii. 12. Ezek. xxvii. 30.) From which last places, it appears, it was a custom among other nations. And is most lively expressed by Virgil in Æneid xii. ver. 609—611. where Latinus is represented as rending his clothes, and throwing dust upon his grey hairs, when he lamented his private and the public losses. Tiraquellus hath heaped up a great many examples of this, in his annotations on Alex. ab Alexandro, lib. iii. cap. 7.

Ver. 13. And when he came, lo, Eli sat upon a seat by the way-side: for his heart trembled for the ark of God.] He had caused a seat, I suppose, to be set for him, by the side of the gate that entered into the city, (ver. 18.) that he might hearken after news; being extremely concerned, above all things, for the ark of the covenant of God.

And when the man came into the city.] He passed by Eli, and said not a word to him, though he saw him sitting there; because he was loath he should be surprised with such sad tidings. Or, perhaps, he came into this city at some other gate.

And told it, all the city cried out.] Looking upon themselves as put out of the Divine protection, because they had lost the symbol of his presence, and the book of the covenant, the blessings of which they could no longer claim.

Ver. 14. And when Eli heard the noise of the crying, he said, What means the noise of this tumult? And the man came in hastily, and told Eli.] They about him had not the heart to resolve his question, but brought the man speedily to acquaint him with the truth.

Ver. 15. Now Eli was ninety-eight years old; and his eyes were dim, that he could not see.] He was not able to discern the sadness that was in the people's countenances, but only heard their shrieks and lamentations.

Ver. 16. And the man said, I am he that came out of the army, and I fled to-day out of the army.] The man represents himself as an eye-witness of what had passed, that he might gain the more credit to what he said: and adds, that he brought the freshest news.

And he said, What is there done, my son?] He asked if they had fought, and with what success.

Ver. 17. And the messenger answered and said, Israel is fled before the Philistines, and there hath been also a great slaughter among the people, and thy two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, are dead, and the ark of God is taken.] He hid nothing from him; but reserved the worst news till the last.

Ver. 18. And it came to pass, when he made mention of the ark of God, that he fell from off the seat backward, by the side of the gate.] At the entrance of the city, where his chair was set.

And his neck brake, and he died.] Though he was too indulgent a father, yet he was highly commendable in this, that he was not so much affected with the loss of his sons, and the slaughter of the people, as with the loss of the ark of God. For he kept up his courage, and did not fall, till he heard that mentioned. The more public any concern is, the more it is laid to heart by men of worthy spirits. Such a one was Eli, with whom God was angry upon his sons' account; otherwise he was adorned with many virtues, as Procopius Gazæus observes.

For he was an old man, and heavy.] Being oppressed with grief he swooned away; and being both very old, and very unwieldy, his fall was the more dangerous, and the vertebræ of his neck the more easily displaced.

And he judged Israel forty years.] This aggravated the calamity of his family, that, having been so long in the highest station, it fell into great afflictions in a moment. (See upon chapter the first, ver. 9.) The Jews observe, in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 13. that on the day he died, God forsook the tabernacle in Shiloh, having delivered his strength into captivity, &c. (Psal. lxxviii. 60, 61.)

Ver. 19. And his daughter-in-law, Phinehas's wife, was with child, near to be delivered: and when she heard the tidings that the ark of God was taken, and that her father-in-law and her husband were dead, she bowed herself and travailed; for her pains came upon her.] The great anguish of her mind brought on her labour: and, as Josephus thinks, two months before her time. Which doth not well agree with what is said in the beginning of this verse, that she was near to be delivered. The Hebrew word which we translate bowed herself, signifies she fell on her knees. For so the manner was in those countries: which Ludolphus confirms in his Ethiopic History, and his commentary upon it, (lib. i. cap. 14. n. 101.)

Ver. 20. And, at the time of her death, the women that stood by her.] Assisted at her labour.

Said unto her, Fear not; for thou hast born a son.] The mention of which they thought would have revived her; according to what we read in the gospel of St. John, xvi. 21.

But she answered not, neither did she regard it.] Being so overcome with sorrow and grief, that she minded nothing that was said or done about her.

Ver. 21. And she named the child Ichabod, saying, The glory is departed from Israel: because the ark of God was taken, and because of her father-in-law, and her husband.] Only having a little recovered her spirits, she lamented this chiefly, that God was gone from them: for so the word glory frequently signifies in Scripture, (Psal. cvi. 20. Jer. ii. 11.) The Hebrew word אי also signifies the same with לא not, as Ludolphus observes, in his commentary upon his Ethiopic History, (lib. i. cap. xvi. 106.) And so Bochartus here translates Ichabod, by inglorious, or without glory: that is, saith he, without the true God, (par. i. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 34.)

Ver. 22. And she said, The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken.] She seems to have expired with these words; which she repeats again, because this chiefly lay at her heart; as the concerns of religion do in all pious spirits.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. AND the Philistines took the ark of God.] Why God suffered the ark of his presence to fall into the hands of those uncircumcised people, Abarbinel gives four or five reasons. The Israelites were such great sinners, that they were unworthy of his presence among them. The idolatry of Micah remained to this day in the land; therefore he fulfilled his threatening, (Lev. xxvi. 19. 31.) The sin, also, of the priests highly provoked him to deliver up the ark, which was in their hands, when they were killed. And the Israelites greatly offended in carrying the ark into the battle, without asking counsel of God: who resolved to demonstrate his power even among the enemies of Israel.

And brought it from Eben-ezer.] Where the Israelites were encamped before the battle, (iv. 1.) and whither it is possible they fled, to save the ark, when their army was overthrown.

Unto Ashdod.] One of the five cities of the Philistines, where some of the Anakims were left unsubdued by Joshua, (Josh. xi. 22.) and was in future times the principal city of the country, called Azotus. And perhaps it was so now; which might be the reason the ark was carried thither, rather than to any other city; being situated also in the middle of the five principalities; and having a famous temple in it (mentioned in the next verse), whither all the country resorted.

Ver. 2. And when the Philistines took the ark of God, they brought it into the house of Dagon, and set it by Dagon.] The heathen were wont to offer part of the spoil that they took in war unto their gods: and what could there be more acceptable than this to Dagon, who seemed to have triumphed over the God of Israel? thus we read, in after-ages, how conquerors triumphed not only over the people whom they vanquished, but over their gods also. As Isaiah represented Bel and Nebo carried captive, when Babylon was taken, (xlvi. 1, 2.) And Jeremiah saith the same of Chemosh, the god of Moab, and Malcolm, the god of Ammon, (xlviii. 7. xlix. 3. and see Dan. xi. 8.) Thus the Romans did very frequently, as Bochartus shews, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34. Yet there are some who imagine, that their setting the ark by Dagon (on the side of him), signified that they intended to do some honour to it, as having the presence of God in it. Concerning Dagon, see what I have noted upon Judg. xvi. 23. and Mr. Selden, Syntag. ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 3. where he confutes those who think Dagon hath his name from dagan, which signifies corn (as if he were the inventor of it), and confirms the opinion of those who think he had his name from dag, which signifies a fish; fishes and pigeons being sacred to him. Some take this idol to have been the same among the Syrians, with Triton among the Europeans, or with Neptune, or (as Scaliger will have it), with Venus, who was worshipped under the name of Atergatis, and Adargatis: which are only the corruption of the Hebrew words Addir-daga, i. e. magnificent fish, as Mr. Selden there observes; though Bochart thinks this was a different goddess from Dagon, (par. i. Hieroz. lib. i. cap. 6.)

Ver. 3. And when they of Ashdod arose early in the morning.] To go to pray at the temple.

Behold, Dagon was fallen with his face to the earth before the ark of the Lord.] In a posture of the most humble adoration: which was prostration; acknowledging the God of Israel to be above all gods. In this some of the Jews think there was a miracle in a miracle, as they speak: for whereas the ark was set by Dagon (i. e. on one side of him) when Dagon fell, it was not right forward, but he was turned about with his face towards the ark. (See Buxtorf de Area Fœderis, p. 171.)

And they took Dagon, and set him in his place again.] Looking upon it as a mischance.

Ver. 4. And when they rose early on the morrow morning, behold, Dagon was fallen with his face to the ground before the ark of the Lord.] Which shewed his former fall was not by chance, but by the power of God, before whom he could not stand.

And the head of Dagon, and both the palms of his hands, were cut off upon the threshold.] It is likely Dagon stood on high, upon some pedestal or altar; from whence he was not only thrown down, but his head and his hands thrown out of the door with the greatest contempt: being cut off upon the threshold of the temple. A token (as most interpreters think) that this idol was void of wisdom and power, his head and his hands (which are the seat of those qualities) being gone. Some have a fancy that Dagon had feet also upon his tail: from whence the LXX. it is likely, here add, that both his feet were cut off also: which hath no ground at all in the Hebrew text. (See Selden, in the forenamed book; and Vossius de Idolol. lib. ii. cap. 16.)

Only the stump of Dagon was left him.] In the Hebrew the words are, only Dagon was left to him: that is, saith Kimchi, nothing but the form of a fish remained; all that resembled a man being broken off. Thus the Lord shewed there was no god besides him: his ark, though taken captive and carried into a strange land (as St. Chrysostom discourses, Orat. v. adversus Judæos), throwing down their idol twice, and thereby demonstrating, that the Israelites were not overthrown for want of any power in their God to defend them, but for the iniquity of those that worshipped him.

Ver. 5. Therefore neither the priests of Dagon, nor any that come into Dagon's house, tread on the threshold of Dagon unto this day.] Out of reverence to it; looking upon it (as Abarbinel glosses) as a holy thing, by the touch of Dagon's head and hands. So foolishly did they pervert the meaning of God, that, instead of thinking Dagon to be no god, they honoured the very threshold of his temple as if it had some divinity in it. For it is an idle conceit which the Jews have in Jalkut, that forsaking Dagon they worshipped his threshold. (See Buxtorf, in his Hist. Arcæ, cap. 19. p. 172.) This superstition continued for some ages, as Bochartus gathers from Zephan. i. 9. where God saith he will punish those that leap on the threshold, after the manner of the Philistines, as he expounds it, after the Targum, par. i. Hierozoic. lib. ii. cap. 36.

From those words, unto this day, Hobbes and such-like writers frame an argument, that this book was not wrote by Samuel; not considering that these things happened when Samuel was but a youth, and that this was written when he was old; so that there was a considerable space of time between them.

Ver. 6. But the hand of the Lord was heavy upon them of Ashdod.] Since they were so blind as not to see his hand in throwing down their god, &c. he smote them with such sore plagues in their own bodies, as made them sensible of his power.

And he destroyed them.] With a pestilence, I suppose, of which many died. (See ver. ult.)

And smote them with emerods, even Ashdod, and the coasts belonging to it.] Not only the people of the city, but of the villages belonging to it, were smitten with this plague. About which interpreters differ very much: some taking this disease for a dysentery, which was so violent that it rotted their guts, and made them fall down and come out. Whereupon others think it was that which we call procidentia ani, the falling of the fundament; but most interpreters, both ancient and modern, take it as we do, for the emerods. For it was some disease in the hinder-parts, as appears from the words of the Psalmist, lxxviii. 66. as they are commonly understood. See my notes on Deut. xxviii. 27. and Nic. Fuller Miscell. lib. v. cap. 3. especially Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 36. where he gives a large account of the Hebrew word apholim, which is used only here and in the forenamed place of Deuteronomy.

At the end of this verse, the Vulgar and the LXX. also add, that a great number of mice started up out of the earth, and overrunning their fields, made great waste there. But, as Lyra well observes, this gloss in all likelihood being written in the margin, out of chap. vi. ver. 4, 5. it crept at last into the text, though it be neither in the Hebrew, nor the Chaldee, nor Syriac, nor Arabic. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 34.)

Ver. 7. And when the men of Ashdod saw that it was so, they said, The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us: for his hand is sore upon us, and upon Dagon our god.] Now their eyes were opened to see, that though they had vanquished the Israelites, they could not stand before the God of Israel. And it seems no unreasonable conjecture, that they speak here, and in the following verse, concerning the ark, with a note of distinction; calling it the ark of the God of Israel, (ver. 8. 10, 11. vi. 3.) and the ark of the Lord, (vi. 8.) For other nations had such arks, and for the same use, to put their mysteries in them: as in this were the tables of the covenant alone. Clemens Alexandrinus relates what trash and other filthy stuff was in the μυστικαὶ κισταὶ, the mystical coffers of the heathen. From whose superstition, that the Israelites might be preserved, God, perhaps, appointed this ark to be made by Moses. (See his Προτρεπτικὸς λόγος, p. 13, 14.)

Ver. 8. They sent therefore, and gathered the lords of the Philistines unto them, and said, What shall we do with the ark of the God of Israel?] They desired a general council might be held, to consult what to do in this case; whether to keep the ark, or how to dispose of it.

And they answered.] i. e. The lords of the Philistines (who in the language of that country were called Sarnim, the same with Sarim in the Hebrew) came to the following resolution.

Let the ark of the God of Israel be carried about unto Gath. And they carried the ark of the God of Israel about thither.] They seem to be possessed with a superstitious conceit, that there was something in the place which was offensive to him; and that he might be better pleased with another: just as Æneas and his people indicted their beds and their houses, of the disasters that befel them; and Cadmus forsook his own city, as if the ill luck which hunted him had been the place's, not his own: as our Dr. Jackson observes, out of Ovid, in his Original of Unbelief, chap. 18. parag. 4.

——— "tanquam fortuna locorum Non sua se premeret"———.

Gath was the next city to Ashdod, northward of it: in which some of the Anakims also remained. (Josh. xi. 21.)

Ver. 9. And it was so, that, after they had carried it about, the hand of the Lord was against the city with a very great destruction.] A great many died of the pestilence, as they had done at Ashdod.

And he smote the men of the city, both small and great, and they had emerods in their secret parts.] They that did not die were sorely tormented by emerods; which was a disease they had never known before; as some understand the last words. Or, they had those the physicians call blind emerods: which do not swell outwardly, but lie hidden within; and are the most grievous and hard to be cured of all other.

Ver. 10. Therefore they sent the ark of God to Ekron.] The last city of the Philistines northward: where in after-times (if not now) the famous god called Baal-zebub was worshipped, (2 Kings i. 2.)

And it came to pass, as the ark of God came to Ekron, that the Ekronites cried out, saying, They have brought about the ark of the God of Israel to us, to slay us and our people.] These seem to be the words of the governors of the city; who had learned, from the experience of the other great cities, that no place was secure from the stroke of the God of Israel.

Ver. 11. So they sent and gathered together all the lords of the Philistines.] As they of Ashdod had done, (ver. 6.)

And said, Send away the ark of the God of Israel, and let it go again to its own place, that it slay us not, and our people.] Destroy the whole city.

For there was a deadly destruction throughout all the city; and the hand of God was very sore upon them.] Which made them desire it might be sent out of the country, and not to the other cities in the south, Gaza and Askelon.

Ver. 12. And the men that died not were smote with emerods: and the cry of the city went up to heaven.] This is the explication of the foregoing words: some were struck with the pestilence as soon as the ark came thither, and others lingered under intolerable pains, which made them cry out in an inexpressible manner: for this is an hyperbolical speech; things that are exceeding great beyond expression, being said to reach up to heaven, (Deut. i. 28.) Thus Virgil, lib. ii. Æneid. in many places, ver. 223. 338. 488.

"Clamores simul horrendos ad sydera tollit.
——— Sublatus ad æthera clamor.
——— Ferit aurea sydera clamor."

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. AND the ark of the Lord was in the country of the Philistines seven months.] The Hebrew word sadeth, which we translate country, signifying a field (as the LXX. here translate it, ἐν ἀγρῷ), Theodoret, and Procopius Gazæus, think, that the Philistines, being so plagued by the ark in their cities, sent it into the open fields: but were disappointed of their hope, of being freer from the hand of God there, than in their cities; for mice sprung up out of the ground, and wasted their corn and their fruits, as the LXX. here add, at the end of this verse, as they did in the foregoing chapter, ver. 6. καὶ ἐξέζεσεν ἡ γῆ αὐτῶν μυίας, and their land bubbled up mice. But the Chaldee hath no such thing; and saith expressly, The ark was in the cities of the Philistines seven months.

Ver. 2. And the Philistines.] That is, the lords of the country.

Called for the priests.] Who were best skilled in sacred rites and ceremonies.

And the diviners.] Who were a kind of prophets, pretending to know the will of God, and to foretel future events. See Deut. xviii. 12. of this word kosemim, which we translate diviners. From whence Bochartus thinks the Roman word Casmilli is derived, being as much as Kosme-el, the minister of God.

Saying, Tell us what we shall do to the ark of the Lord?] They never called it the ark of the Lord till this time: but now were struck with some apprehension that the Lord was above all gods.

Tell us wherewith we shall send it to its place.] They did not call them to be resolved by them whether they should send it home or not, (for upon that they seem to have been resolved already, ver. 11.) but in what manner it should be sent, and whether accompanied with any presents to obtain his favour.

Ver. 3. And they said, If ye send away the ark of the God of Israel.] Against which resolution they had nothing to object, but rather approved it.

Send it not empty.] They answer directly to the question, first in general, that it must not be sent back without some offering.

But in any wise return him a trespass-offering.] Concerning the Hebrew word asham, which we translate trespass-offering, and how it differs from a sin-offering, see upon Lev. v. 15. It seems to be presented by the Philistines as an acknowledgment that they had offended the God of Israel, by bringing his ark from its proper place, for which they begged his pardon by this offering.

Then ye shall be healed, and it shall be known to you why his hand is not removed from you.] It seems their plagues still continued (notwithstanding their resolution to send home the ark), but they hoped by this offering they would be removed; and the reason would appear why they were removed no sooner: for these diviners were not sure from whence these plagues came: but by this means they thought they should either be healed, or know the ark was not the cause of their sickness.

Ver. 4. Then said they, What shall be the trespass-offering which we shall return to him?] It is very observable what reverence they had to their priests and prophets, without whose advice they would do nothing: and therefore desire to be particularly informed what the trespass-offering should be, that they might not send one that was improper. All nations thought their gods were to be appeased when they were angry, by honorary gifts, as many have observed: particularly Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 36. And of that opinion they were in these ancient times. But wise men still gave it in charge, "Ne quis impius oblatis donis Deum placare audeat:" that no wicked man should presume to attempt to appease God by the offering of gifts, as Cicero speaks, lib. ii. de Legibus.

They answered, Five golden emerods, and five golden mice, according to the number of the lords of the Philistines.] Who were five, and were to be at the charge of offering one for each of them. This also was a custom among the ancient heathens, to consecrate unto their gods such monuments of their deliverances, as represented the evils from which they were freed. As they dedicated to Isis and Neptune a table, which contained the express image of the shipwreck, which they had escaped: and slaves and captives, when they had regained their liberty, offered their chains. Which Christians in the fifth century began to imitate, as Bochartus observes (in the forenamed place) out of Theodoret. Accordingly the Philistines, hoping shortly to be delivered from the emerods and mice, wherewith they were sorely afflicted, sent the images of them unto that God from whom they expected deliverance. And this is still practised among the Indians, as Tavernier relates in his travels to their country, p. 92. where he saith, that when any pilgrim goes to a pagod for the cure of any disease, he brings the figure of the member affected; made either of gold, silver, or copper, according to his quality; which he offers to his god, and then falls a singing, as all others do after they have offered. Mr. Selden also hath observed, that mice were used among the ancient heathen for lustration and cleansing, de Diis Syris, Syntag. i. cap. 6.

For one plague was on you all, and on your land.] The plague of emerods upon their own bodies; and the plague of mice upon their land.

Ver. 5. Wherefore ye shall make images of the emerods, and images of your mice which mar the land.] By this it appears, that their country was infested by mice, which had eaten their corn in the field, and other fruits of the earth. Which is a plague which divers ancient authors mention, as sent upon several countries, by the anger of their gods: particularly upon a city in Mysia, and upon the country of Troas, as is observed by Huetius, in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 12. And Bochart hath collected a great many more examples of such devastations in Spain, Italy, Thrace, &c. made by mice; which have the name of achbar in Hebrew (as he thinks), signifying a destroyer of the field. (Hieroz. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 34.)

And ye shall give glory unto the God of Israel.] That is, acknowledge him, by this present to him, to be the inflicter of these plagues, and to have power to remove them; begging his pardon, and seeking for healing from him. For thus this phrase signifies in the like case, Rev. xvi. 9. where St. John complains, that after many plagues men did not repent, to give glory unto God: that is, by repenting, to acknowledge his sovereign authority, justice, holiness, &c.

Perhaps he will lighten his hand from off you, and from off your gods, and from off your land.] For they had all suffered; their gods as well as themselves, and their land.

Ver. 6. Wherefore then do ye harden your hearts, as the Egyptians and Pharaoh hardened their hearts? When he had wrought wonderfully among them.] These words seem to import, that some of them were loath to send the ark away with such presents; and objected against it: which moved the priests and diviners, to bid them take heed, lest they brought upon themselves the fate of Pharaoh, and his people. With whose history these men were acquainted; and being discreet persons made a good use of the examples of former times: and believed as much as many of the Israelites did, or rather more.

Did they not let the people go, and they departed?] When it was too late, they consented to what was demanded. The Jews say in Jalkut, that the Philistines at first said among themselves, This is the God who smote the Egyptians with ten plagues: but they are all ended. Whereupon God said, "Do you imagine I have not one plague more? I will send such a one upon you, as never was from the beginning of the world," &c. (See Buxtorf. Hist. Arcæ Fœderis, cap. 19.) If they had any such thoughts, their priests pertinently enough put them in mind of the Egyptians: that they might not make themselves like them in hardness of heart; as God had made them like in their plagues.

Ver. 7. Now therefore make a new cart, and take two milch-kine, on which there hath come no yoke.] Both these were in honour of the ark; that they employed nothing about it which had ever served for any other use. And there was another reason also for the latter of these; that they might be the more certain they were led by the God of Israel, if they went directly unto his country: for kine unaccustomed to the yoke are wont to run back, and turn out of the way into which they are put.

And tie the kine to the cart, and bring their calves home from them.] This would make it still more wonderful, if they did not return to their calves, when they heard them bleat after them; which they naturally would have done, if a greater power had not drawn them a contrary way.

Ver. 8. And take the ark of the Lord, and lay it upon the cart; and put the jewels of gold, which you return him for a trespass-offering, in a coffer by the side thereof; and send it away, that it may go.] They had either heard, or by their present sufferings were made to fear, that it was dangerous to look into the ark; and therefore they did not open it, to put their present within it; but put it in a coffer by the side of it. It is probable the word argaz (which we meet withal no where else), in the language of the Philistines, signifies either a coffer, or a purse, or a wallet, as Josephus translates it: and Bochartus thinks it likely, that these golden jewels were put into little bags, which hung on either side the ark.

Ver. 9. And see, if it go by the way of its own coast.] Without any guide: and being set (as Josephus saith) in a place where three ways met.

To Beth-shemesh.] A city in the tribe of Judah, in the confines of both countries.

Then he hath done us this great evil: but if not, then we shall know that it is not his hand that smote us; it was a chance that happened to us.] From some unknown cause.

Ver. 10. And the men did so; and took two milch-kine, and tied them to the cart, and shut up their calves at home.] The men of Ekron did all this, as the priests had directed.

Ver. 11. And they laid the ark of the Lord upon the cart, and the coffer with the mice of gold and the images of their emerods.

Ver. 12. And the kine took the straight way to the way of Beth-shemesh, and went along the highway, lowing as they went, and turned not aside to the right hand, or to the left.] Though they had no driver, nor visible director; and had such strong attractives to draw them back, and there were so many other ways in which they might have gone; yet they went directly towards Beth-shemesh, without the least deviation; lowing all the way after their calves, which had been taken from them: unto whom their natural affection would have inclined them to return, if by a higher hand they had not been led forward to the land of Judah.

And the lords of the Philistines went after them to the borders of Beth-shemesh.] To observe (as the priests advised, ver. 9.) whether of themselves they would go thither.

Ver. 13. And they of Beth-shemesh were reaping their wheat-harvest in the valley.] Which being about Pentecost, it shews the ark was taken captive in the latter end of the foregoing year. (Compare this with ver. 1.)

And they lifted up their eyes, and saw the ark, and rejoiced to see it.] Come back to them in such a wonderful manner, without any visible conductor.

Ver. 14. And the cart came into the field of Joshua, a Beth-shemite, and stood there.] This was another marvellous thing, that the kine went no further; being come into a territory of a city of the priests, (for so Beth-shemesh was, see upon Josh. xxi. 16.) who were to take care of the ark of God.

Where there was a great stone.] Which seems to have been the boundary of the two countries.

And they clave the wood of the cart, and offered the kine a burnt-offering unto the Lord.] The great stone, I suppose, serving instead of an altar; whereon they offered a whole burnt-offering of praise and thanks to God for his goodness: for they thought in reason that this cart, and these kine, should never be converted to any common use, and therefore employed them in making this sacrifice. In which the priests did not sin, though cows were not, by the law, allowed to be offered to God, and no offering was to be made, but in the place which God had chosen. For this was to be understood of ordinary offerings, not of such as an extraordinary occasion might require; and besides, the ark being here, God was so also (who as yet appointed no place for its future residence, now Shiloh was destroyed), and so their sacrifices, they thought, in reason, might be here acceptable to him. And they the rather chose to offer these cows to God, because they belonged to him, and therefore were to be his sacrifices; they having drawn his ark, and been particularly directed by him.

Ver. 15. And the Levites took down the ark of the Lord, and the coffer that was with it, wherein the jewels of gold were.] It was not the business of the Levites to take down the ark; but of the priests: who after they had disposed it to be fit for the Levites to take it upon their shoulders, the Kohathites were to carry it. (See Numb. iv. 15.)

And put them upon the great stone.] Where, it is probable, they had before offered up the kine, instead of an altar.

And the men of Beth-shemesh offered burnt-offerings, and sacrificed sacrifices, the same day unto the Lord.] The sacrifices (which they are said to sacrifice) were peace-offerings; which they added to their whole burnt-sacrifices, that they might make a feast upon them; as an expression of their great joy to see the ark returned to them in such a miraculous manner.

Ver. 16. And when the five lords of the Philistines.] Who stood upon the borders of their country, (ver. 12.)

Had seen it.] Beheld all the forenamed wonders.

They returned to Ekron the same day.] And reported, no doubt, what they had seen: which convinced them, that their plagues came from the God of Israel

Ver. 17. And these are the golden emerods, which the Philistines returned for a trespass-offering unto the Lord; for Ashdod one, for Gaza one, for Askelon one, for Gath one, for Ekron one.] Each city of this country, I suppose, was at the charge of presenting one emerod. Which cities are not reckoned in the order wherein they lay; but Ashdod being the city to which the ark was first brought, it is mentioned first. But from south to north they lay in this order Gaza, Askelon, Ashdod (which as I said was in the middle of them), Gath, and Ekron.

Ver. 18. And the golden mice, according to the number of all the cities of the Philistines belonging to the five lords, both of fenced cities, and of country villages, even unto the great stone of Abel, whereon they set down the ark of the Lord; which stone remaineth to this day in the field of Joshua the Beth-shemite.] As the golden emerods were made at the public charge of those cities, so were the mice also: unto the making of which the villages likewise contributed. For their fields being principally afflicted by the mice, as the cities were by the emerods; and they being all sharers, some way or other, in the public calamities, it was thought reasonable they should all join in this trespass-offering: which was an offering of the whole nation, as far as ever their coast extended, and that was to the great stone mentioned ver. 14. which is there called Eben-gedolah, the great stone; but here Ebel-gedolah, the great weeping, from the lamentations which were here made upon the following occasion, mentioned in the next verse.

Ver. 19. And he smote the men of Beth-shemesh, because they had looked into the ark of the Lord.] Which God had forbidden, not only to the common people, but to the sons of Levi also, (Numb. iv. 20.) But their curiosity made them forget their duty: being desirous either to see whether the Philistines had taken out the tables of the covenant; or that they might have a view of such an ancient sacred monument, written by God's own hand. Out of this story, as Bochartus ingeniously conjectures, the Greeks forged the fable of Bacchus; who was very angry with the Athenians, because they did not receive his mysteries with pomp, when they were brought out of Bœotia into Attica; and smote them with a sore disease in their secret parts. In his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 18. in the latter end.

Even he smote of the people fifty thousand and threescore and ten men.] This translation is made by an unaccountable transposition of the words: which in the Hebrew lie exactly thus, He smote of the people, threescore and ten men, fifty thousand men. Which the Gemara, with Jarchi and Kimchi, and the Targum, expound, He smote all the Sanhedrin, which were seventy men, and fifty thousand of the common people. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 19. n. 3.) But as it is a question whether there was any such Sanhedrin in these days, and it is certain there was not at Beth-shemesh; so it is not likely it was such a populous place, nor is there any particle to couple the last sum with the foregoing. Therefore Bochart's interpretation is far more reasonable, which is this, He smote threescore and ten men; fifty out of a thousand men. God was so indulgent, that is, as not to slay all that were guilty, but only seventy of them; observing this proportion, that out of a thousand offenders, he smote only fifty persons; that is, a twentieth part. So that of fourteen hundred that deserved punishment, he smote only seventy men; which is the twentieth part of that number. And this interpretation is very easy, only supplying the particle mem before eleph, making the sense to be out of a thousand. And he instances in many places of Scripture, where this particle is manifestly wanting, to make out the true meaning. See his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 36. p. 370. where he shews that Josephus thus understood these words, lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 2. where he saith God smote Ἑβδομήκοντα τῶν ἐκ τῆς Βηθσάμης κώμης, seventy of those of the village of Beth-shemesh. And thus Abarbinel also understands the first words, that he smote at Beth-shemesh only seventy men; the other number, he thinks, refers to those who were slain in the country of the Philistines; the story whereof is now finished. For the particle beth, he thinks, signifies as much as with, in this manner: Together with the seventy of Beth-shemesh, he smote in all fifty thousand, because of the ark. But Bochartus's interpretation is most natural; which is highly applauded by another person of very great learning, Johan. Wagenselius, who, in his annotations upon the Gemara of Sota, (cap. 7. sect. 15.) saith, "Ipsa veritas militat," Truth itself defends this opinion of Bochartus. And indeed it cannot be conceived, there should be so many as our translation supposes, to be slain at Beth-shemesh, and the coasts thereof, being but a village; or if there had, it is very improbable that God would smite so many at once: for there would have been none left to make lamentation. Therefore, as the Romans decimated the soldiers that had offended; that is, put every tenth man to death; so God here punished half so many for this offence of looking into the ark.

And the people lamented, because the Lord had smitten of the people with a great slaughter.] It was a great slaughter, considering the smallness of this place; as Abarbinel glosses upon these words, who takes it, as Josephus doth, for a village. And it is not strange that some should be smitten with death; for it was always accounted, in all nations, a great profaneness for any one that was not initiated to look into their mysteries; to prevent which hereafter God made so many examples of his displeasure in this place. Instances of those among the heathen, who were struck blind, or upon whom some other calamity fell upon such account, the illustrious Spanhemius hath noted in his observations upon Callimachus's hymn in Lavarum Palladis, ver. 34. yea, though they did it ignorantly, as he shews upon ver. 78. 82. p. 606. (See also Huetius, in his Alnetanæ Quæstiones, lib. ii. cap. 12. p. 200.)

Ver. 20. And the men of Beth-shemesh said, Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? and to whom shall he go up from us?] They seem by this to be sensible of their rashness, and acknowledge the holiness of God to be such, that they were not worthy of his Divine presence among them; but desires that some who could do him honour better than they, might take the ark into their care. But Abarbinel thinks they were only struck with a great fear, as the Philistines were when God plagued them; which made them send the ark from one place to another, as they of Beth-shemesh now sent to those of Kirjath-jearim, to come and fetch the ark to their city; fearing more of them should die, if it stayed with them at Beth-shemesh.

Ver. 21. And they sent messengers to the inhabitants of Kirjath-jearim, saying, The Philistines have brought again the ark of the Lord; come ye down, and fetch it unto you.] This was a city which stood upon a hill, and therefore they desired them to come down from thence. And being a strong place, there they thought the ark might be secure, in case of any new incursions of their enemies. See concerning this city, Josh. xv. 9, 10. where it is called also Kirjath-Baal, xviii. 14. and Baalah, or Baal-Judah, 2 Sam. vi. 2. 1 Chron. xiii. 6.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. AND the men of Kirjath-jearim came, and fetched up the ark of the Lord.] They cheerfully received the message; and were so far from thinking themselves in danger by entertaining it, that they thought it a blessing, and kept it with them till the reign of David.

And brought it to the house of Abinadab in the hill.] In the highest part, I suppose, of the city: as David afterward placed it upon Mount Sion.

And sanctified Eleazar his son to keep the ark of the Lord.] Which belonged to the Levites: therefore Abinadab was of that tribe, otherwise he could not have consecrated (i. e. set apart, or solemnly appointed) his son to keep the ark, i. e. to attend it, and see that no rudeness was offered to it; as well as to keep a guard about it, to defend it from violence. If it be inquired why they did not carry the ark to Shiloh, its ancient seat, the answer is, that the Philistines had destroyed that place; and the tabernacle, upon the death of Eli, was removed from thence unto Nob, where it remained till the death of Samuel. And after his death it was carried to Gibeon, where it remained fifty years, according to the account of the author of Seder Olam Rabba. All which time the ark was in Kirjath-jearim, till David brought it first to the house of Obed-Edom, and then to his own city. After which the tabernacle still remained at Gibeon till Solomon's temple was built, 1 Chron. xvi. 39. 2 Chron. i. 3. where we read, that, even after the death of his father, Solomon sacrificed at Gibeon, the tabernacle being there.

Ver. 2. And it came to pass, while the ark abode in Kirjath-jearim, the time was long; for it was twenty years.] This is not to be understood of the whole time that the ark remained here; for it continued, as I said before, in this place, till the time of David, (2 Chron. vi. 3.) which was about forty-six years; therefore it refers to the following words.

And all the house of Israel lamented after the Lord.] Or rather (as Dr. Lightfoot translates them), Then all the house of Israel, &c. Their idolatry had taken such deep root in them, that neither the loss of the ark, nor the slaughter of so many Israelites, wrought upon their hearts. But it was twenty years before they minded the ark, or took any notice of it. Then they were awakened to some sense of their duty, and began to seek the favour of God, and lament their apostacy from him. (See his Annot. on this place, and upon Acts iii. 24. p. 758.) And one reason why they did not regard the ark, was, perhaps, because it was now seated in the borders of the country of the Philistines, of whom they were afraid. And this is the sense of Abarbinel. For though others think, that from the day that the ark came to Kirjath-jearim, the Israelites began to lament their sins, and to turn to God; having heard of the miracles that had been done in the land of the Philistines, &c. yet he doth not approve of this opinion; but will have their lamentation to begin after the ark had been twenty years at this place, where it remained many more years than twenty.

Ver. 3. And Samuel spake unto all the house of Israel.] Who were assembled at some solemn festival; or were summoned by him to attend him; for after the death of Eli he began to judge Israel.

If you return to the Lord with all your heart.] By this it appears, that his reproofs and instructions, and the representation he had made of their sin, and of their danger, had touched their hearts, and made them begin to lament themselves, and seek his favour; whereupon he exhorts them to give this following proof of their sincerity.

Then put away the strange gods and Ashtaroth from among you.] By the strange gods I take Baalim to be meant; which are frequently joined with Ashtaroth, as they are in the very next verse to this, where their obedience to this exhortation is reported. (And see upon Judg. ii. 12, 13. 17. iii. 7. viii. 33.)

And prepare your heart unto the Lord.] By serious resolutions.

To serve him only.] As it follows in the next verse.

And he will deliver you out of the hands of the Philistines.] Who had now oppressed them, less or more, for the space of forty years.

Ver. 4. Then the children of Israel did put away Baalim and Ashtaroth, and served the Lord only.] There was now, I suppose, a general reformation made in the worship of God.

Ver. 5. And Samuel said, Gather all Israel to Mizpeh.] A place where they had been wont anciently to assemble upon great occasions. (See upon Judg. xx. 1.)

And I will pray for you unto the Lord.] To accept of their repentance, and pardon their sins, and establish them in their good resolution to serve the Lord alone; and to deliver them out of the hand of the Philistines. For all which he could have prayed alone by himself; but he thought their public prayer would be more effectual.

Ver. 6. And they gathered in Mizpeh, and drew water, and poured it out before the Lord, and fasted on that day, and said there, We have sinned against the Lord.] This being a day of humiliation, fasting, and prayer, as appears by the latter part of these words, interpreters commonly expound the former part of them, as belonging to the same matter. And some think, as the Targum doth, that by pouring out water, is to be understood the tears of contrition, which were drawn from the bottom of their hearts, and fell from their eyes before the Lord. Others think they washed their bodies in water, signifying the purification of their souls from the filthiness of sin. And others (which Bochartus himself thinks more probable), that this water was poured on the ground, in token of the expiation of their sin, which they desired and hoped might be remembered no more: as water poured on the ground could no more be seen. Unto which they think a place in Job alludes: (xi. 16.) but we no where find any such rite as this among the Jews, either in ancient or later times. And the conjecture of Fortunatus Scacchus seems more ingenious, that an altar being to be erected to offer sacrifice, they poured out water to cleanse the ground, that it might not be set up in an impure place, (Myrothec. Elæochrysm. Sacr. ii. cap. 31.) But after all, I think the interpretation which Constantine L'Empereur hath given of these words (in his annot. on Codex Middoth, cap. 2.) is far more reasonable; which is, that they poured out water in token of joy, after they had fasted and confessed their sins (for he translates the words, "Postquam jejunarunt," after they had fasted on that day), as they were wont to do in the feast of tabernacles: unto which he refers those words in Isa. xii. 3. in which the prophet foretels the joy that should be in the days of the Messiah, by saying, "Ye shall draw waters with joy out of the wells of salvation:" alluding to a known rite among the Israelites in the feast of tabernacles, unto which our Saviour is thought to allude, John vii. 37, 38. And there is the greater reason for this interpretation, because Samuel had just before promised them, that the Lord would deliver them from the Philistines, if they heartily repented: which made them rejoice in hope of it, because they did now sincerely turn to him.

And Samuel judged the children of Israel in Mizpeh.] When they were reconciled to God, he reconciled them one to another, by determining their differences and doing right where any one was wronged: or he declared the law to them whereby they were to be judged; and, perhaps, punished some gross idolaters, or other great offenders.

Ver. 7. And when the Philistines heard that the children of Israel were gathered together at Mizpeh, the lords of the Philistines went up against Israel.] Being ignorant of the true reasons of this meeting, the Philistines imagined the Israelites assembled to consult about war, and so resolved to be beforehand with them, and surprise them.

And when the children of Israel heard it, they were afraid of the Philistines.] Being unarmed, I suppose, or not prepared to give them battle.

Ver. 8. And the children of Israel said unto Samuel, Cease not to cry unto the Lord our God for us, that he will save us out of the hands of the Philistines.] According to the promise made to them, (ver. 3.)

Ver. 9. And Samuel took a sucking lamb.] For after a lamb was eight days old, it was fit to be sacrificed unto God, (Exod. xxii. 30. Lev. xvii. 27.) The Hebrew word tale is the name for the youngest sheep, as ajil is for the eldest, and chebes for one between both.

And offered it for a burnt-offering wholly unto the Lord.]

Whereby he supplicated the Divine mercy, as the son of Sirach explains it: (Ecclus. xlvi. 16.) "He called upon the mighty Lord, when his enemies pressed him on every side, ἐν προσφορᾷ, by the obligation of a sucking lamb."

And Samuel cried unto the Lord God of Israel; and the Lord heard him.] Which is a demonstration, that though he was not a priest, nor this place appointed for sacrifice, yet, as a prophet, he had authority from God to build an altar any where, and to make his supplication in this manner. Thus other holy men, Gideon and Manoah, were warranted to offer extraordinary sacrifices in places which God had not before appointed. And it is probable that God answered Samuel, as he did Manoah, by fire consuming the sacrifice, in testimony of God's acceptance, (Judg. xiii. 20.) And thus we read of an altar he built in another place, ver. 17. as Elijah did in following times.

Ver. 10. And as Samuel was offering up the burnt-offering.] Before it was consumed.

The Philistines drew near to battle against Israel.] Hoping to find them unprepared. The son of Sirach saith, they of Tyre joined with the Philistines in this action, (Ecclus. xlvi. 17.)

But the Lord thundered with a great thunder on that day upon the Philistines, and discomfited them; and they were smitten before Israel.] They were affrighted, like men out of their wits, with thunder and lightning; which killed many of them before the Israelites could come up to fight them. For, together with this horrible tempest, Josephus saith there was an earthquake, and that the earth opened in several places, and swallowed up some of them, who, like blind men, ran into those gaps.

Ver. 11. And the men of Israel went out of Mizpeh, and pursued after the Philistines.] Having Samuel to lead them, as their captain, according to Josephus.

And smote them, until they came under Beth-car.] A place in the confines of the tribe of Judah. This victory was the more wonderful, because we do not find the Israelites came appointed with any weapons to Mizpeh; but, as far as can be gathered by the relation of the fight, they smote them with their own weapons; which the Philistines threw away when they fled, and which were found among those that were slain by the lightning.

Ver. 12. And Samuel took a stone, and set it up between Mizpeh and Shen.] So Jacob and Joshua had done, as monuments of God's mercy to them, and their obligations to him.

And called the name of it Eben-ezer, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us.] That is, thus far we have gotten the better: for they were not utterly destroyed, but driven quite out of their coasts, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 13. So the Philistines were subdued, and they came no more into the coast of Israel.] He put an end to the forty years' tyranny of the Philistines, mentioned Judg. xiii. 1. (See my notes there, and upon ver. 5. of that chapter, and Judg. xv. 20.)

And the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel.] As in this battle he gave them such an overthrow, that they were quite driven out of the country of Israel: so, during Samuel's government, until Saul was made king, we never read that they attempted with an army to invade them; but then they did, (xiii. 19.)

Ver. 14. And the cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were restored to Israel.] They not only expelled the Philistines, but recovered also several places of which the Philistines had possessed themselves, during their dominion over them.

From Ekron even unto Gath; and the coasts thereof did Israel deliver out of the hands of the Philistines.] Ekron was in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 45.) which the Philistines now forsook out of fear, as some think: or were driven out of it for the present, though it was not long before they got possession of it again.

And there was peace between Israel and the Amorites.] Not by compact and covenant; but by the inclination of both sides, they abstained from all hostile actions. The Amorites were not the only remainders of the old inhabitants of Canaan; but being the most powerful among them, they had long given name to the rest, (Gen. xv. 16.) And now the Philistines were thus subdued, none of them, who used to infest the Israelites, durst stir to give them any molestation, but sat quiet and still.

Ver. 15. And Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life.] From these words Mr. Hobbes and his followers draw an argument that this was written by somebody after the death of Samuel. Which is a very weak proof: for the sense may be no more than this: that Samuel was so diligent in the discharge of his office, that he gave himself no rest, but sat to judge causes every day.

Ver. 16. And he went from year to year in a circuit to Beth-el, and Gilgal, and Mizpeh, and judged Israel in all those places.] Ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις τούτοις, in all these sanctified places, as the LXX. translate these last words (though there be no such thing in the Hebrew), because, as Mr. Mede conjectures, here were proseuchas, i. e. places of prayer, in those ancient days. But we may more certainly gather from hence, that there was no such high court then established (which they called the Sanhedrin in following ages) to judge all causes; at least, not such inferior courts as were appointed by the law in Deut. xvi. 18. as the high court is in Deut. xviii. 8. For if there had, there would have been no need of Samuel's riding circuit every year about the country to do justice, as other judges had done. (Judg. v. 10. x. 4. xii. 14.)

Ver. 17. And his return was to Ramah; for there was his house: and there he judged Israel.] The power of the judges was greatest in war: but when it was over, they still retained such an authority, that all difficult causes (at least) were brought before them. They were consulted also in all political affairs: and, that they might know where to resort to Samuel, when he had ended his circuit, he kept his constant station at Ramah.

And there he built an altar unto the Lord.] There being no declaration yet made where God would have the ark to be fixed, after the destruction of Shiloh, he built an altar where he himself constantly resided. Because it was fit, when they consulted about any public business, concerning the good of the commonwealth of Israel, that there should be a public invocation of God's direction and blessing: which was done by sacrifice, as appears from ver. 9.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when Samuel was old.] The Jews in Seder Olam Rabba, and other books, make

Samuel to have lived no more than fifty-two years; when he could not be said to be old. Therefore Abarbinel forsakes the doctors in this, and shews their proofs of it to be very weak; and thinks that he rather lived until he was seventy, if not eighty years old. But less than seventy, he affirms, none of the prophets or good men lived.

That he made his sons judges over Israel.] When he could not well sustain all the labour, he took them to assist him: both when he went his circuit, and in hearing causes at home. Or, perhaps, when he was old, he went circuit no more; but settled them in a convenient place (as it follows in the next verse) where people might have justice done them, either by him or by them.

Ver. 2. Now the name of his first-born was Joel, and the name of his second Abijah; they were judges in Beer-sheba.] As his constant residence was at Ramah, so he ordered theirs to be at Beer-sheba. Whereby, as Corn. Bertram observes, (cap. 9. de Repub. Jud.) the country was divided into two parts, for the greater convenience of the people; that the causes of all those who dwelt between Dan and Mount Ephraim, might be brought to be judged by Samuel at Ramah; and the causes of those between Mount Ephraim and Beer-sheba, might be judged by his sons.

Ver. 3. And his sons walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment.] Covetousness made them take bribes, (contrary to the law, Exod. xviii. 8.) and they made them pervert judgment. (See Exod. xxiii. 21. Deut. xvi. 19.) Procopius Gazæus here asks this question: Why God did not punish Samuel as he did Eli, for the wickedness of his sons? Unto which he answers, that Samuel's sons were not so bad as Eli's: for taking bribes privately, was not like open profaning the tabernacle, and making the worship of God contemptible. And, besides, it is possible Samuel might be ignorant of this corruption in his sons: who did not live near him, but he in Ramah, and they at Beer-sheba.

Ver. 4. And all the elders of Israel gathered themselves together, and came to Samuel unto Ramah.] All the great men who were dissatisfied with the management of affairs came to Ramah: which was one of the places where Samuel judged the people, and determined their controversies, (vii. 16, 17.)

And they said unto him, Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: make us a king to judge us like all the nations.] The weakness of Samuel's body, and the ill disposition of his sons' minds, they make their pretence of demanding what they had long desired to have. The Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 2. sect. 6. according to the tradition of R. Eliezer, saith, the elders were in the right in desiring a king to judge them: for, according to the opinion of some of their doctors, this was one of the three things God commanded to be done, when they came into Canaan, that they should make them a king. The only error was, which arose, they say, from the perverseness of the vulgar people, that they desired a king like all the nations. But these are mere fancies; for God gave no such command, as their best authors, Bechai, Nachman, Ralbag, and others, acknowledge. But their own pride and vanity suggested these desires to them, that they might not want that outward pomp and show which was among their neighbours. Fear also of a potent enemy, who was about to invade them, might make them think a king necessary to lead them on successfully to encounter him, (ver. 20. and xii. 12.) But above all, this proceeded from their insensibility of the great honour they enjoyed above all mankind, in being under the peculiar government of God: for whom they had so little regard, that he saith, (ver. 7.) they despised him; that is, made nothing of such a King as they could not see. But that he had the supreme power over them was apparent, in that when they prayed Samuel to make them a king, immediately he prayed to God; shewing it was not in his power to do it, but in God alone.

Ver. 6. But the thing displeased Samuel, when they said, Give us a king to judge us. And Samuel prayed unto the Lord.] To give him direction what to do in this case: but thus far the elders were in the right, that they came to the prophet to ask a king: for none, as I said, could make one, but the Lord alone, who was their sovereign.

Ver. 7. And the Lord said, Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee.] These are the words of an angry sovereign, (Hos. xiii. 11.) being as much as to say, Let them have their will. Which he indulged to them, partly to punish them, and partly to preserve them from apostacy from their religion. For being as violently set upon having a king, after the manner of the Egyptians, as they had been to follow their gods, they might have thrown off the law itself, and conformed entirely to the customs of other nations, if they had not been humoured: for they were so set upon it, as appears from ver. 19. that after the prophet had represented to them, how much they would lose by having their desires granted, they persisted in them, saying, "Nay, but we will have a king," &c. Which expresses a resolution to have one whatsoever became of them.

For they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them.] These words shew that Samuel took it very heavily, that they should be dissatisfied with his government: but God tells him, he himself had more reason to be angry: for, in truth, they had thrown off his authority, who was their king: (as Samuel tells them afterward, xii. 12.) and therefore was highly offended they should desire any other. Which the Jewish doctors abovementioned (ver. 5.) justly make an argument that God did not command them in the book of Deuteronomy to make them a king; because he was displeased when they desired to have one. For the supreme Lord of the world was their sovereign; who governed them by judges, whom he raised up and extraordinarily inspired, when he saw occasion: as he had before conducted them by Joshua and Moses, who never ordained any thing of moment without a special command for it from God: who reserved to himself the sole power of establishing laws, and appointing magistrates, and making war, as appears by the war against the Midianites, Numb. xxxi. For there is no truth in their opinion, who imagine that the government of the Israelites, before they had a king, was an aristocracy. Josephus, indeed, seems to say so, in one or two places of his Antiquities: but, in his book against Appion (a very learned gentile), wherein he writes most accurately, he makes it a distinct sort of government, different from all other; which he truly calls by a new name, Θεοκρατία, the government of God, (lib. ii.) For God exercised the supreme authority among them, by his express command. Which being without example, that it may not seem incredible to those who are wont to detract from the sacred history, it may be fit to observe, (to use the words of Hermannus Conringius, in his animadversions on Machiavel's Princeps, cap. 6.) that the demons, who were worshipped as gods by the gentiles, attempted to imitate this, by setting up a like government. So that memorable history of the original of the commonwealth of the Cyrenians in Egypt, mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Pausanias, Justin, and others; and that history of the beginning of Heraclea in Pontus, which Justin relates, lib. xvi. cap. 3. For this republic being raised by the express command of demons, was, upon that account, they say, exceeding flourishing. No less memorable is the republic of the Mexicans in America, erected by the command of their demon Vitzipultzi: who, above all others, endeavoured to imitate the miracles wrought by God for the Israelites. Many others, he there shews, pretended to this: though all was transacted by themselves.

Ver. 8. According to all the works that they have done, since the day that I brought them out of Egypt unto this day, wherewith they have forsaken me, and served other gods, so do they also unto thee.] No wonder they desired another sort of ruler than Samuel, for they had chosen other gods. And this had been their wicked humour ever since they were delivered from the tyranny of Pharaoh.

Ver. 9. Now therefore hearken unto their voice.] Since they had no greater regard unto God and his minister; he resolved to let them exchange his government for such a one as the nations had, who often oppressed them.

Howbeit yet protest solemnly unto them, and shew them the manner of the king that shall reign over them.] He continuing still their king, God was so very gracious as to order Samuel to lay before them at large, into what servitude they were going to throw themselves by casting off the government of judges set over them by God himself; and subjecting themselves to the power of such kings as ruled in other nations.

Ver. 10. And Samuel told all the words of the Lord unto the people that asked of him a king.] How ill God took it, looking upon it as a rejection of himself; who had hitherto governed them most graciously, and often delivered them from the heaviest oppressions. For he either stirred up some person, by an immediate signification of his will and pleasure, to be their judge: or, when there was none, he was ready to rule their proceedings himself, by urim and thummim, directing them what course to follow in the public concerns of the nation. These two things plainly demonstrated (as our Mr. Thorndike hath well observed) that God was their king, whom they now cast off. (See Review of the Rites of the Church, p. 68. 133.)

Ver. 11. And he said, This shall be the manner of the king that shall reign over you.] And, moreover, he declared what kind of government they chose instead of God's. There are various opinions about the jus regium, the royal power, here mentioned. Which containing divers particulars that seem arbitrary and unjust, interpreters have chosen to expound the Hebrew word mishpat, not by jus, but by mos and consuetudo; that is, not by right, but by manner and custom. And so the words may be translated, as Joseph Scaliger observed long ago from many instances, (Epist. xv.) particularly Gen. xl. 13. and in this book, xxvii. 11. (See Petavius also upon Epiphanius, Hæres. lv. n. 9.) But there is no necessity of this, as Grotius rightly observes, and from him Conringius. For Samuel doth not speak of a just and honest right of a king to do these things (for his right is quite otherwise described in that part of Moses's law which concerns the king's duty), but such a right as the kings of the nations had then acquired: for they desired such a king as their neighbours had; who were all under the absolute dominion of their princes. Which Aristotle calls, δεσποτικὴν ἀρχήν· lib. v. polit. cap. 10. Οἱ περὶ τὴν Ἀσίαν ὑπομένουσι μὲν δεσποτικὴν ἀρχὴν οὐδὲν, δυσχεραίνοντες, They of Asia endure a despotic government, nothing at all complaining.

He will take your sons, and appoint them for himself.] To attend him as the guards of his body, and in other offices. This shews that he speaks of an arbitrary power, which kings in those days used. And therefore Abarbinel observes, that Samuel doth not say absolutely, I will shew you the manner or right of the king (as if it were a right belonging to all kings), but that shall reign over you; that is, of such a king as you desire, who will administer affairs in this fashion.

For his chariots, and to be his horsemen.] To look after his chariots and his horses. For so the word paras signifies (as Lud. de Dieu and Bochartus have observed), and these words should be thus translated, For his chariots and his horses.

And some shall run before his chariots.] Be his footmen.

Ver. 12. And he will appoint him captains over thousands, and captains over fifties.] Others should be disposed of to military offices, higher or lower, as pleased him, (xiv. 52.) who were to be perfectly subject to him, and displaced by him when he thought good.

And will set them to ear his ground, and to reap his harvest.] Others should be made husbandmen, to plough his ground and reap his corn on his own terms; when, perhaps, their labour was necessary about their own fields.

And to make his instruments of war, and instruments of his chariots.] Others he would make artificers: which was not very agreeable to that nation, who were inclined from their beginning rather to look after the breed of cattle.

Ver. 13. And he will take your daughters to be confectioners, and to be cooks, and to be bakers.] He would exercise, he shews, as arbitrary power over the women as over the men; whom he would make to serve in such employments as he thought fit, either for nothing, or such wages as he pleased to give them.

Ver. 14. And he will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your olive-yards, even the best of them, and give them to his servants.] Bestow them on such of his courtiers as he thought good to raise to great estates. Which is not to be understood as if he should challenge a right to take their lands from them (for the contrary appears from the story of Ahab, who without a very wicked contrivance could not possess himself of Naboth's vineyard), but that he should take the fruit of them when he thought it necessary, especially in time of war, to gratify his soldiers. To this case Abarbinel confines the sense of these words.

Ver. 15. And he will take the tenth of your seed, and of your vineyards.] This was part of the jus regium in the eastern countries, (see my notes upon Gen. xxviii. 22.) to have the tenth part of the fruit of the land for the king's share: and if they contented themselves with this portion they were accounted good kings. As Cypselus, king of Corinth, is observed by Aristotle to have exacted no more of his subjects than the tenth of their fruits. Such capitations and taxes, as Bodinus speaks, (lib. vi. de Republ. cap. 2.) which are usual now, being unknown in those days.

And give to his officers, and to his servants.] This revenue being brought into his exchequer, he therewith paid his bedchamber-men, and other servants, their salaries. I call them bedchamber-men, because the Hebrew word (which we translate officers) signifies eunuchs (as the LXX. here translate it), who commonly attended them in their chambers. And it was the more grievous to have such men maintained out of this revenue, because they were strangers: for it was not lawful for the Jews to make any of their nation an eunuch. This revenue itself also proved a heavy burden upon the Jews, because this tenth part was exacted out of the remainder, after the tenth part had been paid to the Levites, as Kimchi and Abarbinel observe.

Ver. 16. And he will take your men-servants, and your maid-servants, and your goodliest young men.] The most beautiful and proper persons he could find.

And your asses, and put them to his work.] Either at the plough, or for carriage, or any other employment wherein they were necessary.

Ver. 17. And he will take the tenth of your sheep: and ye shall be his servants.] So subject to him, that, if he pleased, they should be no better than his slaves. I know none that hath discoursed this whole matter so perspicuously and fully, as the late learned Puffendorf, whose words I shall translate, as I find them in his book, De Rebus Gestis Philippi. This people, saith he, had hitherto lived under governors raised up by Divine instinct, who had exacted no tribute of them, nor put them to any charges. With which government they being not contented, but desiring to have a king, like other nations, that should live in pomp and splendour, and keep standing forces about him, to be ready to resist any invasion; Samuel informs them what it was they desired, that they might consider, when they understood it, whether they would persist in their choice: if they would have a king magnificently attended, then he tells them, the king will take their sons, and put them in his chariots, &c. (ver. 11.) If they would have him keep up constant forces, then he must appoint them for colonels and captains, and employ those in his wars who were wont to follow their family business, (ver. 12.) And since, after the manner of other kings, he must keep a stately court, they must be content that their daughters (ver. 13.) should serve in several offices; which the king would think below the dignity of his wives and daughters. Many ministers also in several employments, both in war and peace, must have salaries to support them; which must be paid out of their fields and vineyards, (ver. 14.) For which services, he tells them, the king will exact the tenth of all belonging to them, that he may maintain his royal expenses. In one word, if you will have a king, he must be maintained, after a royal manner, out of your estates.

Ver. 18. And ye shall cry out in that day, because of your king which you have chosen.] This shews, that, in all the foregoing verses, Samuel describes the uncontrollable power which the eastern princes exercised over their subjects; who were patiently to bear whatsoever their princes imposed upon them, without any power to help themselves. For, as Grotius observes, this mishpat doth not signify a true right, but such a fact as hath effectum juris (the effect of right), viz. an obligation of not resisting: which is the reason that Samuel adds these words; that the people, loaded with intolerable oppressions, should implore the help of God: because there was no human remedy left for their relief. (See lib. i. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 3.) This plainly confutes the fancy of the Jews concerning their Sanhedrin, and their power to scourge princes: for, as Samuel consulted nobody in making a king, but God alone; so, when he was made, he got such a power, that it is ridiculous to think that high court could control him.

And the Lord will not hear you in that day.] But leave them under this heavy yoke; because they would not hearken unto him, when he represented to them what would be the effect of that power which they desired him to set over them.

Ver. 19. Nevertheless the people refused to obey the voice of Samuel: and they said, Nay; but we will have a king over us.] This description of the government of the eastern kings did not deter them from persisting in their desires. But they peremptorily demanded a king, though Samuel told them that this demand was a throwing off the government of God. Who always heard their cry, when they were oppressed by their enemies; but now would leave them without any help, when they groaned under the oppression of their kings. Which obstinacy, as an excellent person of ours (Dr. Jackson) speaks, did prognosticate that incurable and desperate disease, which had its fatal crisis in their rejecting Christ: who was both priest and prophet, and their lawful king. In casting off whom they could not but cast off God, that he should not reign over them. And so a great admirer of his paraphraseth the seventh verse of this chapter: Let it not grieve thy spirit that they grow weary of thee: but let them have their will, for so will they serve the Lord and thy Redeemer.

Ver. 20. That we may be like all other nations.] Strange blindness! that they could not see it was their singular felicity, that they were not like other nations: but had God for their governor, who never failed, in time of need, to raise up men of wonderful worth to be their deliverers. It was their vain-glorious humour, therefore, that made them think they were inferior to other nations, unless they saw a prince set over them shining in gold and jewels, living in a sumptuous palace, attended with guards richly clothed, appearing in great pomp and state, as they did in other countries; which they fancied would be for the glory of their land.

To judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles.] There was anciently a respect to their military virtue, in the choice of their kings; the very word rex, among the Romans, having its original from their abilities to govern armies, and keep them in good order and discipline. Such were all those great men whom God had raised up, as there was occasion, to judge Israel. Who had been so successful when they fought for them, that they were always victorious; which they could not promise themselves their kings would be; the very first of which was slain in battle.

Ver. 21. And Samuel heard all the words of the people, and rehearsed them in the ears of the Lord.] As he had told all the words of the Lord unto the people, (ver. 10.)

Ver. 22. And the Lord said unto Samuel, Hearken unto their voice, and make them a king.] Such as they desired, like those of other nations: for so it appears in the following history many of them were, as Samuel had predicted. Witness the words of the people to Rehoboam, concerning Solomon's government, (1 Kings xii. 4.) And the tyrannical words of Jezabel to Ahab, about Naboth's vineyard, (1 Kings xxi. 7.) And all the violence of Manasseh, who shed innocent blood very much, till he had filled Jerusalem with it, (2 Kings xxi. 16.) And what David himself did, in the matter of Uriah, when he had defiled his wife, (2 Sam. xi. 15, 16.)

And Samuel said unto the men of Israel.] To the elders of the people, who had attended him about this matter.

Go ye every man unto his city.] He bade them leave the business unto him; and God, he doubted not, would set a king over them.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. NOW there was a man of Benjamin, whose name was Kish, the son of Abiel, the son of Zeror, the son of Bechorath, the son of Aphiah, a Benjamite.] In this genealogy there is no difficulty but one; which is, that in two places of the Chronicles it is said, that Ner begat Kish, (1 Chron. viii. 37. ix. 39.) But by begetting there must be meant, the giving him his breeding and education. For it is evident Ner was Kish's brother, (1 Sam. xiv. 51.) D. Kimchi will have it that he had two names, Abiel and Ner.

A mighty man of power.] This seems not to be meant of his wealth or interest in his country, (for Saul himself saith he was of a mean family, ver. 21.) but of his great strength, courage, and fortitude; which is therefore mentioned, because it hath been often observed, that fortes creantur fortibus.

Ver. 2. And he had a son, whose name was Saul, a choice young man, and a goodly; and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people.] They desired a king like the rest of the nations, who looked upon persons of an heroic stature and countenance to be marked out for empire. Whence the saying of Euripides, Εἶδος ἄξιον τυραννίδος; and that of Curtius, "Quippe hominibus barbaris in corporum majestate veneratio est." But no words are more memorable, to this purpose, than those of Pliny, in the conclusion of his fourth chapter of his panegyric to Trajan, where he saith, the strength and talness of his body, the nobleness of his aspect, the dignity of his mouth, the gracefulness of his speech, &c. "Nonne longe lateque principem ostentant?" Do they not every where proclaim a prince? This was a thing so carefully provided for in ancient times, to have a goodly race of kings, that the Lacedemonians set a fine upon their king Archidamus (as Plutarch tells us in the beginning of his book, περὶ παιδῶν ἀγωγῆς) for marrying a wife of a low stature; who was likely to bring them, οὐ βασιλέας ἀλλὰ βασιλίσκους, not kings but kinglings, to reign over them.

Ver. 3. And the asses of Kish, Saul's father, were lost.] Wandered out of their pasture.

And Kish said unto Saul his son, Take now one of the servants with thee, and arise, go and seek the asses.] It is no wonder that he was employed in this inquiry, for I suppose he had the charge of looking after his father's cattle: which was an employment the greatest men did not disdain in ancient time: as we learn from the history of Hercules and Paris, and others among the Greeks. And in Judea asses were a considerable part of their substance: for the greatest persons rode upon asses till the time of Solomon, when horses began to be multiplied, (Judg. x. 4.)

Ver. 4. And they passed through Mount Ephraim, and they passed through the land of Shalisha, but they found them not; then they passed through the land of Shalim, and there they were not, &c.] They searched, that is, all the mountainous country of the tribe of Ephraim, which lay next to Benjamin, after they had first gone through that tribe, as it here follows:

And they passed through the land of Benjamin, &c.] Or, they had passed through the land of Benjamin; where hearing no tidings of them, they went into the next country, to see if they were strayed thither.

Ver. 5. And when they were come to the land of Zuph.] A territory in the tribe of Ephraim, where some of Samuel's ancestors had lived, (i. 1.) and Ramah, where Samuel now dwelt, seems to have been in it; as we may gather from the next verse.

Saul said to his servant that was with him, Come, let us return.] Being uncertain whither to go next, after they had sought so many places in vain.

Lest my father leave caring for the asses, and take thought for us.] Be afraid that we are lost. The Hebrew word, as Dr. Hammond observes, (upon Psal. xxxviii. 18.) signifies solicitude of mind, mixed with grief and sorrow.

Ver. 6. And he said unto him, Behold now, there is in this city a man of God.] A prophet.

And he is an honourable man.] A person of great fame, and held in high esteem.

All that he saith comes surely to pass.] Which procured him such honour.

Now, let us go thither; peradventure he can shew us our way that we should go.] To find the asses.

Ver. 7. Then said Saul to his servant, But, behold, if we go, what shall we bring the man?] This was a part of the honour they did to great men in those countries, to make them a present, when they had occasion to address themselves to them. Particularly prophets were thus honoured; being men of God; before whom they were not to appear empty. Thus also they demonstrated their reverence to their king, in the next chapter of this book, (ver. 27.)

For the bread is spent in our vessels, and there is not a present to bring to the man of God: what have we?] Provision for their table was as acceptable a present as money: which appears from what Jeroboam's wife brought to Ahijah the prophet, (1 Kings xiv. 3.)

Ver. 8. And the servant answered Saul again, and said, Behold, I have here at hand a fourth part of a shekel of silver; that will I give to the man of God to tell us our way.] A small present, but as acceptable as the widow's mite; being all they had left in their travels.

Ver. 9. Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to inquire of God.] By consulting a prophet.

Thus he spake, Come, let us go to the seer: for he that is now called a prophet, was beforetime called a seer.] Though the word nabi (a prophet) had been anciently known, as appears by the books of Moses; and used in Samuel's days, as appears from many places in this book; yet the more common word, which now prevailed, when Saul was anointed king (for in all languages words are in and out of fashion, in several times), was roeh (a seer). But in following years, when Samuel wrote this book, nabi was become the more usual word in all men's mouths. This is a fair account of these words, from whence some argue, that Samuel was not the author of this book, nor Moses the author of the Pentateuch: where Abraham is called nabi; (xx. 7.) which shews that this was no new word in these days, as they would have this place understood. But it might be sufficient to answer unto this, that nabi did not signify, in ancient times, one that foretold things to come; but only one that was familiar with God, and was instructed in his will, that he might instruct others. But now, in Samuel's time, it came to be appropriated to the revealing future things, and foretelling what should come to pass, or revealing secrets, which none could know but God.

Ver. 10. Then said Saul to his servant, Well said; let us go. So they went to the city where the man of God dwelt.] That is, to Ramah.

Ver. 11. And as they went up the hill to the city, they found young maidens going down to draw water.] At the fountain, which (as usual) was at the bottom of the hill.

And said unto them, Is the seer here?] Of which there might be some doubt; because some time he was wont to go circuit about the country.

Ver. 12. And they answered them, and said, He is; behold, he is before you: make haste now.] That is, they could not fail to find him, if they lost no time, but went speedily to the city, before he went to sacrifice; when it would not be proper to interrupt him.

For he cometh to-day to the city.] He either lived without the gate of the city; or returned from his country circuit.

For there is a sacrifice of the people to-day.] Either at some solemn festival (the new moon some imagine), or upon some special occasion of prayer and thanksgiving to God; for the people of that city, or for all Israel.

In the high place.] All sacrifices were regularly to be offered before the ark, in the place which the Lord should choose. But while this choice stood suspended, because Shiloh was laid desolate, and no other place appointed; they sacrificed in other places, where neither the ark, nor the tabernacle was: the tabernacle being void of the ark, which was its principal furniture; and the ark being without a house for God to dwell in. What place then, in this condition, could be more commodious, than those cities where the priests and Levites lived; to which the people went for instruction? and they chose the highest parts of those cities for this purpose. Corn. Bertram (cap. 11. de Repub. Jud.) imagines, that from this example high places came to be in use in after-ages (unless we suppose them to be the relics of the Canaanites, or more ancient people), for this is the first time we read of a high place among the people of God. Yet we read before of the thing, though not of the name. See Judg. vi. 20. xiii. 19. and so early as Abraham's time we read (Gen. xxii.) he was directed to Mount Moriah to offer his son. The same learned man also thinks, that this was the beginning of synagogues and schools, as our Mr. Thorndike doth in his Religious Assembly, p. 29. For though, when the ark was settled, it became unlawful to offer sacrifices in high places; yet it was no offence to continue there for public prayer, and the praises of God, and the learning of the law.

The Jewish doctors take this high place to have been some house, where, after they had sacrificed, they feasted when they had done. And so the Targum here translates these words, the house of feasting.

Ver. 13. As soon as ye come into the city, you shall straightway find him.] For on this day he appeared publicly.

Before he go up to the high place to eat: for the people will not eat until he come, because he doth bless the sacrifice.] That is, the feast upon the sacrifice, which were peace-offerings; the greatest part whereof belonged to him that brought the sacrifice; wherewith he entertained his friends.

And afterward they eat that be bidden.] The guests of him that offered the sacrifice; who, at this time, I suppose, was Samuel. For God having told him, that he should that day see the man whom he intended for their king, it is likely he appointed more sacrifices to be added unto those which were usually offered at such times, at his own charge. That there might be the greater feast, unto which he invited the people, (ver. 24.) that is, the principal of the people; and placed the guests, (ver. 22.) and carved at the table, (ver. 23.) which are all tokens that he was at the expense of the sacrifice, and made this feast for his friends.

Ver. 14. And they went up into the city: and when they were come into the city, behold, Samuel came out against them, for to go to the high place.] Met them directly in his way to the feast: for so God in his providence had disposed things; as it follows in the next words.

Ver. 15. Now the Lord had told Samuel in his ear a day before Saul came, saying.] In the Hebrew the words are, He revealed or uncovered the ear of Samuel; as is noted in the margin. Now that was done in order to tell him something; and therefore the meaning is, God told him a secret; using, in all likelihood, a whispering voice.

Ver. 16. To-morrow, about this time, I will send thee a man out of the land of Benjamin.] This shews still that all was done by God's direction.

And thou shalt anoint him to be captain over my people Israel, that he may save my people out of the hand of the Philistines.] Who had grievously oppressed them for forty years together: and though driven out of the country by Samuel, yet were ready to invade them again; as they did, it appears, by the following history.

For I have looked upon my people, because their cry is come unto me.] Though he would not hear their cry to relieve them from the oppression of their kings, (viii. 18.) yet he was so gracious as to make those kings instruments of their deliverance from the oppression of their cruel neighbours.

Ver. 17. And when Samuel saw Saul, the Lord said unto him.] With such a low voice as he heard the day before, (ver. 15.)

Behold the man whom I spake to thee of! the same shall reign over my people.] The word we translate reign, signifies something of coercion and restraint, as is observed in the margin; and denotes, he should rule them with an absolute, uncontrollable power, sternly and rigidly, after the manner of the eastern monarchs. Which was, as I said, a punishment for throwing off the kind and gentle government of God.

Ver. 18. Then Saul drew near to Samuel in the gate.] He came up to him, as he was going out of his house.

And said, Tell me, I pray thee, where the seer's house is.] It is an argument that Saul had led a very private life, since he had never seen Samuel, who went about into so many places to judge the people.

Ver. 19. And Samuel answered Saul, and said, I am the seer: go up before me unto the high place.] This seems to be spoken out of respect to him.

For thou shalt eat with me to-day; and to-morrow I will let thee go, and tell thee all that is in thine heart.] All that he desired to know. This shews it was a supper, not a dinner, to which he invited him; otherwise he might have dismissed him as well after dinner, as the next morning. But the custom of that country was to make their entertainment in the evening, when business was over.

Ver. 20. And as for thy asseswhich were lost three days ago.] This satisfied him he was a prophet, that he knew what he came to him for, though he had not told him.

Set not thy mind on them, for they are found.] He frees his mind from all care about the asses; that he might eat and drink the more cheerfully at the feast.

And on whom is all the desire of Israel? is it not on thee, and on all thy father's house?] The meaning is, all Israel desire a king, and there is none fitter for it than thyself; whose family God is resolved to advance.

Ver. 21. And Saul answered and said, Am I not a Benjamite, of the smallest of the tribes of Israel? and my family the least of all the families of the tribe of Benjamin?] He thought no person more unfit for the dignity; both because the tribe of which he was had been lamentably impaired in the time of the Judges, (chap. xx.) and his own family was very inconsiderable in this little tribe.

Wherefore then speakest thou so unto me?] He concluded therefore, that Samuel did but jest with him.

Ver. 22. And Samuel took Saul and his servants and brought them into the parlour, and made them sit in the chiefest place among them that were bidden.] He convinced him he was in earnest, by setting him uppermost at the table, in the most honourable place among the guests.

Which were about thirty persons.] The principal persons, I suppose, of the city, who were witnesses of the extraordinary respect which he paid him.

Ver. 23. And Samuel said unto the cook, Bring the portion which I gave thee, of which I said, Set it by thee.] The master of the feast distributed to every one their portion; or ordered what dish should be set before them: and Samuel had commanded the cook (before they sat down) not to set one dish upon the table, but keep it till he called for it.

Ver. 24. And the cook took up the shoulder, and that which was upon it.] The left shoulder and breast; for the right shoulder and the right breast belonged to the priest. (Lev. vii. 33, 34.)

And set it before Saul.] As the principal place was given him at the feast, so the principal dish also was set before him, to express still the great regard he had to his person.

And Samuel said, Behold that which is left!] Reserved on purpose for his entertainment.

Set it before thee, and eat.] Let it stand, as it is set before thee, and eat of it, as thy portion.

For unto this time hath it been kept for thee, since I said, I have invited the people.] The plainest translation of these words, is that of Lud. de Dieu, Eat, because till this appointed time it hath been reserved for thee, when I said, I have invited certain persons. That is, besides the thirty persons, he told the cook he had invited some others (which were Saul and his attendant) for whom he would have this shoulder to be reserved. For by inviting the people, he understands only these two persons; the word people sometimes signifying (as he shews) very few. He thinks, indeed, the feast was not made by Samuel, who brought along with him only these two guests: but that seems to me not to agree with the whole story.

And Saul did eat with Samuel that day.] Who entertained him very nobly; for the left shoulder was always accounted the best part of the sacrifice: being the same with that which the priest had for his portion. And therefore set before the king, if he was present at the feast, and thence called by Josephus Μερὶς Βασιλικὴ, the royal portion: for the arm and shoulder, as Philo discourses, were the symbols of strength and fortitude.

Ver. 25. And when they were come down from the high place into the city, Samuel communed with Saul upon the top of the house.] Concerning his advancement to the royal dignity, and his administration of the government.

Ver. 26. And they rose up early: and it came to pass, about the spring of the day.] Before the people of the place were stirring.

That Samuel called Saul to the top of the house, saying, Up, that I may send thee away.] According to his promise, (ver. 19.)

And Saul arose, and they went out both of them, he and Samuel, abroad.] For Samuel intended, out of respect to him, to conduct him part of his way. But went without any of his usual attendants; that what he did, might, for the present, be kept a secret.

Ver. 27. And as they were going down to the end of the city, Samuel said to Saul, Bid thy servant pass on before us (and he passed on), but stand thou still awhile, that I may shew thee the word of the Lord.] Which he would have none to hear but himself: because he now meant only to give him private satisfaction, that God had chosen him to be the king of his people; before whom afterward he was publicly chosen by lot.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. THEN Samuel took a vial of oil.] It was the business of a prophet to anoint a king, as Abarbinel observes upon Exod. xxx. Which he proves from this example of Samuel's anointing Saul, and afterward David; and Nathan's anointing Solomon, and the prophet (which the Hebrew doctors say was Jonah) anointing Jehu, (2 Kings ix. 1. 6.) This unction seems to have been in the open fields: but that it was done at a fountain, because Solomon was there anointed, cannot be proved (as the Hebrew doctors would have it) from that single instance; which will not make a general rule. Nor can it be proved, that this was sacred oil taken from the tabernacle, but rather common: for Samuel was no priest, and therefore could not meddle with that which was kept there; nor was he now near unto that place.

And poured it upon his head.] There is no order of God, that we read of, for the anointing of kings: but it had been an ancient custom, two hundred years before this time, as appears from the parable of Jotham. (See on Judg. ix. 8.) And it was now used by Samuel, that their king might be like the kings of other nations, as they desired. In aftertimes they were far superior to them, if we may believe the Hebrew doctors; who say the family of David had the privilege to be anointed with the same holy oil, wherewith the high-priest was anointed. For though the law appropriated it unto him, yet there was a dispensation with the law, manifested by some prophet. For certain it is, that Solomon was anointed with oil taken from the tabernacle, (1 Kings i. 39.) Only, they say, there was a difference in the form of anointing: the king being anointed in the form of a crown encircling his head; but the high-priest in the form of a cross, by one line drawn with the oil running down his forehead, and by another drawn by the oil between his eyebrows; which they call in the form of the Greek letter chi, having no mind to mention the name of the cross. (See Selden's Titles of Honour, p. 144. De Success. in Pontific. lib. ii. cap. 9. Schickard's Jus Regium, cap. 1. Theor. 4.)

And kissed him.] In token of subjection and reverence to him; according to the custom of ancient times, (see Gen. xli. 40.) and in those following, (Psal. ii. 12.) This the Jews call neshikah shel gedolah, the kiss of greatness or majesty; in our language, the kiss of homage.

And said, Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance?] That is, doubt not, but by authority from God thou art made the ruler of his people. This was a thing not easily to be believed, and therefore he gives him three or four signs, in the following verses, to confirm his faith. But it must not be imagined, that now he was inaugurated; for that was done afterward, according to this prophetical prediction: which was kept so private, that it shewed he intended no more now, than to assure Saul he should be made king, and publicly installed their sovereign.

Ver. 2. And when thou art departed from me to-day, thou shalt find two men by Rachel's sepulchre, in the border of Benjamin, at Zelzah: and they will say unto thee, The asses which thou wentest to seek are found: and, lo, thy father, &c.] He foretelling Saul so exactly how many persons he should meet, and the place where, and what they would say to him, was an argument that he was a prophet; and therefore was to be believed in what he said to him from God concerning the kingdom. Rachel's sepulchre was in the way to Beth-lehem, (Gen. xxxv.) which was in the tribe of Judah, but in the border of Benjamin.

Ver. 3. Then shalt thou go on forward from thence, and thou shalt come to the plain of Tabor, and there shall meet thee three men going up to God to Beth-el.] This had been a religious place ever since the days of Jacob: as if, by God's appearance to him there, it had been consecrated for prayer and sacrifice: and the tabernacle being now without the ark, and the ark in no determined place, they sacrificed in high places (as Samuel we read did in the foregoing chapter), and particularly here at Beth-el; where Jeroboam afterward settled one of his calves. But Fortunatus Scacchus thinks it no improbable conjecture, that they had no altar, but sacrificed upon the bare ground. (Myrothec. Elæochrysm. Sacr. lib. ii. cap. 5.)

One carrying three kids, and another three loaves, and another carrying a bottle of wine.] Intending to offer sacrifices of peace-offerings.

Ver. 4. And they will salute thee, and give thee two loaves of bread; which thou shalt receive at their hands.] This may be looked upon as a third sign, or an appendix to the second. And it is the more remarkable, because this present which they made him, was a figure of that honour which the people did him when he was declared their king. And if these loaves were two of the three which they were going to offer in sacrifice (as some think they were), the present was the more noble. But though this may be justified, by supposing them to be given to one that was faint with travelling, and which they might recruit at Beth-el; yet we may as well think, as Kimchi doth, that they were two loaves which they brought along with them for their own use in their journey: which they freely imparted unto Saul; and Samuel bade him not refuse; but learn thereby, when he had abundance, to be kind to those who were in want.

Ver. 5. After that thou shalt come to the hill of God.] So called, because they were wont to sacrifice here; or because here was a school of the prophets, who were called men of God. Some take this to be Gibeah, others Kirjath-jearim.

Where is a garrison of the Philistines.] This makes it probable the hill beforementioned was Geba, or Gibeah: for there they had a garrison, (xiii. 3.) which doth not contradict what was said vii. 13. For though the Philistines were subdued, and made no invasions upon the Israelites while Samuel lived; yet they might retain some strong holds, out of which they could not drive them.

And it shall come to pass, when thou art come thither to the city, that thou shalt meet a company of prophets.] Here it seems was a college of prophets, settled for the instruction of youth in the knowledge of the law and of piety (who were called the sons of the prophets), where, though the Philistines also had a garrison, yet in this they were better than many Christians (as Grotius observes), for they spared those places (when they conquered them) where learned men lived, and were dedicated to the study of religion. (See lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 11. sect. 10.)

Coming down from the high place.] Perhaps they came from a sacrifice, which had been offered in the high place: and now praised God for his benefits, in the following manner.

With a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp, before them.] With variety of instrumental music; among which the nevel (which we translate psaltery) was the chief: having its name, as the Jewish doctors fancy (in the Midrasch, upon Psalm lxxxi.) from hence—that it put down all other instruments of music, as much as a wise man doth a fool. Bartoloccius, in his Kirjath-Sepher, par. ii. fol. 185, &c. gives an account of this, and the rest of the instruments here mentioned. With which I do not think fit to trouble the reader; but only note, that this music was used in prophesying, because the minds of the prophets were thereby composed, and made apt to receive soft and good impressions, as Grotius here observes from many examples.

And they shall prophesy.] Sing the praises of God, as the word prophesy sometimes signifies, (Exod. xv. 21. 1 Chron. xxv. 3.) In what manner this was done, it is not so easy for us now to define or specify (as Mr. Mede speaks). But one of them seems to have been the precentor, to usher in the verse or ditty; and the rest to have answered, Τὰ ἀκροτελεύτια, the extremes, or last words of the verse. (See him, book i. discourse xvi. p. 78.)

Ver. 6. And the Spirit of God shall come upon thee, and thou shalt prophesy with them.] This was the highest assurance of all the rest, that Samuel anointed him by God's authority; who vouchsafed suddenly to inspire him with such thoughts and affections, that he became like one of them, viz. a psalmist: able in an instant to compose hymns in the praises of God; or to accompany them in their melodies, which he had never learnt. For he was not bred in the school of the prophets.

And shalt be turned into another man.] Endued with extraordinary prudence and courage, and such-like qualities, as fitted him for the government and conduct of God's people.

Ver. 7. And let it be, when these signs are come unto thee, that thou do as occasion shall serve thee.] As if he had said, I cannot give thee particular rules about every thing that is to be done by thee: but doubt not to undertake the government of the people: for God's Spirit shall guide thee to do that which the present occasion requires.

For God is with thee.] Be confident of good success in all thy undertakings, for God will be with thee, when thou goest out against thine enemies. The Chaldee paraphrast understands the foregoing words as if he had said, make all things belonging to a king, and then adds, for the Word of the Lord will be thy help.

Ver. 8. And thou shalt go down before me to Gilgal.] A place which had been famous for many great things done there, when they first came to Canaan: and lay conveniently for all the tribes beyond Jordan to meet, now they dwelt there.

And, behold, I will come down to thee, to offer burnt-offerings, and to sacrifice sacrifices of peace-offerings: seven days shalt thou tarry, till I come unto thee, and shew thee what thou shalt do.] This looks like another sign, which he gave him, of God's presence with him, in future times, if he were obedient to his commands. For it cannot be understood of his going immediately to Gilgal; and staying there seven days: for the people were first to be called together to Mizpeh, where he was made king, (ver. 17.) and after the defeat of the Ammonites he was confirmed in the kingdom at Gilgal, (xi. 14, 15.) And then the next year, a war breaking out with the Philistines, all the people met at Gilgal, and Saul with them; waiting for Samuel to come, as he had appointed, to offer sacrifice; which Saul, being impatient of staying so long for him, offered himself, &c. (xii. 4. 8, 9.) and thereby forfeited God's favour; whose prophet had assured him he would not fail to come to meet him here. But then these words must not be pointed as they are now, but as the Hebrew text will bear; retaining the same words, and only altering the pause or point in this manner: Thou shalt go down before me to Gilgal: and, behold, I will come unto thee to offer burnt-offerings, and to sacrifice sacrifices of peace-offerings, seven days. Here is to be a pause; and then another sentence begins thus: Thou shalt tarry till I come unto thee, &c. As if he had said, See, in any case, that thou tarry till I come, and shew thee what thou shalt do. Which Samuel, perhaps, knew not himself at present: but intended to ask counsel of God; and being fully instructed in this great business, then come to consecrate him (as Dr. Jackson conjectures), and establish him in his kingdom; by a solemn sacrifice for seven days, such as Solomon used at the consecration of the temple. (See his Third Sermon on Jer. xxvi. 19.; and the very same he repeats in his book of the Knowledge of Jesus Christ, chap. 17. parag. 4.)

Ver. 9. And it was so, when he had turned his back to go from Samuel, God gave him another heart: and all these signs came to pass that day.] So great was the goodness of God, that he immediately fulfilled the last and chief of these signs: for he was no sooner gone from Samuel, but he felt another spirit come into him of wisdom and fortitude, to qualify him for the government of God's people. Which afterward God took away from him, because of his sins, xvi. 14. (See Psal. li. 12.)

Ver. 10. And when he came thither to the hill, behold, a company of prophets met him; and the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he prophesied among them.] He mentions not the other signs particularly, because they were not of such general concernment unto others; but for his own satisfaction: whereas this of the prophets meeting him, and his conversion into a prophet, was of great and universal concernment; to make the people reverence him as their king, when they heard how God had honoured him with such an extraordinary gift from heaven.

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, when all that knew him beforetime saw that, behold, he prophesied among the prophets, then the people said one to another, What is this that is come unto the son of Kish? Is Saul also among the prophets?] It begat wonder in all those who knew his education, that he should on a sudden be inspired as they were, who were bred up in the school of the prophets: for though it was in the power of God alone to bestow the gift of prophecy upon men, yet commonly he endowed none with it, but such as were trained up in those studies which might dispose them for it. For had it been usual to invest those with this spirit, who had not been educated in such a course as might fit them to receive it, we cannot think it would have been so great a marvel now, as to give rise to this proverb. Which must not be understood, as Procopius Gazæus observes, as if Saul had perpetually the gift of prophecy; but that he received such a spiritual gift, whereby he at present prophesied; and was endued with prudence also to govern the people of God. Thus the seventy elders, who were to assist Moses, prophesied; but not always. It is observed by Erasmus, That this became a proverb, when they saw, "aliquem indecenter alieno gregi admixtum," any man indecently mingled with company that were strangers to him. Or, when they saw a sudden change wrought in any person; as Gregory Nazianzen applied it when he was chosen a bishop: "Saul prophesied so much beyond expectation, and when nobody thought of it, that the miracle became a proverb."

Ver. 12. And one of the same place answered and said, But who is their father?] This wonder was presently satisfied by a prudent person among them, who bade them consider who it was that made prophets: not men, nor merely good education, but God alone; who was the father of all the children of the prophets (i. e. of their disciples), to teach them by his Spirit. Which he could bestow when he pleased upon any man, and make him a prophet, without the help of any other master: which was the cause of Amos, vii. 14. And that is the meaning of the word father in this place, which signifies the same with master or teacher. (See upon Gen. iv. 20, 21.)

Ver. 13. And when he made an end of prophesying, he came to the high place.] Herein he differed from the prophets who met him; that he prophesied but for a short time, this not being his office: and when he had done, he went up to the high place from whence they came down. Where was, I suppose, a place of worship, unto which he went up to give thanks to God for his gifts, and to pray to him to prosper him in the government he designed for him.

Ver. 14. And Saul's uncle.] Who met him here in the high place, or in his way home.

Said unto him and to his servant, Whither went ye?] How came you to stay so long before your return?

And he said, To seek the asses: and when we saw that they were no where.] In no place where they sought them.

We came to Samuel.] To be informed by him.

Ver. 15. And Saul's uncle said, Tell me, I pray thee, what Samuel said unto you?] What discourse they had with him.

Ver. 16. And Saul said unto his uncle, He told us plainly that the asses were found. But of the matter of the kingdom, whereof Samuel spake, he told him not.] Lest he should seem to have been seeking so high a dignity: and because hitherto Samuel thought fit it should be kept a secret between them two.

Ver. 17. And Samuel called the people together.] How long after he departed from Samuel we are not told; but now resolved to declare God's choice of Saul to be their king more publicly.

Unto the Lord to Mizpeh.] Which was a very famous place, where they used to meet upon great occasions, (see chap. vii.) and God was pleased to be present (as hath been before observed) wheresoever there was a general assembly of his people, for the common good. (See upon Judg. xx. 1.) Yet one cannot well imagine, that every person of the whole body of all Israel were called hither unto this convention: but by the people we are to understand all the elders and heads of their tribes, who governed and represented the rest: and accordingly that which follows is to be interpreted.

Ver. 18. And said unto the children of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I brought Israel out of Egypt, and delivered you out of the hands of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all kingdoms, of them that oppressed you.] He commemorates the benefits they received from him, ever since they were in Egypt; from whence he brought them; and suffered none of the kingdoms that lay in their way to Canaan to obstruct their passage: and since they came there delivered them from many heavy oppressions.

Ver. 19. And ye have this day rejected your God, who himself saved you out of all your adversities and tribulations.] By raising up judges, whensoever they cried to him for help: who never failed to conquer all their enemies.

And ye have said unto him, Nay.] When he desired them to continue under his government, they refused, and would not be denied what they asked.

But set a king over us.] They would not any longer be governed by God, but have a king settled over them; to whom they might resort for help.

Now therefore present yourselves before the Lord by your tribes, and by your thousands.] Into which their tribes were divided. This was a wonderful obstinacy and stupidity, that, after God had given them time to consider what it was they desired, and what difference there was between his government, and that of the kings round about them, they should not relent; but persist to the last in their resolution; and imagine that a king could save them, though God was not with him.

Ver. 20. And when Samuel had caused all the tribes of Israel to draw near.] Unto the place where the lots were to be drawn, in the presence of the heads of their tribes and families, who represented all the rest.

The tribe of Benjamin was taken.] This is a phrase used in the seventh of Joshua, about the discovery of him, who had offended in the accursed thing: which all agree was by lots. And so Rasi and Ralbag understand it here: though Kimchi imagines God told him by urim and thummim, out of what tribe and family their king should be taken. Which is not probable, because the ark was not now at Mizpeh; before which the high-priest was to stand, when he consulted the Divine Majesty by urim and thummim.

Ver. 21. When he caused the tribe of Benjamin to draw near by their families, the family of Matri was taken, and Saul the son of Kish was taken.] The holy writer shortens this account of casting lots: but it is pretty evident they were cast four times: in the first the tribe of Benjamin was taken; in the second the family of Matri in that tribe was taken: but there being several households in that family, it was cast a third time, that they might know in what house their king was, and that of Kish was taken: and in his house, by a new lottery, Saul was taken: and he took this course, as to prevent all dispute, so to give him the greater authority over them, as a person divinely appointed; according to what God had said, Deut. xix. 15. And it is very observable, that Plato himself acknowledges a government appointed by lots to be Θεοφιλῆ ἀρχήν, a government beloved of God, (lib. iv. de Legibus.)

Here interpreters are wont to inquire, why their first king should be chosen out of the smallest tribe, sprung from the youngest son of Jacob, and out of the smallest family in this tribe: especially since Judah all along had the preeminence among his brethren, and the great King was promised to spring from him. To which this seems to be a reasonable satisfaction; that this king being extorted by their undutiful importunities, and given them in anger (as I before observed), God was pleased to express his dislike of it by this choice: whereby he also intended to take them off, from depending on their king (whose power was small) so much as on himself.

And when they sought him, he could not be found.] Having withdrawn himself, either out of feebleness of spirit (as some think), or rather out of modesty, he declined so high an authority, unless imposed upon him: or, perhaps, being affrighted when he heard Samuel still representing God as offended with them, for asking a king: which was to reject his government.

Ver. 22. Therefore they inquired of the Lord further, if the man should come thither. And the Lord answered.] From hence Abarbinel argues, that God directed them, both by lot, and by urim and thummim. Which if it be true, then, though the ark was not there, yet they inquired of the Lord in the usual way, and he was pleased to give answers any where, in great and weighty cases. As Abiathar inquired of the Lord with the ephod for David, at Keilah and at Ziklag, (xxiii. 9. xxx. 7.)

Behold, he hath hid himself among the stuff.] Or, among the carriages. Here the Jews observe, that whosoever flies dominion, him dominion follows. For when they told Saul he was chosen king, he said he was not fit for that office, and bade them inquire again by urim and thummim: which they make the meaning of the word further. And while they were going to make this inquiry, he went and hid himself, till the oracle discovered him. (See Buxtorf, Hist. Urim et Thummim. cap. 3. p. 307.)

Ver. 23. And they ran and fetched him thence: and when he stood among the people, he was higher than any of the people, from the shoulders and upwards.] A princely person, and of a majestic aspect: as Corn. Nepos describes Iphicrates in the account he gives of his life, cap. 3. "Fuit et animo magno et corpore, imperatoriaque forma, ut ipso aspectu cuivis injiceret admirationem sui." He was great both in mind and body, having a form so imperial, that his very aspect struck every one with admiration of him. And thus P. Cunæus observes, that not only barbarous people, but the most polite nations did, "Majestatem corporis venerari," look upon a majestic body with veneration, lib. i. de Repub. Hebr. p. 85. Which appears by what Homer saith of Agamemnon, Iliad. iii. ver. 166. and Virgil of Æneas and Turnus: the latter of which he describes just like Saul, lib. vii. ver. 782.

"Ipse inter primos præstanti corpore Turnus Vertitur, arma tenens, et toto vertice supra est."

Ver. 24. And Samuel said unto all the people, See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen.] Though the people were resolutely bent to have a king, yet they were sensible none could make one but God. And therefore they came, in the beginning of this business, to ask one of his prophets. But Samuel could not constitute one without Divine direction and appointment, as appears by the first verse of this chapter, where he saith, the Lord hath anointed thee; and the lot whereby he was publicly chosen was cast before the Lord, (ver. 19. 23.) And accordingly here he tells them, the Lord hath chosen him. Thus afterward the Lord commanded David to be anointed, (xvi. 1. 3.) and among all his sons Solomon was particularly appointed by God to succeed him, (1 Chron. xxix. 5.)

That there is none like him among all the people?] Such was his stature and his aspect, that, as Josephus expresses it, ἐξεῖχέ τε ἁπάντων, καὶ τὸ ὕψος ἦν βασιλικώτατος, he excelled, and was most kingly in his height, (lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 5.)

And all the people shouted.] All that were then present, except some profane fellows, who were so far from owning him for their king that they despised him.

And said, God save the king.] In the Hebrew, let the king live, that is, be prosperous. The same form of words was used in after-ages when they made kings, (1 Kings i. 34. 39. 2 Kings xi. 12. 2 Chron. xxiii. 11.) All this being done at Mizpeh, when Samuel set up the great stone called Ebenezer, it is not improbable that Saul was there declared their king.

Ver. 25. Then Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord.] The right of the king, which he had laid before the people, upon their first desire to have one, (viii. 11.) he now wrote in a book, and laid up before the Lord: that it might be a witness against them, that all the evils which hereafter befel them, were drawn upon them by their own desires. For what Petrus Cunæus saith, that he wrote the words mentioned Deut. xvii. 16, &c. is altogether unlikely: they being laid up before the Lord long ago, when the law was put by the side of the ark, (Deut. xxxi. 26.) Josephus said a great deal better, (lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 5.) Τὰ μέλλοντα συμβήσεσθαι κακὰ γράψαι, &c. The prophet having written the evils that should befal them, he read them in the ears of the king, and then laid up the book in the tabernacle of God, to be a testimony unto future ages of what he had foretold. A duplicate of this writing, it is likely, he left with the elders of the people.

And Samuel sent all the people away, every man to his house.] The people were not dismissed by Saul, who would not presently take upon him to exercise his authority. For Samuel was there, who had been for many years their supreme governor. That is, sixteen years (as Sir J. Marsham computes) before the inauguration of Saul: and he lived eighteen years after, as Josephus saith, in the latter end of the sixth book of his Antiquities; during which time he exercised the power of a judge.

Ver. 26. Saul also went home to Gibeah.] In this he still shewed his humility: going to his own home, which was no princely palace.

And there went with him a band of men, whose heart God had touched.] A company of stout valiant men, of great resolution: whom God inclined to follow him, as his guard. Or, were moved, perhaps, by the authority of Samuel (who was a man of God), to go and attend him.

Ver. 27. And the children of Belial said.] Some very lewd men (see upon Deut. xiii. 13.) who hated all government: and being, it is probable, men of some rank and quality, were proud, and despised a person of such a small family.

How shall this man save us?] They would not vouchsafe so much as to call him by his name; but insolently contemned him, as one of no note, who had no power to deliver them.

And they despised him, and brought him no presents.] As the manner was to do unto their kings in the eastern countries, when they first tendered their service to them. Which was a token of their benevolence, subjection, and joy. Thus the Psalmist represents the people offering gifts to the Messiah, Psal. xlv. and lxxii.

Jonathan thus expresses it in this place, They did not come to wish him a happy reign.

But he held his peace.] This was an act of great prudence: which declared he was endued with an extraordinary spirit; which enabled him to dissemble his knowledge of the scorn they put upon him. For if he had taken notice of it, he must have punished it; and it had not been safe to begin his reign with any thing of severity: therefore he wisely ordered himself, as if he did not observe their neglect. Corn. Bertram thinks, in his book de Repub.

Jud. cap. 10. that these men refusing to be governed by Saul, he retired for awhile, and led a private life: leaving Samuel to administer all affairs, as he had done for many years. But whether that be true or not, it is evident Saul, in the beginning of his reign, was endued with a spirit of singular wisdom and moderation: and was none of those princes whom Dion Prusæus describes, (Orat. de Regno, p. 5.) μακαρίζοντας ἐξουσίαν μετ' ἀνοίας, who bless and praise power, joined with folly and want of understanding.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. THEN Nahash the Ammonite.] He was either the king of the children of Ammon, or the captain of his host; who laid siege to Jabesh-Gilead, as Josephus saith, about a month after Saul was chosen king: but had levied war against them before, (xii. 12.) which was the occasion of their desiring a king.

Came up against Jabesh-Gilead.] He renewed, it is likely, their old pretensions to this country: which they had made in the time of Jephthah. For Jabesh-Gilead was in the tribe of Manasseh on the other side Jordan; bordering upon the Ammonites: who laid a claim to this country, which the Israelites took from Sihon and Og, as we read in Judg. xi.

And all the men of Jabesh said unto Nahash, Make a covenant with us, and we will serve thee.] Be his subjects, but not slaves, with whom no covenant was made.

Ver. 2. And Nahash the Ammonite answered them, On this condition I will make a covenant with you, that I may thrust out all your right eyes.] He would not put out both their eyes, because that would have made them unserviceable to him; but only the right, which (as many learned men have observed) was most useful in war; the left eye being covered with their shields, which they held in their left hand: so Procopius Gazæus, the left eye is covered with the shield; with the right we see our enemies.

And lay it for a reproach upon all Israel.] This is the only reason he gives for such insolent treatment, that all Israel might know what they were to expect, if he could prevail over them.

Ver. 3. And the elders of Jabesh said unto him, Give us seven days, that we may send messengers into all the coasts of Israel: and then, if there be no man to save us, we will come out to thee.] It may seem strange, that either they should submit so soon to such base conditions; or that Nahash should grant them so much respite, when he saw them so abject, and inclined to yield to him. But the reason of both is visible: for Saul they thought was not able to help them; having not yet taken upon him the government, but living privately; (see ver. 5.) and Nahash, it is like, was loath to drive them to desperation, by denying them this short space to expect relief, which he thought could not possibly come to them, though Saul should appear and endeavour to levy an army; for that he imagined could not be done in so few days.

Ver. 4. Then came messengers to Gibeah of Saul.] So called, because Saul was there born, and bred, and dwelt.

And told the tidings in the ears of the people: and all the people lifted up their voices, and wept.] As men despairing of relief.

Ver. 5. And, behold, Saul came after the herd out of the field; and Saul said, What aileth the people that they weep? And they told him the tidings of the men of Jabesh.] By this it appears (as I noted in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter), that some men, not only refusing to submit to him, but despising him, he went and lived retired, and led a rustic life: exercising no authority over the people; but leaving all to Samuel's management.

Ver. 6. Then the Spirit of the Lord came upon him when he heard these tidings, and his anger was kindled greatly.] But now he resolved, by an impulse he felt from heaven, to shew that God had chosen him to be their king. Who, upon this occasion, gave him an extraordinary measure of courage, zeal, and military skill.

Ver. 7. And he took a yoke of oxen.] Which he had newly brought out of the field, (ver. 5.)

And hewed them in pieces, and sent them throughout all the coasts of Israel, by the hand of messengers, saying, Whosoever comes not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so shall it be done unto his oxen.] He herein begins to give a proof of his resolution, by this terrible threatening; and by the representation he made of the execution he intended, if he was disobeyed. Whereby it appears, that the kings of Israel assumed such an absolute power as Samuel described chap. viii. One part of which consisted in making war, and raising soldiers, by their sole authority, and punishing those that did not come to the army at their summons. For we never read that they consulted the oracle before they went to war; nor that they are reproved by the prophets for that neglect. In like manner they made laws, which is the act of a sovereign. For though they could not alter the laws of Moses, but were to govern themselves by them; yet, in things not determined there, or were not clear and plain, they made what laws they thought good; as appears by David, and Solomon, and other of their best princes.

And the fear of the Lord fell upon the people.] They were no less affected with the cutting these oxen in pieces, than they had been with the using the Levite's concubine in like manner, (Judg. xix. 19.) as Bochartus notes: who observes something like this among heathen people, (Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 33.)

And they came out with one consent.] God, who put courage into Saul, possessed the people also with a fear of offending him; now that he asserted his royal authority over them. For he names himself before Samuel (the kingly dignity being superior to the prophetical), but wisely mentions him also, that they who did not reverence himself as their king, might follow the prophet, whom all reverenced.

Ver. 8. And when they numbered them in Bezek.] Of this place, see upon Judg. i. 6.

The children of Israel were three hundred thousand, and the men of Judah thirty thousand.] It is thought by some, that the Philistines invaded them in the west, as the Ammonites did in the east, (just as they had done formerly in the time of Jephthah, Judg. x. 7, 8.) which is the reason so few of Judah came in at this summons; being engaged elsewhere against another dangerous enemy. But they would not wholly neglect to come to his assistance in this other war, but shewed their forwardness to obey him, as much as they were able. Bertram, also, Altingius, (in his Shilo, lib. iii. cap. 11.) and others, take it as an honour done to this tribe, which had the pre-eminence, that they were numbered by themselves. But Sir J. Marsham looks upon it as the beginning of a schism, (Secul. ix.)

Ver. 9. And they said unto the messengers that came, Thus shall ye say to the men of Jabesh-Gilead, To-morrow, by that time the sun shall be hot, ye shall have help, &c.] The morrow after their return, before noon.

Ver. 10. Therefore the men of Jabesh said.] Unto Nahash the Ammonite.

To-morrow we will come out unto you, and ye shall do with us that which seemeth good to you.] In case, that is, relief did not come to them by that time: of which they pretended to have no hope. Most look upon this as spoken ironically and in mockery: but Grotius takes it for a stratagem, to make them secure: according to the opinion of those times, that they might delude an enemy by deceitful words: as Elisha did the Syrians, 2 Kings vi. 18, 19, &c. (See lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 1. sect. 17.)

Ver. 11. And it was so on the morrow, that Saul put the people in three companies; and they came into the midst of the host in the morning-watch, and slew the Ammonites till the heat of the day.] He set upon them, I suppose, on three sides, and the men of Jabesh issuing out on the other, they were so distracted that they could make little resistance: but the Israelites got into the midst of them very early, and made a great slaughter of them till noon.

And it came to pass, that they which remained were scattered, so that two of them were not left together.] This is added to shew, with what a complete victory Saul began his reign: whereby God established his authority.

Ver. 12. And the people said unto Samuel.] Who, it appears from hence, accompanied Saul in this expedition, to encourage him with hopes of good success.

Who is he that said, Saul shall not reign over us? bring the men, that we may put them to death.] Great successes make great alterations in the affections of the people; who quietly saw Saul contemned a little while ago; but now would have inquiry made after those sons of Belial, who spake opprobriously of him, (x. 27.)

Ver. 13. And Saul said, There shall not a man be put to death this day.] He prudently dissembled his knowledge of their despisal of him, before the kingdom was confirmed to him: but this moderation, now that he was wonderfully victorious, argued greater wisdom and goodness. For nothing is more glorious than to be humble and meek in the height of power.

For to-day the Lord hath wrought salvation in Israel.] Besides the policy he exercised in pardoning offenders (whereby he laid the strongest obligations upon them to be faithful to him), it was a piece of piety to imitate God, who had been so good to them all.

Ver. 14. Then Samuel said unto the people, Come, and let us go to Gilgal, to renew the kingdom there.] New kingdoms are not easily settled. And this place was famous upon many accounts, as Mizpeh was, where Samuel first declared him king. Particularly, Samuel was wont to judge the people here, (vii. 16.)

Ver. 15. And all the people went to Gilgal; and there they made Saul king, before the Lord in Gilgal.] He had been anointed in Ramah; and chosen by lot in Mizpeh; but still some disdained to own him as their king: which made him content himself for a time (as I said before) with a private life. But now, after this signal token of God's presence with him, in the late victory, he was, by common consent, acknowledged by all the people for their king. Which is the meaning of these words, they made Saul king; for it is certain, it was neither they nor Samuel that could make a king; but God alone: who ordered Samuel to anoint him, and then made the lot to fall upon him; and now inclined the hearts of all the people to submit to his authority.

The LXX. here say, ἔχρισε Σαμυὴλ, &c. that Samuel here anointed Saul king over Israel. And Josephus, (lib. vi. cap. 6.) that he again anointed Saul, Τῷ ἁγίῳ ἐλαίῳ, with holy oil. But there is not a word of this anointing in the Hebrew text, no, nor in the Vulgar Latin: and the Targum very well expresses it, they made Saul to reign, i. e. would not let him any longer lead a private life; but prayed him to take the government upon him according to God's ordinance, and promised subjection to him. Gilgal seems to have been chosen for this purpose, rather than any other place: because there was a sanctified piece of ground, as Abarbinel speaks, where, when they entered into Canaan, the ark first stood: which now, perhaps, they brought hither, and offered sacrifice before it.

And there they sacrificed sacrifices of peace-offerings before the Lord.] Who was present, as I observed before, (see Judg. xx. 1.) in such great assemblies of the body of the people: with whom both they and their king made a covenant of obedience to him, by offering of the sacrifices.

And there Saul and all the men of Israel rejoiced together.] By feasting upon the peace-offerings: giving thanks to God for the late victory, and for settling the kingdom.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. AND Samuel said unto all Israel.] In the presence of Saul, as appears from ver. 3. 5.

Behold, I have hearkened unto you in all that you said unto me, and have made you a king.] This speech was made before they parted from Gilgal: where they had renewed the kingdom.

Ver. 2. And now, behold, the king walketh before you.] To rule and govern them, (Numb. xxvii. 17.)

And I am old and grey-headed.] And therefore very willing to be discharged from the government of you.

And, behold, my sons are with you.] Reduced also to the state of private persons; being the king's subjects, no less than you.

And I have walked before you from my childhood to this day.] He appeals to them whether he had not always discharged his duty faithfully, from the very beginning; when God had made him a prophet to instruct and guide them. For now they might freely accuse him, if they had any thing to allege against him: both he and his sons being now become subjects to a more sovereign authority.

Ver. 3. Behold, here I am: witness against me before the Lord, and before his anointed.] He offers himself to be tried, and to give a public account of his administration: being ready to answer any thing that could be objected against him.

Whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken?] He desires them to testify, if he had ruled after the manner of the eastern kings: under which government they chose to put themselves.

Or whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed?] If they knew of no open violence, he bids them mention any fraud or circumvention, of which he had been guilty.

Or of whose hands have I received any bribes to blind mine eyes? and I will restore it you.] He challenges them to prove so much as the receiving any gift, in any cause that came before him; and he would make full satisfaction.

Ver. 4. And they said, Thou hast not defrauded, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand.] They acknowledged him to be perfectly an upright judge: who could not be charged to have done any thing amiss.

Ver. 5. And he said unto them, The Lord is witness against you, and his anointed is witness this day, that ye have not found aught in my hand. And they answered, He is witness.] Of his innocence; and that they had no reason to complain of his government.

Ver. 6. And Samuel said unto the people, It is the Lord that advanced Moses and Aaron, and brought your fathers up out of the land of Egypt.] D. Kimchi refers this to the foregoing words; as if he had said, the Lord that did such wonders by Moses and Aaron is witness, &c.

Ver. 7. Now therefore stand still.] The Jews observe, that they were wont to stand, when they heard the word of God. Though those words, Exod. xx. 18. are but a slender proof of it.

That I may reason with you before the Lord of all the righteous acts of the Lord, which he did to you and to your fathers.] He would not dismiss them, till, having obtained this honourable testimony from them, he had represented to them the great benefits they had received from God, and their ingratitude to him.

Ver. 8. When Jacob was come into Egypt, and your fathers cried unto the Lord, then the Lord sent Moses and Aaron, which brought your fathers out of Egypt, and made them dwell in this place.] Any one may easily discern, this is but a compendious narrative of what God did for them, from their first coming out of Egypt, till they were settled in Canaan; no more than that their fathers cried unto the Lord, when Jacob came into Egypt, and the Lord sent these two persons to deliver them. For many things intervened between both these; till at last God settled them in their rest, in the good land he promised to give them.

Ver. 9. And when they forgat the Lord their God, he sold them into the hand of Sisera, captain of the host of Hazor, and into the hand of the Philistines, and into the hand of the king of Moab; and they fought against them.] This is a short history of the calamities which befel them, for their idolatry, after they came there: some few of which he only mentions; without observing exactly the order in which they came upon them: but these were the people who longest oppressed them.

Ver. 10. And they cried unto the Lord, and said, We have sinned, because we have forsaken the Lord, and have served Baalim and Ashtaroth: but now deliver us out of the hand of our enemies, and we will serve thee.] This they did very often. (Judg. iii. 9. 13. iv. 3. vi. 7. especially x. 10. 15, &c.)

Ver. 11. And the Lord sent Jerubbaal, and Bedan, and Jephthah, and Samuel, and delivered you out of the hand of your enemies on every side, and ye dwell safely.] This is perfectly agreeable to the history of the book of Judges; which acquaints us, that as often as they repented, and besought his pardon, &c. he raised up deliverers unto them: the latest of which he only mentions. In which account there is no difficulty, but only about Bedan: of whom we no where read. But see my notes upon Judg. x. 4. unto which may be added, that the Chaldee paraphrase here hath it, he sent Gideon and Samson, &c. whom most take to be the person here meant, and called Ben-Dan (the son of Dan), because he was of that tribe: and by contraction called Bedan; just as instead of Saulmeel (asked of God), they called him who writes this book Samuel, for shortness' sake. Who mentions himself as one of their deliverers; because the signal overthrow he gave the Philistines, which drove them out of their country, was fresh in their memory.

Ver. 12. And when ye saw that Nahash, the king of the children of Ammon, came against you, ye said unto me, Nay; but a king shall reign over us; when the Lord your God was your king.] They would not stay till God raised them up a deliverer, or commanded Samuel, who was their judge, to fight with him: but would have a king like other nations, always at hand to fight their battles. (See upon viii. 5.) The word nay seems to signify that Samuel told them, that God would be with them to deliver them; or that he offered himself to be their leader under God: but they refused his offer, and continued to demand a king.

Ver. 13. Now therefore behold the king whom you have chosen, and whom you have desired!] He could not upbraid them too often with this, that they would not be content with the government of God, which was peculiar to them; but chose to be like other people.

And, behold, the Lord hath set a king over you.] Though they chose to have a king like other nations, and be governed by God no longer; yet he still puts them in mind they could not make one, but he was set over them by God; as I have before observed.

Ver. 14. If ye will fear the Lord, and serve him, and obey his voice, and not rebel against the commandment of the Lord.] According to the covenant they lately made with him: (xi. 15.) all virtue springs from the fear of God.

Then shall both ye, and your king that reigneth over you, continue following the Lord your God.] That is, be defended by him; and continue a happy people: notwithstanding they had thus rejected him. This appears to be the meaning, by what is opposed to it in the following verse.

Ver. 15. But if ye will not obey the voice of the Lord, but rebel against the commandment of the Lord; then shall the hand of the Lord be against you, as it was against your fathers.] He would suffer their enemies to oppress them, as they did in the days of the Judges: or send other plagues upon them.

Ver. 16. Now therefore stand and see the great thing, which the Lord will do before your eyes.] For a visible demonstration of the truth of all that Samuel had said.

Ver. 17. Is it not wheat-harvest to-day?] A very clear day, and in no disposition to rain. Which was not wont to fall in harvest-time; but in the autumn, and in the spring: called the later and the former rain.

I will call upon the Lord, and he shall send thunder and rain; that you may perceive and see that your wickedness is great, which you have done in the sight of the Lord, in asking you a king.] By this he shewed how he could in an instant deprive them of all the comforts of life; as they deserved, for their rejecting him and his prophet: who was so powerful, as by his prayers to produce such wonders.

Ver. 18. So Samuel called upon the Lord; and the Lord sent thunder and rain that day.] A very horrible tempest, accompanied, it is likely, with lightning; when all was serene, and no sign appeared of it.

And all the people feared the Lord and Samuel.] This struck such a terror into them, that they were afraid God would destroy them, as he did Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; and that Samuel would not intercede for them.

Ver. 19. And all the people said unto Samuel, Pray for thy servants unto the Lord, that we die not: for we have added unto all our sins this evil, to ask us a king.] Till now they seem not to have been sensible of their sin, in desiring an alteration in the form of their government: therefore it was a miraculous storm, full of horror, which extorted this confession from them; not only of this, but all their former sins.

Ver. 20. And Samuel said unto the people, Fear not; ye have done all this wickedness; yet turn not aside from following the Lord, but serve him with all your heart.] He would not have them despair of recovering God's favour; and directs them the best way to it: by continuing so sensible of their wickedness, as to be moved to true repentance and steadfast obedience.

Ver. 21. And turn ye not aside: for then shall ye go after vain things, which cannot profit.] He warns them above all things against worshipping other gods, whom he calls vain things which cannot profit; by a scheme of speech in the Hebrew language, signifying, they do a great deal of mischief. Thus in Prov. xx. 23. the wise man saith, a false balance is not good; that is, is very bad and hateful to God; as it goes before, of divers weights. And thus heathen writers speak, particularly Homer, Odyss. ξ. ver. 85.

Οὐ γὰρ σχέτλια ἔργα θεοὶ μάκαρες φιλέουσι.

The blessed gods do not love wicked actions; i. e. they hate and detest them.

Nor deliver, for they are vain.] He presses them to persist in the worship of God alone; whom if they forsook and went after other gods, in vain did they expect help and deliverance from them, for they were void of all power.

Ver. 22. For the Lord will not forsake his people for his great name's sake; because it hath pleased the Lord to make you his people.] The steadfastness of God in his affection to them, notwithstanding their provocations, was a mighty motive to faithful obedience.

Ver. 23. Moreover, as for me, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you: but I will instruct you in the good and right way.] Not only pray for them, but teach and instruct them: which were the two great offices of a prophet. They had highly disobliged him; but he imitated God, who pardoned them, and so did he.

Ver. 24. Only fear the Lord, and serve him in truth with all your heart: for consider how great things he hath done for you.] All his prayers and instructions would not do the business, without their serious considerations. And what more worthy their constant thoughts than the great benefits they had received from God: particularly his tender mercy in not casting them off when they shaked off his government.

Ver. 25. But if you will still do wickedly, ye shall be consumed, both you and your king.] As it proved, not only in this, but in several future reigns.

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. AND Saul reigned one year.] In the Hebrew the words are, the son of one year in his reign or kingdom. A very learned prelate of our own (in his Demonstration of the Messiah, par. ii. p. 240.) takes the meaning to be, that after the Philistines were subdued by Samuel, a year passed, when Saul began to reign; and after this he reigned two years free from their yoke. As for his being called the son of one year in the Hebrew, it is well translated by us reigned one year; because he was born, when he was made king, and changed into another man: for thus (as Bochartus hath observed) the day of an emperor's inauguration among the gentiles was called his birth-day, viz. natalis regni, the day when he began his reign.

And when he had reigned two years over Israel.] So Ralbag interprets the Hebrew words; and thereby confutes the strange fancy in Seder Olam Rabba, that Saul reigned but two years in all. Whereas the meaning is, after this he reigned two years free from the oppression of the Philistines: but when they were ended, the Philistines got the upper hand again, and enslaved the Israelites, as appears by this chapter.

Ver. 2. Saul chose him three thousand men.] In the first year of his reign he performed those things mentioned in the foregoing chapter: and when he had reigned two years, these things fell out which we read in this chapter. Which is much better than Dr. Lightfoot's exposition, that he had been king one year from his first anointing at Ramah, to his second at Gibeah: and after that he reigned two years more before the Lord cast him off, and anointed David. Symmachus and Procopius Gazæus, not much otherwise. Who by son of one year think the simplicity of his mind is denoted: which he preserved for some time, i. e. till he had reigned two years over Israel, and then he began to be depraved and forsaken of God.

Whereof two thousand were with Saul in Michmash, and in Mount Beth-el, and one thousand men with Jonathan in Gibeah of Benjamin.] There was another Gibeah in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 57.)

And the rest of the people he sent every man to his tent.] The forementioned number being sufficient for his guard, and to preserve the country in peace, and to oppose any sudden inroad of their enemies: he would not be burdensome to his people, by keeping great forces.

Ver. 3. And Jonathan smote the garrison of the Philistines.] Who, though subdued by Samuel at Eben-ezer, and driven out of the country; yet kept some strong holds, as I observed, x. 5.

That was in Geba.] This was a distinct place from Gibeah, though both in the tribe of Benjamin: as is evident from Josh. xviii. 24. 28.

And the Philistines heard it.] And thereupon (as the following words import) denounced war against Israel.

And Saul blew the trumpet throughout all the land of Israel, saying, Let the Hebrews hear.] He gave them notice by a proclamation, what Jonathan had done, and what was the effect of it: and thereupon summoned them to come to Gilgal.

Ver. 4. And all Israel heard say, that Saul had smitten the garrison of the Philistines.] This shews that Jonathan acted by Saul's order: who was desirous to free his own tribe from such intruders.

And that Israel also was an abomination with the Philistines.] Who were highly incensed to take revenge.

And the people were called together after Saul to Gilgal.] Where Samuel had appointed to meet him, (x. 8.)

Ver. 5. The Philistines gathered themselves together to fight with Israel, thirty thousand chariots, and six thousand horsemen, and people as the sand of the sea-shore for multitude; and they came up and pitched in Michmash, eastward from Beth-aven.] A prodigious army, and very formidable, by reason of their chariots and horsemen, which were also very numerous, (see Josh. xi. 4.) But it is not likely the Philistines alone could bring so many into the field: no, nor after other nations thereabout were associated with them, it is credible that they should make up thirty thousand chariots of war. For none ever had so many; Pharaoh himself pursuing the Israelites only with six hundred, (Exod. xiv. 7.) Therefore most of them were no more than carriages, which were necessary for the baggage of such vast multitudes of people: which is a better account, in my judgment, than to say there is a mistake made by transcribers in later times: as Bochartus himself thinks, (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 9.) because in the Syriac and Arabic copies there are only found three thousand. Which is too great a number, without the help of the foregoing exposition; for in the vast army of Mithridates there were but a hundred chariots, and in Darius's two hundred, and in Antiochus Epiphanes' (of which we read 2 Macc. xiii. 2.) but three hundred.

Ver. 6. When the men of Israel saw that they were in a strait (for the people were distressed). Though their wonderful success against the Ammonites had encouraged them to obey the summons of such a prosperous leader, as Saul had been; yet when they saw the vast army of the Philistines, how well they were appointed, and themselves unprovided, their hearts failed them, and they slunk from him as fast as they had flocked to him.

Then the people did hide themselves in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits.] One part of the people endeavoured to secure themselves in lurking places: where it was not easy to find them.

Ver. 7. And some of the Hebrews went over Jordan to the land of Gad and Gilead.] Another part of them fled as far as they could from present danger, into the country of the two tribes and a half.

As for Saul, he was yet in Gilgal, and all the people followed him trembling.] All that were left with him were in great fear, seeing so many of their brethren desert him.

Ver. 8. And he tarried seven days, according to the set time that Samuel appointed.] He mistook Samuel's meaning, (as I shewed upon x. 8.) who told him he would come and offer sacrifice seven days: and then adds, thou shalt tarry till I come. So two interpreters, who are ancient in respect of our times (Rupertus and Angelomus), have observed an amphibologia in Samuel's words in that place, which may be construed two ways; and it was Saul's folly to make choice of the wrong sense. For the last words there are as much as if he had said, be sure to tarry till I come, and shew thee what thou shalt do. And indeed common reason might have taught him, that if the war was to be undertaken, it was to be managed likewise by the counsel of the Lord: and therefore he ought not to have sacrificed, or done any other solemn act, before the prophet, who was God's ambassador in this business, came to instruct him.

But Samuel came not to Gilgal.] So soon as Saul expected him.

And the people were scattered from him.] That third part of the people who were left began to go away, when they saw Samuel did not come to advise and assist him in this dangerous condition.

Ver. 9. And Saul said, Bring hither the burnt-offering unto me, and peace-offerings. And he offered the burnt-offering.] And would have proceeded to offer the peace-offerings, if Samuel's coming had not prevented him.

Ver. 10. And it came to pass, that, as soon as he had made an end of offering the burnt-offering, behold, Samuel came; and Saul went out to meet him, that he might salute him.] Welcome him thither: which he did in honour of the prophet.

Ver. 11. And Samuel said, What hast thou done? And Saul said, Because I saw the people were scattered from me, and that thou camest not within the days appointed, and that the Philistines gathered themselves together to Michmash.] These looked like weighty reasons; but could not excuse his presumption in not waiting for Samuel, who assured him he would come thither.

Ver. 12. Therefore, said I, The Philistines will come down now upon me to Gilgal, and I have not made supplication unto the Lord: I forced myself therefore, and offered a burnt-offering.] He pretends it was much against his inclination: but pleads necessity for what he did, least his enemies should have set upon him before he had commended himself to God and begged his blessing. By which it appears, that burnt-offerings were of the nature of a prayer to God: whom they acknowledged hereby to be the Lord of all. Whence it is that we read so often of Abraham and Isaac, that they "built altars (which were for sacrifice) and called upon the name of the Lord." The gentiles also, as well as the Jews, invoked God by their sacrifices, as Mr. Mede hath shewn from Homer and other authors, book ii. p. 464.

Ver. 13. And Samuel said to Saul, Thou hast done foolishly: thou hast not kept the commandment of the Lord thy God, which he commanded thee.] When God advanced Saul to be king, he was little in his own eyes, and then a great man in the sight of God. But now he began to take upon him, and thought it was fit the prophet should wait for the king rather than the king for the prophet: and distrusted Samuel's word, who bade him tarry till he came. And so intruded upon the priest's office; or, at least, caused the priest to do that unseasonably which was reserved for Samuel to do, when God thought fit to send him: who had all along transacted all matters between God and Saul. In short, his folly and disobedience consisted in this, that he intrenched upon the priest's office, or upon the prophet's, or upon both: and would not wait Samuel's coming, nor confess his fault to him when he came; but made excuses, and laid the fault upon all but himself, (ver. 11.)

Abarbinel hath expounded this a little more distinctly, by observing the command which Samuel gave him, when he anointed him, x. 8. where he tells him, first, he would come and offer sacrifice; secondly, he bids him wait for him seven days; and, lastly, saith he would direct him what to do. Now Saul transgressed every part of this command: for he offered sacrifice himself, which God intended should be offered only by the prophet; and he did not stay till the end of the seventh day, but offered on the seventh day in the morning; and he intended to begin the war without any direction from Samuel what he should do. He thinks, also, that those words, seven days (in that place), may refer to the words going before, viz. peace-offerings so many days. For Saul was bound, as it follows, to tarry till Samuel came, though he stayed more than seven days before he came.

For now would the Lord have established thy kingdom upon Israel for ever.] This suggests that the intention of Samuel's coming to offer sacrifice at Gilgal for seven days, was to confirm Saul in the kingdom, (as I observed upon x. 8.) if he had not foolishly deprived himself of that blessing: but here the Hebrew doctors take notice of a difficulty, which is, how God could intend to establish the kingdom upon him for ever, without contradicting the prophecy of Jacob, who had promised the sceptre to the tribe of Judah. Which Ralbag thinks is sufficiently answered, by saying that for ever signifies no more than a long time; as it doth in the words of Hannah in the beginning of this book, chap. i. 22. and in Exod. xxi. 9. and many more places. And so others interpret these words, as long as his posterity lasted.

Ver. 14. But now the kingdom shall not continue.] He predicts that God would not let his family enjoy the kingdom: because of other sins which he foresaw he would commit.

The Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart, and the Lord hath commanded him to be captain over his people, because thou hast not kept that which the Lord commanded thee.] God had not yet commanded David to lead his people, but he fully intended to do it, if Saul did not repent, and obtain a pardon of him for his offence. Whereby he had not provoked him so far, as to have an irreversible sentence passed upon him (as many great men have thought), but it might have been revoked if he had not persisted in his folly, and committed a much greater offence against the Divine Majesty, in the war against Amalek. Then Samuel tells him, the Lord would not repent: which not being added here, it makes it probable he was capable of a pardon, notwithstanding this denunciation: if he had begged it with repentance, and better obedience for the time to come.

Ver. 15. And Samuel arose, and gat him up from Gilgal unto Gibeah of Benjamin.] The place of Saul's birth, and where he lived; which I look upon as a sign that Samuel did not intend to desert him, as he did afterward, nor looked upon him yet as forsaken by God.

And Saul numbered the people that were present with him, about six hundred men.] A strange alteration since the last year, when against the Ammonites he had three hundred thousand men with him, besides those of Judah, (xi. 6.)

Ver. 16. And Saul, and Jonathan his son, and the people who were present with him, abode in Gibeah of Benjamin.] They followed Samuel; and it was a strong place, where they could defend themselves better than in the open field: and here, it is likely, he hoped to increase his forces, being in his own tribe.

But the Philistines encamped in Michmash.] A place not very remote from Gibeah; but in the tribe of Ephraim.

Ver. 17. And the spoilers came out of the camp of the Philistines, in three companies.] They sent out parties three several ways, to ravage the country, there being none to oppose them.

One company turned the way that leadeth to Ophrah.] There was a city of this name in the tribe of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 23.) but many take this rather to be that in the tribe of Manasseh, where Gideon was born, (Judg. vi. 11.)

Unto the land of Shual.] So called, because it abounded with foxes, as Bochart observes.

Ver. 18. And another company turned the way of Bethhoron.] Both the upper and the nether cities of this name were in the tribe of Ephraim, (1 Chron. vii. 24.)

And another company turned to the way of the border that looks to the valley of Zeboim, towards the wilderness.] The Chaldee paraphrast translates these words, the valley of vipers; for tzeboa signifies a sort of speckled serpent, wherewith this valley abounded, and lay towards the wilderness of Jericho in the tribe of Benjamin. Thus also a great number of the Hebrew writers translate Zeboim; which Junius takes for a city in this tribe. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 7.)

Ver. 19. Now there was no smith found throughout all the land of Israel: for the Philistines said, Lest the Hebrews make them swords and spears.] To this miserable condition the Philistines had reduced them during the forty years' tyranny over them, of which we read, Judg. xiii. 1. But after Samuel had put an end to it, by the great overthrow he gave the Philistines at Eben-ezer, it seems something strange they had not restored their artificers. But the sloth of the Israelites appears in their whole story; and it was not easy, in so short a time, for men to learn this trade, which the Philistines wisely destroyed, as the Chaldeans, when they destroyed Jerusalem, carried away all the smiths to Babylon, that they who remained in the land might not arm themselves again, (2 Kings xxiv. 14.)

Ver. 20. But all the men of Israel went down to the Philistines, to sharpen every man his share, and his coulter, and his axe, and his mattock.] Not to the country of the Philistines, for that was too far off from some parts of the land of Israel; but to their garrisons, which they held among them, even after Samuel had driven the main body of them out of the country, as I observed upon x. 5.

Ver. 21. Yet they had a file for the mattocks, and for the coulters, and for the forks, and for the axes, and to sharpen the goads.] Thus Pliny tells us in his Natural History, lib. xxxi. cap. 14. that in the league which Porsanna made with the Roman people, after the expulsion of their kings, it was expressly covenanted, "Ne ferro, nisi in agricultura uterentur;" that they should not make use of iron, but only in the tilling of their fields.

Ver. 22. So it came to pass, that in the day of battle, there was neither sword nor spear found in the hand of any of the people that were with Saul and Jonathan: but with Saul, and Jonathan his son, was there found.] The Jews being very much addicted to feeding cattle, very much neglected mechanical arts, as appeared when Solomon built the temple. For there were so few skilled in architecture among the Israelites, that he was constrained to send to another nation for them. And so Rasi thinks it was in the trade of smiths; there being no iron mines in the land. But that was not the true reason, as Kimchi observes; for the Philistines, as was said before, had transplanted the smiths, when the Israelites were under their dominion. In their oppressions also, which they lay under, their enemies were wont to disarm them, as appears by the song of Deborah, (Judg. v. 8.) But though they had no sword nor spear, yet they had bows and arrows, and slings; which the men of Gibeah could anciently manage to a wonderful advantage, as we read, Judg. xx. 16. And besides these, they anciently used clubs to beat down their enemies; and before the invention of spears with iron points, they had sharp stakes hardened in the fire, as many authors inform us.

Ver. 23. And the garrison of the Philistines went out to the passage of Michmash.] Some refer this to the garrison mentioned ver. 3. which Jonathan having smitten, they that escaped joined with the army at Michmash. But it refers rather to the garrison mentioned in the beginning of the next chapter, (ver. 1.) and the last word relates not to the passage, but to the garrison. As if he had said, The garrison of the Philistines in Michmash went out to the passage. For Michmash, as Rasi observes, was upon a high hill, as Gibeah was; between which was a valley, called here a passage. Into which the garrison descended, to invite the Israelites to battle; or, as the Targum translates the first word, the captain-general of the Philistines went out into the valley; to view the ground, we may suppose, and form a camp there.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass upon a day, that Jonathan the son of Saul said unto the young man that bare his armour, Come, and let us go over to the garrison of the Philistines that is on the other side.] Of the valley, mentioned in the foregoing verse. This had been a very rash attempt, and very criminal (he having no order from his father, who commanded in chief), if he had not had a Divine incitation to it. Which he felt upon the sight of the Philistines appearing, as if they intended to assault Gibeah; and upon the information he received of the great spoil which the three parties made of the poor people in the country, (xiii. 17.)

But he told not his father.] Lest he should have hindered him from this enterprise, into which he felt himself moved by God.

Ver. 2. And Saul tarried in the uttermost part of Gibeah.] In some intrenchments he had made without the city.

Under a pomegranate-tree, which is in Migron.] Where he pitched his tent.

And the people that were with him were about six hundred men.] His forces were not augmented since he came to Gibeah, as might have been expected, (xiii. 15, 16.) But, as Vegetius observes, (lib. i. de Re Militari, cap. 8.) "in omni conflictu non tam prodest multitudo, quam virtus:" in all conflicts valour doth more service than multitude.

Ver. 3. And Ahijah the son of Ahitub, Ichabod's brother, the son of Phinehas.] It seems Phinehas (who was slain with Hophni) left two sons; Ichabod, who was born after his death; and Ahitub, who was born before: and left a son, who is here called Ahijah, and in xxii. 9. Ahimelech; who left a son called Abiathar, xxiii. 6.

The son of Eli, the Lord's priest in Shiloh.] These last words, the Lord's priest in Shiloh, manifestly belong to Eli, who was the high-priest while the tabernacle was in Shiloh.

Wearing an ephod.] Or rather, the ephod; which comprehends the breast-plate, with urim and thummim, for they were inseparable from it. These Ahijah, being high-priest, now wore: for these words, as Ralbag observes, belong to him. (See Selden, lib. i. de Success. ad Pontif. cap. 3.) Saul being now in great distress sent for Ahijah, to consult God for him, as there should be occasion: and, as appears by the eighteenth verse of this chapter, had commanded him to bring the ark with him from Kirjath-jearim.

And the people knew not that Jonathan was gone.] This makes Josephus's opinion probable, that he went away in the night: which was prudent upon another account; that he might not be spied presently by the Philistines.

Ver. 4. And between the passages, by which Jonathan sought to go over unto the Philistines' garrison, there was a sharp rock on one side, and a sharp rock on the other.] So that there was no way to come at the Philistines, but by climbing up one of these rocks, (ver. 12.) which were thought inaccessible: and therefore not fortified, as the other passages to Michmash were, with such strong guards as Jonathan could not encounter.

The name of the one was Bozez, the name of the other Seneh.] Which were such famous precipices, that they had names bestowed on them: the original of which will not be worth our inquiry; but the latter seems to have taken its name from the thorns that grew upon it.

Ver. 5. The fore-front of the one was situate northward over against Michmash, and the other southward over against Gibeah.] By this we understand how these two places lay, towards which these rocks pointed.

Ver. 6. And Jonathan said to the young man that bare his armour, Come, let us go over to the garrison of the uncircumcised.] He speaks of them with contempt, as strangers to the covenant of God.

It may be the Lord will work for us: for there is no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few.] He speaks with some diffidence to his servant; but was inwardly persuaded of a certain victory, by the Divine assistance.

Ver. 7. And his armour-bearer said unto him, Do all that is in thine heart: turn thee.] Which way thou wilt.

Behold, I am with thee according to thy heart.] He resolved not to forsake his master in any undertaking, though ever so dangerous: being such a servant as Gideon had, (Judg. vii. 10.)

Ver. 8. Then said Jonathan, Behold, I will pass over to these men.] He resolves to lead the way.

And we will discover ourselves unto them.] At break of day.

Ver. 9. If they say thus unto us, Tarry until we come unto you; then we will stand still in our place, and will not go up unto them.

Ver. 10. But if they say thus, Come up to us; then we will go up: for the Lord hath delivered them into our hand; and this shall be a sign unto us.] Which he could not have known without an instinct from God, who often suggested such thoughts unto good men: as we see in the example of Abraham's servant, Gen. xxiv. 14, &c. And there is something like this in the beginning of Herodotus's fifth book concerning the Pæones, and the Perinthians: where he saith, the Pœonians went to war by a Divine direction with the Perinthians; and were ordered, if the Perinthians, being opposed to them, provoked them by name to fight, then they should invade them; but if they did not, they should abstain from fighting. Now while they faced one another there happened a threefold single combat: and the Perinthians being victors in two of them, began to sing a song of triumph, and insult over the Pœonians; who thereupon said one to another, νῦν ἂν εἴη ὁ χρησμὸς ἐπιτελεσμένος ἡμῖν, νῦν ἡμέτερον τὸ ἔργον. Now is the oracle fulfilled to us, now is our business: and so shouting, and falling upon the Perinthians, they vanquished them, and left few of them remaining.

Ver. 11. And both of them discovered themselves unto the garrison of the Philistines.] At the bottom of the rocks.

And the Philistines said, Behold, the Hebrews come forth out of their holes where they had hid themselves.] See xiii. 6. They imagined it was not courage, but necessity, which forced them to come within their view, as they sought for food.

Ver. 12. And the men of the garrison answered Jonathan and his armour-bearer, and said, Come up to us, and we will shew you a thing.] They mocked at them, thinking they durst not attempt to climb up to them.

And Jonathan said to his armour-bearer, Come up after me; for the Lord hath delivered them into the hand of Israel.] Now he gives him the same assurance which he had before in his own mind.

Ver. 13. And Jonathan climbed up upon his hands and his feet, and his armour-bearer after him.] Not in the view of the Philistines, but by some difficult way, which none was ever known to go: and so, perhaps, they came behind them and surprised them.

And they fell before Jonathan; and his armour-bearer slew after him.] The first onset was made by Jonathan (as he led the way up the precipice), who rushed upon them with such a fury, that he threw them down to the ground, and then his armour-bearer killed them. So some understand this: which was a more wonderful action than that of Horatius Cochlites (as Victorinus Strigelius observes), who alone maintained a passage at a bridge, against all the forces of the enemy: and caused the bridge to be broken down behind him. But that shews, since natural courage made a man so daring, it is not incredible that Jonathan made such an attempt by Divine incitation.

Ver. 14. The first slaughter, which Jonathan and his armour-bearer made, was about twenty men, within as it were an half acre of land, which a yoke of oxen might plough.] viz. In one day. That is, saith Kimchi, in a very small space of ground: which De Dieu will have to be half a furrow in length. (See him.)

Ver. 15. And there was a trembling in the host, in the field, and among the people; the garrison, and the spoilers, they also trembled.] News being brought of this slaughter to the host of the Philistines which lay in the field, it put them into a great consternation: for they were asleep (it is likely), this being done very early in the morning, as Josephus thinks, (lib. vi. cap. 7.) And all the people that attended the host, as well as the garrison, and spoilers who had been ravaging the country, (xiii. 17.) were very much affrighted: imagining a great army had been at hand to fall upon them; of which these two were but the scouts. Whose exploits, perhaps, were also magnified beyond the truth.

And the earth quaked.] Some think there was a real earthquake, which increased their fear: but it may be no more than a metaphorical expression, for the great tumult they were in.

So it was a great trembling.] In the Hebrew, a trembling of God; that is, which God sent upon them: called by the heathen a panic fear, which they thought came from their gods; and made the stoutest men quake. So Pindar excellently expresses it in his Nemea, ix. ver. 63.

——— Ἐν γὰρ
Δαιμονίοισι φόβοις
Φεύγονται καὶ Παῖδες Θεῶν.

When men are struck with Divine terrors, even the children of the gods (i. e. the most heroic spirits) betake themselves to flight. And the army of the Philistines consisting (as I observed on xiii. 5.) of different nations, it made the confusion and trembling the greater: because they either did not understand, or suspected one another.

Ver. 16. And the watchmen of Saul in Gibeah of Benjamin looked.] For it was seated on a high hill, which overlooked the country about it.

And behold the multitude melted away.] Were scattered; so that fewer and fewer were seen in a company together.

And they went on beating down one another.] Not being able, in this confusion, to distinguish their friends from their enemies.

Ver. 17. Then said Saul unto the people that were with him, Number now, and see who are gone from us. And when they were numbered, behold, Jonathan and his armour-bearer were not there.] He easily missed Jonathan, I suppose, but could not imagine he would fall upon the Philistines, without a good number of men to assist him: which he knew he had not. This made him call the high-priest, to inquire of God, that he might be informed what was the matter, and what he should do.

Ver. 18. And Saul said to Ahijah, Bring hither the ark of God: for the ark of God was at that time with the children of Israel.] How could he bid him bring the ark, when it was at Kirjath-jearim, in the house of Abinadab? To this Abarbinel answers, that he doth not speak of the ark in which the tables of the law were kept (for he doth not say, bring the ark of the covenant hither), but a little coffer, wherein the ephod was kept; that is, the breast-plate with urim and thummim. These the priest brought along with him, that Saul might consult God upon occasion, as David did, 1 Sam. xxx. 8. Therefore the LXX. translate it, προσάγαγε τὸ Ἐφοὺδ, bring hither the ephod. And so Rasi and Kimchi. (See Buxtorf. Hist. Arcæ, cap. 3. and our learned Dr. Spencer, de Leg. et Rit. Heb. fol. 859.) But this doth not seem a solid interpretation, there being but one ark mentioned in Scripture, which is not always called the ark of the covenant, but the ark of the Lord, or the ark of God, as it is called when it came into the camp of Israel, and was taken by the Philistines, (chap. iv. ver. 6. 11. 17, 18, &c.) Therefore here, I suppose, Saul commanded the ark itself to attend him; when he wanted the advice and assistance of Samuel.

Ver. 19. And it came to pass, that while Saul talked with the priest.] Desiring him to inquire of God what was become of Jonathan and his armour-bearer; and what was the meaning of that tumult in the host of the Philistines.

That the noise that was in the host of the Philistines went on and increased: and Saul said to the priest, Withdraw thine hand.] He was going to take the urim and thummim, as the forenamed authors understand it, when Saul, hearing the tumult grow greater and greater among the Philistines, bade him forbear: there being no need, for he concluded they were routed; and therefore resolved, without any further deliberation, to go and pursue them. Or, as others understand it, the priest having stretched forth his hand to God in prayer for his advice, Saul called upon him to desist: for it was plain what they had to do without any inquiry.

Ver. 20. And Saul and all the people that were with him assembled; and came to the battle: and, behold, every man's sword was against his fellow, and there was a very great discomfiture.] This Josephus thinks fell out (as I noted above) because their army consisted of divers nations, who did not know one another, and so fell into great confusion.

Ver. 21. Moreover, the Hebrews that were with the Philistines before that time, which went up with them into the camp from the country round about.] As some, it seems, did; either out of fear, compulsion, or design.

Even they also turned to be with the Israelites that were with Saul and Jonathan.] And helped to destroy the Philistines.

Ver. 22. Likewise all the men of Israel that had hid themselves in Mount Ephraim.] And other places mentioned xiii. 6.

When they heard that the Philistines fled, even they also followed hard after them in the battle.] Pursued them closely.

Ver. 23. So the Lord saved Israel that day: and the battle passed over unto Beth-aven.] These words seem to imply, that the fight continued till they came to this place, which lay westward from Michmash, (xiii. 5.) and there the Philistines threw down their arms; and fled as fast as they could towards their own country.

Ver. 24. And the men of Israel were distressed that day.] When they should have been full of joy and triumph.

For Saul had adjured the people, saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any food until the evening, that I may be avenged of my enemies. So none of the people tasted any food.] That they might not lose time, nor make the least stay in the pursuit of their enemies, who fled before them. The king had the same power that the great Sanhedrin had, who, the Jews say, might devote those to destruction, who did not obey the charge that was given them in war. (See Selden, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6.) But this was a very indiscreet act of Saul, unbecoming an excellent captain; for instead of pursuing the Philistines with vigour, they fainted for want of refreshment. Therefore great commanders always took care their soldiers should be moderately fed, that they might not be tired in a long conflict. So Vegetius informs us: (lib. iii. de Re Militari, cap. 9.) "Veteribus seculis mos fuit, parco cibo curatos milites ad certamen educere, ut citatiores sumpta esca redderet et longiore conflictu non fatigerentur inedia." And there was the same need of taking a little refreshment if they could get it, when they were engaged in a long pursuit of their enemy.

Ver. 25. And all they of the land came to a wood; and there was honey upon the ground.] Which dropped from the hollow trees, or the clefts of rocks, where bees made their combs in that country; and sometimes upon the very ground; as Bochart hath shewn in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 12. where he observes this was not peculiar to Judea, but usual in other countries.

Ver. 26. And when the people were come into the wood, behold, the honey dropped; but no man put his hand to his mouth: for the people feared the oath.] Wild honey was so copious in those countries, and flowed so plentifully, that it gave occasion to that hyperbolical speech in the book of Job, xx. 17. where we read of brooks, or torrents, of honey and butter.

Ver. 27. And Jonathan heard not when his father charged the people with the oath.] He and his armour-bearer being engaged in fight, (with whom some others joined, ver. 21.) long before Saul and his small army came to join him.

Wherefore he put forth the end of his rod, and dipped it in a honey-comb, and put his hand to his mouth; and his eyes were enlightened.] That is, his spirits and strength, which were quite spent by long abstinence from meat, so that he could scarce see, were restored to him, and he was made fresh and lively to proceed in pursuit of the enemy. For, as Gerh. Vossius observes, (lib. iv. de Orig. et Progr. Idol. cap. 79.) the eyes are wont to grow dim with long hunger: and as all meat and drink refreshes and enlivens, so wine and honey do it above all other more speedily: for their spirits are both very subtile, and soon diffuse their strength through the body. It is also observed by learned men, that honey is an excellent medicine for sore and weak eyes: but that is nothing to this purpose; such cures being not performed by eating of it, but by anointing the eyes with it.

Ver. 28. Then answered one of the people.] That came with Saul to the pursuit.

And said, Thy father charged the people with an oath, saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any food to-day. And the people were faint.] And yet forbore to take any refreshment, for fear of the curse.

Ver. 29. Then said Jonathan, My father hath troubled the land: see, I pray you, how mine eyes have been enlightened, because I tasted a little of this honey.] Which did not cause so long a stay, as to hinder the pursuit of the enemy.

Ver. 30. How much more, if haply the people had eaten freely this day of the spoil of their enemies which they found? for had there not been now a much greater slaughter among the Philistines?] They would have been able to pursue them more swiftly, and to have done greater execution upon them, than they could when they were faint. Thus men, by their rashness, hinder what they would have.

Ver. 31. And they smote the Philistines that day from Michmash to Ajalon.] A city in the tribe of Dan, (Josh. xix. 42.) which bordered upon the country of the Philistines.

And the people were very faint.] Otherwise they might have pursued further.

Ver. 32. And the people flew upon the spoil.] Like a ravenous bird, which wanted food.

And took sheep, and oxen, and calves, and slew them on the ground: and the people did eat them with the blood.] Raw, or but half roasted or boiled, their hunger being so sharp, that it made them forget their duty.

Ver. 33. Then they told Saul, saying, Behold, the people sin against the Lord, in that they eat with the blood.] All the people were not so profane, but only some part of them.

And he said, Ye have transgressed: roll a great stone unto me.] Our learned Dr. Spencer thinks, they did not eat with the blood, as we translate it, but upon, or by the blood; which was an idolatrous custom in the east, to invite the familiarity of demons, as hath been noted on Lev. xix. 26. And therefore Saul, to keep the people from thus defiling themselves, commanded a great stone to be brought to him, that there they might kill their beasts at that one place, and then feed upon them. (See de Leg. et Rit. Hebr. p. 334.) But this doth not seem probable that they should now practise those idolatrous rites, when God had wrought such a wonderful deliverance for them; and they were so impatient to eat, that they had not time to think of such ceremonies.

Ver. 34. And Saul said, Disperse yourselves among the people.] He speaks unto his officers.

And say unto them, Bring me hither every man his ox, and every man his sheep.] This is a sign they had not all offended; having not yet killed their beasts.

And slay them here, and eat; and sin not against the Lord in eating with the blood. And all the men brought every man his ox with him that night, and slew them there.] As many as they had occasion to use.

Ver. 25. And Saul built an altar unto the Lord.] To offer sacrifices of peace-offerings, and give thanks to God for this great victory. Though others think it was not for sacrifice, but only a monument of God's mercy, in this late deliverance.

The same was the first altar that he built unto the Lord.] In the Hebrew the words are (as is observed in the margin of our Bibles), that altar he began to build unto the Lord; i. e. he laid the first stone himself. We read of his offering before in Gilgal; but that, perhaps, was not upon an altar erected by himself, but was built before by others.

Ver. 36. And Saul said, Let us go down after the Philistines by night, and spoil them until the morning, and let us not leave a man of them.] Having thus refreshed themselves, in the evening Saul propounded to them to renew the pursuit: hoping to cut off their whole army, when they were asleep in the night.

And they said, Do whatsoever seemeth good unto thee.] Their good success made them as forward, as before they were backward to follow him.

Then said the priest, Let us draw near hither unto God.] It is likely he stood before the altar (if it were for sacrifice) and put them in mind, that it was dangerous to undertake any thing without God's advice: which he was there ready to ask for them: in the Targum it is, Let us inquire by the Word of the Lord.

Ver. 37. And Saul asked counsel of God.] By urim and thummim.

Shall I go down after the Philistines? wilt thou deliver them into the hand of Israel?] Hitherto Saul had some goodness left in him: for he hearkened to the priest, when he admonished him of his duty, which he neglected. The Targum here again hath it, Saul asked by the Word of the Lord.

But he answered him not that day.] Though perhaps the priest had often begged an answer, yet he received none.

Ver. 38. And Saul said, Draw near hither all the chief of the people; and see wherein this sin hath been this day.] He concluded some sin had provoked God, not to regard his supplication: which he desired might be found out and punished.

Ver. 39. For, as the Lord liveth, that saveth Israel, though it be in Jonathan my son, he shall surely die. But there was not a man among the people that answered him.] Though many knew that Jonathan had transgressed his father's charge, (ver. 28.) yet none would discover it.

Ver. 40. Then said he unto all Israel, Be you on one side, and I and Jonathan my son will be on the other side. And the people said, Do what seemeth good unto thee.] He had gained great authority among the people (it appears by this, and by ver. 36.) since his wonderful success.

Ver. 41. Therefore Saul said unto the Lord God of Israel, Give a perfect lot. And Saul and Jonathan were taken: and the people escaped.] The word lot is not in the original, but only give perfect, that is, declare who is innocent. So the word give sometimes signifies to pronounce, (Deut. xiii. 1, 2.)

Ver. 42. And Saul said, Cast lots between me and Jonathan my son. And Jonathan was taken.] This looks like virtue in him, that, for good example's sake, he would not exempt himself, though a king, from the same trial to which he exposed all the people.

Ver. 43. Then said Saul to Jonathan, Tell me what thou hast done. And Jonathan told him, and said, I did but taste a little honey, that was in my hand, and, lo, I must die.] This shews a very great mind, that he neither denied what he had done, nor excused it by his ignorance, nor refused to die: though he looked upon it as very hard. So Josephus represents it, εὐγενῶς καὶ μεγαλοφρόνως, &c. with a generous and great mind, he told his father the truth; and desired not to be spared, (lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 7.)

Ver. 44. And Saul answered, God do so and more also: for thou shalt surely die, Jonathan.] This demonstrates Saul to have been of a rash and of a rigorous temper. With whom learned men are wont to compare Titus Manlius; who caused his son's head to be cut off, for fighting the enemy, when he had a fair advantage, contrary to order, as A. Gellius tells us, (lib. ix. cap. 13.) But in this regard Saul was to be commended, as Josephus also observes, that he had a greater regard to his oath, than to his kindred and natural affection.

Ver. 45. And the people said unto Saul, Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid: as the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground; for he hath wrought with God this day. So the people rescued Jonathan, that he died not.] They did not rescue him by force and violence, but by their petition to Saul, and the reason they gave for it. Josephus saith, that " by their prayers and vows to God they delivered him:" who, perhaps, signified by the priest, that he approved the people's desire. They were too forward indeed to swear directly against Saul's oath: but of the two, his being the most rash, God was pleased to annul it, and absolve him from it. Thus Josephus understands it, They rescued him from the anger of his father, καὶ εὐχὰς ὑπὲρ τοῦ νεανίσκου ποιοῦνται τῷ Θεῷ, ὡς τὸν αὐτὸν ἀπολύσαι τοῦ ἁμαρτήματος, and made their prayer to God for the young man, that he would loose him from his sin.

How that phrase, not a hair of his head, &c. was used, appears from 2 Sam. xiv. 11. 1 Kings i. 51.

Ver. 46. Then Saul went up from following the Philistines, and the Philistines went to their own country.] He pursued them no further, but let them go quietly to their own homes.

Ver. 47. And Saul took the kingdom over Israel.] Ruled with greater authority over his people after this victory: for the Philistines had enslaved them, (as I observed xiii. 2.) But by this deliverance they were freed from their yoke, and Saul recovered his kingdom.

And fought against all his enemies on every side.] He did not invade them (as may be gathered from the next verse), but repelled them, and kept them within their own limits.

Against Moab, and against the children of Ammon, and against Edom, and against the kings of Zobah, and against the Philistines.] These were the principal enemies wherewith they were encompassed. And by the kings of Zobah are meant those that ruled in that part of Syria, which is called Aram-Zobah; which lay towards Euphrates: having that river for its eastern bounds, and Damascus and the land of Canaan for its western. For it appears to be near to the Israelites, by the frequent wars which David and Solomon had with the kings of this country, (2 Sam. viii. 3. x. 6. 2 Chron. vii. 3.) and the aid which the Syrians of Damascus sent them, (2 Sam. viii. 5.) and their flying thither when they were routed. (1 Kings xi. 24.) And the cities which Solomon built in the wilderness, (1 Kings ix. 17, 18.) are said to be in Hamath-Zobah, 2 Chron. viii. 34. which demonstrates it was upon the confines of Judea.

And whithersoever he turned himself, he vexed them.] He got the better of them. And in his days the Reubenites also made war with the Hagarites, and possessed their land, till the time of the captivity, (1 Chron. v. 10. 18—20.)

Ver. 48. And he gathered a host, and smote Amalek.] Which war is at large described in the next chapter.

And delivered Israel out of the hand of them that spoiled them.] The six forementioned nations.

Ver. 49. And the sons of Saul were Jonathan, Ishui, and Melchi-shua, &c.] These were only fit to accompany him in his wars, and upon that account are only mentioned here, and xxxi. 2. though he had another son (Ish-bosheth), who is mentioned in 1 Chron. viii. 33. under the name of Esh-baal.

Ver. 50. And the name of Saul's wife was Ahinoam, the daughter of Ahimaaz; and the name of the captain of his host was Abner, the son of Ner, Saul's uncle.] For Ner was brother to Saul's father, as the next verse tells us. It seems to me observable, that we never read of more than one wife that Saul had, though David had many. It is possible he did not think it prudent, in a new-erected kingdom, to follow the example of the eastern kings in every thing.

Ver. 51. And Kish was the father of Saul; and Ner, the father of Abner, was the son of Abiel.] As Kish also was, (xi. 1.)

Ver. 52. And there was sore war against the Philistines all the days of Saul.] Who could not perfectly subdue them; as appears from their renewing the war, (chap. xvii. &c.)

And when Saul saw any strong man, or any valiant man.] Who behaved himself with vigour and courage in the wars.

He took him unto him.] To be one of his guard, or to be preferred in the army.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. SAMUEL also said unto Saul, The Lord sent me to anoint thee to be king over his people, over Israel: now therefore hearken unto the voice of the words of the Lord.] Being so highly obliged to God, above all other men in the nation, it highly concerned him to be very careful to observe his commands; especially having lately been disobedient, (xiii. 13.)

Ver. 2. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way, when he came up from Egypt.] See my notes upon Deut. xxv. 17, 18.

Ver. 3. Now go, and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass.] This heavy sentence was pronounced against them long ago, (Exod. xvii. 14.) and renewed at their entrance into Canaan, with a charge not to forget it, (Deut. xxv. 19.) and now ordered to be put in execution.

Ver. 4. And Saul gathered the people together, and numbered them in Telaim, two hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand men of Judah.] The word Telaim signifying lambs (which it is likely were very plentiful in this place), the Targum translates it, he numbered them by paschal lambs: as if the Passover was kept at this time. And so Rasi fancies that it being unlawful to number the people, he commanded every man to take a lamb out of the flock, and numbered them. But David Kimchi, and others, take this as we do, for the name of a place called Telem, in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 24.) For there is no place mentioned in Scripture called Telaim; nor any so near it in sound as this. (See Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 11. n. 5. and Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 43.) I have often observed that their armies consisted of footmen, they having no horses in Judea. And in two regards they were more useful than horsemen, as Vegetius observes, (lib. ii. de Re Militari, cap. 1.) first, because " possunt ubique prodesse," they may be serviceable every where, which horsemen cannot. And, secondly, a great number of them, " sumptu et expensa minore nutritur," is maintained at less expense and charge.

Ver. 5. And Saul came to a city of Amalek.] To the metropolis of the kingdom, whose name, perhaps, was Amalek. For so the words may be understood, he came to the city Amalek.

And laid wait in the valley.] Or fought them in the valley, as we translate it in the margin: for they came out to give him battle.

Ver. 6. And Saul said to the Kenites.] Who were of the posterity of Jethro: some of which were of the tribe of Judah, others in Naphtali; and some, it seems, dwelt among the Amalekites in the rocky part of that country, (Numb. xxiv. 21.)

Go, depart, get ye down.] For they dwelt on high.

From among the Amalekites, lest I destroy you with them.] For some of the Amalekites, it is likely, would flee to them for shelter.

For you shewed kindness to the children of Israel when they came out of Egypt.] Some of their ancestors did, which the Israelites did not forget, (Exod. xviii. 12. Numb. x. 31.)

And the Kenites departed from among the Amalekites.] And went, it is likely, into the land of Judah.

Ver. 7. And Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah until thou comest to Shur, that is over against Egypt.] That is, their whole country, of which this was the extent; from Havilah in the north-east, to Shur in the south-west. These two, Havilah and Shur, are constantly opposed, as the most opposite terms of Arabia, as Bochartus hath observed, in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 6.

Ver. 8. And Saul took Agag the king of the Amalekites alive, and utterly destroyed all the people with the edge of the sword.] That is, all that could be met with: but some fled, no doubt, as soon as they saw him victorious; and saved themselves in other countries. Accordingly we read of good numbers of this people afterward.

Ver. 9. But Saul and the people spared Agag.] Whosoever proposed it, they all agreed in it, not to kill Agag: and Saul, it is most likely, was the chief author of this counsel. Who, θαυμάσας τὸ κάλλος καὶ τὸ μέγεθος τοῦ σώματος (as Josephus speaks), being struck with admiration of him as a very goodly and proper person, thought fit to save him. Not following herein the command of God, but his own private fancy and affection, (lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 8.) Others think he intended to lead him in triumph. (See ver. 12.)

And the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, and of the fatlings, and of the lambs.] Interpreters wonderfully vary about the sense of the word hamisnim, which we translate fatlings: as may be seen in Bochartus's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 43. fol. 430. where he shews it signifies cattle in their full strength.

All that was good.] Of their household goods (I suppose), apparel, and such-like things.

And would not utterly destroy them.] As they had been commanded by God; but took them as a prey unto themselves.

But every thing that was vile and refuse, that destroyed they utterly.] All that was not worth the keeping. Which is a wonderful instance of the baseness of human nature, when governed by covetousness, or any such-like affection.

Ver. 10. Then came the word of the Lord unto Samuel, saying.] Immediately before Saul returned from his expedition.

Ver. 11. It repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king.] Whom he resolved now to throw down from his throne. (See ver. 29.) For repentance in God, imports only the will of a change, and not of every change, but of the Divine sentence pronounced, which the Scripture calls repentance. So Procopius Gazæus, "Pœnitentia Dei, est dispensationis ipsius mutatio," God's repentance is the change of his own dispensation.

For he is turned back from following me, and hath not performed my commandment. And it grieved Samuel; and he cried unto the Lord all night.] Beseeching him to pardon Saul.

Ver. 12. And when Samuel rose up early to meet Saul in the morning, it was told Samuel, saying, Saul came to Carmel.] A city in the mountains of the tribe of Judah, where Nabal dwelt, who is called the Carmelite, xxvii. 3. (See Josh. xv. 55.)

And, behold, he set him up a place.] Either for the dividing of the spoil, as the Targum understands it; or marking out a camp, as Kimchi; or he erected a triumphal arch, as St. Jerome: having brought Agag with him, to make his triumph greater. Which arch, it may be thought, was in the form of a hand: for in the Hebrew the word we translate place is jad, which signifies a hand. Or, as Rasi will have it, he here built an altar: which Elijah in future times repaired, (1 Kings xviii. 30.) But this is a very gross mistake: for this Carmel was very remote from that mount which Elijah frequented, as Bochartus hath observed, (par. i. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 48.) It may be rather thought, to be some building erected in the form before-mentioned, to signify that they overcame the Amalekites with a strong hand.

And is gone about, and passed on, and gone down to Gilgal.] In a long pomp, I suppose, as a mighty conqueror.

Ver. 13. And Samuel came to Saul: and Saul said to him, Blessed be thou of the Lord.] A form of salutation, wishing him all happiness from God: who had ordered him to undertake such a piece of service, as he had done him.

I have performed the commandment of the Lord.] He was so insensible of any fault he had committed, that he boasts of his performance.

Ver. 14. And Samuel said, What means then this bleating of the sheep, &c.] Which he had commanded him utterly to destroy, (ver. 3.)

Ver. 15. And Saul said, They have brought them from the Amalekites.] He lays the blame upon the people, when it is evident he himself was principally in fault, (ver. 9.)

And the people spared the best of the sheep and of the oxen to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God; and the rest we have utterly destroyed.] This was a plausible pretence, it being the custom all the world over, to give part of their spoils in war unto their gods; if there had not been an express command for destroying every thing in this war: so that nothing should be spared, either for himself, or for them.

Ver. 16. And Samuel said unto Saul, Stay.] This sounds as if Saul was going away: being abundantly satisfied in his noble achievements.

And I will tell thee what the Lord hath said unto me this night.] When he cried to him without ceasing, (ver. 11.) Though Samuel was a prophet, saith Procopius Gazæus, yet speaking to a king, he begs leave he may do it freely.

And he said, Say on.] He hoped, it is likely, to hear himself commended for his piety.

Ver. 17. Then Samuel said unto Saul, When thou wast little in thy own sight, wast thou not made the head of the tribes of Israel, and the Lord anointed thee king over Is- rael?] It is of great use for men to remember what they were: as Placilla the wife of Theodosius (Strigelius here observes) said to her husband, Αεί σε προσήκει λογίζεσθαι, τί μὲν ἦσθα πάλαι, τί δὲ γέγονας νῦν, &c. It behoves thee always to think what thou wast heretofore, and what thou art now. For calling these things to mind, thou wilt not be ungrateful to thy benefactor: but govern the kingdom thou hast received according to the laws; and by that means honour him that bestowed it upon thee.

Ver. 18. And the Lord sent thee on a journey, and said, Go and utterly destroy the sinners the Amakelites.] He was employed in a very honourable expedition, to destroy the declared enemies of the Lord.

Ver. 19. Wherefore then didst thou not obey the voice of the Lord, but didst flee upon the spoil.] With great greediness, as a hungry bird or beast doth upon his prey.

And didst evil in the sight of the Lord?] The command was as plain as words could make it: so that there was no reason but his own base covetousness, why it was not obeyed.

Ver. 20. And Saul said unto Samuel, Yea, I have obeyed the voice of the Lord, and have gone the way which the Lord sent me, and have brought Agag the king of the Amalekites, and have utterly destroyed the Amalekites.] A strange stupidity! to imagine such a partial obedience could be pleasing unto God.

Ver. 21. But the people took of the spoil, sheep and oxen, the chief things that should have been utterly destroyed, to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God in Gilgal.] This was a mean thing, to throw all the blame on the people, whom he should have governed better: and it was worst of all, to let them pretend religion for their disobedience.

Ver. 22. And Samuel said, Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams.] This most Divine admonition is inculcated by all following inspired writers, David, Solomon, and the prophets. (See Psal. l. 13, 14. li. 16, 17. Eccles. v. 1. Isa. i. 11, 12, &c. lxvi. 3. Jer. vii. 21, 22, &c. Hos. vi. 6. Micah vi. 6—8. Zach. viii. 16.) And some of the heathen have said excellent things to this purpose.

Ver. 23. For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft.] Or, following after divination: which is opposed to prophecy, as idols are to God.

And stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry.] The words aven and teraphim signify all manner of idolatry. From which though Saul was free, yet his obstinate disobedience made him liable to such punishment as idolaters deserved. For as they were to be cut off, so he was to be dethroned, as it here follows.

Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, he also hath rejected thee from being king.] As idolaters were to lose their lives, so he and his posterity lost the kingdom. And it is observable, that he was at last slain by the hand of an Amalekite, (2 Sam. i. 8.)

Ver. 24. And Saul said unto Samuel, I have sinned: for I have transgressed the commandment of the Lord, and thy word; because I feared the people, and obeyed their voice.] It is not certain whether he led the people into this sin, or they led him. I look upon this only as an excuse (he having no reason to fear the people, who were all at his command), and that he was not yet thoroughly sensible of his guilt.

Ver. 25. Now therefore, I pray thee, pardon my sin.] By deprecating God's displeasure.

And turn again with me.] To Gilgal; from whence he came forth to meet Samuel.

That I may worship the Lord.] And by Samuel's prayers obtain a pardon.

Ver. 26. And Samuel said unto Saul, I will not return with thee: for thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, and the Lord hath rejected thee from being king over Israel.] The prophet looked upon God's sentence as peremptory; and therefore peremptorily denied his request.

Ver. 27. And as Samuel turned about to go away, he laid hold upon the skirt of his mantle.] It was a four-square garment covering the breast and the back; knit at the shoulder, but open on the sides, as Jo. Braunius hath shewn, lib. ii. de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. cap. 5. n. 8. On this Saul laid hold, that he might stop Samuel from going away.

And it rent.] A sign the motion of Samuel was violent; he being full of indignation against Saul.

Ver. 28. And Samuel said, The Lord hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbour of thine, that is better than thou.] That casual rent, he took to be an apt representation of his destiny.

Ver. 29. And also the Strength of Israel.] The word we translate Strength imports victory (as is observed in the margin), and therefore these words should be translated, He that gives victory, and disposes kingdoms, or the triumphant King of Israel.

Will not lie, nor repent: for he is not a man, that he should repent.] Sometimes, God is said to repent of the evil, i. e. to alter his intentions of inflicting punishment. But in this case there was no room for it, because of the oath of God, that Amalek should be cut off. This made Saul's sin unpardonable; it being of the like nature (to use the words of Dr. Jackson) as if a judge or inferior magistrate, being entrusted to do justice in a matter, unto which his sovereign lord had peremptorily and determinately sworn, should upon a bribe, or other sinister respect, neglect his duty, and (as much as in him lay) make his master forsworn. For an inferior judge to do this, deserves more bodily deaths than one. And therefore though God did repent that he had made Saul king (for he had the kingdom only by mere promise, not by a promise confirmed by an oath), yet he would not repent his deposition, nor reverse the sentence against him; because, by his preposterous indulgence unto Amalek (God's sworn enemy), he did by this fact incur the sentence of deposition by oath.

Ver. 30. And he said, I have sinned.] Now he makes a downright acknowledgment of his guilt; without any alleviations of it, from the fear he was in of the people, or any other thing, (ver. 24.)

Yet honour me, I pray thee, before my people, and before Israel.] He submitted to the sentence, and only desired while he was king he might not lose his honour with those that waited on him, and with the rest of his subjects.

And turn again with me, that I may worship the Lord thy God.] He speaks as if he thought, that, unless it were for Samuel's sake, he was afraid God would not regard him.

Ver. 31. And Samuel turned again with Saul.] He said before he would not: (ver. 26.) but upon his importunity (and ordered perhaps by God), he altered his mind. For he spake before only his present thoughts, which upon further reason he might change.

And Saul worshipped the Lord.] In the company of Samuel, that the people might not despise his authority while he held it.

Ver. 32. Then said Samuel, Bring ye hither unto me Agag the king of the Amalekites.] This he spake to the people, in the presence of Saul, that he might see what he ought to have done himself.

And Agag came unto him delicately.] Or, walking in state; for though he was at the point of death, saith Kimchi, he could not forbear to come to Samuel in a haughty manner: but this word seems to relate to softness, rather than pride; and signifies that he came to him with a soft pace, treading gingerly (as we speak) after a nice and delicate manner.

And Agag said, Surely the bitterness of death is past.] Being spared by Saul and his soldiers, he feared no hurt from a prophet.

Ver. 33. And Samuel said, As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women.] This shews he had been a bloody tyrant, and was now cut off, not merely for the sins of his ancestors four hundred years ago, but for his own merciless cruelty.

And Samuel hewed Agag to pieces.] He commanded it to be done by the public executioner of justice: or, perhaps, did it himself. (See Judg. viii. 20.) This doth not prove that Samuel continued a judge after Saul was anointed: but he was authorized to do this by a special command from God.

Before the Lord in Gilgal.] For here they had been praying, and offering sacrifice: and God was present in all the great assemblies of his people. (See Judg. xx. 1.)

Ver. 34. Then Samuel went to Ramah.] Where he commonly lived, (vii. ult.)

And Saul went up to his house in Gibeah of Saul.] Which was the place of his birth, and constant abode, (x. 26. xiv. 2.)

Ver. 35. And Samuel came no more to see Saul until the day of his death.] He was wont, it is likely, to make him frequent visits: but now he forsook him, as a man abandoned by God.

Nevertheless Samuel mourned for Saul.] Yet he had still so much love to him, or to his country, as to lament the sad condition into which he was fallen.

And the Lord repented that he had made Saul king over Israel.] In testimony whereof he utterly cast him off; and all Samuel's tears could not procure a reversal of the sentence pronounced against him.

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord said unto Samuel, How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from being king over Israel?] Since God had told him so plainly, and positively, that the sentence against him was irreversible, it was in vain to mourn and to pray (as some think he did) for his restitution to God's favour.

Fill thy horn with oil, and go to Jesse the Beth-lehemite: for I have provided me a king among his sons.] It might increase his sorrow, perhaps, to think that if Saul should die suddenly, there was none yet appointed by God to succeed him. Which might be one reason why now God declared his pleasure about that matter.

Ver. 2. And Samuel said, How can I go?] That is, with safety.

If Saul hear it, he will kill me.] For he was enraged at the sentence passed upon him, though at that present he seemed to submit unto it.

And the Lord said, Take an heifer with thee, and say, I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord.] Which he, being a prophet, might do any where: all the ritual laws being subject to the prophets.

Ver. 3. And call Jesse to the sacrifice.] To an eucharistical feast upon the sacrifice: unto which they might invite their neighbours and friends.

And I will shew thee what thou shalt do; and thou shalt anoint him whom I will name unto thee.] God promises to direct him so to manage the business, that he should come into no danger. From whence it may be gathered, that it was not the holy oil wherewith he anointed him, for that was kept in the sanctuary: unto which place he could not have gone to fetch it, but it would have been known, and raised suspicions of what he was going to do. (See Fort. Scacchus, in his Myrothecium, lib. iii. cap. 46.)

Ver. 4. And Samuel did that which the Lord spake.] Took a horn of oil, and an heifer.

And came to Beth-lehem: and the elders of the town trembled at his coming.] They went out, I suppose, to meet him, but trembled when they saw him.

And said, Comest thou peaceably?] They were afraid that he came to reprove them for some sin that was in their city; or that he fled to them for security against Saul's anger, which might bring them into danger.

Ver. 5. And he said, Peaceably: I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord.] That was one intention of his coming; and though there was another (to anoint David) he was not bound to declare it: for where there are two ends of any action, one may without any injury to truth declare the one, and conceal the other. As Moses did, when he told Pharaoh they must go and sacrifice to God in the wilderness; but suppressed their intention to march to the land of Canaan.

Sanctify yourselves, and come with me to the sacrifice.] See upon Exod. xix. 10.

And he sanctified Jesse and his sons, and called them to the sacrifice.] It is likely Jesse might be an elder; but if he were, his sons were not: but he gave them a particular invitation, and took care they should come prepared. Samuel was not a priest, but being a prophet he had authority from God, in extraordinary cases, to perform the office of a priest, in offering sacrifice.

Ver. 6. And it came to pass, when they were come.] After the sacrifice was over, while they were making ready the feast, that was to follow upon it, Samuel took Jesse privately into a room, and there, it is likely, acquainted him with his commission: whereupon he called for his eldest son to come to him.

That he looked on Eliab, and said, Surely the anointed of the Lord is before me.] Beholding a goodly person, handsome and tall (as appears by the following verse), he concluded within himself, that this was the person God designed for his anointed.

Ver. 7. And the Lord said unto Samuel.] By a secret, inward suggestion.

Look not on his countenance, nor on the height of his stature; because I have refused him: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart.] All have not a noble spirit, who have a noble aspect; as appeared by Saul. Which should have made Samuel not conclude so hastily, from a goodly appearance.

Ver. 8. Then Jesse called Abinadab, and made him pass before Samuel.] That he might have a full view of him.

And he said, Neither hath the Lord chosen this.] God had suggested to him, as he did concerning the former, that he did not approve him.

Ver. 9. Then Jesse made Shammah to pass by. And he said, Neither hath the Lord chosen this.] He is called Shimeah, 2 Sam. xiii. 3. and Shimma, 1 Chron. ii. 13.

Ver. 10. Again, Jesse made seven of his sons to pass before Samuel.] Not all at once; but seven in all, one after another in order; David being the eighth.

And Samuel said unto Jesse, The Lord hath not chosen these.] These words shew that he had acquainted Jesse with his business: but these four of his sons, among whom he was to anoint one to be king, were no more qualified for it, than the three first: for he had eight sons in all, (xvii. 12.)

Ver. 11. And Samuel said unto Jesse, Are here all thy children? And he said, There remaineth yet the youngest; and, behold, he keeps the sheep.] And so was not at home. The most excellent commanders were anciently taken from the plough, or from feeding sheep, as Pliny observes, lib. xviii. Nat. Hist. cap. 5. "Fortissimi viri, et milites strenuissimi ex agricolis gignuntur." And so Vegetius, lib. i. cap. 3. de Re Militari, discusses this point, whether the best soldiers came out of the city or country: and resolves, "aptiorem armis rusticam plebem," &c. that the country people are most fit for arms; who live in the open air, and are bred up to labour, and endure heat, and neglect the shade; being unacquainted with baths, ignorant of delights, of a simple mind, contented with a little; having their bodies hardened to the enduring all labour; who are used by the country life to carry burdens, dig trenches, and such-like labour. And therefore he concludes, that the strength of an army is to be supplied out of the field, for so it is, that the less men are acquainted with the delights of life, the less they fear death. Moses was thus bred a long time in the service of Jethro: and Saul looked after his father's cattle.

And Samuel said unto Jesse, Send and fetch him: for we will not sit down till he come hither.] By this it appears, all this was transacted between the sacrifice and the dressing of the feast upon it.

Ver. 12. And he sent and brought him in. Now he was ruddy.] His hair was red, which in ancient times was accounted beautiful, as Bochartus observes from this place. With which agree the words of Festus, who having said that rutilus signifies red, adds, "cujus coloris studiosæ etiam antiquæ mulieres erant;" of which colour women also were studious in ancient times. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34.) But it must be confessed, that the Hebrew word admoni doth not signify only red, but also bright and shining; as Bochartus himself acknowledges those words, Lament. iv. 7. are to be understood, where he saith of the Nazarites, ademu azem mippinim, they were more shining in body than pearls. And I think these words are so to be interpreted concerning David, that he had a clear complexion; or was very fair (as we speak) and lovely.

And withal of a beautiful countenance.] Or, had beautiful eyes, as the words are in the Hebrew, "Oculis speculis et liberalibus," as Conradus Pellicanus here glosses.

And goodly to look to.] Of a pleasant aspect; full of sweetness and clemency, as the same author understands it. All this is said to signify that he was a goodly person, and had greatness in his countenance.

And the Lord said, Arise, anoint him: for this is he.] The Jews observe upon these words, that it was necessary to anoint the first of a family, that was advanced to the kingdom; but it was not necessary to anoint his children that succeeded him: unless upon occasion of a dispute, by a contrary faction. (See Selden, de Success. in Pontificat. lib. ii. cap. 9.)

Ver. 13. Then Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him.] He did not hereby invest him actually with the kingly power: but this anointing was only a designation of him to succeed Saul after his death. So David always understood it; looking upon Saul as the Lord's anointed as long as he lived; that is, as the king of Israel. (See Judg. ix. 8.)

In the midst of his brethren.] It had better have been translated, from the midst of his brethren; that is, he singled him out from the rest, and privately anointed him. For it is manifest by what is said before, that Samuel was afraid to have it known, and therefore did not anoint him publicly in the midst of his brethren. And by Eliab's treatment of David after this, (xvii. 28.) it plainly enough appears he did not know him to be the king elect of God's people.

The Jews in Seder Olam Rabba (cap. 13.) say, David was twenty-nine years old when he was anointed: which certainly is false, if it be understood of this first unction by Samuel (whereby God elected him, as in the two following Judah and Israel received him for their king); for after Saul's death he reigned forty years, and lived till he was seventy. So that he was thirty years old when he began to reign: part of which time he spent in the service of Saul; and after that was sorely persecuted by him. How long that persecution lasted is uncertain: but it continued so long, that it makes the opinion of Abarbinel probable, that David could not be above twenty years old, if so much, when Samuel anointed him.

And the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward.] A spirit of prudence to behave himself wisely upon all occasions; with a spirit of courage, so that he durst grapple with a lion and a bear: and the spirit of prophecy, in which he was very eminent afterward. In short, a spirit fit for a prince.

And Samuel went up, and went to Ramah.] Having no further commission from God at Beth-lehem.

Ver. 14. But the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul.] Which came upon him when he was first made king, and continued with him till this time; (x. 11. xi. 6.) yet he did not lose his courage, but his prudence and skill in government.

And an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him.] He grew melancholy, timorous, and suspicious: so that he started where there was no danger, as the Hebrew word seems to import; and thereby became very unfit for business, being sometimes furious and distracted; always full of anxiety and solicitude of mind: sighing and trembling like a man in the dark, as Abarbinel explains it. For his blood and spirits were thick and heavy, having lost their usual purity and splendour.

Ver. 15. And Saul's servants said unto him, Behold, an evil spirit from God troubleth thee.] His courtiers could not but observe a strange disturbance in him: which they looked upon as so unusual, that they ascribed it to the hand of God.

Ver. 16. Let our lord now command thy servants, that are before thee, to seek out a man who is a cunning player upon the harp.] An instrument always highly esteemed; as those were who could play well upon it. It is called cinnor in the Hebrew, from whence, no doubt, the Greek Κιννύρα is derived.

And it shall come to pass, that when the evil spirit from God is upon thee.] When a melancholy fit seized him.

That he shall play with his hand, and thou shalt be well.] It being a bodily disease, they hoped by this means he might receive some relief: and, perhaps, they had seen some experiment made of it upon men in the like condition; for music wonderfully alters the spirits, and consequently the blood: and hath a peculiar virtue in it to cheer and delight those that are sad, and compose those that are furious, as Saul sometimes was.

Ver. 17. And Saul said unto his servants, Provide me now one that can play well, and bring him to me.] For none durst deny his attendance on him, as Samuel had described the manner of the kingdom, (viii. 11, 12, &c.)

Ver. 18. Then answered one of the servants, and said, Behold, I have seen the son of Jesse the Beth-lehemite, that is cunning in playing, and a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in matters, and a comely person.] It is likely this was some friend or acquaintance of David's, who had a mind to bring him to court: and therefore reckons up all his good qualities, as well as his skill in music; together with his success in all affairs. Which though he managed with great prudence, yet he could not have been so constantly prosperous if God had not blessed him.

Ver. 19. Wherefore Saul sent messengers unto Jesse, saying, Send me David thy son, which is with the sheep.] This message, it is likely, might possess Jesse with some fear that the secret was discovered.

Ver. 20. And Jesse took an ass laden with bread, and a bottle of wine, and a kid, and sent them by David his son unto Saul.] But by this present he hoped to ingratiate his son in his princely favour. The word laden is not in the Hebrew, but only an ass of bread. Which is a phrase used in other authors, as Bochartus hath observed out of Athenæus: who mentions this phrase in Sosibius, ἄρτων τρεῖς ὄνους καναηλίνους, three great asses of loaves, (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34.)

Ver. 21. And David came to Saul, and stood before him.] Ministered unto him among the rest of his servants.

And he loved him greatly; and he made him his armour-bearer.] Which was an honourable preferment.

Ver. 22. And Saul sent to Jesse, saying, Let David, I pray thee, stand before me; for he hath found favour in my sight.] This was an extraordinary token of his kindness, that he would not keep his son to wait upon him without his consent.

Ver. 23. And it came to pass, when the evil spirit from the Lord was upon Saul, that David took a harp, and played with his hand.] Josephus seems to have thought that he also sung hymns and psalms to the harp; for his words are, (lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 9.) λέγων τε τοὺς ὕμνους καὶ ψάλλων εν τῇ κιννύρᾳ, &c. But the illustrious Spanheim shews that the word ψαλμὸς is often used for the sound of the harp. So the scholiast upon Aristophanes's Aves, ψαλμὸς κυρίως ὁ τῆς κιθάρας ἦχος. (See his observation on Callimachus's hymn in Apollinem, ver. 12.) And so Nero truly said, (which Tacitus mentions in his Annals, lib. xiv. cap. 14.) "Antiqui duces cithara cecinerunt," the ancient great commanders sang to the harp. So Cornelius Nepos reports of Epaminondas, that he was an excellent musician.

And Saul was refreshed, and was well.] All authors are full of the power of music, both to stir up passions, and to allay them; according to the several kinds of it. Athenæus (lib. xiv.) praises it for the virtue that is in it, καὶ τὰ ἤθη παιδεύειν, καὶ τοὺς θυμοειδεῖς καὶ τὰς γνώμας διαφόρους καταπραΰνειν, to regulate men's manners, and to allay and soften those that are furious, and disturbed in their minds. Such songs Aristotle calls μέλη καθαρκτικὰ, purgative songs; apt to cleanse the mind from turbid motions, (lib. viii. Polit.) See Gerh. Vossius concerning this in his book de Artibus Popularibus, cap. 3. sect. 13. where he shews how diseases of the body have been cured by music, as well as of the mind: and sect. 45, 46. he shews the power of it over brute creatures. Bochartus also enumerates many famous artists among the ancients, besides Orpheus and Amphion (whose history is dressed up fabulously), that are celebrated, not by poets, but by good historians, for their wonderful skill in moving men's passions by music. (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44. p. 461, &c.) And long before these, the great Erasmus hath observed the force of music in curing diseases, and quite altering the passions of men's minds, in his preface to Arnobius upon the Psalms. Which may be found among his epistles, lib. xxviii. p. 1655.

And the evil spirit departed from him.] For a time: there being lucid intervals in such distempers as his was; which frequently returned again.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. AND the Philistines gathered their armies together unto battle.] In what year of Saul's reign this was, we are not told: but Josephus thinks it was not long after the things related in the foregoing chapter. For so his words are, χρόνοις δὲ ὕστερον οὐ πολλοῖς, not many years after, &c. For the Philistines having received a great defeat (chap. xiv.) resolved to be revenged, and thought they had a fair opportunity, when they heard that Saul was distracted.

And were gathered together at Shochoh which belongeth to Judah, and pitched between Shochoh and Azekah, in Ephes-dammim.] See Josh. xv. 35. By this it appears, that the Philistines invaded the country of the Israelites, and possessed themselves of some parts of it. That place here called Ephes-dammim, by taking away the letter aleph, is called Pas-dammim, 1 Chron. xi. 13.

Ver. 2. And Saul and the men of Israel were gathered together, and pitched by the valley of Elah.] A place, I suppose, in the same tribe, for their armies were not far one from another.

And set the battle in array against the Philistines.] As ready, and desirous to fight them.

Ver. 3. And the Philistines stood on a mountain on the one side, and the Israelites on a mountain on the other side: and there was a valley between them.] After they had faced one another some time, and neither side thought fit to engage and begin to fight, they drew up their armies upon two opposite mountains, which were parted by a valley.

Ver. 4. And there went out a champion out of the camp of the Philistines, named Goliath of Gath.] For to this city the Anakims fled when Joshua rooted them out of the land of Canaan, (Josh. xi. 22, 23.) And here they propagated a race of giants; that is, people of great stature and strength.

Whose height was six cubits and a span.] A great number of authors write of such men of vast stature in ancient times. See Magius de Gigantibus, and Casp. Schottus; but especially Hermannus Conringius, in his book de Antiquo Statu Holmstadii, and in another book, de Habitu Corporum Germanorum; where he shews the ancient Germans were of a vast size, as Cæsar relates in his book de Bello Gal. where he calls them "immani corporum magnitudine homines," men of a huge greatness of body. And Pomponius Mela and others say the same. In short, they were generally seven feet high. And now at this day, there is a whole nation on the north side of the strait of Magellan, "immani corporum vastitate," as he there observes, p. 37.

Ver. 5. And he had a helmet of brass upon his head; and he was armed with a coat of mail.] With plates of brass, laid one upon another like fishes' scales. So Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. iii. cap. 13.

And the weight of the coat was five thousand shekels of brass.] This shews he was a man of vast strength: who was able to walk and to fight with such prodigious armour: which was impenetrable. Yet this is not to be understood, as Fortunatus Scacchus thinks, as if the coat weighed so much, for it would have been insupportable; but that it cost so much, or was valued at five thousand shekels of brass, (Myrothec. vol. ii. p. 33.)

Ver. 6. And he had greaves of brass upon his legs, and a target of brass between his shoulders.] That he might be no where vulnerable. For the target defended his neck as well as his shoulders.

Ver. 7. And the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam; and his spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron.] This was one of his offensive weapons: by which the largeness of his sword may be measured.

And one bearing a shield went before him.] Which was proportionable, no doubt, to his bulk: and was carried before him when he made his challenge, for the greater state's sake; but, when he fought, I suppose, was used by himself.

Ver. 8. And he stood and cried unto the armies of Israel.] They were divided, it seems, into several bodies, called here armies: and they could hear one another from the mountains on which they were encamped; and Goliath came down into the valley, and there challenged any body to come and fight with him in the sight of both armies.

Why are ye come out to set your battle in array?] He charges them with presumption, in offering to make war with the Philistines, who were so much superior to them.

Am not I a Philistine, and you servants of Saul?] Who doubted of this, that he was a Philistine, and they Saul's subjects? The meaning thereof is, as Abarbinel explains it, that he was one of the lords of the Philistines, a chief ruler in Gath, subject to none; and yet would condescend to fight with any of Saul's servants: who, in comparison with him, he looked upon as no better than slaves. The Targum will have it, that he brags of his great deeds: particularly that he had killed Hophni and Phinehas with his own hand, and taken the ark of God captive; and therefore wonders at their presumption, that they should come to fight with those who had gained such victories over them. Which is not likely, for they had since that been beaten twice by the Israelites.

Choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me.] He propounds the deciding of their quarrel by a single combat: which seems to have been done out of a bravado, rather than from any examples of those ancient times, of ending quarrels in this manner: for though it looks like a charitable design to prevent much bloodshed; yet no nation sure was willing to venture its whole well-being upon one single man's good success. We read, indeed, as I observed upon xiv. 10. of two or three single combats, before the armies of the two nations engaged, but they were not intended to be decisive of the quarrel between them. This therefore was, as I said before, a high rant of Goliath's, proceeding from the high opinion he had of his matchless strength: which made him brag, as if he was the support of the whole nation: which must stand or fall together with him.

Ver. 9. If he be able to fight with me and kill me, then will we be your servants; but if I prevail against him, and kill him, then shall ye be our servants, and serve us.] These conditions were never accepted, though Saul sought for a man to fight: but quite contrary, they were so far from being agreed on by either side, that the Philistines did not yield themselves slaves to the Israelites upon the death of Goliath; but fled to their own country, and there defended themselves against them, and fought many battles with them.

Ver. 10. And the Philistine said, I defy the armies of Israel this day; give me a man that we may fight together.] He expresses the utmost contempt of their whole army: in which he signifies there was not a man that durst look him in the face.

Ver. 11. When Saul and all Israel heard these words of the Philistine, they were dismayed, and greatly afraid.] For though Saul had not quite lost his courage, but gathered an army to fight the Philistines; yet it was not so undaunted as it had been before the Spirit of God forsook him: and the people's spirits sink, when their leaders flag and are dismayed.

Ver. 12. Now David was the son of that Ephrathite of Beth-lehem of Judah, whose name was Jesse.] He being chosen by God to combat with Goliath, the Divine writer gives an account who he was, and what relations he had.

He had eight sons.] In the first book of the Chronicles (ii. 13—15.) there are but seven mentioned: one being dead without children, as R. Solomon thinks; or being only an adopted son.

And the man was accounted an old man in the days of Saul.] And therefore excused from going to the war.

Ver. 13. And the three eldest sons went and followed Saul to battle: and the names of his three sons that went to the war were Eliab the first-born, &c.] These, I suppose, were men of the greatest experience and strength; and therefore fittest for the service.

Ver. 14. And David was the youngest: and the three eldest followed Saul.] David being young, was not put to the hardships of war: but the eldest only undertook to serve their prince and their country in this time of common danger.

Ver. 15. But David went and returned from Saul to feed his father's sheep at Beth-lehem.] In the beginning of this war, as Josephus thinks, Saul sent David home to his father, ἀρκούμενος αὐτοῦ τοῖς τρισὶ υἱοῖς, &c. contenting himself with three of his sons, who came to his assistance, with the hazard of their lives.

Ver. 16. And the Philistine drew near morning and evening, and presented himself forty days.] This is an argument the Philistines could not force the camp of the Israelites: otherwise they would not have spent so much time in this bravado. Unless we suppose, as Abarbinel doth, that all this time more forces were marching to this place, as their general rendezvous, both from the country of the Philistines, and from the land of Israel: for such great armies could not suddenly be got together. Or some wise men on both sides were treating all this time, to see if they could bring matters to an accommodation. It is a mere fancy of R. Jonathan, in the Gemara of the Mischna, title Sota, that Goliath drew near morning and evening, that he might disturb the Israelites at their morning and evening prayers, and hinder them from reciting them.

Ver. 17. And Jesse said unto David his son, Take now for thy brethren an ephah of this parched corn, and these ten loaves, and run to thy brethren.] For he did not know but provision might be scarce with them; or, as some will have it, he was informed they were under some hardship, and desired to know how they did. But having other sons at home with him, it was by a Divine direction that he sent David from the sheep upon this errand.

Ver. 18. And carry these ten cheeses unto the captain of their thousand.] Whose favour might be very serviceable to them.

And look how thy brethren fare, and take their pledge.] Some think that they went to war, in those days, at their own charge, and were not paid by the king. Provision therefore beginning to fail, Jesse's sons had sent to him for a supply, and by a certain token. Which their father bids David take with him, to know if it were theirs. So some expound the word pledge. But others think that if they had borrowed money, or pawned any thing for it, he ordered David to redeem it: or that he should bring something from them, that might certify him of their health. Others translate the word not pledge but business: and take the sense to be, Bring me word what they do; how they behave themselves; what company they keep, and whom they associate themselves withal.

Ver. 19. And Saul, and they, and all the men of Israel were in the valley of Elah, fighting with the Philistines.] They were now drawn up in battalia (as we speak) ready to engage: not in the valley, but hard by it, on the side of the mountain, where they faced the Philistines, and shewed themselves resolved to fight, if they came down from the other mountain.

Ver. 20. And David rose up early in the morning, and left the sheep with a keeper, and took, and went, as Jesse had commanded him: and he came to the trench as the host was going forth to the fight, and shouted for the battle.] By the trench, may be meant the carriages (as we translate the word in the margin), wherewith the host was surrounded, instead of a trench made about it.

Ver. 21. For Israel and the Philistines had put the battle in array, army against army.] This is the reason of what follows.

Ver. 22. And David left his carriage in the hand of the keeper of the carriage.] He left the provision which his father had sent his brethren with his servant, it being no time to present it to them, when they were just going to engage.

And ran unto the army, and came and saluted his brethren.] Acquainting them, no doubt, with their father's care of them.

Ver. 23. And as he talked with them, behold, there came up the champion (the Philistine of Gath, Goliath by name) out of the army of the Philistines, and spake according to the same words: and David heard them.] Though the armies stood ready to engage, yet the vanity of Goliath made him once more desire the matter might be determined by a single combat.

Ver. 24. And all the men of Israel, when they saw the man, fled from him, and were sore afraid.] They that could look the whole army of the Philistines in the face (among whom they knew Goliath was), one would think should not flee at the sight of one man. But the meaning is (as the next words shew), they could not endure to hear his opprobrious words against them, and his blasphemous words against God.

Ver. 25. And the men of Israel said, Have you seen this man that is come up? surely to defy Israel is he come up.] They bewailed among themselves their sad condition; that all the people of Israel should be set at nought, and vilified by one man; who despised both them and their God, (ver. 45.)

And it shall be, that the man who killeth him, the king will enrich him with great riches, and give him his daughter, and make his father's house free in Israel.] To make his family free in Israel, was to make them noble. And the Targum translates it, make them free princes in Israel: particularly free from paying any tribute or taxes, which was a royal privilege; of which see Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gentium, cap. 14. fol. 740. Here some observe, that Saul had lost his wonted piety; for he sent not to Samuel, nor consulted the high-priest, nor offered sacrifice: but only proclaimed a great reward to him that should fight with Goliath, and kill him. Which shewed he had not lost all prudence: for thus Caleb won Kirjath-sepher, by offering his daughter in marriage to him that should take it. And David himself afterward encouraged his soldiers to assault the strong fort of Zion, by promising to make him commander-in-chief of all his forces, who should first enter it. Thus Mathias Hostius observes, the Athenians offered a hundred talents to him that should bring Xerxes to them alive or dead: many more instances of this way of exciting men to valiant exploits he gives in his history of this monomachia.

Ver. 26. And David spake to the men that stood by him, saying, What shall be done to the man that kills this Philistine, and takes away the reproach from Israel?] He desired them to repeat the king's promise; signifying that he would undertake to encounter Goliath.

For who is this uncircumcised, that he should defy the armies of the living God?] He would not have them think he was moved by the hope of the reward (which was not to be despised) so much as by zeal for God, and for his country: which suffered by the reproaches of one, who was not in covenant with God: and therefore he did not fear him, nor would suffer him any longer to make such proud boasting.

Ver. 27. And the people answered him after this manner, saying, So shall it be done unto the man that killeth him.] They all confirmed what was before said.

Ver. 28. And Eliab his elder brother heard when he spake unto the men: and his anger was kindled against David, and he said, Why camest thou down hither?] His passion made him forget that he came by his father's order, to see how they did, &c.

And with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness?] This intimates, that he was fitter to look after sheep, than to fight a giant.

I know thy pride, and the naughtiness of thine heart; for thou art come down to see the battle.] Vain-glory he thought brought him to the battle: and now made him offer to run such a desperate adventure.

Ver. 29. And David said, What have I done? Is there not a cause?] He justifies his discourse; since no man, no, not Eliab himself, had the courage to wipe off the reproach which Goliath cast upon them all.

Ver. 30. And he turned from him to another, and spake after the same manner: and the people answered him again after the same manner.] He told them he would undertake to fight Goliath; and they told him what would be his reward if he killed him.

Ver. 31. And when the words were heard that David spake, they rehearsed them before Saul; and he sent for him.] They had been spoken to so many, that at last they came to Saul's ear: who desired to hear himself what he said.

Ver. 32. And David said unto Saul.] Who had told him what he heard reported of his resolution.

Let no man's heart faint because of him; for thy servant will go and fight with this Philistine.] In assured hope of victory.

Ver. 33. And Saul said unto David, Thou art not able to go against this Philistine to fight with him: for thou art but a youth, and he a man of war from his youth.] This Saul spake out of kindness to David, whom he would not have to hazard himself against an old soldier, when he was inexperienced in war.

Ver. 34. And David said unto Saul, Thy servant kept his father's sheep; and there came a lion and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock.] Not both together (as Castalio supposes in his translation), but at several times; and it is likely more than once.

Ver. 35. And I went out after him, and smote him, and delivered him out of his mouth: and when he rose up against me, I caught him by the beard, and smote him, and slew him.] Sometimes he pursued the lion and killed him in his flight: or, if he turned again to devour him, he boldly caught him by the beard and killed him. And in like manner we are to understand he encountered the bear.

Ver. 36. Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear.] The author of Halicoth Olam, by a strange fetch, concludes from hence, that he killed a lion with two of her whelps, and a bear with one of her cubs. (Par. iv. cap. 3.)

And this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them, seeing he hath defied the armies of the living God.] He encourages himself by three arguments. His mastery over such terrible creatures as a lion and a bear: which made him not fear this great beast, Goliath. Who was not one of God's people: whom he had insolently set at nought as varlets and slaves, (ver. 8.) though they were the servants of the living God.

Ver. 37. David said moreover, The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear.] In the Hebrew it is, out of the hand of the lion, and out of the hand of the bear. And Aristotle observes, that bears have paws, Χερσὶν ὁμοίους, resembling hands.

He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine.] To silence all objections, he declares that he was possessed with a full persuasion, that God would deliver this Philistine into his hands, as he had done the lion and the bear: for he felt himself full of that spirit which then assisted him. Abarbinel thinks, that he repeats this so often, because Saul did not seem to believe it, or did not attend to it: and therefore he saith over again, ver. 37. what he had said, ver. 36. And tells him it was not by his own strength, but by the mighty power of God, that he overcame those furious beasts: as he doubted not he should do this Philistine by the same power. Whereupon Saul prayed God to prosper him.

And Saul said, Go, and the Lord be with thee.] As he believed he would.

Ver. 38. And Saul armed David with his armour, &c.] Not that which he was wont to wear himself (for he was so tall it would not have fitted David), but he ordered them to bring out of his armoury a helmet and a coat of mail, as it here follows.

Ver. 39. And David girded his sword upon his armour, and he assayed to go; for he had not proved it. And David said unto Saul, I cannot go with these; for I have not proved them. And David put them off him.] He was not accustomed to wear such things, not being used to go armed: and, therefore, begged leave to lay them aside; as likely rather to encumber him, than facilitate his enterprise. Which Machiavel, in his Princeps, cap. 13. applies to the danger of employing mercenary soldiers; for "aliena arma aut ex humeris decidunt, aut sunt tibi oneri, aut te constrictum tenent."

Ver. 40. And he took his staff in his hand.] His shepherd's staff.

And chose him five smooth stones out of the brook.] Or rather five cleft stones: not whole and entire, but broken. For the word signifies partitions; and, therefore, denotes the stones to have been ragged; and sharp pointed were most fit for his purpose. (See De Dieu.)

And put them in a shepherd's bag which he had, even in a scrip.] Which hung by his side.

And his sling was in his hand.] A sort of weapon, in the management of which some were wonderful skilful in ancient days. (See Judg. xx. 16.) And Livy, with other authors, mention slingers that could hit a mark at a very great distance: particularly the Phœnicians, who, as Bochartus observes, were famous slingers; from whom this art was derived to the Baleares. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44.)

And he drew near to the Philistine.] It seems David made the first motion towards him, to shew he was in no fear of him.

Ver. 41. And the Philistine came, and drew near to David; and the man that bare the shield went before him.] As he was wont to do, (ver. 7.)

Ver. 42. And when the Philistine looked about and saw David.] He expected some tall, robust person to encounter him; and, therefore, at the first did not mind David, who was but a stripling.

He disdained him; for he was but a youth, and ruddy, and of a fair countenance.] He contemned him upon three accounts: as being a youth, unaccustomed to war; and being beautiful, seemed more fit to dance with women, than to fight with men; and he came also unarmed. (See xvi. 12.)

Ver. 43. And the Philistine said, Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves? And he cursed David by his gods.] So the Romans were wont to do, saying, "Dii Deæque te perdant:" as Goliath, it is likely, now wished, that Dagon and Ashtaroth, and the rest of his gods, would confound David.

Ver. 44. And the Philistine said unto David, Come unto me, and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field.] For in his hand David was no more than a little lamb in the hand of a butcher.

Ver. 45. Then said David to the Philistine, Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield; but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts.] By a commission from Him who commands all creatures in heaven and earth: and in a full assurance that he will deliver thee into my hand. Concerning the word chidon, which we translate a spear, see Bochart in his Hieroz. par. i. p. 138.

The God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied.] The leader and protector of those armies whom Goliath had set at nought.

Ver. 46. This day will the Lord deliver thee into my hand; and I will smite thee, and take thy head off from thee.] Which Goliath thought impossible, he having no sword by his side.

And will give the carcasses of the host of the Philistines this day unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the earth.] David did not rashly and vainly boast beforehand of the victory, as Goliath hath done: but, being full of faith (as Pellicanus here notes), praised the Divine omnipotence, and prophesied of an assured victory.

That all the earth may know there is a God in Israel.] Superior to all other.

Ver. 47. And all this assembly shall know that the Lord saveth not by sword and by spear.] They might learn, if they pleased, that the Lord needed not human force to effect his designs. David did not want courage: but he ascribes all to God; in whose power and might he went forth, and not his own.

For the battle is the Lord's, and he will give you into our hand.] The battle was properly the Lord's against the seven nations of Canaan: because he had commanded them to be extirpated. But in all other battles he disposed of the victory as he pleased. Strigelius here notes out of Sophocles the profane spirit of Ajax; who was therefore punished with madness: because his father Telamon piously admonishing him, as he went to war, to fight bravely, but to expect victory from God; he impiously answered, that "cowards might overcome by the help of God, but he doubted not to overcome without him."

Ver. 48. And it came to pass, when the Philistine arose, and came and drew near to meet David.] Having nothing but victory in his thoughts, as Pellicanus here observes, he arose, and marched gravely, and pompously, covered over with armour, and fearing nothing.

That David hasted, and ran towards the army to meet the Philistine.] But David, being loaded with no armour, nimbly ran towards him, and knocked him down; before he had so much as drawn his sword out of his sheath.

Ver. 49. And David put his hand in his bag, and took thence a stone, and smote the Philistine in his forehead.] Which either was bare (he perhaps contemning David so much, as not to pull down his helmet over his face), or else was thrown with such a force, that it pierced his helmet first, and then his forehead: or went in at the place which was left open for his eyes. However it was, the Divine hand directed it: for though there were men so wonderful skilful as to hit a mark that was fixed and immoveable, though small and at a distance; yet none had such admirable skill as to be sure to hit a mark that was in motion, as Goliath's body was at this time.

And the stone sunk into his forehead.] Pierced into his brain, so that he immediately, as it here follows, fell upon his face to the earth.

Kimchi thinks, that when he said to David, Come, and I will give thy flesh to the fowls of the air, he looked up, and his helmet then fell from off his head.

Ver. 50. So David prevailed over the Philistine with a sling and with a stone, and smote the Philistine, and slew him.] So true is that of Vegetius, (lib. i. cap. 6.) "Utilius est fortes esse milites, quam grandes." But it was not mere fortitude and valour that prevailed, but the Spirit of God.

But there was no sword in the hand of David.] This was so wonderful a thing, that so great a victory should be obtained without the usual warlike weapons, that it was thought fit a special mark should be set upon it.

Ver. 51. Therefore David ran, and stood upon the Philistine.] That he might complete his victory, and make it notorious to all the army.

And took his sword, and drew it out of its sheath.] He was strong, not merely by nature, but by the power of God: otherwise he could not have well managed the sword of a giant.

And slew him, and cut off his head therewith.] It is likely the stone had only stunned him; but his life was still in him after this blow in his forehead: and therefore now he quite dispatched him.

And when the Philistines saw their champion was dead, they fled.] Having lost all their courage with his life.

Ver. 52. And the men of Israel and of Judah arose, and shouted.] As they used to do when they had got the victory.

And pursued the Philistines, till they came to the valley, and to the gates of Ekron, &c.] They pursued them to their own country (which was in a valley), even to the gates of their principal cities; as Gath and Ekron were.

Ver. 53. And the children of Israel returned from chasing after the Philistines, and spoiled their tents.] They acted like good soldiers; who did not first fall upon the spoil; and thereby let the enemy escape.

Ver. 54. And David took the head of the Philistine, and brought it to Jerusalem.] After he had shewn it to Saul, (ver. 57.) and exposed it to all the people, (xviii. 6.) Jerusalem was now become a noted city, which was the reason, I suppose, why he brought his head hither: though it is only said, he brought it to that place; where it having been shewn as a spectacle, perhaps was reposited somewhere else.

But he put his armour in his tent.] Which, I suppose, was set up for David, upon this occasion; when he prepared himself to encounter the Philistine. And when his tent was taken down after the battle, the armour was deposited in the tabernacle, as his sword was, to remain there for a trophy.

Ver. 55. And when Saul saw David go forth against the Philistine, he said unto Abner, the captain of the host, Whose son is this youth?] Such cavillers as Spinosa from hence argue, that this chapter was not written by him that wrote the former: for how is it possible, say they, that Saul should not know David, who had lately attended on him in his court? But this is very frivolous; for in such a multitude of business as kings have, and among so many new faces which they see every day, it was easy to forget a man he had seen and conversed withal now and then; especially when he was crazed, and had a disease in his head, as Saul had. Besides, David came now in another kind of apparel than he did when he was sent to wait upon Saul at court: for he appeared now as a shepherd, in a rustic habit, (ver. 40.) and his countenance, it is likely, was much altered by the heroic motion he now found in himself to fight with Goliath. And after all, Abarbinel observes, he doth not ask who David was, but who was his father: which he might easily forget when he had been disturbed with melancholy, and with the public affairs.

And Abner said, As thy soul liveth, O king, I cannot tell.] He being a military man, and therefore much abroad, had not seen David when he was at court, or taken no notice of him.

Ver. 56. And the king said, Inquire then whose son this stripling is.] It was natural to desire to know whence such a young man came, who so much excelled all other men.

Ver. 57. And as David returned from the slaughter of the Philistine, Abner took him, and brought him unto Saul, with the head of the Philistine in his hand.] He thought it was best the king should learn from his own mouth who he was: especially after such a glorious exploit.

Ver. 58. And Saul said, Whose son art thou, thou young man? And David answered, I am the son of thy servant Jesse the Beth-lehemite.] More discourse, no doubt, passed between them, as appears by the next words; but this was all that was proper to be recorded, in answer to Saul's question.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when he had made an end of speaking unto Saul, that the soul of Jonathan was knit unto the soul of David, and he loved him as his own soul.] Such was the prudence and modesty of his discourse and behaviour, after such an heroic action, that he entirely gained Jonathan's affection.

Ver. 2. And Saul took him that day, and would let him go no more to his father's house.] Saul also resolved to shew greater respect unto him than before. For it appears by this that he had not lived always at court, after he came first thither; but often went to his father, when Saul was well, and had no use of him.

Ver. 3. Then Jonathan and David made a covenant.] Solemnly entered into a mutual friendship.

Because he loved him as his own soul.] Such excellent men there were among the heathen, between whom there was ζεῦγος φιλίας, as Plutarch calls it, a yoke of friendship, wherein they were so joined together in love and amity, as to have one common interest. He mentions (in his book περὶ πολυφιλίας) Theseus and Perithous; Achilles and Patroclus; Orestes and Pylades; Pythias and Damon; Epaminondas and Pelopidas: but none of them comparable to these two, Jonathan and David: who entered into the most sacred bonds of mutual assistance and defence to the very death; and kindness to their posterity after either of them was dead. Which was a singular providence of God, who by this means preserved David, in that sharp persecution which shortly after arose against him at court.

Ver. 4. And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it unto David.] That he might appear like a courtier.

And his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle.] That he might look like another Jonathan; and all might take notice they were no longer two, but one. For he put him into the garb both of a courtier and of a soldier; or rather, great commander.

Ver. 5. And David went out whithersoever Saul sent him.] Upon military expeditions: none of which he refused, though ever so hazardous.

And he behaved himself wisely.] Shewed as much prudence in his conduct as he did courage.

And Saul set him over the men of war.] Not over all; for Abner was general, as we speak, of all his forces: but he made him captain of his guard; or gave him some other great command in his army.

And he was accepted in the sight of all the people, and also in the sight of Saul's servants.] Except a few, who envied his preferment.

Ver. 6. And it came to pass, as they came.] Marched along, in a great cavalcade (as they now speak), from the place of battle.

When David returned from the slaughter of the Philistine.] I suppose, Saul and the whole court thought fit to honour David, by accompanying him to Jerusalem, when he carried Goliath's head thither.

The women came out of all the cities of Israel.] All the neighbouring cities.

Singing and dancing to meet king Saul with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of music.] As the custom was in times of great rejoicing.

Ver. 7. And the women answered one to another as they played.] They sang as well as played on musical instruments: and they sang alternately, as they did Exod. xv. 21. And the burden of the song seems to have been that which follows.

And said, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands.] For his slaying Goliath was the cause of the flight of the army of the Philistines, and the great slaughter of them.

Ver. 8. And Saul was very wroth, and the saying displeased him; and he said, They have ascribed unto David ten thousands, and to me they have ascribed but thousands: and what can he have more but the kingdom?] He began to be jealous they would advance him to the throne, in a little time: having so highly magnified him above their king.

Ver. 9. And Saul eyed David from that day forward.] Narrowly observed him, whether he had any such design to make himself king. Or, as it is commonly interpreted, he looked askew upon him, as one he envied and hated, and was afraid of; as the LXX. translate it.

Ver. 10. And it came to pass on the morrow, that the evil spirit from God came upon Saul.] Which had formerly haunted him, (xvi. 14.) and now, by his discontent, anger and melancholy was brought again upon him.

And he prophesied in the midst of the house.] Before the whole court. This prophesying is generally understood, only of his imitating the motions, actions, and gestures of the prophets; which sometimes were very different from those of other men: (see 2 Kings ix. 11.) but I do not see why this word should not retain the signification here, which it hath in other places: that he sung Divine songs. Which perhaps he the rather did, that David might suspect no danger from him. Abarbinel thinks, that his mind being disturbed with various roving thoughts about his own condition, and about David, he foretold that David should be heir of his kingdom.

And David played with his hand, as at other times.] To compose and quiet his disturbed spirits.

And there was a javelin in Saul's hand.] Which he had provided on purpose, as the following words shew, to dispatch David.

Ver. 11. And Saul cast the javelin, for he said, I will smite David even to the wall with it.] This argued he was so full of fury, that he designed to kill him in his own house, before all his courtiers, when David was waiting upon him, and doing him service.

And David avoided out of his presence twice.] Had his eye upon him, and shunned the blow, both now, and at another time mentioned xix. 10.

Ver. 12. And Saul was afraid of David, because the Lord was with him, and was departed from Saul.] Who was as unsuccessful in all his designs, as David was prosperous.

Ver. 13. Therefore Saul removed him from him.] From his court.

And made him a captain over a thousand.] Instead of captain of his guard (which required his attendance at court), he gave him a command abroad: where he hoped he might be killed in some expedition; or he might have an opportunity privately to take away his life.

And he went out and came in before the people.] As the leader of that thousand men.

Ver. 14. And David behaved himself wisely in all his ways.] None could find any fault in his conduct, whithersoever he went.

And the Lord was with him.] Made all his undertakings prosperous.

Ver. 15. Wherefore, when Saul saw that he behaved himself very wisely, he was afraid of him.] His fears increased as he saw David still grow so prudent that no exception could be taken to his behaviour.

Ver. 16. But all Israel and Judah loved David.] This is to be understood (as Corn. Bertram thinks, de Repub. Jud. cap. 10.) as if he had said, The Israelites in general loved David, but especially they of the tribe of Judah.

Because he went out and came in before them.] This phrase signifies in other places to administer all things belonging to one's charge with full authority. So Moses speaks of himself, Deut. xxxi. 2. and of Joshua his successor, Numb. xxvii. 21. And so I suppose it signifies here, that David had an absolute power under Saul, over those whom he commanded: and managed it so well that he gained every body's affection.

Ver. 17. And Saul said to David, Behold my elder daughter Merab, her will I give thee to wife.] He at last bethinks himself of the promise he had publicly made unto him that should kill Goliath. The performance of which David did not demand, but in modesty left it to Saul's own conscience. Who now intended nothing less, it appears by the sequel, than to be as good as his word.

Only be thou valiant for me, and fight the Lord's battles.] He would not have him think upon this marriage of coming again to live at court: but to continue a military life, and fight for his country, whereby he hoped to be rid of him.

For Saul said, Let not mine hand be upon him.] Now he seems to have some sense of honour, and to lay aside those base thoughts of murdering him himself.

But let the hand of the Philistines be upon him.] By whose hand God's just judgment so ordered things that Saul himself fell.

Ver. 18. And David said unto Saul, Who am I? and what is my life.] The hazarding his life, he tells him, could not deserve so high an advancement.

And what is my family in Israel, that I should be son-in-law to the king?] This was not a refusal of the honour, but an acknowledgment how unworthy he was of it.

Ver. 19. And it came to pass, at the time when Merab, Saul's daughter, should have been given to David.] When all things were ready for the marriage.

That she was given to Adriel the Meholathite to wife.] A most high affront to David, and the greatest injury that could have been done him: which he wisely dissembled. How Jonathan resented this usage we are not told. It is likely his duty to his father made him entreat David to take it patiently; and to look upon Saul as one that was sometimes beside himself, and did not know what he did.

Ver. 20. And Michal, Saul's daughter, loved David: and they told Saul, and the thing pleased him.] Not out of any love to David, or desire to perform his promise: but because he hoped by her means to bring his ends about of destroying David.

Ver. 21. And Saul said, I will give him her, that she may be a snare to him, and that the hand of the Philistines may be against him.] He hoped his daughter, in obedience to him, might be persuaded to bring him into some snare that he would lay for him: or, that being exposed to great dangers (which he was to undergo, as a condition of having her to wife) he might perish in some of them.

Wherefore Saul said unto David, Thou shalt be this day my son-in-law.] That is shortly, within a time, it is likely, prefixed by Saul.

In the one of the twain.] By marrying one of his daughters. He had two; and though he was disappointed in one of them, yet his promise was fulfilled, if he married the other.

Ver. 22. And Saul commanded his servants, saying, Commune with David secretly.] It seems David was not forward to embrace Saul's offer; having been so grossly abused: therefore Saul ordered his courtiers in private discourse to take occasion to persuade him to it.

And say, Behold, the king hath delight in thee, and his servants love thee: now therefore be the king's son-in-law.] The affection of the king and of the whole court, was a mighty argument to induce him to it.

Ver. 23. And Saul's servants spake these words in the ears of David. And David said, Seemeth it a light thing unto you to be a king's son-in-law, seeing I am a poor man, and little esteemed?] Having no estate, and of small credit: and therefore unable to endow her according to her quality.

Ver. 24. And the servants of Saul told him, saying, In this manner spake David.] In the Hebrew, according unto these words; that is, they reported his words faithfully; that he was as sensible of his own meanness, as of the honour that was offered him.

Ver. 25. And Saul said, Thus shall ye say to David, The king desireth not any dowry, but a hundred foreskins of the Philistines, to be avenged of his enemies.] This custom hath prevailed in latter times in some countries, to give their daughters in marriage to the most valiant men; or those who should bring them so many heads of their enemies. Alex. ab Alexandro reports of a people in Carmania, that if any were desirous to marry, it was necessary he should first bring the king the head of an enemy, (lib. i. cap. 24.) Vincent le Blanc reports the like of others, (par. i. cap. 30.) But why did Saul desire the foreskins of the Philistines', and not their heads? To this Procopius Gazæus answers, that Saul did not know but David might cut off the heads of his own subjects and bring them instead of the Philistines, and therefore he asked so many foreskins, which the Israelites had not, that he might be sure he had killed so many enemies. As for portions, the Hebrew custom was not like that of the Romans, who required the wife to bring a portion to her husband, "ut onera matrimonii tanto æquius sustineat," that he might be able to bear the charges of matrimony more equally. But among the Hebrews the husband endowed the wife, and received nothing at all with her. And so the custom was among the people of that land before they came into Canaan. For Sichem bade Dinah's relations require what dowry they pleased, and it should be settled upon her, he desiring nothing of them but her, (Gen. xxxix. 17.) And so it was in the case of David. (See Wagenseil upon Sota, cap. 4.)

But Saul thought to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines.] Who he knew would be extremely enraged against David, by putting this great indignity upon them, as they all counted it, of cutting off their foreskins.

Ver. 26. And when his servants told David these words, it pleased David well to be the king's son-in-law.] In the Hebrew the words are, the thing was right in David's eyes; that is, he thought fit to accept the offer upon these conditions.

And the days were not expired.] Which were appointed to be fulfilled (as it is in the Hebrew) before the marriage took effect: so that he had time to perform what was agreed instead of a dowry.

Ver. 27. Wherefore David arose and went, he and his men, and slew of the Philistines two hundred men: and brought their foreskins, and they gave them in full tale to the king, that he might be the king's son-in-law.] He gave Saul double of what he had demanded: partly to shew his sense of the honour he had done him, and partly to express his love to his daughter, and to declare his intention to venture his life freely to do him service.

And Saul gave him Michal his daughter to wife.] There being no way to avoid it, after the marriage had been so solemnly treated and ratified.

Ver. 28. And Saul saw and knew that the Lord was with David.] He was convinced of it, by the success which he constantly gave him.

And that Michal, Saul's daughter, loved him.] Which was a great disappointment to him.

Ver. 29. And Saul was yet the more afraid of David.] Having thus advanced him; and seeing no hope of bringing his designs to pass against him.

And Saul became David's enemy continually.] He was every day more resolved to destroy him. Such strange blindness did his anger and hatred, and such-like passions, bring upon him, that he set himself against him, who he saw and knew had God for his friend.

Ver. 30. And the princes of the Philistines went forth.] To fight with the Israelites: who had highly incensed them by David's late action, as well as by former losses. And they thought, perhaps, that David would make use of the benefit the law allowed, Deut. xxiv. 25. of not going to war in a year after he was married.

And it came to pass, after they went forth, that David behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul.] By discovering, I suppose, the designs of the Philistines, and preventing them: for we do not read that they came to a battle.

So that his name was much set by.] He was very highly esteemed.

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. AND Saul spake to Jonathan his son, and to all his servants, that they should kill David.] When he could not destroy him by craft, he declares open enmity to him; and commands his son and his whole court to make him away: some of which he thought would obey him. It is strange that he should speak to Jonathan to murder David, if he knew the friendship he had for him; and he could not well be ignorant of it, since he had so publicly declared it, as we read xviii. 3, 4. But he imagined his love to a father would overcome his love to a friend. And there was a great providence of God in his disclosing his mind so freely to Jonathan, whereby David came to be certainly informed of his danger.

Ver. 2. And Jonathan, Saul's son, delighted much in David.] He continued to take much delight in his company: and therefore would not lose the pleasure of his friendship by suffering him to be killed.

And Jonathan told David, saying, My father seeketh to kill thee. Now therefore, I pray thee, take heed to thyself until the morning, and abide in a secret place, and hide thyself.] He hoped, I suppose, to find his father better disposed in the morning: and in the mean time would have David secure himself in some close place where nobody could find him.

Ver. 3. And I will go out.] The next morning.

And stand beside my father in the field.] In which, it is likely, Saul used to walk in the morning, and take the fresh air. Thereabouts he advised David to lurk in some secret place, that he might speedily acquaint him with the issue of his discourse with his father.

And I will commune with my father concerning thee; and what I see, that I will tell thee.] Let him know how he left his father inclined.

Ver. 4. And Jonathan spake good of David unto Saul his father.] A noble act of friendship, to adventure to commend him to one who was his declared enemy.

And said unto him, Let not the king sin against his servant, against David; because he hath not sinned against thee, and because his work hath been to thee-ward very good.] He represented to him what a sin and dishonour it would be to kill such a faithful servant as David had been: who never offended him; but studied by all good offices to please him.

Ver. 5. For he did put his life in his hand, and slew the Philistine.] Especially he puts him in mind of that hazardous enterprise wherein he slew Goliath.

And the Lord wrought a great salvation for all Israel.] By which means the whole realm was delivered out of their enemies' hand.

Thou sawest it, and didst rejoice.] He desires him to remember that he himself was a witness of it; and could not then but applaud David, and rejoice in what God had done by him.

Wherefore then wilt thou sin against innocent blood, and slay David without a cause?] Having mollified Saul by so many arguments, he beseeches him to revoke the order he had given ver. 1. and in downright terms tells him, if he did not, he would bring innocent blood upon his own head.

Ver. 6. And Saul hearkened to the voice of Jonathan: and Saul sware, As the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain.] Some think he sware deceitfully; that Jonathan, believing he had no ill intentions towards David, might not persuade him to fly, but bring him to court again, where he might have an opportunity to kill him. But I rather think he spake what he really meant at this present: though this alteration proceeding not from any affection he bare to David, but from a sense (which Jonathan's discourse had wrought in him) how base a thing it would be, to slay a man of such worth, and who had done him such service, he soon forgot it, and returned to his old bent.

Ver. 7. And Jonathan called David, and Jonathan shewed him all these things: and Jonathan brought David unto Saul, and he was in his presence, as in times past.] When he was in his favour.

Ver. 8. And there was war again: and David went out and fought with the Philistines, and slew them with a great slaughter; and they fled from him.] All these battles were only between parties, for David commanded no more than a thousand men, (xviii. 13.) And if the whole army of the Philistines had been gathered together, Abner would have commanded the army of Israel against them; for he was captain of the host.

Ver. 9. And the evil spirit from the Lord was upon Saul, and he sat in his house with his javelin in his hand.] The more services David did his country, the more did Saul's hatred and malice increase against him. For this new victory, in all likelihood, made him melancholy and mad to see him so prosperous.

And David played with his hand.] He did not omit his duty to Saul, though he knew his danger.

Ver. 10. And Saul sought to smite David to the wall with his javelin; but he slipped away out of Saul's presence, and he smote the javelin into the wall.] His wrath and fury made him forget his oath: so dangerous it is to be possessed with such passions.

And David fled, and escaped that night.] He got out of the palace, before Saul's order (which it is likely he gave) could be executed, to apprehend him.

Ver. 11. Saul also sent messengers unto David's house, to watch him, and to slay him in the morning.] As he went out of the door of his house. By this it is apparent, when Saul missed his blow, he was the more enraged, and implacably pursued his destruction.

And Michal, David's wife, told him, saying, If thou save not thy life to-night, to-morrow thou shalt be slain.] She had intelligence either from her brother Jonathan, or some other friend at court: or perhaps she saw suspicious persons hovering about the house.

Ver. 12. So Michal let down David through a window.] Which did not look towards any of the doors which were narrowly watched.

And he went, and fled, and escaped.] Having most of the night, it is likely, to travel in.

Ver. 13. And Michal took an image.] In the Hebrew, a teraphim. But it doth not signify such as were made for a superstitious use (which David would not have suffered in his house), but a simple image of a man's head; such as we now use for blocks, whereon to comb our perukes. Abarbinel thinks (whom Abendana follows) that women were wont in those days to make such figures in the likeness of their husbands; that when they were absent from them, they might have them in their image, to look upon them, as still present with them. Of which sort of teraphim (which were images in the likeness of men) was this of Michal's; who, dearly loving her husband, had got one made in his likeness. But whatsoever becomes of this, the conceit that teraphim were little puppets (as I may call them), which the high-priest had in his breast-plate (called urim and thummim) is plainly destroyed. For this place shews that teraphim was a large image representing a man: and therefore fitter for a bed, than for a breast-plate.

And laid it in the bed.] Where David was wont to lie.

And put a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster.] It is hard to determine what the word cebir signifies, which we translate pillow; for there is great variety of opinions among interpreters about it. But Bochartus hath with much probability resolved that it signifies great. And the meaning is, she put a great deal of goats' hair upon his bolster; for though the word goats is only mentioned in the Hebrew, yet the word hair must be supplied, as a great many other places of Scripture testify. (See his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 51. p. 623.) For in those countries goats had long hair, which was shorn, as the wool of sheep is, and served for many uses; and it is not unlike man's hair, as he there observes. It was also of divers colours, so that she might choose some fine goats' hair (which was ready at hand, being used to be spun) of the same colour with David's.

And covered it with a cloth.] As if David had been sick.

Ver. 14. And when Saul sent messengers to take David.] He not coming out of doors, where they watched for him, Saul sent other messengers to take him in his house.

She said, He is sick.] Her affection to David made her tell an untruth; whereby he gained more time to get to a place of safety.

Ver. 15. And Saul sent messengers again to see David.] As if they came to visit him, and see how he did.

Saying, Bring him to me in the bed, that I may slay him.] Such was his insatiable rage, that he could not stay to see whether he would die of his sickness; but when he was able to make no resistance, resolved to dispatch him.

Ver. 16. And when the messengers were come in, behold, there was an image in the bed, with a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster.] An image dressed up with goats' hair, resembling a man.

Ver. 17. And Saul said unto Michal, Wherefore hast thou deceived me so, and sent away mine enemy, that he is escaped?] He did not expect to be served so by a daughter, whom he had married to David, that she might betray him.

And Michal answered Saul, He said unto me, Let me go; why should I kill thee?] This was another fiction of her own; for it is not likely that she endeavoured to detain him, or that he threatened to kill her if she did.

Ver. 18. So David fled, and came to Samuel to Ramah, and told him of all that Saul had done unto him. And he and Samuel went and dwelt in Naioth.] A place near to Ramah, as the next verse shews.

Ver. 19. And it was told Saul, Behold, David is at Naioth in Ramah.] Ramah seems to have been the place from whence Samuel was descended, called (in the first chapter, ver. 1.) Ramathaim-zophim, for the reason I gave there. And Naioth was a neighbouring place belonging to it, and perhaps the suburbs of it: where the sons of the prophets either had their ordinary residence, or were wont sometimes to retire thither for greater privacy.

Ver. 20. And Saul sent messengers to take David.] His implacable hatred had abolished all respect and reverence to Samuel (under whose protection David now was), and to the college of the prophets, which was a kind of sanctuary unto those who fled to it.

And when they saw the company of the prophets prophesying, and Samuel standing as appointed over them.] To govern them.

The Spirit of the Lord came also upon the messengers of Saul, and they also prophesied.] That is, praised God in hymns, which the prophets composed and sang to him, (1 Chron. xxv. 1, 2. 4.)

Ver. 21. And when it was told Saul, he sent other messengers, and they prophesied likewise. And Saul sent again the third time, and they prophesied also.] A strange obstinacy, to contend so long with the Spirit of God: who quite diverted the minds of his messengers from David, by inspiring them with Divine thoughts.

Ver. 22. Then went he also unto Ramah.] Not out of devotion, but to destroy David.

And came to a great well that is in Sechu.] Where company commonly was to fetch water.

And he asked and said, Where are Samuel and David? And they answered and said, Behold, they be at Naioth in Ramah.] It is a probable opinion of Conrad. Pellicanus, that Naioth signifies the habitation or college where the prophets dwelt in Ramah.

Ver. 23. And he went thither to Naioth in Ramah.] He directed his way towards that place.

And the Spirit of the Lord came upon him also, and he went on prophesying until he came to Naioth in Ramah.] His messengers did not prophesy till they came thither; but God inspired Saul as he was on the way unto that place. So that from Sechu, I suppose, till he came there, his evil spirit was gone, and he praised God as the prophets did. This was to convince him, that he laboured in a vain pursuit after David, whom the Spirit of God powerfully defended.

Ver. 24. And he stripped off his clothes also.] His royal robes (as R. Solomon and other Jewish doctors expound it), appearing like an ordinary man; or perhaps in the prophetical habit. Or it may be meant only of his upper garment, whatsoever it was. For when the Germans are said by some to have appeared naked, Tacitus interprets it, "rejecta veste superiore," throwing off their upper garment. But the first I take to be the truest account; and, as Procopius Gazæus here notes, "Habitus ille regni ablationem significabat;" this throwing off his royal habit signifies the taking away his kingdom from him.

And prophesied before Samuel in like manner.] This seems to denote, that his messengers had also stripped themselves when they prophesied. And Abarbinel will have it, that they all still foretold the crown should be set upon the head of David.

And lay down naked all that day, and all that night.] As a man in an ecstacy, that had not the use of his senses. But by naked is meant only, as before, stripped of his royal robe.

Wherefore they say, Is Saul also among the prophets?] This gave occasion to renew the proverbial saying, which had been in use long before. (See x. 12.)

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. AND David fled from Naioth in Ramah, and came and said before Jonathan.] By Saul's being thrown into a trance (mentioned in the verse beforegoing), God's providence gave David time to escape; and he went from thence to Gibeah, where Jonathan was.

What have I done? and what is mine iniquity? and what is my sin before thy father, that he seeketh my life?] Such violent and unwearied persecution must arise from some extraordinary cause or other; which he desires to know: for he could not accuse himself of any kind of fault, that should embitter Saul against him.

Ver. 2. And he said, God forbid; thou shalt not die.] He would have him think there was no such danger as he suspected.

Behold, my father will do nothing, either great or small, but he will shew it me; and why should my father hide this from me? it is not so.] These words signify that Jonathan knew nothing of his father's design; and that he had sent the messengers forenamed, without his privity, to seize David. Yet it is strange he should not know of his sending to his house to apprehend him. Therefore some think Jonathan, out of dutiful affection to his father, dissembled the matter: and would not have David think him so very wicked as he was.

Ver. 3. And David sware moreover, and said.] That it was certainly so.

Thy father certainly knoweth that I have found grace in thine eyes, and he saith, Let not Jonathan know this, lest he be grieved.] He was willing to believe that Saul might conceal his intentions from Jonathan; for the reason here mentioned.

But truly, as the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, there is but a step between me and death.] But by a most solemn oath he endeavours to persuade him that he was in extreme danger of losing his life.

Ver. 4. Then said Jonathan to David, Whatsoever thy soul desireth, I will even do it for thee.] Both to find out Saul's intentions, and to save David's life.

Ver. 5. And David said unto Jonathan, To-morrow is the new moon, and I should not fail to sit with the king at meat.] There were solemn sacrifices every new moon, and then a feast upon them. And David being one of the king's family, by marrying his daughter, used to eat with them at these festival times: and he thought it possible that Saul, who lately pursued him in a fit of rage, when the evil spirit was upon him, might now be mitigated by the Spirit of God coming upon him at Naioth: and so might inquire after him, and receive him into favour again, as he had formerly done. But he durst not trust to this opinion, till he had tried his mind and affection to him, after the manner here propounded.

But let me go, that I may hide myself in the field.] He desires, with his approbation, to retire to his father's house, and the field thereabouts, with which he was well acquainted.

Till the third day at even.] That is, till the next day but one after the new moon, as appears from ver. 27. 35.

Ver. 6. If thy father at all miss me, then say, David earnestly asked leave of me that he might run to Beth-lehem, his city: for there is a yearly sacrifice there for all the family.] It is likely this was a custom among pious families to meet together once a year, and praise God for his mercies towards them all.

Ver. 7. If he say thus, It is well; thy servant shall have peace: but if he be very wroth, then be sure that evil is determined by him.] If he approved of Jonathan's licence, he might hope he was pacified: but if he still stormed and raged, he might probably conclude his destruction was decreed; and that his hatred continued so implacably, that he must be forced to leave his country.

Ver. 8. Therefore thou shalt deal kindly with thy servant.] In giving him a faithful account how he found his father disposed towards him.

For thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the Lord with thee.] It was Jonathan's motion, that they should make a solemn covenant before God (who is the avenger of all falseness) of mutual friendship, (xviii. 3.)

Notwithstanding, if there be in me iniquity, slay me thyself; for why shouldest thou bring me to thy father?] A marvellous assurance of his integrity, which made him freely offer himself to die, without troubling his father any further, if he knew any guilt in him.

Ver. 9. And Jonathan said, Far be it from thee.] Do not speak after this manner.

For if I knew certainly that evil was determined by my father to come upon thee, then would not I tell thee?] He disclaims all thoughts either of killing him himself, or letting him fall into the hands of his father, if he could prevent it. For who could imagine a man so solemnly engaged, and who had already shewn himself such a faithful friend, would not discover any design he knew against him?

Ver. 10. And David said, Who shall tell me?] He desired to know who should bring him advice how matters stood.

And what if thy father answer thee roughly?] And not suffer thee to come to me thyself.

Ver. 11. And Jonathan said unto David, Come, let us go into the field. And they went both of them into the field.] To take their measures about this matter.

Ver. 12. And Jonathan said unto David, O Lord God of Israel, when I have sounded my father any time to-morrow, or the third day, and, behold, if there be good towards David, and I then send not unto thee, and shew it thee.] The first words seem to be an exclamation: and the rest, as if he had said, Shall I who love thee so much, be thought capable of breaking my word with thee? All these verses are full of passion; and the words are broken, concise, and interrupt: as the words of lovers are wont to be, especially when they are disturbed.

Ver. 13. The Lord do so, and much more to Jonathan: but if it please my father to do thee evil, then I will shew it thee, and send thee away, that thou mayest go in peace; and the Lord be with thee, as he hath been with my father.] In this case he advises him to get away, and preserve himself as well as he could: praying God to make him as successful as his father had been; and bring him to the kingdom.

Ver. 14. And thou shalt not only, while I yet live, shew me the kindness of the Lord.] The kindness promised him before the Lord, or the greatest kindness. The words in the Hebrew run plainly thus, And wilt thou not, if I be then alive (viz. when God had advanced him to the throne, as he did his father) wilt thou not shew me the loving-kindness of the Lord? He made no doubt, but rather strongly affirmed his belief of it.

That I die not.] After the manner of those kings, who were wont to cut off the children of their predecessors: unto whose throne they were advanced.

Ver. 15. But also thou shalt not cut off thy kindness from my house for ever.] The covenant they had made was not merely personal, but reached to their posterity.

No, not when the Lord hath cut off the enemies of David, every one from the face of the earth.] When he had the greatest power, and none to oppose his will.

Ver. 16. So Jonathan made a covenant with the house of David, saying, Let the Lord even requite it at the hand of David's enemies.] They had made a league of personal friendship, a little after the slaughter of Goliath: and now they make a friendship between their families; and Jonathan wished that God would requite it, if any of his family proved David's enemies. This he renewed afterward, and added further articles to the league, that Jonathan should be next to himself, (xxiii. 18.)

Ver. 17. And Jonathan caused David to swear again, because he loved him.] Or he made him swear again by the love he bare to him.

For he loved him as he loved his own soul.] The greatness of his love to him made him think he could never do enough to secure his friendship to all generations.

Ver. 18. Then Jonathan said unto David, To-morrow is the new moon; and thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty.] The place where he used to sit with Saul at table.

Ver. 19. And when thou hast stayed three days, then thou shalt go down quickly.] It is commonly interpreted, of staying so long with his kindred at Beth-lehem, or some other place of retirement. But in the Hebrew the words are, thou shalt three times (or three days) go down to a very low place: and the meaning seems to be, that if Jonathan did not come the first day, he should take it for granted he knew nothing; and come again the second; and if he brought him no news then, come the third.

And come to the place where thou didst hide thyself when the business was in hand.] When they were discoursing of this very matter; how to discover Saul's affection towards David. Or, when he did David's business with his father, and interceded so effectually for him, that Saul promised not to kill him.

And thou shalt remain by the stone Ezel.] It is thought to be a stone that shewed men their way, where several roads met: because the word imports going or travelling.

Ver. 20. And I will shoot three arrows, as though I shot at a mark.] For when he came there might be passengers going to and fro: which would deprive them of the privacy they desired. Therefore this seems to have been given as a sign that the coast was clear.

Ver. 21. And, behold, I will send a lad, saying, Go find out the arrows. If I expressly say to the lad, Behold, the arrows are on this side of thee, take them; then come thou: for there is peace to thee, and no hurt, as the Lord liveth.] So that he might securely appear, and shew himself.

Ver. 22. But if I say thus unto the young man, Behold, the arrows are beyond thee; go thy way: for the Lord hath sent thee away.] He would not have him venture to discover himself; but look upon this as a sign that God would not have him appear at court.

Ver. 23. And as touching the matter that thou and I have spoken of, behold, the Lord is between thee and me for ever.] As a witness, and an avenger, if we keep not the covenant we have made of perpetual friendship.

Ver. 24. So David hid himself in the field: and when the new moon was come, the king sat him down to eat meat.] He did not immediately hide himself in the field, but when the time came that he had appointed: for he first went to Beth-lehem, (ver. 6. 28.)

Ver. 25. And the king sat upon his seat, as at other times, even upon a seat by the wall.] The Israelites sat at meat (as did the Greeks and Romans in aftertimes) in a half round, or circle: which they called sigma, from the ancient figure of that letter, which was thus, ς. Now the middle place, in this fashion of sitting, was most honourable among this people, as our Mr. Thorndike gathers from this very place. Upon which R. Solomon saith, "Saul sat in the head of the couch next the wall." For supposing them to sit in a round, or half circle, as the manner always was, we must needs conceive that the back or middle of this half circle must be towards the wall, for all conveniences. (See his Religious Assemblies, p. 62.) It may be also here observed, that the custom of lying along, leaning on their elbows, was not yet introduced, in these ancient times; but they sat at meat as we do. (See Bochartus, Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 5. p. 598.)

And Jonathan arose.] When his father came into the room: and after Saul had taken his place, it is likely, sat on his right hand.

And Abner sat by Saul's side.] On his left hand, I suppose, being his cousin, and the general of his army.

And David's place was empty.] Which, it is probable, was next to Abner's.

Ver. 26. Nevertheless Saul spake not any thing that day.] Made no inquiry after David.

For he thought, Something hath befallen him, he is not clean; surely he is not clean.] What this mikrah or accident signifies, which we translate something hath befallen him, see upon Lev. xv. 16.

Ver. 27. And it came to pass on the morrow, which was the second day of the month, that David's place was empty: and Saul said unto Jonathan his son, Wherefore cometh not the son of Jesse.] His calling him the son of Jesse argued both scorn and displeasure against him.

To meat, neither yesterday nor to-day?] By this it appears, the Jews anciently observed two days, in the beginning of every month, with festival joy. The reason was, because the new moon being proclaimed according to its appearance, and it appearing unequally, sometimes in the afternoon, sometimes in the evening, sometimes at midnight, therefore they observed two days, as Scaliger and others have observed. And they who were not clean the first day, might observe the second: for that sort of uncleanness here spoken of lasted but one day.

Ver. 28. And Jonathan answered Saul, David earnestly asked leave of me to go to Beth-lehem.] Which he, being next to the king, had power, I suppose, to grant: as appears, from his demanding of Jonathan an account what was become of him.

Ver. 29. And he said, Let me go, I pray thee; for my family hath a sacrifice in the city; and my brother, he hath commanded me to be there.] The eldest brother let all the rest know that their company was expected.

Now, if I have found grace in thine eyes, let me go away, I pray thee, and see my brethren: therefore he cometh not to the king's table.] He expresses in many words, the great importunity of David for leave to go and visit his relations: which he thought might make the king not take it ill that he had granted it.

Ver. 30. And Saul's anger was kindled against Jonathan, and he said unto him, Thou son of a perverse rebellious woman.] Or, as it is in the Hebrew, thou son of perverse rebellion. That is, a very perverse rebel.

Do not I know that thou hast chosen the son of Jesse to thy own confusion.] Made him his friend, to his utter undoing.

And unto the confusion of thy mother's nakedness?] For the world would think that he was none of his son; because he loved him entirely, whom Saul hated extremely.

Ver. 31. For as long as the son of Jesse liveth upon the ground, thou shalt not be established, nor thy kingdom.] He was fully satisfied that David, if he lived, would be king of Israel. Which, if he knew by Samuel's anointing him, it was madness to imagine that he should be able to overthrow the counsel of God.

Wherefore now fetch him to me; for he shall surely die.] He could not expect to be obeyed, since his son loved him so much: but his fury made him lay this command upon him.

Ver. 32. And Jonathan answered Saul his father, Wherefore should he be slain? what hath he done?] He declines his command, by desiring to know what his guilt was.

Ver. 33. And Saul cast a javelin at him to smite him.] It is not said, as it is of David, xix. 10. to smite him to the wall: and therefore some think he intended only to wound him, not to kill him: but the word smite, in Scripture, commonly signifies to kill, and there is no reason to take it otherwise here: Saul's fury being so great, that he minded not what he did. One would think that he used a javelin or lance as a sceptre: for it was always ready at hand.

Wherefore Jonathan knew that it was determined of his father to slay David.] That it was his unalterable resolution. Which is implied in that phrase, (ver. 31.) he is the son of death, as Constantine L'Empereur observes upon Bava-kama, p. 90.

Ver. 34. So Jonathan rose from the table in fierce anger, and did eat no meat the second day of the month: for he was grieved for David, because his father had done him shame.] Here are two reasons why he fasted: first, because he was extremely afflicted for David; and, secondly, his father had put Jonathan to shame, by his foul language, and by throwing a javelin at him: for so the words run clearly in the Hebrew; for he was grieved for David, and because, &c. the copulative and being wanting, as in many other places.

Ver. 35. And it came to pass in the morning.] Of the third day.

That Jonathan went out into the field at the time appointed with David, and a little lad with him.] According to their agreement, (ver. 20, 21.)

Ver. 36. And he said to the lad, Run, find out the arrows which I shoot. And as the lad ran, he shot an arrow beyond him.] Which was the sign given to David of Saul's ill intentions, (ver. 22.)

Ver. 37. And when the lad was come to the place of the arrow which Jonathan had shot, Jonathan cried after the lad, Is not the arrow beyond thee?] He cried so loud, I suppose, that David might hear him what he said.

Ver. 38. And Jonathan cried after the lad, Make speed, stay not.] So desirous he was to be alone with David.

And Jonathan's lad gathered up the arrows, and came to his master.

Ver. 39. And the lad knew not any thing; only Jonathan and David knew the matter.] The meaning of all this.

Ver. 40. And Jonathan gave his artillery to the lad, and said unto him, Go, carry them into the city.] That he might be left alone with David.

Ver. 41. And as soon as the lad was gone, David arose out of a place towards the south.] On the south of the stone Ezel: on the north side of which Jonathan shot his arrows, that the lad might not chance to stumble upon David.

And fell on his face to the ground, and bowed himself three times.] After three bows, he fell on his face; out of reverence to him, as the king's son, and his excellent friend. Arrianus saith, (lib. iv.) that this prostration was introduced by Cyrus: but he is confuted by this action of David; which shews it to have been a far more ancient posture.

And they kissed one another, and wept one with another, until David exceeded.] Being to become an exile from his friend, from his wife, from his kindred, and the people of God; and from all sacred solemnities.

Ver. 42. And Jonathan said to David, Go in peace, forasmuch as we have sworn both of us in the name of the Lord, saying, The Lord be between me and thee, and between my seed and thy seed for ever.] As much as to say, doubt not that I will faithfully keep my covenant with thee; as I doubt not of thy perpetual steadfastness in it, when I am dead. And this must be our satisfaction, in this sad separation.

And he arose and departed.] That is, David left Jonathan.

And Jonathan went into the city.] I suppose their discourse continued but a short time; for fear of being discovered.

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. THEN came David to Nob.] It is hard to tell where this city was; for it is not reckoned among the cities of the priests, either in the tribe of Judah, or of Benjamin, or of any other. But D. Kimchi saith, his father took it for Jerusalem; and perhaps it was near to it: where the tabernacle being fixed, the priests resorted thither in great numbers, and settled there. In Neh. xi. 32. we find mention of a city of this name, in the tribe of Benjamin: whither Saul, perhaps, brought the tabernacle, being his own tribe.

Unto Ahimelech the priest.] Intending here to commend himself and his cause to God; and to beg his direction and protection. Ahimelech is no where called the high-priest, but always Ahimelech the priest, or simply the priest: (ver. 4—6. 9.) yet, being the son of Ahitub, (xxii. 9. 11.) who was the son of Phinehas, the son of Eli, he is generally supposed to have been the brother of Ahijah, (mentioned xiv. 3.) and he being dead, to have succeeded him in the high-priesthood.

And Ahimelech was afraid at the meeting of David.] Seeing him alone; and having heard, perhaps, something of the king's displeasure against him.

And said unto him, Why art thou alone, and no man with thee?] A man of David's quality, he knew, never went without attendants. And the truth is, David had some persons with him, as the fourth verse tells us, and appears from our Saviour's words (in the second of St. Mark), where he mentions "David and those that were with him." But he had no such persons as used to be his guard; and he left those that were with him at some distance, that Ahimelech might not see them.

Ver. 2. And David said unto Ahimelech the priest, The king hath commanded me a business, and hath said unto me,

Let no man know any thing of the business whereon I send thee, and what I have commanded thee.] We are not from hence to take an example of speaking untruths (as Conradus Pellicanus here glosses), but the wickedness of the world is the more to be deplored, which sometimes puts a necessity upon excellent men to lie, that they may preserve their lives, which cannot be safe without it.

And I have appointed my servants to such and such a place.] Here he acknowledges he had servants with him: but he had disposed them into several places, that the king's business might be the better concealed.

Ver. 3. Now therefore what is under thy hand?] He desires to know what he was able to do for him, to supply his wants.

Give me five loaves of bread in my hand.] Particularly he desires to satisfy his hunger, and enough for his servants.

Or what there is present.] That is, any other victuals.

Ver. 4. And the priest answered, There is no common bread under my hand; but there is hallowed bread, if the young men have kept themselves at least from women.] It was the ancient custom among other nations, for the priests to keep themselves even from the lawful use of women, before they performed their office: as Porphyry informs us, lib. iv. Περὶ Ἀποχῆς, sect. 7. Therefore Ahimelech requires this of David's soldiers, or companions, that being to eat of the holy bread, which none but priests might eat, they should eat it with the same purity, which was required of the priests.

Ver. 5. And David answered the priest, and said unto him, Of a truth women have been kept from us about these three days, since I came out.] As many days as the Lord himself required for the sanctifying of the people, when he appeared on Mount Sinai, at the giving of the law, (Exod. xix. 15.)

And the vessels of the young men.] That is, their bodies: so the word keli here signifies, as σκεῦος doth in 1 Tim. iv. 4.

Are holy.] That is, separated from women.

And the bread is in a manner common.] He adds, that he need not scruple to give them the hallowed bread; for it was not so holy as when it was upon the table of the Lord: but became, in a manner, or in some part, common bread; being now the food not only of the priest, but of his whole family.

Yea, though it were sanctified this day in the vessel.] The marginal translation is more plain, especially when there was other that day sanctified in the vessel. He means, new bread was set upon the table of the Lord: so that no wrong was done to him. By the vessel is meant the dish on which the bread was placed, mentioned Exod. xxv. 29.

Ver. 6. So the priest gave him hallowed bread; for there was no bread there but the shew-bread that was taken from before the Lord, to put hot bread in the day that it was taken away.] In this neither Ahimelech nor David committed any sin: for invincible necessity dispensed with all these ritual laws; as the Jews themselves confess. Particularly R. Levi, who saith, in a great famine they might eat an ass's head, which was an unclean creature. And they justify this by the words of the law, (Lev. xviii. 5.) he shall live in them, not, He shall die in them. From whence they gather, that in danger of life such laws were not to be observed. And so Procopius Gazæus observes, that wise men among the ancient people of God, had less regard to these bodily precepts of the law: and that Abiathar, in granting leave to David and his men to eat of the pontifical bread, plusquam vulgus sapiebat, was much wiser than the vulgar people. He calls him Abiathar, not Ahimelech, who granted this indulgence; for so doth our blessed Saviour, Mark ii. 26. and there is a learned friend of mine, who hath a Dissertation ready for the press, to prove that Abiathar was at this time high-priest. Though it is commonly thought he was only the sagan, as the Jews in later times call him who was the high-priest's vicar: and upon that account was a secondary high-priest; though that name of high-priest did not belong to Abiathar in the highest sense. And besides this, there is no incongruity in saying, that was done in the days of Abiathar the high-priest (as our Saviour speaks), which was done in Abiathar's days, though done somewhat before he came to the high-priesthood. As things may be said to have been done in the days of Henry VIII. or any other king of England, which came to pass before he began to reign.

Ver. 7. Now, a certain man of the servants of Saul was there that day, detained before the Lord.] It is not to be imagined that he was detained here by force and constraint: but by some vow he had upon him; or other religious performance, to which he had obliged himself.

And his name was Doeg, an Edomite.] His native country was Edom: but he was proselyted to the Jewish religion.

The chiefest of the herdsmen that belonged unto Saul.] The Hebrew word abir signifies a potent man, or prince; and is sometimes attributed to God. And therefore here signifies, that he was set over all the herdsmen, as their inspector and governor. Such there were in Syria, as Bochartus observes, out of Diodorus Siculus; who mentions one that was προεστὼς τῶν βασιλικῶν κτηνῶν, pecoris regii præfectus. And so the Targum, and Kimchi, and others, here translate it.

Ver. 8. And David said unto Ahimelech, Is there not here under thy hand either spear or sword? for I have not brought my sword nor any weapon with me.] He left them all behind, that he might the better conceal himself, and pass for a private man.

Because the king's business required haste.] But he pretended to Ahimelech, it was because he had not time to go to his house: the king pressing him immediately to be gone about his business.

Ver. 9. And the priest said, The sword of Goliath the Philistine, whom thou slewest in the valley of Elah, behold, it is here wrapped in a cloth behind the ephod.] Behind the place where the garments of the priests were laid up: of which the ephod and its appurtenances were the chief.

If thou wilt take that, take it; for there is no other save that here. And David said, There is none like unto that; give it me.] Which he thought he might use, though it had been laid up in God's treasury as a monument of his wonderful mercy: because he was in great necessity to provide for his own defence.

Ver. 10. And David arose, and fled that day for fear of Saul.] Out of the country of Israel.

And went to Achish the king of Gath.] A miserable condition! to be forced to flee to those for protection, who, he had reason to think, were his bitter enemies. For this was the city of Goliath whom he had slain, and whose sword he had now about him. But perhaps he thought he should not be known; or he knew Achish to be a very generous person; or being now in disgrace with Saul, he thought the Philistines might take him for Saul's enemy, and engage with them against him. Thus Themistocles being banished his own country, fled first to Admetus the king of the Molossians, with whom he had been at enmity, and then to the king of Persia.

Ver. 11. And the servants of Achish said unto him, Is not this David the king of the land?] Either they meant a chief commander in Israel, who was respected as the king: or they had heard of his being designed to be king instead of Saul, which made him persecute him.

Did they not sing of him one to another in dances, saying, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands?] By this it appears they had good information of what was done in the land of Israel: and so might know what was reported, that Samuel had anointed him to be their king.

Ver. 12. And David laid up these words in his heart, and was sore afraid of Achish king of Gath.] This discourse deeply affected him, and made him think himself not safe there.

Ver. 13. And he changed his behaviour before them, and feigned himself mad in their hands, and scrabbled on the doors of the gates, and let the spittle fall down upon his beard.] He counterfeited himself to be out of his wits, or to be a fool, who never had any. For he wrote upon the gates, and slavered, as fools are wont to do.

Ver. 14. And Achish said unto his servant, Lo, the man is mad, wherefore have ye brought him unto me?] Some of the courtiers had presented him unto the king: who seeing him a goodly person, had listed him, perhaps, as an officer in his service.

Ver. 15. Have I need of madmen that ye have brought this fellow to play the madman in my presence? shall this fellow come into my house?] He would not have his court troubled with fools or madmen. For it is likely he did not believe this to be David; or if he was, he was now become good for nothing: and come out of his own country because he was beside himself.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. DAVID therefore departed thence, and escaped to the cave of Adullam.] Which was a strong hold (1 Chron. xi. 13.) in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 35.) unto which tribe he belonging, might hope to find some friends there.

And when his brethren and all his father's house heard it, they went down thither to him.] Either to comfort him, or to secure themselves from the fury of Saul: who they thought might probably wreak his hatred to David upon them.

Ver. 2. And every one that was in distress.] All needy people, pinched with want, who heard that David was there.

And every one that was in debt.] Perhaps David might not know they were such persons: or if he did, intended not to protect them from their creditors, if they had been able to pay them. It was the manner in ancient times, among the Gauls, for those who were in debt or oppressed, to betake themselves to the service of some great men: by whom, as they were maintained, so they devoted themselves to live and die with them. Thus Cæsar tells us, lib. vi. de Bello Gall. cap. 13. "Plerique cum aut ære alieno aut magnitudine tributorum, aut injuria potentiorum premantur, sese in servitutem dicant nobilibus," &c. And these they called Soldurii: and the men that came to David seem to have been such as resolved to live and die with him.

And every one that was discontented.] In the Hebrew, bitter of soul; that is, lay under sore afflictions.

Gathered themselves unto him; and he became a captain over them.] They listed themselves under him, as their commander: who was forced to take this course in his own defence, that he might not be suddenly surprised. But Grotius observes, (lib. i. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 6.) that David did not entertain these men into his service, till, in the judgment of Jonathan, and by many other certain arguments, his life appeared to be in imminent danger. And then he neither assaulted any city, nor sought for any occasion to fight: but avoided it, by seeking for lurking-places, sometimes in the deserts, sometimes among strange people: always taking care not to hurt his countrymen.

And there were with him about four hundred men.] Among whom, I suppose, his own kindred were the chief.

Ver. 3. And David went thence to Mizpeh of Moab.] For the Moabites were at difference with Saul, (xiv. 47.)

And he said unto the king of Moab, Let my father and my mother, I pray thee, come forth, and be with you.] He the rather hoped for this kindness to be shewn to his aged parents (who were not able to travel up and down, as he was likely to do), because he was descended from a Moabite by the mother's side, especially if Ruth the Moabitess were of the royal family, as the Jews imagine.

Till I know what God will do with me.] Who, he doubted not, would make good his word to him.

Ver. 4. And he brought them before the king of Moab; and they dwelt with him all the time that David was in the hold.] All the time of his exile: when he wandered here and there, and had no certain place of abode: being haunted by Saul from place to place; seldom suffering him to rest. So Pellicanus expounds the Hebrew word metzudah: which signifies also a strong hold.

Ver. 5. And the prophet Gad.] Who being bred under Samuel, and knowing he had anointed David to be king, resolved to accompany him in his banishment: which was a great comfort to him.

Said unto David, Abide not in the hold.] This doth not signify any particular strong place, where he now was: but, in general, all those places where he thought himself secure, in the neighbouring countries.

Depart, and get thee into the land of Judah.] Where he would have him publicly appear; as one that confided in God, and in his own innocence.

Then David departed, and came into the forest of Hareth.] Where there were many secret lurking-places: unto which he might upon occasion resort.

Ver. 6. And when Saul heard that David was discovered, and the men that were with him.] He was not so well beloved, as to have early intelligence of David's listing men: which made him reproach those that attended him, in the following verse.

(Now Saul abode in Gibeah under a tree in Ramah.] Or, in a high place, as Ramah signifies. Otherwise the first words must be interpreted near Gibeah, or in the territories of Gibeah.

Having his spear in his hand.] By his spear is to be understood his sceptre, according to the phrase of those times. For so Justin, (lib. xliii. cap. 3.) speaking of the first times of the Romans (which was about the reign of Saul), saith, "Per ea adhuc tempora, reges hastas pro diademate habebant, quas Græci sceptra dixere," &c. In those days, kings hitherto had spears as signs of royal authority: which the Greeks call sceptres. For in the beginning of things, the ancients worshipped spears for immortal gods. In memory of which religion, spears are still added to the images of the gods. And thus the kings of Argos (as Pausanias tells us in his Bœotica) called their sceptres spears.

And all his servants were standing about him).] His usual guards, and the principal officers of his court.

Ver. 7. Then Saul said unto his servants that stood about him, Hear now, ye Benjamites.] Ye men of my own tribe: of whom he seems to speak with disdain.

Will the son of Jesse give every one of you fields and vineyards, and make you all captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds?] Bestow preferment upon them all, more or less; if not lands of inheritance. For so the words are to be translated, give you fields, &c. or make you captains, &c.

Ver. 8. That all of you have conspired against me.] To conceal David's designs from him, if not to assist him in them. The spirit of jealousy always possesses those who are engaged in such bloody designs as he had against David: which all good men abhorred.

And there is none of you that sheweth me my son hath made a league with the son of Jesse; and there is none of you that is sorry for me.] He suspected Jonathan had made a league with David; but did not certainly know it, much less what it was: and was very much vexed, that none were solicitous enough for him (so the word signifies, as De Dieu observes, which we translate sorry for him), to make a discovery of it to him.

Or sheweth me that my son hath stirred up my servant against me, to lie in wait as at this day.] His jealousy carried him so far as to make him suspect Jonathan not only sided with David, but had encouraged him to take up arms, and to appear openly, as having many friends and partakers: for since he threw the javelin at Jonathan, it is likely he absented himself from court, or did not appear so frequently, or looked discontented when he came into his presence.

Ver. 9. Then answered Doeg the Edomite, which was over the servants of Saul.] The rest being silent, he undertook to inform the king who were false to him: or being a forward man, and hating David, prevented all the rest of his fellow-servants.

And said, I saw the son of Jesse.] He speaks as contemptibly of him, as his master had lately been wont to do, not vouchsafing to call him by his name, (xx. 27. 30.)

Coming to Nob, to Ahimelech the son of Ahitub.] He represents him, as if he came to take advice of Ahimelech, and lay his designs accordingly.

Ver. 10. And he inquired of the Lord for him.] Some think Doeg in this slandered Ahimelech, because we read nothing of it; and David speaks of his false tongue: but this may as well be true as that which follows is. And Doeg's wickedness consisted in representing things wrong: concealing the truth, and saying nothing of David's pretences to Ahimelech; but insinuating as if he were in a plot with David against the king. Whereas, the good man was made to believe that David was going about the king's business, and upon that account assisted him.

And gave him victuals, and gave him the sword of Goliath the Philistine.] And very innocently, as he very well knew: but represented these as acts whereby he abetted David in his conspiracy: which are the lies of which David accuses him, nothing being farther from the truth.

Ver. 11. And the king sent to call Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub, and all his father's house, the priests that were in Nob: and they came all of them to the king.] By his father's house is meant all the house of Eli, whom God had threatened to cut off.

Ver. 12. And Saul said, Hear now, thou son of Ahitub.] He shews not the least respect to him, but rather the utmost contempt: calling him in his rage the son of Ahitub.

And he answered, Here I am, my lord.] But he did not forget his respect to the king.

Ver. 13. And Saul said unto him, Why have ye conspired against me, thou and the son of Jesse, in that thou hast given him bread, and a sword, and hast inquired of God for him, that he should rise against me, to lie in wait, as at this day?] A very rash charge, unless there had been proof that he did these things with an evil intent, which there was not.

Ver. 14. Then Ahimelech answered and said, And who is so faithful among all thy servants as David, which is the king's son-in-law, and goeth at thy bidding, and is honourable in thy house?] The oracle was consulted only upon public occasions, not for any private business. And therefore the sense of Ahimelech's apology for himself is this: Since David was held by all to be a most loyal subject, as well as a person of great honour, and in high favour with the king, having married his daughter; what could he think but that David was sent by the king (as he said he was) upon some business of public concern; to command his forces, suppose (as he had often done), in some expedition against his enemies? And, doubting what course to take, came to advise with God, as he had done heretofore. For this was not the first time (as he saith in the next verse) that he had consulted the Divine Majesty for him, in difficult cases, concerning the good of the kingdom.

Ver. 15. Did I then begin to inquire of God for him?] He desired that might not be an argument against him; for he had theretofore done the same thing without any imputation of guilt.

Be it far from me.] That which he was charged withal; conspiracy against the king, (ver. 13.)

Let not the king impute any thing to his servant, or to his father's house; for thy servant knew nothing of all this, more or less.] If there was any bad design, he pleads perfect ignorance of it.

Ver. 16. And the king said unto him, Thou shalt surely die, Ahimelech, thou, and thy father's house.] A mad resolution: for what had the rest of the priests done to deserve such a bloody execution?

Ver. 17. And the king said unto the footmen that stood about him.] In the Hebrew it is, to the runners; that is, to those who used to go before him, and to follow him when he went abroad.

Turn, and slay the priests of the Lord; because their hand is also with David, and because they knew when he fled, and did not shew it me.] Such was the power their kings exercised (as Samuel told them they would), that, without a formal process against a man accused of a crime, they commanded him to be cut off at their pleasure.

But the servants of the king would not put forth their hand to fall upon the priests of the Lord.] Such was their reverence to God and religion in ancient times: which kept them in their wars from doing any hurt to the priests of their enemies, as Grotius observes, lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 11. sect. 10. And therefore Theodoret here justly praises the guards of Saul, that they chose rather to expose themselves to the enraged fury of Saul, than execute it upon the priests of God.

Ver. 18. And the king said to Doeg, Turn thou, and fall upon the priests.] He who was the informer, he made also his executioner.

And Doeg the Edomite turned, and fell upon the priests, and slew that day eighty-five persons.] Kings never want some to execute their commands, though never so bloody. Saul was little better than a madman; and yet had those at his beck who would do as he bade them, because he was their king. It was excellently, therefore, said by Justin Martyr, Εὐχώμεθα τοὺς βασιλεῖς καὶ ἄρχοντας, μετὰ τῆς βασιλικῆς δυνάμεως, καὶ σώφρονα τὸν λογισμὸν ἔχοντας εὑρεθῆναι, Let us pray that kings and rulers, together with a royal power, may be found having a sober mind.

That did wear a linen ephod.] i. e. Ministered unto God: but we are not to understand by the ephod such a garment as the high-priest wore, for this is distinguished from that by the matter of it, which was merely linen: and nothing else but a linen robe, which was an honourable kind of garment, which others who were not priests were permitted to wear; as I observed before upon chap. ii. ver. 18. and see Braunius, lib. ii. de Vestitu Hebr. Sacerd. cap. 6.

Ver. 19. And Nob, the city of the priests, smote he with the edge of the sword, both man and woman, and suckling, and oxen, and asses, and sheep, with the edge of the sword.] His fury transported him to deal worse with them than he did with the Amalekites; some of which he spared, though God commanded him to destroy them all. But he did this to terrify all the Israelites from giving the least assistance to David: and make them forward to come and tell him, if they knew where he was. In all this was fulfilled the word of the Lord against the house of Eli by the prophet, in the second chapter of this book; and by Samuel, when he was a child, in the third chapter. Abarbinel thinks, that, at this time, the Gibeonites were slain; upon which account there was a sore famine in the days of David. For Josephus saith, (lib. vi. cap. 14.) that Doeg slew in all three hundred eighty-five persons; taking some men, as wicked as himself, into his assistance.

Ver. 20. And one of the sons of Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub, named Abiathar, escaped, and fled after David.] For he could be safe no where else.

Ver. 21. And Abiathar shewed David that Saul had slain the Lord's priests.] Which confirmed David in his belief of the hatred he bare him, and his resolution to destroy him.

Ver. 22. And David said unto Abiathar, I knew it that day, when Doeg the Edomite was there, that he would surely tell Saul.] For he knew he was none of his friend, and a man that loved mischief.

Ver. 23. Abide thou with me; fear not: for he that seeketh my life seeketh thy life.] He comforts him with the assurance, that he would take as much care of him, as of himself.

But with me thou shalt be in safeguard.] For he was sure God would make good his promise of protecting him, till he was made king of Israel.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. THEN they told David, saying, The Philistines fight against Keilah.] Or, they had told David, &c. For this was done before Abiathar came to him to tell him of the slaughter of the priests, ver. 6. where it is said, he fled to David to Keilah. Which was a city in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 44.) Which the Philistines now besieged; being encouraged thereunto, perhaps, by the news they heard that David was forced to flee his country.

And they rob the thrashing-floors.] Which was commonly without their cities; for the convenience of wind, to separate the chaff from the corn. (See Ruth iii. 2. 15.)

Ver. 2. And David inquired of the Lord.] It is probable by the prophet Gad, who we read before, xxii. 5. was now with him. For there is no mention yet of Abiathar's having the ephod; though some think it is mentioned, ver. 6. to shew how David inquired of God.

Shall I go and smite these Philistines? And the Lord said unto David, Go and smite the Philistines, and save Keilah.] A remarkable instance of David's love to his country: unto which he did not become an enemy, when he was banished from it.

Ver. 3. And David's men said unto him, Behold, we be afraid here in Judah.] In that part of the country where they then were.

How much more, then, if we come to Keilah, against the armies of the Philistines?] His men argued against this expedition, because they did not think themselves safe in their own country, where they hoped they had some friends: and therefore thought they should be in greater danger, if they made the Philistines their enemies.

Ver. 4. Then David inquired of the Lord yet again.] Not for his own satisfaction, but for theirs: as we read in the history of Gideon that he did.

And the Lord answered him and said, Arise.] Make no delay.

Go down to Keilah; for I will deliver the Philistines into thy hand.] Here he expressly assures him of victory.

Ver. 5. So David and his men went to Keilah, and fought with the Philistines, and brought away their cattle, and smote them with a great slaughter. So David saved the inhabitants of Keilah.] He seems to have pursued the Philistines to their own country: from whence he brought their cattle. Or else we must suppose these cattle were the booty they had among the Israelites; which is not so probable, because then David would have restored them to their owners.

Ver. 6. And it came to pass, that when Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech, fled to David to Keilah, that he came down with an ephod in his hand.] Or rather, with the ephod. For he being left, I suppose, to keep the sanctuary, while his father and the rest of the priests went to wait upon Saul, as soon as he heard of their slaughter, took this principal vestment of the high-priest, viz. the ephod, unto which the urim and thummim, with the breast-plate, were annexed, and carried it unto David. Unto whom he hoped to be the more acceptable, when he appeared capable to serve him in that high office. And accordingly he calls upon him, (ver. 9.) to bring hither the ephod; as he did afterward, (xxx. 7.) But the ephod could do no good, without the urim and thummim, which were inseparable from it. And that he speaks of the high-priest's ephod is manifest, because he doth not call it a linen ephod, such as the priests wore; but the ephod. The only difficulty is, that Saul after this seems to have consulted God by urim, (xxviii. 6.) But perhaps he made a new one, in the room of that which Abiathar carried away: but God would not own it, nor any other way give him advice. Aben Ezra, indeed, here notes, that there wants that which they call the he hajediah, that is, the demonstrative particle he, to shew that he means the high-priest's ephod, and therefore it was only a linen ephod. Which led him into this absurd opinion, that in some cases God answered without urim and thummim; being consulted merely by an ephod.

Ver. 7. And it was told Saul that David was come to Keilah.] So remarkable an action could not but come presently to Saul's ears; who was not at all mollified by it, but rather more resolutely bent upon David's destruction.

And Saul said, God hath delivered him into my hand; for he is shut in, by entering into a town that hath gates and bars.] The men of Keilah could not but open their gates to their deliverer; but Saul fancied that he sought for safety in a place, that would only secure him from running away from him.

Ver. 8. And Saul called all the people together to war.] Raised a great army.

To go down to Keilah, to besiege David and his men.] He pretended, it is likely, he would go, and be avenged of the Philistines: but his inward intention was to go against David.

Ver. 9. And David knew that Saul secretly practised mischief against him.] This intimates that Saul did not openly declare, when he raised his army, he would besiege Keilah; but made a show of some other design.

And he said to Abiathar the priest, Bring hither the ephod.] Which no doubt he put on: otherwise he could not have inquired of the Lord by it.

Ver. 10. Then said David, O Lord God of Israel, thy servant hath certainly heard that Saul seeks to come to Keilah, to destroy the city for my sake.] Some think that David put on the ephod, and then asked the Lord's advice: but that is a great mistake; for the high-priest was the person appointed by God, to ask counsel of him for the supreme governor, (Numb. xxvii. 21.) Therefore David spake these words by the mouth of Abiathar.

Ver. 11. Will the men of Keilah deliver me into his hands? will Saul come down, as thy servant hath heard? O Lord God of Israel, I beseech thee, tell thy servant. And the Lord said, He will come down.] He seems to have been in a great fright, and some confusion of spirit, when he spake these words: which made him not only to ask two things together (which the Jews say was not usual), but also out of due order. For the first question should have been, Will Saul come down? and then the other should have followed, Will they deliver me into his hand? God therefore put him into the right method, by answering to the last question first: as the Jewish doctors observe in the Gemara of the Codex Joma.

Ver. 12. Then said David, Will the men of Keilah deliver me and my men into the hand of Saul?] Hence the Talmudists gather, that he who asked out of order was bound to ask again.

And the Lord said, They will deliver thee.] He saw the base disposition of their hearts, whatsoever gratitude they pretended to David for their deliverance. For that is a rare virtue; not to be found in those in whom self-love prevails. It is not easy to be resolved, how they inquired of God, the tabernacle not being there. It is likely David had some tent, wheresoever he was, wherein he was wont to pray to God, and meditate his praises; and there God was pleased to answer him.

Ver. 13. Then David and his men, which were about six hundred.] His forces were increased two hundred, since the famous victory over the Philistines at Keilah.

Arose, and departed out of Keilah, and went whithersoever they could go.] Sometimes to one place, sometimes to another: according as they found any hope of safety. So Hackspan interprets this phrase in his Disputationes, p. 403.

And it was told Saul that David was escaped from Keilah.] Now he began to have better intelligence of David's motions, since the slaughter at Nob: which made the people afraid to fall under his displeasure.

And he forbore to go forth.] Not knowing as yet where to find him.

Ver. 14. And David abode in the wilderness in strong holds, and remained in a mountain in the wilderness of Ziph.] Where it was not easy to come at him.

And Saul sought him every day; but God delivered him not into his hand.] As he foolishly fancied he would, (ver. 7.) though God very manifestly had forsaken him, and was with David.

Ver. 15. And David saw that Saul was come out to seek his life.] That he was restless in his endeavours to destroy him.

And David was in the wilderness of Ziph in a wood.] Where he could better defend himself than in an open country.

Ver. 16. And Jonathan, Saul's son, arose, and went to David into the wood.] Being a very private place, they had, it is likely, by some intelligence which passed between them, appointed a meeting there.

And strengthened his hand in God.] In his promise to him. What Hecuba saith in Euripides, is most true in this friend of David's, and in Saul his father:

> Ὁ μὲν πονηρὸς οὐδὲν ἄλλο πλὴν κακός·
> Ὁ δ' ἐσθλὸς, ἐσθλός· οὐδὲ συμφορᾶς ὕπο
> Φύσιν διέφθειρ' ἀλλὰ χρηστός ἐστ' ἀεί.

A bad man is nothing else but bad. But a good man is still good: nor because of any calamity doth he lose his nature; but is always good.

Ver. 17. And he said, Fear not; for the hand of Saul my father shall not find thee: and thou shalt be king over Israel, and I will be next unto thee.] He doth not mean, that he would succeed him in his throne; but be the principal person in the kingdom, next to David. Which, I suppose, had been agreed between them.

And that also Saul my father knoweth.] For he remembered what Samuel told him, xv. 28. and by his wonderful successes concluded he was the person of whom Samuel spake.

Ver. 18. And they two made a covenant before the Lord.] Solemnly renewed the covenant, which they had formerly made. This is the third time that we read of their making a covenant. (See xviii. 3. xx. 16.) In none of which there is any mention of a sacrifice, no more than there is in the covenant between David and the elders of the people, (2 Sam. v. 3.) and between Solomon and Hiram; (1 Kings v. 12.) which is an argument that eating together of a sacrifice, or going between the parts of a sacrifice, was not essential to the making a covenant: though it must be acknowledged, the rite was so ancient of dividing the parts of the sacrifice, that hence is the phrase which is so frequent in Scripture of cutting a covenant, i. e. entering into it.

And David abode in the wood, and Jonathan went to his house.] For he did not accompany his father, in his search after David.

Ver. 19. Then came up the Ziphites to Saul to Gibeah, and said, Doth not David hide himself with us in the strong hold in the wood, in the hill of Hachilah, which is on the south of Jeshimon?] These people were of the tribe of Judah; among whom David thought himself the safer, because he was of the same tribe. But they were afraid to be served as those at Nob: which made them come and discover the place where he was, very particularly, and precisely.

Ver. 20. Now therefore, O king, come down, according to all the desire of thy soul to come down.] Which they knew was very great.

And our part shall be to deliver him into the king's hand.] For being neighbours to it, they knew all the avenues of the wood where he was: and how to come at him.

Ver. 21. And Saul said, Blessed are ye of the Lord; for ye have compassion on me.] This signifies, that the generality of people did not favour him in his design: which made him so joyfully receive the Ziphites' intelligence.

Ver. 22. Go, I pray you, and prepare ye.] Dispose all things so, that I may take him.

And know and see his place where his haunt is.] Inform themselves perfectly, in what hill, or wood, or cave, he hid himself.

And who hath seen him.] He would have them certainly informed, that he might not go after him in vain.

For I am told he dealeth very subtilely.] So that it was not easy to catch him.

Ver. 23. See therefore, and take knowledge of all the lurking-places where he hideth himself, and come to me again with the certainty, and I will go with you.] He seems to be very diffident, having been so oft disappointed: and by this means gave David time to get intelligence, and remove to another place.

And it shall come to pass, that if he be in the land, I will search him out through all the thousands of Judah.] Their tribes were divided into thousands; (see Judg. vi. 15.) among some of whom he supposed he would lurk: and he would not cease searching for him till he found him.

Ver. 24. And they arose, and went to Ziph before Saul.] As he had directed them, ver. 22.

But David and his men were in the wilderness of Maon, in the plain on the south of Jeshimon.] Having heard what the Ziphites had undertaken, he disappointed their design, by going into another place, with which, it is likely, they were not so well acquainted. For Maon was a distinct wilderness from Ziph: though both in the tribe of Judah.

Ver. 25. Saul also and his men went to seek him.] Hearing, I suppose, by the Ziphites, whither he was gone.

And they told David.] He also had intelligence brought him, that Saul was coming against him.

Wherefore he came down into a rock.] Some craggy place.

And abode in the wilderness of Maon.] Not thinking himself safe there, he went into another part of the same wilderness.

And when Saul heard that, he pursued after David in the wilderness of Maon.] So that he came to the very place where he was.

Ver. 26. And Saul went on this side of the mountain, and David and his men on that side of the mountain: and David made haste to get away for fear of Saul; for Saul and his men compassed David and his men round about to take them.] Saul's forces being far more numerous, he divided them into several parties; who marching several ways, were about to encompass the whole mountain: so that it should be impossible for David to escape them. Who therefore made haste to get away before he was quite surrounded.

Ver. 27. But there came a messenger unto Saul, saying, Haste thee, and come; for the Philistines have invaded the land.] A marvellous providence of God, who stirred them up at this very time to make an irruption into the land of Israel, for the preservation of David when he was in extreme danger.

Ver. 28. Wherefore Saul returned from following after David, and went against the Philistines.] It was very probable David would in a little time have fallen into his hands, had not the messenger, who, I suppose, was sent by his council, desired him with all speed to come and oppose the Philistines, who were the most dangerous enemies.

Therefore they called the name of that place Sela-hammah-lekoth.] That is, the rock of divisions. Either because Saul was distracted here between two counsels, whether to pursue David, or go immediately against the Philistines; or, because God divided Saul from David, when he was coming up close unto him.

Ver. 29. And David went up from thence, and dwelt in the strong holds at En-gedi.] A place in the tribe of Judah, not far from the Dead Sea: which Solomon in his Song celebrates for the famous vineyards which were there: and St. Jerome and Eusebius say there was excellent balm at En-gedi: from which the wilderness near it took its name, where David found secure lurking-places.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when Saul was returned from following the Philistines.] Who either retreated upon Saul's march towards them, or he drove them out of the land.

That it was told him, saying, Behold, David is in the wilderness of En-gedi.] The very place was not told him where David was, but only in general that he was in that wilderness.

Ver. 2. Then Saul took three thousand chosen men out of all Israel.] Men of valour, and whom he thought he might trust.

And went to seek David and his men upon the rocks of the wild goats.] In craggy and bushy places, where none but wild goats lived; but he imagined David might there skulk: and, therefore, resolved to be at the pains of searching for him there.

Ver. 3. And he came to the sheep-cotes by the way, where there was a cave.] In which the sheep rested in the heat of the day. Unto which place David was directed by God's guidance: for Saul would not suspect that he would abide in the highway unto those rocks, where he was going to look for him.

And Saul went in to cover his feet.] See upon Judg. iii. 24.

And David and his men remained in the sides of the cave.] Where they could see him by the light at the entrance of it: but he could not see them, because it was dark in the remote parts of it. Some of these caves were exceeding large: Strabo in his sixteenth book mentions one that would contain four thousand men.

Ver. 4. And the men of David said unto him, Behold the day of which the Lord said unto thee, Behold, I will deliver thine enemy into thy hand, that thou mayest do to him as it shall seem good unto thee.] We do not read any where that God made a promise to deliver Saul into David's hand: but so they interpreted what Samuel had said, that God would take the kingdom from Saul and give it to David. And they, having a desire to return to their own habitations, and likewise to have preferment under David, desired him to make use of the opportunity which now presented itself of destroying his enemy, and advancing himself.

Then David arose, and cut off the skirt of Saul's robe privately.] Which he might easily do, if he were asleep: as that phrase may be interpreted, he went in to cover his feet. This robe was long, coming down to the feet: as the Hebrew word meil signifies.

Ver. 5. And it came to pass, that afterward David's heart smote him.] He was inwardly troubled.

Because he had cut off Saul's skirt.] For it looked like an indignity unto a prince to have his royal robe disfigured: "Tantam intelligebat personæ illius sanctitudinem" (as Grotius speaks), such he understood was the sacredness of his person. And that very deservedly; for the supreme powers being obnoxious to many men's hatred, ought to be secured in the discharge of their office. Of which the Romans took care in the very tribunes of the people, that they should be ἄσυλοι, inviolable, (lib. i. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 7.)

Ver. 6. And he said unto his men.] When he returned unto them, and they grew angry, he had only cut off the skirt of his robe, and not killed him.

The Lord forbid that I should do this thing.] Which they desired.

Unto my master.] For I must own him, as long as he is alive, to be my lord and master; unto whom I am bound to be faithful.

The Lord's anointed.] Whom God hath appointed to be king as long as he lives.

To stretch forth my hand against him, seeing he is the anointed of the Lord.] Set up by God, who alone could throw him down. For he was as much constituted king by God while he lived, as David was after his death. And his anointing made his person sacred: for the very heathens looked upon their kings as holding the place of God. So Artabanus the Persian (as Plutarch relates in the life of Themistocles), This is the very best of our many excellent laws, Τὸ τιμᾶν βασιλέα καὶ προσκυνεῖν, ὡς εἰκόνα Θεοῦ τὰ πάντα σώζοντος, that we should honour and adore our king, as the image of God, who preserves all things.

Ver. 7. So David stayed his servants with these words, and suffered them not to rise against Saul.] Who still had a desire to kill him, though David would not: which he hindered by his wise and pious persuasions.

But Saul rose up out of the cave, and went his way.] To his camp: which he had left to take some repose in the cave, having a guard to attend him, who stood without while he covered his feet within.

Ver. 8. David also arose afterward.] When Saul was gone.

And went out of the cave, and cried after Saul, saying, My lord the king.] A bold attempt, to adventure to come into the presence of such an enraged enemy. But his innocence and confidence in God emboldened him, especially having so strong an evidence to give him of his integrity.

And when Saul looked behind him, David stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself.] See xx. 41.

Ver. 9. And David said unto Saul, Wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, Behold, David seeketh thy hurt.] He wisely endeavours, at the entrance of his speech, to mollify Saul, by transferring all the blame of his persecution, from him, unto the sycophants and false accusers that were about him.

Ver. 10. Behold, this day thy eyes have seen that the Lord had delivered thee into my hand in the cave.] Out of which he followed Saul.

And some bade me kill thee, but my eye spared thee.] A phrase for taking pity and compassion upon those whom we have in our power to hurt.

And I said, I will not put forth my hand against my lord, for he is the Lord's anointed.] He acknowledgeth him both to be his king, and appointed by God so to be.

Ver. 11. Moreover, my father.] So he was by the marriage of his daughter; and as he was supreme governor, the father of his country. Or if he had not been so, yet this word was proper to be used, that he might soften and sweeten him into more tender usage to him.

See; yea, see the skirt of thy robe in my hand.] He offers him a demonstration of the truth of what he declared: and prays him to observe it.

For in that I cut off the skirt of thy robe, and killed thee not, know thou and see.] Let it convince thee.

That there is neither evil nor transgression in my hand.] That he had no bad design against him, nor ever attempted to do him any harm. For if he had, it had been as easy to cut his throat, as to cut off the skirt of his robe.

And I have not sinned against thee; yet thou huntest my soul to take it.] This was a great aggravation of Saul's guilt (which makes David repeat it), that he sought the life of one who had no way offended him, and when it was in his power would not hurt him.

Ver. 12. The Lord judge between me and thee, and the Lord avenge me of thee.] If he still persisted to persecute him. But he doth not, by these words, avenge me of thee, pray God to punish him for the injuries he had done him; but only to vindicate and deliver him from his violent and unjust persecution. So the Hebrew word nakam often signifies.

But my hand shall not be upon thee.] He persisted in his resolution not to avenge himself; but leave it to God to do him right.

Ver. 13. As saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked; but my hand shall not be upon thee.] Men may be known by their actions. And this is as if David had said, Were I so bad as I am represented, I should now have shewn it: but I will never have my hand in such crimes. Or thus, It is for wicked men to do this: but I am none of them.

Ver. 14. After whom is the king of Israel come out? after whom dost thou pursue?] He turns every stone, as we speak, to appease Saul's rage; and tells him in conclusion, that it was below him, and a disparagement to him to raise armies against such a mean person as he was.

After a dead dog, after a flea?] He represents himself as contemptible as it was possible, that he might convince Saul it was not for his honour to take so much pains to kill him if he could: for what an inglorious thing was it for a king, with so many armed men, to triumph over a dead dog? As if a lion should hunt after a flea. "Which (as Bochartus glosses) if it be sought, is not easily found; and if it be found, is not easily caught; and if it be caught, is a poor prey, especially for a prince."

Ver. 15. The Lord therefore be judge, and judge between me and thee, and plead my cause, and deliver me out of thy hand.] He thought he could not repeat this too often, that as hitherto, so he resolved hereafter to leave it to God to judge which of them was in the right, and not avenge himself. It may seem strange that Saul, who came with such an enraged mind to seek for David, should hear him make so long a speech to him with patience, and not furiously fall upon him as soon as he saw him. But we may well think, that at the first he was surprised to see him follow after him out of the cave; and more astonished to find, after a few words, that it was in David's power to kill him, if he had pleased: which he knew he had, by a long persecution of him, provoked him to do.

Ver. 16. And it came to pass, when David had made an end of speaking these words unto Saul, that Saul said, Is this thy voice, my son David?] Though he stood at such a distance, that it is likely he could not know him by his face, yet he very well knew his voice.

And Saul lifted up his voice, and wept.] His heart being mollified at present, by this unparalleled kindness of David, in sparing his life, when he could have taken it away.

Ver. 17. And he said unto David, Thou art more righteous than I; for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil.] Most men have their good moods. And Saul now could scarce avoid being touched with a deep sense, how very unjust and unkind he had been to one who truly loved him.

Ver. 18. And thou hast shewed this day, how that thou hast dealt with me: forasmuch as, when the Lord had delivered me into thy hand, thou killedst me not.] The demonstration of his kindness was so clear, that he could not but acknowledge it, and be affected with it.

Ver. 19. For if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away?] i. e. He will certainly destroy him to save himself. The kindness of David therefore was unusual, and without example.

Wherefore the Lord reward thee good, for that thou hast done unto me this day.] Herein David had imitated God; who doth good to the evil: from whom Saul prays David might receive his reward for the good done to him.

Ver. 20. And now I know well that thou shalt surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel shall be established in thy hand.] These wonderful providences of God over David, and David's no less wonderful virtue, at last convinced Saul that God designed him to be the king of his people, and that none could hinder his establishment.

Ver. 21. Swear now therefore unto me by the Lord, that thou wilt not cut off my seed after me, and that thou wilt not destroy my name out of my father's house.] As he had endeavoured to destroy David; and as kings frequently destroyed the family of those into whose thrones they were advanced.

Ver. 22. And David sware unto Saul.] Who should rather have sworn unto David, he would suffer him to live quietly; yea, have invited him to return home, and assured him of his protection. But David did not require this: resolving to trust to God, and not to him. Some question how David kept this oath, when he hanged up seven of Saul's sons, (2 Sam. xxi.) But they should consider, that he did not this of himself, but at the desire of the Gibeonites, unto whom God required satisfaction should be given for Saul's bloody endeavours to destroy them.

And Saul went home; but David and his men gat them up unto the hold.] viz. Of En-gedi. For he durst not stay in such an open place as he now was in, knowing Saul's inconstancy, and the hatred he had to him, and the fury he was in when the evil spirit came upon him. It is dangerous to trust a reconciled enemy: and the old saying is very wise, μέμνησο ἀπιστεῖν, remember not to be too credulous. And so the son of Sirach, (Ecclus. xii. 10, 11.) "Never trust thine enemy: though he humble himself, yet take good heed, and beware of him."

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. AND Samuel died.] According to Josephus (lib. vii. latter end) he governed Israel after the death of Eli twelve years, and lived eighteen in the reign of Saul, and then died. But according to Sir J. Marsham, he judged Israel sixteen years before Saul's inauguration; and after he was made king lived eighteen.

And all the Israelites were gathered together, and lamented him.] Such was his virtue, and such was the love the people bare to him, that the whole nation bewailed his loss, and that many days, as Josephus saith, Καὶ ἐπὶ πολλὰς ἡμέρας ἔκλαυσεν.

And buried him in his house at Ramah.] The place where he was born, and had long lived: where, it is likely, there was a place belonging to his house in which his family was interred.

And David arose, and went into the wilderness of Paran.]

Which was in the southern parts of Judea, near to Arabia: into which he might presently flee, if there were occasion. The Mahometan writers (as Hottinger observes) make Paran a part of Arabia Deserta: so that now it was that David dwelt in the tents of Kedar: which was the same with Paran, as our learned Fuller observes in his Miscellanies.

Ver. 2. And there was a man in Maon, whose possessions were in Carmel.] There were two Carmels: one in the north near the sea, in the confines of Asher and Zebulun, to which Elijah was wont to resort; and another in the south near Hebron, in the tribe of Judah, which is here meant. See Josh. xv. 55. both concerning Maon and Carmel.

And the man was very great, and he had three thousand sheep, and a thousand goats.] A very wealthy man.

And he was shearing his sheep in Carmel.] They pulled off the wool at Rome, and in the neighbouring countries (as Bochartus observes), but not in Greece, nor Judea; where they sheared it, as we do now.

Ver. 3. And the name of the man was Nabal, and the name of his wife was Abigail; and she was a woman of great understanding, and of a beautiful countenance: but the man was churlish, and evil in his doings.] Uncharitable, and perhaps oppressive in his dealings.

And he was of the house of Caleb.] Descended from a worthy ancestor, but very unlike him. In the Hebrew the word is Calebi, a Calebite, of the family of Caleb. But the word Caleb signifying a dog, some of the ancient interpreters understand the word here, as if the holy writer insinuated he was of dog-like dispositions and manners. Whence the LXX. translate it, ὁ ἄνθρωπος κυνικὸς, a dogged man, or a cynic. And so the Syriac and Arabic.

Ver. 4. And David heard in the wilderness that Nabal did shear his sheep.] For the wilderness of Paran was not far from Nabal's house.

Ver. 5. And David sent out ten young men.] To shew his great respect to him.

And David said unto the young men, Get ye up to Carmel.] For it was a mountain, as the other Carmel was.

And go to Nabal, and greet him in my name.] Present his service to him, as we now speak; and wish him continued happiness, as it is in the following words.

Ver. 6. And thus shall ye say to him that liveth in prosperity.] In the Hebrew the words are only, to him that liveth: unto which we add in prosperity; because life in Scripture signifies happiness, as death signifies misery.

Peace be both to thee, and peace be unto thy house, and peace to all that thou hast.] A most affectionate and comprehensive salutation; wherein he wishes well to him (both his soul and body), and to his whole family, and to all that he possessed, either at home or abroad: and some think in the first words he wishes all this might be perpetuated as long as he lived. There could not well be a higher compliment, as we now speak; for peace comprehends all manner of blessings, in the holy language.

Ver. 7. And now I have heard that thou hast shearers.] Whom he entertained that day.

Now, thy shepherds which were with us, we hurt them not, neither was there aught missing to them all the while they were in Carmel.] He represents the good demeanour of those who belonged to him, while they were in his neighbourhood. And suggests, that he would not have had so many sheep to shear, if his men had been like others in their condition. But though they were soldiers, and in great necessity, they never took any thing from him.

Ver. 8. Ask thy young men, and they will shew thee.] He desires him to be informed of the truth of this from his own servants.

Wherefore let the young men find favour in thine eyes (for we come in a good day); give, I pray thee, whatsoever cometh unto thy hand unto thy servants, and to thy son David.] Most humble words, and full of respect: mixed with strong arguments; from their harmless and friendly living in his neighbourhood; and from the present festival which he kept, when men's hearts use to be open and bountiful: and they did not desire delicates, but any thing that was at hand, which he could spare.

Ver. 9. And when David's young men came, they spake to Nabal according to all these words in the name of David, and ceased.] Added nothing of their own, but waited for his answer in silence, as Maimonides interprets it, in his More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 116.

Ver. 10. Nabal answered David's servants and said, Who is David? and who is the son of Jesse?] A most rude and brutish answer to such a civil message and humble request.

There be many servants now-a-days that break every man from his master.] He reproaches them all as a company of fugitives and vagabonds; and taxes David secretly, with infidelity to his master Saul.

Ver. 11. Shall I take my bread, and my water, and my flesh that I have killed for my shearers, and give it unto men whom I know not whence they be?] A most foolish speech; when he had just before called David the son of Jesse: which shews he knew well enough who he was.

Ver. 12. And David's young men turned their way, and went again, and told him all these sayings.] They did not stand arguing with him, or entreating him: but slighted him, as much as he did them.

Ver. 13. And David said unto his men, Gird you on every man his sword. And they girded on every man his sword; and David also girded on his sword.] Being resolved, in his passion, to be revenged on Nabal.

And there went up after David about four hundred men, and two hundred abode by the stuff.] For he had with him six hundred men in all; as we read before, xxiii. 13.

Ver. 14. But one of the young men.] Belonging unto Nabal.

Told Abigail, Nabal's wife, saying, Behold, David sent messengers out of the wilderness to salute our master; and he railed on them.] Some of his servants were wiser and better than he himself, which makes good that saying of Seneca (in his third book de Beneficiis), "Nulli præclusa est virtus, omnibus patet," &c. Virtue is shut up from none; it lies open to all. It admits all, it invites all; free men and servants, kings and exiles. It makes not choice of such a house, or of such an estate: but is content with a man himself.—For who can choose but admire the wisdom and fidelity of this shepherd? who admonished his mistress of the danger her family was in; as he rationally concluded from the rude abuse that had been put upon David: whose merits he honestly set before her.

Ver. 15. But the men were very good to us, and we were not hurt, neither missed any thing, as long as we were conversant with them, when we were in the fields.] They confirm every word that David's messengers had told their master, (ver. 7.)

Ver. 16. They were a wall unto us, both by night and day, all the time we were with them keeping sheep.] They add more than David's men had said of themselves, that they not only did them no hurt, but were a guard and defence to them against robbers, and against wild beasts.

Ver. 17. Now therefore know and consider what thou wilt do; for evil is determined against our master, and against all his household.] This they understood, either from the young men whom David sent, who let fall some words signifying how highly he would resent the indignity done to him; or they concluded it from what they had observed of the nature of David; who was very kind, but would not put up rude affronts.

For he is such a son of Belial, that a man cannot speak to him.] So wilful and obstinate, that they durst not speak to him of this matter: fearing he would be more insolent to them than he had been to David.

Ver. 18. Then Abigail made haste.] For she was so prudent a woman as not to neglect the good advice of a servant.

And took two hundred loaves, and two bottles of wine, five sheep ready dressed, and five measures of parched corn, and a hundred clusters of raisins, and two hundred cakes of figs, and laid them upon asses.] This shews he was a great man, who had such plenty of provisions in his house. For it is not to be imagined, that she would rob the shearers of a festival day to gratify David.

Ver. 19. And said unto her servants, Go before me: behold, I come after you.] They carried the present; that David beholding it, might be a little mitigated before she came to him.

But she told not her husband Nabal.] Who, it is likely, would have persisted in his folly: or been so long before he would have been persuaded to be wiser, that it would have been too late to prevent the danger.

Ver. 20. And it was so, as she rode upon the ass, that she came down by the covert of the hill.] By a way full of bushes, so that David saw not her, nor she him, till they met together.

And, behold, David and his men came down against her.] From another hill, I suppose.

And she met them.] In the bottom, between the two hills.

Ver. 21. (Now David had said, Surely in vain have I kept all that this fellow hath in the wilderness, so that nothing was missing of all that pertained to him; and he hath requited me evil for good.] This he said to himself: or to his men, as soon as the messengers came back; or as they were upon the road to Nabal's house.

Ver. 22. So and more also do God unto the enemies of David.] He means to himself: but being unwilling to pronounce his own name, or any other whom he respected, together with a curse, he transfers it to an enemy: by a figure called euphemismus. Or, as some take it, the meaning is, let my enemy destroy me, if I let Nabal and his family escape. But the former is the plainest interpretation; it being common in the Jewish language (as Joh. Cocceius observes), when they speak of any evil to themselves, to translate it to another person. Of which he gives instances out of Maccoth, and Bava Bathra. (See him upon the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 4. sect. 18. annot. 1.)

If I leave to him before the morning light.] He intended to fall upon them in the night, when they were in a dead sleep, after great jollity.

Any that pisseth against the wall.)] That is (as the generality of interpreters think), so much as a dog; this being, they take it, like that saying of Aurelian, mentioned by Vopiscus, who, going to a city, and finding the gates shut against him, said in his wrath, "Canem in hoc oppido non relinquam;" I will not leave a dog in this town. But Bochartus excepts to this interpretation, that all dogs do not piss against the wall, but only the males; and that not till they be six or eight months old, as Aristotle and others observe. And therefore (to omit his other reasons) he takes this phrase to be a periphrasis of a man, as the Hebrews expound it, particularly Ralbag. So that it is as much as to say, I will not leave a man alive.

Ver. 23. And when Abigail saw David, she hasted, and lighted off the ass, and fell before David on her face, and bowed herself to the ground.] Both out of reverence to him as a great man, and as an humble supplicant, for pardon of a great offence.

Ver. 24. And fell at his feet, and said, Upon me, my lord, upon me let this iniquity be.] She applies herself to him, in a speech full of art and prudence; and first begs, like a kind wife, that she might suffer, not her husband, who was not so wise as he should be.

And let thine handmaid, I pray thee, speak in thine audience, and hear the words of thy handmaid.] She desires him patiently to hear her reasons.

Ver. 25. Let not my lord, I pray thee, regard this man of Belial, even Nabal; for as his name is, so is he; Nabal is his name, and folly is with him.] She represents him as a man that offended out of folly rather than malice; which might a little excuse his rudeness. There are many such allusions in Scripture, as there is here of Nebala and Nabal. (See Gen. v. 25. xlix. 8. 16. 19. Zeph. ii. 4.)

But I, thine handmaid, saw not the young men of my lord, whom thou didst send.] If any were to be punished, she had desired it might be herself; yet she had this to say in her own behalf, that she knew nothing of the message sent by David.

Ver. 26. Now therefore, my lord, as the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, seeing the Lord hath withholden thee from coming to shed blood, and from avenging thyself with thine own hand.] This is wonderfully artificial, to presume so much upon his goodness and clemency, as already to conclude, she had diverted him from his purpose: or rather, that God had interposed, by his good providence, to hinder him from shedding blood.

Now let thine enemies, and they that seek evil to my lord, be as Nabal.] That is, may thou have no worse enemy than he. Or, may thy enemies have no more power to hurt thee, than Nabal hath. This is another argument to persuade him to mercy; that Nabal was so inconsiderable, that, as he would do him no good, so he could do him no evil.

Ver. 27. And now this blessing.] That is, this present or gift. The same phrase in xxx. 26. 2 Kings v. 15.

Which thine handmaid hath brought unto my lord, let it even be given to the young men that follow my lord.] To appease their anger: or, as unworthy of David's acceptance.

Ver. 28. I pray thee, forgive the trespass of thine hand- maid.] She still speaks as if she had been the offender; because she desired none might suffer but herself.

For the Lord will certainly make my lord a sure house.] She prays him to be good to her, as God would certainly be to him.

Because my lord fighteth the battles of the Lord, and evil hath not been found in thee all thy days.] She puts him in mind of all his heroical acts against the Philistines, and other enemies; and that hitherto he had been blameless, and done no hurt to the Israelites: and therefore hoped he would do none to her, and her family.

Ver. 29. Yet a man is risen to pursue thee, and to seek thy soul.] Saul she means restlessly endeavoured to take away his life.

But the soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God.] Be preserved. For those things which we would not have lost, nor scattered about, we are wont to bind up in bundles.

And the souls of thine enemies, them shall he sling out, as out of the middle of a sling.] As we bind up things to preserve them from being thrown about, and lost; so we put things into a sling, that they may be cast out of sight, or a great way from us.

Ver. 30. And it shall come to pass, when the Lord shall have done to my lord according to all the good that he hath spoken concerning thee, and shall have appointed thee ruler over Israel.] Nothing could be more obliging than this, at every word to call him her lord, and to acknowledge his title to the kingdom; and her belief that he would certainly enjoy it.

Ver. 31. That this shall be no grief unto thee, nor offence of heart to my lord, either that thou hast shed blood causeless, or that my lord hath avenged himself.] She reserves the most Divine argument to the last; that he would have a clear and quiet conscience, and not be disturbed with a remembrance that he had shed the blood of the innocent, or otherwise avenged himself: which belonged unto God.

And when the Lord hath dealt well with my lord, remember thine handmaid.] Thou wilt thank me for my advice.

Ver. 32. And David said to Abigail, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me.] He was so moved with this pathetical speech, that, in the first place, he acknowledges the good providence of God, which directed her to come so seasonably to prevent the effects of his anger. Whereby he was absolved from his oath, which he had sworn, to cut off Nabal's family. And indeed it was null in itself; for no man can oblige himself to do an evil thing; as this would have been: there being a double guilt in it, as Philo observes, if he had shed their blood. To which may be applied the words of Seneca, that in such cases, "scelus est fides," to keep one's word, is a wicked thing. See Grotius de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 13. sect. 6. where he observes, that Cicero mentions the like case with this in the vow of Agamemnon. And Procopius Gazæus here well resolves, that this oath of David was the effect of anger; but his sparing Nabal the effect of reason and prudent counsel.

Ver. 33. And blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, which hast kept me this day from coming to shed blood, and from avenging myself with my own hand.] Next he commends her, and her wise counsel; for which he beseeches God to bless her: for she had preserved him from a very outrageous piece of revenge; which might have afflicted him all his days.

Ver. 34. For in very deed, as the Lord God of Israel liveth, which hath kept me back from hurting thee, except thou hadst hasted and come to meet me, surely there had not been left unto Nabal, by the morning light, any that pisseth against the wall.] It may seem strange, that his anger should not cool in so much time as passed between the return of his messengers and Abigail's meeting him: but the affront was great, and his soldiers it is likely inflamed his rage, and he resolved to make Nabal an example to others, not to use him so rudely.

Ver. 35. So David received of her hand that which she brought, and said unto her, Go in peace unto thy house: for I hearkened unto thy voice, and accepted thy person.] Both she herself, and what she said, and what she brought, were most welcome to him. So happy a thing it is (as Euripides speaks in his Heraclidæ, ver. 359.) to fall into the hand of a wise, and not a foolish enemy. For the latter, if he get the better, exercises nothing but cruelty: but with the former there is room for mercy, justice, moderation, and pardon. Such an enemy Abigail met withal; unto whom Nabal's offence was not more provoking to the destruction of his family, than the admiration of Abigail's virtue to its preservation.

Ver. 36. And Abigail came to Nabal; and, behold, he held a feast in his house like the feast of a king: and Nabal's heart was merry within him, for he was very drunken.] Had eaten and drank too liberally, at a very great feast, which he made for his shearers.

Wherefore she told him nothing, less or more, till the morning light.] Said not a word of what had passed, because he was not capable to understand the mercy of God to him.

Ver. 37. But it came to pass in the morning, when the wine was gone out of Nabal.] When he had slept himself sober.

And his wife told him of these things, that his heart died within him, and he became as a stone.] He fainted away, and was as cold as a stone; out of the dread of the danger which he imagined still hung over him. For it is a frigid interpretation of Rasi and Kimchi, that he was troubled to hear of the great present that his wife had made to David.

Ver. 38. And it came to pass, that about ten days after, the Lord smote Nabal, that he died.] It seems he lay so long dispirited, in a stupid senseless condition; and then God put an end to his life, either by some disease, or by a sudden stroke.

Ver. 39. And when David heard that Nabal was dead, he said, Blessed be the Lord, who hath pleaded the cause of my reproach from the hand of Nabal, and hath kept his servant from evil: for the Lord hath returned the wickedness of Nabal upon his own head.] He doth not rejoice so much in his death (who was a worthless wretch) as in the justice of God: who shewed him, that, if men would have patience, they should see right done them; so that they need not go about to avenge themselves.

And David sent and communed with Abigail, to take her to him to wife.] Being a woman of admirable prudence, as well as beauty, (ver. 3.) and one that expressed a high esteem of him, he sent some to treat with her about marriage with him.

Ver. 40. And when the servants of David were come to Abigail to Carmel, they spake unto her, saying, David sent us unto thee, to take thee unto him to wife.] This was their business: which, no doubt, they delivered in many more words, which signified the great esteem and affection which David had for her; whom he knew to be a woman of such great wisdom, that she had respect not merely to his present, but to his future condition. Otherwise he would not have adventured, being now very poor, to court one that had such riches.

Ver. 41. And she arose, and bowed herself with her face to the earth.] In reverence to the very name of David: whom she highly honoured, as a man of an heroic spirit; and who she was fully persuaded should be king of Israel, (ver. 30.)

And she said, Behold, let thine handmaid be a servant to wash the feet of the servants of my lord.] She sent him an answer in these words; which shew her humility to be as great as her other virtues: for to wash one's feet was the lowest sort of service.

Ver. 42. And Abigail hasted, and arose, and rode upon an ass, with five damsels of hers that went after her.] That she might come attended suitable to her quality and his. (See Grotius, Gen. xxx. 3.)

And she went after the messengers of David.] Though she did not long deliberate about the matter, but soon consented, yet it is not likely she followed them immediately: but stayed some decent time before she went to David.

And became his wife.] She had a strong faith in God to marry a man who had nothing to live upon, but was forced to wander from place to place, and beg the assistance of his friends. But she verily believed he would at last come to the throne, as she had before expressed: and could make some provision for him out of her own estate.

Ver. 43. David also took Ahinoam of Jezreel, and they were also both of them his wives.] At the same time: according to the corrupt custom of those days, wherein they had perverted the law of nature, which is admirably expressed by Euripides in his Andromache, (ver. 177, &c.)

——— οὐδὲ γὰρ καλὸν,
Δυσὶν γυναικοῖν ἄνδρ' ἕν' ἡνίας ἔχειν, &c.

It is not good for one husband to govern two wives: but he should be content with one, who would live happily.

And again, (ver. 909.)

Κακὸν δ' ἔλεξας, ἓν' ἄνδρα δίσσ' ἔχειν λέχη.

Thou hast said, it is an evil thing for one man to have two wives. For where there are more than one they seldom agree, but breed great trouble to their husband. It is commonly thought, that Ahinoam was his wife before he married Abigail. (See upon xxvii. 3.)

Ver. 44. And Saul.] Or rather, for Saul, the particle vau being often so used.

Had given Michal his daughter, David's wife, to Phalti the son of Laish.] Here is the reason why David took another wife; because Saul had deprived him of his former: but it was no good reason for taking two, which were more than he had before. He was not forced from Michal, and therefore we read afterward that he took her again. And the Jewish doctors are of opinion, that this Phalti was a very pious man, and would never touch her, because she was another man's wife: which was the reason David received her again. (See 1 Sam. iii. 15.)

Which was of Gallim.] A town near Accaron, as Eusebius and St. Jerome tell us: which had its name from Gal, a heap of stones; it being, I suppose, a stony place.

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1. AND the Ziphites.] The old enemies of David, (xxiii. 19.)

Came unto Saul to Gibeah, saying, Doth not David hide himself in the hill of Hachilah, which is before Jeshimon?] He thought he might safely return thither, Saul having so lately made peace with him. The Ziphites also could not but hear how he had obliged Saul, and what declaration Saul had made, that he knew David would be king of Israel, (xxiv. 20.) Which David thought might discourage them from meddling any more. But quite contrary, they being afraid, if he came to be king, he would remember and revenge their ill usage of him, went to excite Saul to destroy him.

Ver. 2. Then Saul arose, and went down to the wilderness of Ziph, with three thousand men of Israel with him.] The same number he had the last time he pursued after him, (xxiv. 2.)

To seek David in the wilderness of Ziph.] The inconstancy, falseness, and implacable rage of this prince is inconceivable. Who, having not long ago been obliged to David for his life, and had acknowledged his error, and made David swear he would be good to his posterity, yet openly declared himself again to be his enemy, and sought to kill him.

Ver. 3. And Saul pitched in the hill of Hachilah, which is before Jeshimon, by the way.] That is, by the way that went to the wilderness.

But David abode in the wilderness; and he saw that Saul came after him into the wilderness.] He thought at first his intelligence had not been true; but he was credibly informed that Saul's wrath was broke out again, and that he intended to come thither.

Ver. 4. And David therefore sent out spies, and understood that Saul was come in very deed.] A good captain always hath scouts abroad: who assured him his information was true, and that Saul was not far from him.

Ver. 5. And David arose, and came to a place where Saul had pitched.] Within sight of it; where he might observe how they lay.

And David beheld where Saul lay, and Abner the son of Ner, the captain of the host.] Who, it is likely, lay near him.

And Saul lay in the trench.] Or rather, in his chariot, for so the LXX. translate the Hebrew word by λαμπήνη, or as some editions have it, ἁπήνη: which signifies a chariot drawn by mules, as Bochartus shews out of Homer and other authors, par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 19.

And the people lay round about him.] He was enclosed, I suppose, with the carriages; as our marginal translation is of the foregoing word.

Ver. 6. Then answered David, and said to Ahimelech the Hittite.] A valiant man of that nation, who was a proselyte to the Jewish religion: and not only followed David, but was always near to his person.

And to Abishai the son of Zeruiah, brother to Joab.] Who were the sons of David's sister, (1 Chron. xi. 16.) whose father is no where mentioned; being a man, I suppose, of no note.

Saying, Who will go down with me to Saul to the camp?] That is, which of these two.

And Abishai said, I will go down with thee.] Either Ahimelech declined it, as too hazardous an enterprise; or Abishai, being a hot forward young man, offered himself, while the other stood deliberating.

Ver. 7. So David and Abishai came to the people by night.] A bold attempt, for two men to come into the midst of an army of three thousand chosen men, who were not without a watch, though they were now asleep. But a strong confidence in God's promise that he would preserve him, overcame all fear of danger.

And, behold, Saul lay sleeping within the trench, and his spear stuck in the ground at his bolster; but Abner and the people lay round about him.] To secure his person from any sudden assault.

Ver. 8. Then said Abishai to David, God hath delivered thine enemy into thy hand this day: now therefore let me smite him, I pray thee, with the spear even to the earth at once, and I will not smite him the second time.] Though David would not kill him himself, when he had the like opportunity; (xxiv. 4.) yet Abishai thought he might give him leave to do it: and he undertook to stick him to the ground at one thrust, so that he should make no noise by crying out.

Ver. 9. And David said to Abishai, Destroy him not: for who can stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed and be guiltless?] Being made king by God's special appointment, he looked upon it as a high crime to do him any hurt; because he was a sacred person.

Ver. 10. David said furthermore, As the Lord liveth, the Lord shall smite him; or his day shall come to die; or he shall descend into battle, and perish.] God, who made him king, after a solemn manner, could only depose him: and that he could do several ways; either by a sudden stroke, or in the course of nature, or letting him fall in battle.

Ver. 11. The Lord forbid that I should stretch my hand against the Lord's anointed.] What he permitted another to do, when he could hinder it, was as if he had done it himself. But he abhorred to meddle with that, which belonged to God, as he had before said.

But I pray thee, take now the spear that is at his bolster.] As a witness what they could have done, if respect to God, whose anointed he was, had not withheld them.

And the cruse of water, and let us go.] This was set there, either for him to drink, if he was thirsty, or to wash himself; which was prescribed by their law in case of many pollutions.

Ver. 12. So David took the spear and the cruse of water.] By the hand of Abishai: who, like an excellent soldier, was perfectly subject to his commander, to forbear, or to do whatsoever David enjoined him.

And gat them away, and no man saw it, or knew it, neither awaked; for they were all asleep: because a deep sleep from the Lord was fallen upon them.] The Jewish doctors, in Bereschith Rabba, observe, that there are three sorts of that they call tardama, which is the Hebrew word for deep sleep in this place. The first, mere sound sleep, which God sent upon Adam, (Gen. xi. 21.) The second is the deep sleep of prophecy, which he sent upon Abraham, (Gen. xv. 12.) The third is this here mentioned, which they call the sleep marmorita (it should be printed marmota, as Bochart observes), which is a little creature more drowsy than a dormouse. (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 38.)

Ver. 13. Then David went over to the other side, and stood on the top of a hill afar off (a great space being between them).] So that he was in safety, and yet his voice might be heard.

Ver. 14. And David cried unto the people, and to Abner the son of Ner, saying, Answerest thou not, Abner?] Art thou still asleep?

Then Abner answered, and said, Who art thou that criest unto the king?] And disturbest his repose.

Ver. 15. And David said unto Abner, Art thou not a valiant man, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are, Art not thou a man? That is, in place of authority, as well as of great courage and valour.

Wherefore hast thou not kept thy lord the king?] Observed better military discipline, for the preservation of Saul's person.

For there came one of the people in to destroy the king thy lord.] Came into the camp with that intention, and had a very fair opportunity.

Ver. 16. This thing is not good that thou hast done.] A soft way of speaking: but his meaning was, that he was very faulty, as appears by what follows.

Ye are worthy to die, because ye have not kept your master, the Lord's anointed.] Guarded him better from any danger. It is probable they despised David's small forces, which made them so grossly negligent.

Now see where the king's spear is, and the cruse of water that was at his bolster!] He sets before them the tokens of their carelessness; and of the opportunity he had to kill Saul.

Ver. 17. And Saul knew David's voice, and said, Is this thy voice, my son David?] He was in great confusion of mind, and knew not what more to say to him.

And David said, It is my voice, my lord, O king.] He humbly acknowledgeth his authority; and the allegiance he owed him: though he had done him so many injuries.

Ver. 18. And he said, Wherefore doth my lord thus pursue after his servant? for what have I done, or what evil is in my hand?] Being conscious of his own innocence, David expostulates with him in a long speech: and desires, in the first place, to know what crime he had to accuse him of: especially since he lately acknowledged that he was more righteous than himself, (xxiv. 17.)

Ver. 19. Now therefore, I pray thee, let my lord the king hear the words of thy servant.] Having no answer to that question, he desires him to be so patient, as to suffer him to argue awhile with him.

If the Lord have stirred thee up against me, let him accept an offering.] For God is not implacable, but willing to be reconciled, if I have offended him. Or the meaning may be, If, for any offence against God, there be just cause for this anger, I refuse not to die, and expiate the faults with my blood. Or the words may refer to Saul, as if he had said, Offer to God some sacrifice, that he, being appeased, may free thee from this pertinacious melancholy.

But if they be the children of men, cursed be they before the Lord; for they have driven me out this day from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord.] From having any settled abode in his own country; which he foresaw he should be forced also to leave, as we read he did in the next chapter.

Saying, Go, serve other gods.] That was the effect of their actions, though they did not say so in so many words. For they banished him into a nation of another religion, as Mr. Mede expounds these words. (See book iii. p. 823.)

Ver. 20. Now therefore, let not my blood fall to the earth before the face of the Lord.] God seeing it, and being the avenger.

For the king of Israel cometh out to seek a flea.] Which was neither for his profit nor for his glory. (See xxiv. 14.)

As when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains.] Hunt a poor bird from mountain to mountain, with a great deal of labour, which is not easily caught, and worth nothing when one hath it: the Hebrew word kore is no where to be found, but here and in Jer. xvii. 11. from both which places we learn it was a mountainous bird of no great value: in taking of which, the fowler spent his pains to little purpose. And it was one of those birds that sits upon the eggs of other birds; as the words of Jeremiah import, "She gathereth what she hath not brought forth," that is, eggs which she did not lay. From which it is apparent, that this word doth not signify a partridge, which is a bird of price, and doth not sit on other birds' eggs; but, as Bochart hath taken a great deal of pains to shew, was a bird with a long bill and short feet, called rusticula. I will not mention the opinions of interpreters about it, for they are very various, and the same men are not constant to themselves; for R. Solomon, who here takes it for a partridge, in that place of the prophet Jeremiah takes it for a cuckoo. (See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 12.)

Ver. 21. Then said Saul, I have sinned: return, my son David.] He invites him to come to the court again; which is more than he did at their former meeting.

For I will no more do thee harm, because my soul was precious in thine eyes this day: I have played the fool, and have erred exceedingly.] This is a very ingenuous confession, wherein he condemned himself as a great offender against God and against David. In which for the present, no doubt, he was very serious, and both ashamed and sorry for what he had done.

Ver. 22. And David answered and said, Behold the king's spear! let one of the young men come over and fetch it.] He durst not venture to go and present it himself to Saul, though it was the testimony of his fidelity and affection to him. For he did not know but the evil spirit might come on a sudden upon him, and make him change his good resolution.

Ver. 23. The Lord render to every man according to his righteousness and faithfulness: for the Lord delivered thee this day into my hand, but I would not stretch forth my hand against the Lord's anointed.] He repeats what Saul had confessed, the more to affect his heart with it: and tells him he doubted not the Lord would deal with him accordingly, howsoever Saul used him.

Ver. 24. Behold, as thy life was set by this day in mine eyes, so let my life be set by in the sight of the Lord, and let him deliver me out of all tribulation.] He prays God to deal with him as he had done with Saul; and then he doubted not to come out of all his troubles.

Ver. 25. And Saul said unto David, Blessed be thou, my son David; thou shalt do great things, and also shalt still prevail.] He perceived it was in vain to contend any longer against David, whom God designed for great things (as he saw by his most worthy and noble actions), and would still have the better of him, until he came to the throne: for possibly Saul looked upon the taking away his spear, which I observed (upon xxii. 6.) was his sceptre, as an omen the royal authority should be translated to David.

So David went on his way, and Saul returned to his place.] To Gibeah, from whence he came, (ver. 1.) but David did not think fit to accompany him, remembering how fickle he was, and therefore, notwithstanding all those good words, not to be trusted.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1. AND David said in his heart, I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul.] Whose heart he believed was not altered, though he had felt lately some compunction for what he had done against him. But David had the greatest reason to believe he would never be able to compass his design, having God's promise he should be king of Israel; therefore these words were spoken in a melancholy fit, when he was under some great depression of spirit.

There is nothing better for me than that I should speedily escape into the land of the Philistines; and Saul shall despair of me, to seek me any more in any coast of Israel: so shall I escape out of his hand.] He thought, that as long as he remained in any part of Saul's dominions, he would never cease his persecution: but by going into an enemy's country, he would be forced to be quiet.

Ver. 2. And David arose, and he passed over with the six hundred men that were with him, unto Achish, the son of Maoch, king of Gath.] It is not certain that this was the same Achish mentioned xxi. 10. with whom David took shelter at his first flight from Saul. He seems rather to have been another, who is distinguished from the former by the name of his father. But whichsoever he was, he had either invited David to come thither for his security (hoping to make use of his valour or his prudence in his wars), or David had sent ambassadors before to treat with him, and had his royal word, that he should be protected by him. And it appears afterward, that he had David in great esteem; for he gave him a town for his own inheritance, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 3. And David dwelt with Achish at Gath, he and his men, every man with his household, even David with his two wives, Ahinoam the Jezreelite, and Abigail the Carmelite, Nabal's wife.] It was a very capacious place that could contain so many men and their families; some of which might be numerous. And Achish was very generous to receive so many strangers and old soldiers into his royal city, as might have made themselves masters of it. Ahinoam being here mentioned before Abigail, hath made many think she was his wife before he took the other.

Ver. 4. And it was told Saul that David was fled to Gath; and he sought no more again for him.] Unto which, it is likely, he was inclined; if he had not found it to be in vain.

Ver. 5. And David said unto Achish, If I have now found grace in thine eyes, let them give me a place in some town in the country, that I may dwell there: for why should thy servant dwell in the royal city with thee?] This he said, that he might avoid envy. For perhaps he might have too much the port of a king; having so many men at his service, and being attended, no doubt, with a considerable number of them about his person. In a private town also he might more freely exercise his own religion; without any offence to the Philistines, who worshipped other gods.

Ver. 6. Then Achish gave him Ziklag that day.] Either out of his royal bounty, or on condition of some service he should do him.

Wherefore Ziklag pertaineth unto the kings of Judah unto this day.] In the division of the land of Canaan it was first given unto the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 31.) and afterward to that of Simeon, who had a portion out of the land given to Judah, (Josh. xix. 5.) But the Philistines kept possession of it, so that neither of them enjoyed it: till now it became by Achish's gift the peculiar inheritance of David and his successors.

Ver. 7. And the time that David dwelt in the country of the Philistines was a full year and four months.] How long he wandered up and down, till he settled here, we are no where told: but it is probable the persecution of Saul lasted a great while.

Ver. 8. And David and his men went out, and invaded the Geshurites, and the Gezerites, and the Amalekites: for those nations were of old the inhabitants of the land, as thou goest to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt.] The Geshurites and Gezerites were both of them relics of the Canaanites, whom God commanded to be rooted out. (See Grotius.) The Amalekites who were near had been destroyed by Saul, but not these that were afar off: or, perhaps, these were some that fled into these remote parts when they heard Saul was coming against them. And the following words (ver. 11. of David's killing all) must be understood, that he left none alive whom he found in these parts: but there still were Amalekites in other places, (xxx. 1.) Abarbinel imagines all the people here mentioned were at enmity with Achish, and hated him and his people: so that when David smote them he made no complaint about it.

Ver. 9. And David smote the land, and left neither man nor woman alive, and took away the sheep, and the oxen, and the asses, and the camels, and the apparel, and returned, and came to Achish.] To give an account of his actions, and to present him, I suppose, with part of the spoil.

Ver. 10. And Achish said, Whither have ye made a road to-day?] For David, it is likely, constantly kept his men in exercise upon some expedition or other.

And David said, Against the south of Judah, and against the south of the Jerahmeelites, and against the south of the Kenites.] He answers Achish cunningly, in such ambiguous words, that he might understand him as if he had assaulted the land of Judah; whereas he only fell upon those people who bordered on those parts which he mentions. For these countries lay on the south of Judah: and the Jerahmeelites were a part of Judea, and the Kenites of the family of Jethro were their neighbours and confederates.

Ver. 11. And David saved neither man nor woman alive to bring tidings to Gath, saying, Lest they should tell on us, saying, So did David, and so will be his manner all the while he dwelleth in the country of the Philistines.] Who had people of some countries thereabouts; perhaps tributaries to them, and under their protection: whom they might fear David would serve in the same manner, had they known how he dealt with these.

Ver. 12. And Achish believed David, saying, He hath made his people utterly to abhor him; therefore he shall be my servant for ever.] The enmity between him and his own people being, as he thought, irreconcilable, he must make him his friend by faithful service for ever.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass in those days.] While David was in the country of the Philistines.

That the Philistines gathered their armies together for warfare, to fight with Israel.] Mustered all their forces to invade the land of Israel, being encouraged, it is probable, by the banishment of David, the death of Samuel, and the frenzy of Saul.

And Achish said unto David, Know thou assuredly, that thou shalt go with me to battle, thou and thy men.] Achish seems to have been the principal person in the country, and the commander of all their forces. For we read of no other king among them but he: who required David, who was now one of his subjects, to assist him in this warfare against his own native country.

Ver. 2. And David said to Achish, Surely thou shalt know what thy servant can do.] He answered in doubtful words, which might be taken in different senses.

And Achish said to David, Therefore will I make thee keeper of my head for ever.] Achish understood him that he would do his best to serve him: and thereupon promised, if he did, that he would make him captain of his guard, or some great officer, near to his person.

Ver. 3. Now Samuel was dead, and all Israel lamented him, and buried him in Ramah, even in his own city.] This was noted before, (xxv. 1.) but repeated here again, to shew that Saul now was sensible of his loss, wanting his advice in a time of great distress.

And Saul had put away those that had familiar spirits, and the wizards, out of the land.] According to the Divine commandment, (Lev. xx. 27.) which, perhaps, he had executed in the beginning of his reign, when he was governed by Samuel: or if he did it since, it was to shew that he had some zeal for God left, whereby he kept up his authority among the people.

Ver. 4. And the Philistines gathered themselves together.] Met at an appointed place.

And came and pitched in Shunem.] A place in the tribe of Issachar, as we learn from Josh. xix. 18.

And Saul gathered all Israel together, and pitched in Gilboa.] A mountain near the valley of Jezreel, not far from Shunem: as that place in Joshua informs us. So that they seem to be pitched, as they were before the great battle was fought when Goliath fell, upon two mountains, with a valley between them.

Ver. 5. And when Saul saw the host of the Philistines.] Of which he had a full view from Mount Gilboa.

He was afraid, and his heart greatly trembled.] For the Spirit of God having forsaken him, his courage very much failed him, when he saw how numerous the Philistines were, and heard, perhaps, that David was among them; and reflected upon all the evil he had done unto him.

Ver. 6. And when Saul inquired of the Lord.] This seems to contradict what is said 1 Chron. x. 14. that he did not inquire of the Lord: which was the reason that he slew him. But Kimchi and others thus reconcile these two places; that since he did not continue to inquire of him, but went to a witch, it was all one as if he had not inquired at all; for he did it faintly, coldly, and indifferently: resolving, if he was not heard there, to go to some other place for counsel. See Buxtorf, Hist. Urim et Thummim; who observes, out of Samuel Laniado, a learned Jew, that "he whose heart is perfect with God, lifts up his eyes unto him, and fixes them on him; hoping in him, though he doth not presently hear him: and perseveres in his hopes, firmly settling a resolution to wait upon him. But so did not Saul, who was remiss and negligent, saying, If God will not hear me, I will go and consult a familiar spirit."

The Lord answered him not.] Because he had killed his priests, as R. Solomon here notes. And by this means, as R. Levi ben Gersom here farther observes, had nobody capable of the Holy Spirit to consult God for him.

Neither by dreams.] By which he prayed, perhaps, that God would inform himself.

Nor by urim.] Kimchi thinks that he sent to Abiathar to inquire about the event of this war: for he had the urim with him. It is observable, that the Scripture never saith that God answered by thummim; for that is comprehended under urim: which is always put first when they are joined together, and here it is mentioned alone. (See xxiii. 6.)

Nor by prophets.] A college of which, no doubt, was still remaining at Ramah; whom Samuel had educated. It will not be amiss to observe, that the same ways of inquiry were among the gentiles, as appears by what Achilles saith, in the council of the Greeks, who met to consider about the plague Apollo had sent among them: (Iliad. i. ver. 62.)

Ἀλλ' ἄγε δή τινα μάντιν ἐρείομεν ἢ ἱερῆα,
Ἢ καὶ ὀνειροπόλον, (καὶ γάρ τ' ὄναρ ἐκ Διός ἐστιν)
Ὅς κ' εἴποι———

Where he reckons three sorts of men, a prophet, or a priest, or an expounder of dreams; who might tell why Apollo was so angry with them.

Ver. 7. Then said Saul unto his servants, Seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit, that I may go to her, and inquire of her.] In this he acted like a distracted man, who now approved what he had condemned. He mentions a woman rather than a man; because the weaker sex were most addicted to these practices (being most easily deceived by evil spirits), among whom such a person he thought might be soonest found.

And his servants said unto him, There is a woman that hath a familiar spirit.] There are always some flatterers in courts, who will never contradict their princes; but are ready to comply with them in their worst designs. And it appears by this, that though this sort of divination was not publicly practised, yet it was known that there were some who privately continued to consult the dead. I say publicly, because it is very probable that before Saul executed the law against them, there were those that made profession of having familiar spirits, as there were among the heathen. For Plutarch, in the life of Cimon, speaks of Pausanias' going to a Νεκυομαντεῖον (an oracle of the dead) at Heraclea, where he called up the soul of Cleonice.

At En-dor.] A place in the tribe of Manasseh, (Josh. xvii. 11.) not far from Shunem, as Salianus observes: and part of the mountain of Gilboa was over against En-dor, and another part of it against Shunem. This woman, the Jewish doctors say, was the mother of Abner.

Ver. 8. And Saul disguised himself, and put on other raiment, and went, and two servants with him.] He put off his royal apparel, and clothed himself like an ordinary man, having but a small attendance; that he might not be suspected to be what he was. These two servants, the Jewish doctors say, were Abner and Amasa.

And they came to the woman by night.] They could not go the direct way, for then they must have passed through the army of the Philistines: and therefore they fetched a compass, and travelled also by night, that they might not be discovered. And it is likely they went on foot, that less notice might be taken of them; and they might go and return through by-ways, which made their journey the longer. In the night also it was, that women went about such magical practices. For, as Psellus observes in his book of Demons, it is the common opinion of the Greeks, that none of the terrestrial demons dare appear in the day-time. Ἑλληνικῆς γάρ ἐστι δόξης τὸ μηδένα τῶν ἐνύλων δαιμόνων διαρρεῖν τὰς τοῦ ἡλίου αὐγάς. Nay, he saith all those things were performed after the summer solstice; when the days grew short, and the nights increased.

And he said, Divine unto me by the familiar spirits, and bring me him up whom I shall name unto thee.] This consulting the dead, was a very ancient practice among the gentiles, as appears from Homer: but long before him, mentioned by Moses himself, who forbids it in Deut. xviii. 10. Notwithstanding which, the Israelites, who had a Divine oracle, and holy prophets to guide them, fell into this foul sin, as they did into most of the gentile abominations.

Ver. 9. And the woman said unto him, Behold, thou knowest what Saul hath done, how he hath cut off those who have familiar spirits, and wizards, out of the land: wherefore then layest thou a snare for my life, to cause me to die?] For so the law was, (Lev. xx. 27.) And Saul seems by the woman's speech to have executed it, for she saith he had cut them off; whereas it is only said, that he had put them away: as if he had failed in his duty, and merely banished such persons, when he should have put them to death.

Ver. 10. And Saul sware unto her by the Lord, saying, As the Lord liveth, there shall no punishment happen to thee for this thing.] An oath was so sacred a thing in those days, that they entirely relied upon it, and ventured their lives upon its credit.

Ver. 11. Then said the woman, whom shall I bring up to thee? And he said, Bring me up Samuel.] It is a wonderful thing that he should believe a woman should have power to disturb the rest of Samuel, and bring him thither at her command. But he was forsaken by God, and grown delirious.

Ver. 12. And when the woman saw Samuel.] Here interpreters are very much divided; some imagining it was Samuel himself that appeared; others, a spectre, which by the power of the devil, appeared in his likeness. Several of the ancient fathers are of the former opinion, and particularly Justin Martyr; who, in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, alleges this as a demonstration of the immortality of the soul, p. 333. And most of the Roman church are now of the same mind. But Tertullian saith, (in his book De Anima, cap. 57.) "God forbid we should believe the soul of any holy man, much less of a prophet, should be brought up by the power of the devil." Of this persuasion are a great number of the ancients, particularly St. Cyril of Alexandria, who thinks it the greatest absurdity to believe that a wretched woman should call up Samuel's soul; the demons, with whom such people deal, having no such power. And so St. Jerome calls this Samuelis phantasma. Yet there are vast numbers of modern authors, who think that by God's permission, or dispensation, the soul of Samuel might appear; which Sir John Marsham himself takes not to be improbable. (See Chron. Canon. xiii.) But the very letter of the text seems to me to be against this opinion; which speaks of bringing him up, and his coming up out of the earth; whereas, if it had been Samuel, he should rather have come down from heaven. This apparition, therefore, was one of those fallacious spirits, whom Porphyry speaks of (lib. ii. De Abstinentia), "who put on any shape, and counterfeit (as his words are) the gods, and demons, and the souls of the dead;" Γένος ἀπατῆλης φύσεως παντόμορφον καὶ πολύτροπον, ὑποκρινόμενον καὶ θεοὺς, καὶ δαίμονας, καὶ ψυχὰς τεθνηκότων. Which a very learned person (Joh. Wagenseil) hath confirmed, by this reason, which to me seems very solid; that since God was not pleased to answer Saul (as he confessed) either by prophets, or by dreams, or by urim and thummim, but had withdrawn himself wholly from him, it is not probable, that he would send Samuel himself to him from the dead (and none else could do it), and that at the call of a witch, when he would not favour him with any revelation from a living prophet, or any other way. (Confut. Carm. Lipmanni, p. 198.)

She cried with a loud voice: and the woman spake to Saul, saying, Why hast thou deceived me? for thou art Saul.] She cried out for fear of Saul, when she perceived, by the reverence the spectre paid him, who he was. For so Abarbinel interprets it, he bowed with his face to the ground, in honour of Saul, whereby the woman concluded he was the king.

Ver. 13. And the king said unto her, Be not afraid.] Do not imagine I come with any design to discover thee, and bring thee to punishment.

For what sawest thou?] But tell me what appeared to thee.

And she said, I saw gods ascending out of the earth.] By the word Elohim the Jews understand a judge; for so judges are called in Psal. lxxxii. 1. 6. Peter Martyr therefore interprets it not amiss, a person very majestic, like a judge or a king. And so R. Esaias, mentioned by Vorstius upon Pirke Eliezer, (p. 113.) who by Elohim understands "hominem insignis atque excelsæ staturæ," a man of an eminent and high stature; as the Scripture calls high trees and mountains, trees and mountains of God. And he is said to ascend out of the earth. For so the heathen endeavoured (as Homer, Virgil, Statius, and other ancient poets tell us) to bring up the dead out of the earth, to give them answers to their doubts. Which wicked custom prevailed long among the Jews; for Isaiah alludes to it in xxix. 4. when he saith, they should be brought so low, as to speak like a familiar spirit out of the ground, and whisper out of the dust. And it is evident likewise from Isa. lxv. 4. that they were wont to go to the sepulchres of the dead, there to consult them. For that is the meaning of sacrificing in gardens, (ver. 3.) for there they were wont to bury their dead.

Ver. 14. And he said unto her, What form is he of?] This is an argument he saw nothing, but afterward heard a voice.

And she said, An old man cometh up; and he is covered with a mantle.] Such as kings wore, and also prophets, who had very great authority, (xv. 27. 2 Kings ii. 8. 13.) The Hebrew word meil signifies as much as the Greek ποδήρης, a long garment which came down to the feet.

And Saul perceived that it was Samuel, and he stooped with his face to the ground, and bowed himself.] By the description which the woman gave of him, he concluded it was Samuel; and thereupon made his reverence to him.

Ver. 15. And Samuel said to Saul, Why hast thou disquieted me, and brought me up?] This shews it was an evil spirit, personating Samuel, who spake these words. For it is not in the power of witches to disturb the rest of good men, and to bring them into this world when they please. And Samuel, we may be sure, would never have acknowledged such a power in magical arts, the credit of which the devil endeavoured to support.

And Saul answered, I am sore distressed; for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by prophets nor by dreams; therefore I have called thee, that thou mayest make known to me what I shall do.] Some think he omits inquiry by urim, because, in truth, he neither did nor could make use of that: Abiathar having carried it away to David. But this doth not agree with ver. 6. which supposes he did inquire by urim. He should rather, by repentance, and prayer, and sacrifices, and doing right to David, have besought the favour of God, as Pellicanus here well observes.

Ver. 16. And Samuel said to Saul, Wherefore dost thou ask me, seeing the Lord is departed from thee, and become thine enemy?] Nothing could be more senseless than to imagine Samuel could do any thing for him, when the Lord, whose servant Samuel was, would not regard him.

Ver. 17. And the Lord hath done to him.] That is, to David, mentioned in the conclusion of the verse.

As he spake by me.] Still the evil spirit personates Samuel, that Saul might be deceived into a belief that it was really he who spake to him.

For the Lord hath rent the kingdom out of thy hand, and given it to thy neighbour, even unto David.] As Samuel had foretold long ago; and now it was ready to be accomplished.

Ver. 18. Because thou obeyedst not the voice of the Lord.] This relates (Abarbinel thinks) to his sin in Gilgal, (chap. xiii.)

Nor executed his fierce wrath upon Amalek.] This was his next sin, whereby he highly provoked God's anger against him: for he was not sensible he had offended his express command, but justified his conduct, till Samuel took a great deal of pains to convince him; and then told him he would rend the kingdom from him, (xv. 28.)

Therefore hath the Lord done this unto thee this day.] He doth not mention his sin in killing the Lord's priests; because this decree of taking the kingdom from him was passed before that sin was committed.

Ver. 19. Moreover, the Lord will also deliver Israel with thee into the hand of the Philistines.] Samuel himself could no more know this, than an evil spirit; unless God had been pleased to suggest it: which he might think good to do to this ghost, which personated Samuel, that he might terrify Saul. Or, he saw the Philistines to be so numerous, and Saul so feeble and dispirited, that he doubted not the victory would be on the Philistines' side; and therefore confidently pronounced it. But the former is more probable, that God used this evil spirit to declare his mind at this time: so that he spake nothing but by his direction.

And to-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me.] If we take the word to-morrow strictly, Eustathius, archbishop of Antioch, his argument against Origen is good, that this could not be Samuel who spake, because his words are false: there being more than a day between this and the fight, as many have clearly proved from the story itself. But the meaning may be no more, than very shortly thou shalt be as I am, that is, dead. For, as many have well observed (particularly Hackspan, in his disputation concerning Angels and Demons), by these words, be with me, "mors simpliciter notatur, non vero peculiaris mortem secutus status;" death is simply noted, but not the state which follows after death.

And the Lord shall deliver the host of Israel into the hand of the Philistines.] He would not have him think his army should be able to defend him. Abarbinel observes, that he reckons up three judgments, in the very order wherein they fell out (which shews all was spoken by God's order); first, that the host of Israel should be delivered into the hand of the Philistines; then, that Saul and his sons should be slain; and, lastly, that the Philistines should come and dwell in their cities, (xxxi. 7.) which he takes to be the sense of the last words, which otherwise are only a repetition of the first.

Ver. 20. And Saul fell straightway all along on the earth, and was afraid, because of the words of Samuel: and there was no strength in him; for he had eaten no bread all the day, nor all the night.] No wonder he fainted away, being weak in body for want of food; and extremely afflicted in mind by this dismal message, which Samuel, he thought, brought him from God.

Ver. 21. And the woman came unto Saul.] These words suggest that Saul was in some private room, where he alone heard the words that were spoken by the apparition.

And saw that he was sore troubled, and said unto him, Behold, thy handmaid hath obeyed thy voice, and I have put my life in thy hand, and have hearkened unto thy words which thou spakest unto me.] She had exposed herself to extreme danger: for what we carry in our hand may easily fall out, or be snatched from us.

Ver. 22. Now therefore, I pray thee, hearken thou also unto the voice of thine handmaid, and let me set a morsel of bread before thee, and eat; that thou mayest have strength when thou goest on thy way.] For without some refreshment she saw it would be impossible for him to get to his camp again.

Ver. 23. But he refused, and said, I will not.] He chose rather to die there than by the Philistines.

But his servants, together with the woman, compelled him.] Pressed him so hard, that he yielded to them.

And he hearkened to their voice.] Who knew nothing of what he had heard, but thought he had fainted away only for want of food.

So he arose from the earth, and sat upon the bed.] As the manner (I observed before) then was; and not to lie along when they ate.

Ver. 24. And the woman had a fat calf in the house.] The Hebrew word marbek is well translated fat, as Bochartus confesses, though it properly signifies (as he demonstrates) a calf that treads out the corn, and is fatted up by that means. (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 31.)

And she hasted, and killed it, and took flour and kneaded it, and did bake unleavened bread thereof.] Because there was no time to let it ferment.

Ver. 25. And she brought it before Saul, and before his servants; and they did eat. Then they arose up and went away that night.] Before the break of day; that none might discover they had been with such a woman.

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. NOW the Philistines gathered all their army to Aphek.] There were three places of this name; one in the tribe of Judah, another in Manasseh, and a third in Asher. Which last seems to be here meant, where the sons of Eli were slain. (See iv. 1.)

And the Israelites pitched by a mountain which is in Jezreel.] A valley which was overlooked by the mountain Gilboa: from whence the Israelites came down (xxviii. 4.) to draw up their army here.

Ver. 2. And the lords of the Philistines passed on by hundreds and by thousands.] When they took a view of their army, the great men appeared, some at the head of a hundred, some of a thousand soldiers.

But David and his men passed on in the rear-ward with Achish.] Who seems to have been the general of the army: and to have made David and his men his life-guard, according to his resolution, xxviii. 2.

Ver. 3. Then said the princes of the Philistines, What do these Hebrews here?] Who they were afraid would prove false to them, and take part with their own countrymen.

And Achish said unto the princes of the Philistines, Is not this David, the servant of Saul the king of Israel, who hath been with me these days, or these years.] The meaning is, I may say years, not days: for he had been with him part of two years: and, if he had not formerly known him, his predecessor had, (xxi. 10.) and it is likely he had held correspondence with him before he came to him.

And I have found no fault in him since he fell unto me unto this day?] This intimates, that he looked on him as revolted from Saul; and, by the experience he had of his fidelity, he thought he might be still trusted.

Ver. 4. And the princes of the Philistines were wroth with him; and the princes of the Philistines said unto him.] In an angry tone.

Make this fellow return, that he may go again to his place which thou hast appointed him.] At Ziklag, which they were contented he should possess.

And let him not go down with us to the battle, lest in the battle he be an adversary to us.] And thereby do them more mischief than the army of the Israelites.

For wherewith should he reconcile himself to his master? should it not be with the heads of these men?] That is, of the Philistines. They reasoned wisely, according to the common practice of mankind; and well it was for David, that they were such politicians: for hereby God delivered him out of a very great strait; either of being an enemy to his country, or false to his friends, and to his trust. And by the same good providence he was sent back to rescue his wives, and the wives and children of his men, who were taken captive.

Ver. 5. Is not this David, of whom they sang one to another in dances, saying, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands?] They remembered that he was their old enemy, who killed Goliath: and was highly magnified for it above Saul himself.

Ver. 6. Then Achish called David, and said unto him, Surely, as the Lord liveth.] He swears by the God whom David worshipped, that he might be the more believed: or, perhaps, he had learned something from David of the true God, though he worshipped others with him.

Thou hast been upright, and thy going out and coming in with me in the host is good in my sight.] He commends him as an unblameable person in his private conversation; and as an excellent commander in his army.

For I have not found evil in thee since the day of thy coming unto me unto this day.] A very honourable testimony from a foreign prince.

Nevertheless the lords favour thee not.] Unto whom Achish was forced to yield: for he was not an absolute king; but the lords of the country still retained a great authority.

Ver. 7. Wherefore now return, and go in peace, that thou displease not the lords of the Philistines.] From the effects of whose envy and jealousy he could not preserve him.

Ver. 8. And David said unto Achish, But what have I done? and what hast thou found in thy servant, so long as I have been with thee unto this day, that I may not go fight against the enemies of my lord the king?] He had told him before that he found not the least fault in him: therefore this question may seem impertinent. But David was to act his part handsomely upon this occasion; so that, though he was inwardly pleased, he would not have them suspect he was glad to be dismissed: and therefore, since the king was satisfied with his fidelity, asks why he might not be trusted to fight against his enemies, and that his lords would give him a reason? But Abarbinel thinks he never intended this; but being chosen by Achish to be the keeper of his head, (xxviii. 2.) he resolved only to discharge this office; but not to join in the battle against Israel.

Ver. 9. And Achish answered and said to David, I know that thou art good in my sight, as an angel of God.] He had learned something, as I observed before, (ver. 6.) of the Hebrew religion: and it appears by this, of their language also. And the meaning is, he looked upon David as a man sent down from heaven to him: all things prospering that he took in hand.

Notwithstanding, the princes of the Philistines have said, He shall not go with us to battle.] They seem to have made such an order in council: which the king durst not contradict.

Ver. 10. Wherefore now rise up early in the morning.] Lest any mischief should come to him, if he delayed his departure.

With thy master's servants that are come with thee.] This intimates, that the lords of the Philistines would not trust them, because they looked on them still as Saul's subjects.

And as soon as ye be up early in the morning, and have light, depart.] He advises them to lose no time, but, as soon as they could see their way, leave the army, and march to Ziklag.

Ver. 11. So David and his men rose up early in the morning, to return into the land of the Philistines.] For now they were in the Philistines' camp, in the land of Israel, at Aphek, (ver. 1.)

And the Philistines went up to Jezreel.] To the battle to the Israelites, who were pitched there, (ver. 1.)

CHAP. XXX.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when David and his men were come to Ziklag on the third day.] So many days' journey it was from the camp of the Philistines to this place. (See the beginning of the next book, ver. 2.)

That the Amalekites had invaded the south, and Ziklag, and smote Ziklag, and burnt it with fire.] To revenge themselves for what David had done to them, (xxvii. 8.) which they might easily do, when he and his men were absent; and but a small, if any, guard left in the place.

Ver. 2. And had taken the women captives that were therein: they slew not any, either great or small, but carried them away, and went on their way.] Towards their own country. This may seem strange, that David having killed all he could meet with, and spared none, neither men nor women, (xxvii. 9. 11.) they should not serve his people in the same kind. But though they sought revenge, yet they desired booty much more: being a poor and very covetous people; who intended to sell them for slaves, and make money of them.

Ver. 3. And David and his men came to the city, and, behold, it was burnt with fire; and their wives, and their sons, and their daughters, were taken captive.] This befel David when he seemed to be in the greatest security: having escaped the fury of Saul, and also the service of the Philistines; who were likely to make Saul pay very dear for his ill usage of David. But such is the state of this world, we are often surprised with sudden unexpected troubles; and, as the proverb is, "Many things fall out between the cup and the lip."

Ver. 4. And David and the people that were with him lifted up their voice and wept, until they had no power to weep.] For such calamities are enough to break the heart of the most courageous and undaunted spirits.

Ver. 5. And David's two wives were taken captive, Ahinoam the Jezreelite, and Abigail the wife of Nabal the Carmelite.] This is set down distinctly, to aggravate David's loss.

Ver. 6. And David was greatly distressed: for the people

spake of stoning him.] As the cause of this calamity, in leaving the city unguarded: or in provoking the Amalekites so grievously as he had done, in the slaughter of all he could find.

Because the soul of the people was grieved, every man for his sons and for his daughters.] Grief took away the use of their reason.

But David encouraged himself in the Lord his God.] Who had never failed him in the greatest distresses: but done great things for him, and promised to do greater.

Ver. 7. And David said to Abiathar the priest, Ahimelech's son, Bring me hither, I pray thee, the ephod.] From these words Petrus Cunæus (lib. i. de Rep. Heb. cap. 14.) concludes, that the kings of Israel might make use of the ephod, as well as the high-priest: because David saith, Bring me hither, &c. But this doth not signify that he himself meant to use it; but only that he desired it might be used for him: according to what is said of Joshua, in Numb. xxvii. 21. that he should stand before Eleazar the priest, who should inquire for him, &c.

And Abiathar brought thither the ephod unto David.] From these words the same Cunæus, in an epistle of his to Caspar Barlæus, (Epist. Ecclesiasticæ, 506. p. 767.) argues for his forenamed opinion, because it is not said he brought it le David, but el David; the former of which, he thinks, might have signified for his use; but this denotes, it was for him to use himself: which he endeavours to confirm from the high privilege which the king had above other men, of sitting in the house of God, &c. But this is confuted lately by a man very learned in these matters, (John Braunius, lib. ii. de Vest. Hebr. Sacerd. cap. 20. n. 32.) who well observes (as Buxtorf also doth), that in the foregoing words David doth say, Bring the ephod, li, i. e. pro me, or mea causa, for me, or in meam gratiam, for my sake.

Ver. 8. And David inquired at the Lord, saying, Shall I pursue after this troop?] He inquired by Abiathar. So all the Hebrew doctors, as Buxtorf observes in his Hist. Urim. cap. 3.

Shall I overtake them?] This shews it is a vain observation of the Jews, that they were not to ask two questions together: for David still continues to do so here, as he had done at Keilah: though God, they say there, had set him right in his inquiry, and taught him to do otherwise.

And he answered him, Pursue; for thou shalt surely overtake them, and without fail recover all.] He answers both questions at once, and tells him also more than he asked; that he should regain all that he had lost: which, no doubt, was a mighty encouragement unto him in his pursuit.

Ver. 9. So David went, he and the six hundred men that were with him, and came to the brook Besor, where those that were left behind stayed.] They that were left to look after the stuff, (ver. 24.) who were so tired, that they were not able to march any farther.

Ver. 10. So David pursued, he and four hundred men: for two hundred abode behind, who were so faint that they could not go over the brook Besor.] Grief, it is likely, made them neglect to take necessary refreshment before they came out.

Ver. 11. And they found an Egyptian in the field.] They knew him to be so by his habit: or, perhaps, they did not know whence he was, until he came to himself and told them. But finding him in the garb of a soldier, they thought he belonged to the Amalekites.

And brought him to David.] Half dead.

And they gave him bread, and he did eat; and they made him drink water.] Natural compassion might move them to this: but they had another motive, which was the hope of making some discovery, by his means, where the enemies were.

Ver. 12. And they gave him a piece of a cake of figs, and two clusters of raisins.] Did all they could to comfort him up, and revive his spirits.

And, when he had eaten, his spirit came again to him; for he had eaten no bread, nor drunk any water, three days and three nights.] Having nobody near him to look after him: and being so sick, he could not look after himself. This is to be understood as Matt. xii. 40. of one whole day, and part of two others: as appears from the next verse, where he saith, Three days ago I fell sick. In the Hebrew, I fell sick this third day; i. e. this is the third day since I fell sick.

Ver. 13. And David said, To whom belongest thou? and whence art thou? And he said, I am a young man of Egypt, servant to an Amalekite; and my master left me, because three days ago I fell sick.] A barbarous act, to leave him there to perish, when they had camels good store for the carriage of men, as well as of their spoil, (ver. 17.) But this inhumanity cost them dear: for by this means they lost their own lives. Such is the wonderful providence of God (as Conr. Pellicanus here piously observes), which governs all the desires, and thoughts, and counsels, and works, and whatsoever is done among men, both the good and the bad.

Ver. 14. And we made an invasion upon the south of the Cherethites.] They are the same with the Philistines. For the Arabians call their country (as Bochartus observes) Keritha, and the Syrians call it Creth. Whose inhabitants the Hebrews call Crethi, or Crethim. And to put all out of doubt, the south of the Cherethites here mentioned, is, in the sixth verse explained, the land of the Philistines. Who were excellent archers, as we may gather from xxxi. 3. (See there.)

And upon the coast that belongeth to Judah.] The south coast of that tribe.

And upon the land of Caleb.] We read no where else of this land: which, in all probability, signifies that south part of Judah which was given to Caleb, and which his posterity inherited, (Josh. xiv. 13.)

And we burnt Ziklag with fire.] With which they seem to have ended their expedition.

Ver. 15. And David said, Canst thou bring me down to this company? And he said, Swear unto me by the Lord, that thou wilt neither kill me, nor deliver me into the hand of my master.] Who, it is likely, had otherwise been cruel to him: and, therefore, he had no mind to serve him any longer. Besides, his service, I suppose, was no better than slavery.

And I will bring thee down to this company.] For he heard them say, it is likely, where they would stay and rest themselves.

Ver. 16. And when he had brought him down.] Who had given him security, no doubt, by his oath, as he desired: and that, as I observed before, was such a sacred thing in ancient times, that all men relied upon it.

Behold, they were spread abroad upon the earth, eating and drinking, and dancing, because of the great spoil they had taken out of the land of the Philistines, and out of the land of Judah.] They had laid aside their arms, and were feasting and making merry; as men are wont to do, when they have had great success in their enterprises.

Ver. 17. And David smote them from the twilight even unto the evening of the next day.] He came upon them in the evening, when they were refreshing and resting themselves with mirth and jollity: being secure that no danger was near them; because the Israelites and the Philistines (among whom they thought David was) were ready to engage; so that he could no more come to revenge himself, than the Philistines could for the injuries done to them. And it is probable David let them fall asleep, when they had eaten and drunk liberally; and at peep of day fell upon them, and hunted them until the evening, which begun the next day.

And there escaped not a man of them, save four hundred young men, that rode upon camels.] The country of Arabia, where this people lived, abounded with camels: one sort of which run very swiftly. They were used also by some nations in battle: as Vegetius observes, lib. iii. de Re Militari, cap. 23. (See Stewechius's Annotations on him.)

Ver. 18. And recovered all that the Amalekites had carried away; and David rescued his two wives.] Which are here particularly mentioned, because he had the greatest concern for them.

Ver. 19. And there was nothing lacking to them, neither small nor great, neither son nor daughter, neither spoil, nor any thing they had taken to them.] According to the word of God, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 20. And David took all the flocks and the herds.] Which had been taken by the Amalekites from the Philistines, and other places.

Which they drave before those other cattle.] His soldiers drave them before those cattle that had been taken from David and his men.

And said, This is David's spoil.] Not that he challenged it all to himself: but that it was acquired by his valour and conduct; which they now magnified, who lately spake of stoning him. For some think they sung a triumphant song, and that this was the burden of it: which they repeated at the end of every verse.

Ver. 21. And David came to the two hundred men, which were so faint that they could not follow David, whom he had made also to abide at the brook Besor.] That they might look after their stuff.

And they went forth to meet David, and to meet the people that were with him.] To congratulate their happy success: and to receive their wives and children, who had been carried captive.

And when David came unto the people, he saluted them.] He was glad to see them, and inquired how they did (as it is in the margin), for he had left them very weak.

Ver. 22. Then answered all the wicked men, and men of Belial, of those that went with David, and said.] It is likely David told these two hundred men, when he saluted them, that they should lose nothing by their not being able to go along with him: which made these men, who had no conscience, but were only greedy of prey, to say what follows.

Because they went not with us, we will not give them aught of the spoil which we have recovered, save to every man his wife and his children, that he may lead them away, and depart.] This was a savage resolution of such as feared not God, nor regarded men: since it was not the choice of their brethren to stay behind, but mere necessity and inability to travel further.

Ver. 23. Then said David.] Who still preserved his authority over the most wicked among them.

Ye shall not do so, my brethren.] He overrules them: but thought fit to do it in a friendly manner.

With that which God hath given us, who hath preserved us, and delivered the company that came against us into our hand.] As much as to say, When God hath been so good to us, we ought not to be unkind to our brethren.

Ver. 24. For who will hearken unto you in this matter?] No equal persons, he was confident, would be of their opinion, if the matter was referred to them.

But as his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff: their parts shall be alike.] Polybius explains the order of dividing the spoils of war, (as Grotius observes, lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 6. sect. 17.) some of which was allotted those who remained in the camp. But the proportions were various in several places. In some, a simple portion was given to a footman; a double to a centurion; and a treble to a horseman. In other places they varied from this: but howsoever the division was made, the commander-in-chief was allowed to take the best of the spoil to himself: as David perhaps now did: and then left the rest to be equally divided among his men. But the Talmudists say, that, in aftertimes, the king had all the royal furniture that was found in the tent of the conquered prince given unto him for his share.

Ver. 25. And it was so, from that day forward, that he made it a statute and an ordinance for Israel unto this day.] The equity of this law appears from hence: that by common consent these two hundred men were left behind to look after their baggage: and they were part of the same body of men, linked together in the same common society: and were hindered by mere weariness from going to fight, which otherwise they would have done; and their will was accepted for the deed; and they were in the same common danger; for if the four hundred had been routed, their enemies would soon have cut them off.

This law may seem to have been ordained before by God himself in Numb. xxxi. Which if it were, it may be thought strange that David should not allege that law to quiet the present contention. But it is evident this was a very different case from that: for threescore thousand who stayed at home, had no more among them than the twelve thousand had who went to the battle, (ver. 27. of that chapter.) And what was then done was not ordained to be observed as a statute through all generations. This therefore was a new law, but perpetually continued to the time of the Maccabees; as appears from the second book of their history, chap. viii. ver. 28. 30. And Osiander observes, that it pleased the Romans to do the same, as Festus tells us. (See Josh. xxii. 8.) But the most ancient custom among the Romans was (as Godescalcus Stewechius shews at large, upon Vegetius de Re Militari, lib. ii. cap. 7.) to burn part of the spoils, as an offering to their gods; and for the rest, sometimes the soldiers were permitted to keep what every man had got to himself: and sometimes, if the necessities of the commonwealth required, they were all brought to the quæstor, to be put into the public treasury. Out of those which every man kept to himself, they were wont, when they came home, to have some of them upon the posts of the gates to their houses: which it was lawful to remove when a house was sold to another man.

Ver. 26. And when David came to Ziklag, he sent of the spoil to the elders of Judah, even to his friends.] By this it seems plain, that he had reserved some part of the spoil to himself: out of which he made presents to his friends: some of which were of the best quality in the tribe of Judah.

Saying, Behold, a present for you of the spoil of the enemies of the Lord.] In the Hebrew, a blessing for you, &c. So he calls the present, because it was a token that he wished all prosperity to them: who had been kind to him in his banishment, and helped to maintain and protect him: and whom he was desirous still to oblige, that they might more readily receive him, when he had a right to take possession of the kingdom.

Ver. 27. And to them which were in Beth-el.] This seems to be the same place with that which is called Baalath and Kirjath-baal, Josh. xv. 9. 60.

And to them which were in South Ramoth.] A place in the tribe of Simeon, (Josh. xix. 8.) called Ramoth in the south, to distinguish it from Ramoth-Gilead, which lay northward. By which it appears he had other friends, who sometimes gave him shelter, or subsistence, besides those in his own tribe.

And to them which were in Jattir.] A town in the mountainous part of the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 48.)

Ver. 28. And to them that were in Aroer, &c.] Not that on the other side Jordan, (mentioned in Numb. xxxii.) but some other place, in the tribe of Judah, or some neighbouring tribe, where the other places here mentioned were: for we no where read, that David ever fled, during Saul's persecution, into the country beyond Jordan.

Ver. 29. And to them which were in Rachal, and to them which were in the cities of the Jerahmeelites.] These people lay on the south of Judah, (xxvii. 10.) where, it is likely, Rachal also was.

And to them that were in the cities of the Kenites.] Who were near to the Jerahmeelites, it appears from the forenamed place.

Ver. 30. And to those that were in Hormah.] This was a city in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 30.) afterward given unto the tribe of Simeon, (Josh. xix. 4.)

And to them that were in Chor-ashan, and to them that were in Athach.] It is probable that these two places were also in the same tribe.

Ver. 31. And to them which were in Hebron.] Which was certainly a city of Judah: (Josh. xv. 54.) where David was first made king, and reigned over that tribe, (2 Sam. ii. 1, 2, &c.)

And to all the places where David and his men were wont to haunt.] Either to lurk among them, or to get provisions, or intelligence from them.

CHAP. XXXI.

Ver. 1. AND the Philistines fought against Israel.] i. e. Gave them battle: and as they began the quarrel, (xxix. 1.) so they seem to have begun the fight.

And the men of Israel fled from before the Philistines, and fell down slain in Mount Gilboa.] They fled thither from the valley of Jezreel, and were there slain in great numbers.

Ver. 2. And the Philistines followed hard upon Saul and upon his sons.] Who were the leaders of the army: which the Philistines thought would never rally again, if they were slain or taken.

And the Philistines slew Jonathan, and Abinadab, and Melchi-shua, Saul's sons.] It seems Ish-bosheth was not there, being no warlike man; or he escaped out of the battle by flight, as Abner and other great men did: or perhaps he was left at home to manage domestic affairs. Jonathan seems to have deserved a better fate: but the providence of God suffered him to be slain, that David might more easily come to the throne. For though he had freely consented to it, yet he was such a favourite of the people, that many of them might have stickled for him.

Ver. 3. And the battle went sore against Saul.] They pursued him so close, that there was no hope he could escape.

And the archers hit him; and he was sorely wounded of the archers.] In the Hebrew the words are, the archers found him: which signifies, in that language, to rush upon one on a sudden. Bows and arrows were the principal weapons of this nation; in the use of which they were very dexterous, and did terrible execution. Which is the reason, some think, that David, when he came to the throne, taught the Israelites the use of the bow, (as we read in the next book, chap. i. ver. 18.) that they might not be inferior to the Philistines, nor fall into the like disaster that Saul had done. And when he had made peace with the Philistines, he took some of their archers, with whom he was well acquainted, to be the keepers of his body: which are those so often mentioned in the following books, under the name of Cherethites, 2 Sam. viii. 18. xv. 18. xx. 7. 1 Kings i. 38. 44. 1 Chron. xviii. 17. in all which places, where the Hebrew hath the word cerethi, the Chaldee paraphrast interprets it archers. (See Bochartus, in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 15. p. 459.)

Ver. 4. Then said Saul unto his armour-bearer, Draw thy sword, and thrust me through therewith.] For though he had received many wounds, yet they were not mortal; at least, not for the present.

Lest these uncircumcised come and thrust me through, and abuse me.] He was afraid they might put him to some ignominious death, or make sport with him, as they did with Samson.

But his armour-bearer would not; for he was sore afraid.] Dreaded to think of killing his king.

Therefore Saul took a sword, and fell upon it.] And killed himself, as appears by the next words.

Ver. 5. And when his armour-bearer saw that Saul was dead, he fell likewise upon his sword, and died with him.] Some of the Jews think this was Doeg.

Ver. 6. So Saul died, and his three sons, and his armour- bearer, and all his men, the same day together.] That is, all the men that attended upon his person.

Ver. 7. And when the men of Israel that were on the other side of the valley.] Of Jezreel.

And they that were on the other side Jordan.] Or rather on this side Jordan; for the Hebrew word signifies either side. And there was no occasion for those beyond Jordan to flee.

Saw that the men of Israel fled, and that Saul and his sons were dead, they forsook the cities, and fled.] Being afraid, I suppose, to be carried captive.

And the Philistines came and dwelt in them.] The consternation being so great, that there were none to oppose them.

Ver. 8. And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came to strip the slain, that they found Saul and his three sons fallen in Mount Gilboa.] It was contrary to military discipline, presently to fall upon the spoil, which they did not till the next day.

And they cut off his head.] As David had done the head of Goliath.

And stripped off his armour, and sent into the land of the Philistines round about.] They sent the news of this great victory; and perhaps his head and armour in token of it.

To publish it in the house of their idols, and among the people.] That they might give thanks to their gods for the victory they had obtained.

Ver. 10. And they put his armour in the house of Ashtaroth.] As the sword of Goliath was laid up in the tabernacle.

And they fastened his body to the wall of Beth-shan.] To expose it, as we do the bodies of great malefactors, to public shame and reproach. And thus it appears, by ver. 12. they did with the bodies of his sons.

Ver. 11. And when the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead heard of that which the Philistines had done to Saul.] They lived on the other side Jordan; for the people on this side were fled.

Ver. 12. All the valiant men arose, and went all night.] To avoid discovery.

And took the body of Saul, and the bodies of his sons, from the wall of Beth-shan.] Which was a city in the tribe of Manasseh, not far from Jordan and the sea of Gennesaret: out of which the Manassites could not expel the old inhabitants, (Judg. i. 27.) To this place they of Jabesh might march in a night's time, and accomplish their design. Aristotle reports, in the fifth book of his Ethics (as Strigelius here observes), that the temples of the Graces were built in the very midst of the cities of the Greeks, that all men might be admonished to be grateful. Of which virtue the men of Jabesh-Gilead gave a most noble example: who, being delivered by Saul in the beginning of his reign from the Ammonites, when they were in danger to lose their eyes, (chap. xi.) now repay his care of them when he was dead, by not suffering his carcass to want the honour of burial.

And came to Jabesh, and burnt them there.] Some think they burnt their flesh, which was rotten and putrid: others, that they poured upon their flesh aromatic hot spices, such as Joseph ordered for the embalming of his father: or, as the Targum understands it, they burnt upon, or over them. Where Kimchi notes, that the paraphrast had respect to the custom delivered down from their ancestors, of burning the beds and other utensils of the dead upon their graves; or to the burning of spices. Certain it is, there was no such custom as this among the Jews, of burning the bodies of the dead. Though some think that these people imitated the heathenish custom, affecting singularity, as appears from the story of the Benjamites, Judg. xxi. 8. where we read, they alone would not come to the assembly of the whole nation. Such a singularity Gierus thinks they were now guilty of: and, therefore, in a parallel place to this, 1 Chron. x. 11. there is no mention made of this burning: either because it was an unwonted practice, or unworthy to be remembered.

Ver. 13. And they took their bodies, and buried them under a tree in Jabesh.] In this also there seems to be some of the superstition of the gentiles: among whom trees were accounted sacred things.

And fasted seven days.] Expressed great sorrow: of which this was a token. Lucian saith, in his book de Lucta, that the Greeks were wont in their funerals neither to eat nor drink for three days. But this is not to be so understood: but that they fasted for seven days together till the evening (as the manner of fasting was among the Jews), and eat nothing all day.

THE SECOND BOOK OF SAMUEL.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass, after the death of Saul, when David was returned from the slaughter of the Amalekites.] The fight between Saul and the Philistines fell out, when David was in pursuit of the Amalekites.

And David had abode about two days in Ziklag.] Which it seems the Amalekites had not quite burnt; contenting themselves with the spoil.

Ver. 2. It came even to pass on the third day.] After his coming into Ziklag.

That, behold, a man came out of the camp from Saul with his clothes rent, and earth upon his head.] As the manner of deep mourners was. (See 1 Sam. iv. 4.)

And so it was, when he came to David, that he fell on the earth, and did obeisance.] Honoured him as his king.

Ver. 3. And David said, From whence comest thou? And he said, Out of the camp of Israel am I escaped.] Some of the Jews have a conceit, that this was Doeg's son; of which, though there was no proof, yet the objection against it is of no value. For Doeg was an Edomite, and this person an Amalekite, which seems inconsistent with his being the son of Doeg. But it is to be considered, that all Amalekites were also Edomites: though all Edomites were not Amalekites. For Amalek was Esau's grandson, by his son Eliphaz, (Gen. xxxvi. 15, 16.)

Ver. 4. And David said, How went the matter? I pray thee tell me. And he answered, That the people are fled from the battle, and many of the people also are fallen and dead; and Saul and Jonathan his son are dead also.] He relates the matter very orderly; that first the Israelites were routed and fled; and then in the pursuit of them many were slain; and in conclusion, Saul and Jonathan his son. Which two he only mentions; thinking that David was principally concerned in them.

Ver. 5. And David said unto the young man that told him, How knowest thou that Saul and Jonathan are dead?] He might easily know that the Israelites were beaten; but not so easily that these were in the number of the slain.

Ver. 6. And the young man that told him, said, As I happened by chance upon Mount Gilboa.] One would think by this, that he was not a soldier, but a countryman, who had occasion to go that way.

Behold, Saul leaned upon his spear.] Endeavouring to run it through his body.

And, lo, the chariots and horsemen followed hard after him.] So that he feared he should fall into their hands, before he could dispatch himself.

Ver. 7. And when he looked behind him, he saw me, and called unto me: and I answered, Here am I.] He looked round about him, to see if there were any near him of his servants.

Ver. 8. And he said unto me, Who art thou? and I answered, I am an Amalekite.] He did not dissemble his country, though he knew Saul had no reason to be a friend to it.

Ver. 9. And he said unto me again, Stand, I pray thee, upon me, and slay me.] He would have him lean so hard upon him, with the whole weight of his body, that the spear might run through him; which he had not strength to make it do. This is not a likely story: for Saul, in all probability, would have been as unwilling to be killed by an Amalekite, as by a Philistine.

For anguish is come upon me.] The Hebrew word schabatz is variously translated. By some, trembling; by others, convulsions; by the LXX. σκότος, darkness. Kimchi saith it was a disease, which some say was the cramp: but in Scripture, as Braunius observes, (lib. i. de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. cap. 17. sect. 9.) it never signifies any one of these things, but some ornament in a garment. And therefore our marginal translation is better, my embroidered coat hinders the spear from going far into my body: or his coat of mail, as Diodate translates it: for it consisted of little rings one within another, which made it hard to penetrate. And thus Ralbag among the Jews understands it.

Because my life is yet whole within me.] He was not mortally wounded.

Ver. 10. So I stood upon him, and slew him, because I was sure he could not live after he was fallen.] This is contrary to what Saul said just before, that his life was whole in him (unless he meant that the Philistines would instantly come upon him and kill him), and it was as false that he slew him; for it appears by the foregoing relation, that Saul killed himself: and that not with a spear, but with his sword, (xxxi. 4.) But this the young man said to excuse himself, if David did not approve the fact.

And I took the crown that was on his head, and the bracelets that were on his arms, and have brought them hither unto my lord.] Saul was the first that had the ensigns of royal authority; for the judges had none; but were mere ministers of God (during his pleasure), who was their king and governor. And it is not likely that Saul wore his crown when he was in the fight (for that had been to set out himself a mark for the Philistines to shoot at), but it was carried along with him into the field, by some that attended him; to be ready to put on, if he had gotten the victory, and triumphed. The Jews think that Doeg, his armour-bearer, had it in his custody: who, before he killed himself, gave it to his son (this young Amalekite), and bade him carry it to David; hoping he might thereby ingratiate himself with him.

Ver. 11. And David took hold of his clothes, and rent them; and likewise all the men that were with him.] That is, all his attendants. Every one knows that this was a token of very great sorrow, and of a violent passion: which all nations used, as we learn from Homer, Herodotus, Virgil, and other ancient authors.

Ver. 12. And they mourned and wept.] The whole company made great lamentations, and shed many tears.

And fasted until even.] Till the evening sacrifice was offered: though Buxtorf (in his Synag. Judaica) thinks they abstained from all meat and drink till the stars appeared.

For Saul, and for Jonathan his son, and for the people of the Lord, and for the house of Israel; because they were fallen by the sword.] He had great reason to mourn for Jonathan, who was his great friend; but some think he should have rejoiced to hear of Saul's death, who was his bitter enemy. But there were many reasons for his bewailing his death, as a public person, who was lately reconciled to him; and might possibly have returned to a better mind, if he had lived longer. However, the manner of his death very much affected him; and the more, because he heard perhaps of his being just before to consult a witch, and gave no tokens of his repentance. The Jews say, in both the Talmuds, that he mourned for Saul, as the prince of the great Sanhedrin; and for Jonathan, as the father of it. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 16. sect. 4.)

Ver. 13. And David said unto the young man that told him, Whence art thou? And he said, I am the son of a stranger, an Amalekite.] He had told David once before who he was, in the relation he made of his discourse with Saul, (ver. 8.) But being astonished at the news, he did not attend unto that circumstance, or had forgot it. Besides, a good judge ought to examine things strictly, and not to trust unto the first answer.

Ver. 14. And David said, How, wast thou not afraid to stretch forth thy hand to destroy the Lord's anointed?]

Who, it is possible, might have recovered, and been carried off by some of his own men; the Philistines, by some extraordinary providence of God, being diverted from their pursuit. And it was the greater presumption of this young man to do it; since one of Saul's own servants durst not venture upon such a fact.

Ver. 15. And David called one of the young men.] One of the guards of his body.

And said unto him, Go near, and fall upon him. And he smote him that he died.] There was a known law, that no man should be condemned out of the mouth of one witness: and the Jews tell us, that no judge was to sit alone, but to have some other joined with him: and that no man's testimony was to be taken against himself. But this was the singular prerogative of their kings, that they might alone hear any man's cause, and condemn him; and that out of the mouth of one witness, or from his own confession. Of which Maimonides gives this case of the Amalekite as an instance: which he looks upon as an extraordinary example, and as the king's process. (See Schickard, de Jure Regis, cap. 4. Theor. 14. and my notes upon Josh. vii. 25.) But after all, it looks something hard, that a man should be put to death for doing what Saul himself desired, and when he was sure (if this man said true) that he could not live. Abarbinel therefore thinks, that this man being an Amalekite, David supposed he might kill Saul out of revenge, for the slaughter he had made of his people.

Ver. 16. And David said unto him, Thy blood be upon thy head: for thy mouth hath testified against thee, saying, I have slain the Lord's anointed.] That is, thou art the cause of thy own death; or, the blood thou hast shed is the reason of thy death.

Ver. 17. And David lamented with this lamentation over Saul, and over Jonathan his son.] He and his servants had lamented them before, (ver. 12.) but now David composed a song for a public and universal lamentation.

Ver. 18. (Also he bade them teach the children of Judah.] Among whom he now was; and over whom he first reigned. This comes in as a parenthesis between the former verse and what follows; to shew his early endeavours to promote the good of the people.

The use of the bow.] While he made lamentation for the dead, he did not neglect the care of the living: that they might be provided with better means to defend themselves. For they now looking upon him as the king God designed should rule over them, he ordered they should immediately learn the skill of using bows and arrows, in which the Philistines excelled them. (See what I have noted, 1 Sam. xxxi. 3.) Some indeed make this the title of the following song, which they were to sing among their military exercises: but the former seems a more natural interpretation; which Conradus Pellicanus proposed in the beginning of the Reformation. The Jews, saith he, hitherto used only slings and swords; but now were taught to shoot with bows and arrows: for it did not misbecome them to learn the art of defending themselves from infidels. And indeed the benefit of having good archers in an army is so great, that Cato took the pains to describe it in his book of Military Discipline, as Vegetius tells us: who says, that Scipio hoped for no success in Africa against the Numantines, "nisi in omnibus centuriis lectos sagittarios miscuisset," unless he had mingled some choice archers with every company of soldiers, commanded by a centurion, (lib. i. cap. 15.) And as this was done among the footmen, so in the next book he makes it the qualification of a captain of horse, "sagittas doctissime mittere," to shoot arrows most skilfully, (lib. ii. cap. 14.)

Behold, it is written in the book of Jasher).] That is, this order for teaching the children of Judah the use of the bow was more largely recorded there. But what book this was is very uncertain: yet Victorinus Strigelius adventures to say, "Haud dubie fuit historia ecclesiastica, qualis nunc est Eusebiana, aut Theodoretica:" Without doubt it was an ecclesiastical history, like that which we now have of Eusebius or Theodoret. (See my notes upon Josh. x. 13.) I should rather say, that Jasher signifying right, it was a book concerning the right art of making war: upon which subject the ancient Romans wrote many books: particularly Cato, Cornelius Celsus, Frontinus, and Paternus; which were abridged, as he himself tells us, by Vegetius de Re Militari, lib. i. cap. 8. Procopius Gazæus thinks these words declare, "Hanc historiam ex multis libris collectam esse;" that this history was gathered out of many prophetical books.

Ver. 19. The beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places.] The flower of the nation; their choice young men: together with Saul and his sons.

How are the mighty fallen!] What a slaughter is made among the valiant men!

Ver. 20. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon.] The city Gath seems to have been the metropolis of the Philistines' country; and Askelon next to it. Where it was in vain to wish this might not be published: for it was done already. Therefore these are only expressions of great sadness and sorrow, that this overthrow should be published, which he could not but wish had never been heard of.

Lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph.] According to the manner of those countries; where the women celebrated, with songs and dances, the victory of the men over their enemies. (See Exod. xv. 1, &c. Judg. xi. 34.)

Ver. 21. Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither let there be rain upon you, nor fields of offerings.] Fruitful fields, from whence offerings might be brought to the house of God. These are poetical expressions, from the common language of mankind: who are wont to speak with abhorrence of those places, and to curse them, where any calamity hath befallen their friends.

For there the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away.] They were forced to throw away their shields, that they might run the faster away; which was a great disgrace to them.

The shield of Saul, as though he had not been anointed with oil.] As if he had been a common soldier. So these words are generally interpreted, as spoken of Saul. But the words, as though he had, are not in the Hebrew; where there is only, not anointed with oil: which may as well relate to the shield, as the Jews interpret it, and thus explain it:—By the holy oil men were set apart for some great office; as that of priests, and sometimes kings. Now when any person, in a sudden danger of the state, was chosen to be captain-general of their army, they were wont to anoint him: that by this sight he might be animated to fight the Lord's battles courageously. And such a person was called, The anointed of war: nay, sometimes (they say) their armour was anointed, to increase their confidence: just as the vessels of the tabernacle were which the priests used: unto which they think David alludes in these words. See Guil. Schickardus, cap. 1. Theor. 4. of his Jus Regium: where Carpzovius observes, that these words Isa. xxi. 9. favour this interpretation: and are alleged by Rasi and Ralbag, as parallel to this place. But he confesses he can find no where that their shields, or other warlike instruments, were anointed with holy oil, to make them fight with greater boldness.

Ver. 22. From the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, the bow of Jonathan turned not back.] By this it appears, that Jonathan was a very skilful archer (as perhaps some other great men were), though the common people were not trained up to the use of the bow. Which Jonathan so well managed, that as he always hit his mark, so his arrows pierced into the very entrails of the most mighty men.

And the sword of Saul returned not empty.] Always did great execution (as we now speak) upon those whom he fought withal.

Ver. 23. Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant in their lives.] Courteous and kind to their people: which is a great virtue in princes. To David, indeed, Saul expressed a great deal of ill nature: but that proceeded from Saul's jealousy, and fear that he would supplant his family, and place himself in the throne. And this highly advances the glory of David, that he commends his greatest enemy for what was praiseworthy in him: as Cæsar, they say, could not but shed some tears when Pompey's head was brought to him, though we read of nothing that he spake in his praise.

And in their death they were not divided.] Jonathan stuck close to his father in the battle; and demonstrated he was engaged in no conspiracy against him, as he had sometime charged him.

They were swifter than eagles.] In pursuing their enemies. For this, I have often observed, was a requisite quality in an excellent warrior: therefore, in the choice of soldiers, Vegetius saith, "Et velocitas requirenda est et robur;" Both swiftness and strength were to be required, (lib. i. de Re Militari, cap. 8.) The great advantages of being a swift runner, he enumerates in the next chapter.

They were stronger than lions.] In overthrowing their enemies, when they overtook them.

Ver. 24. Ye daughters of Israel, weep over Saul, who clothed you in scarlet, with other delights; and put ornaments of gold upon your apparel.] He would have the women bear a part in this lamentation over Saul, who adorned them with the rich spoils of their enemies. The word other before delights is not in the Hebrew; but the meaning seems to be, that they delighted in fine clothes, which they did not want while Saul lived. And scarlet was every where accounted the most precious colour: the emperor's mantle being of scarlet, as Braunius observes, lib. i. cap. 15. de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr.

Ver. 25. How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle! O Jonathan, thou wast slain in thy high places!] Of his own country, which he valiantly defended.

Ver. 26. I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan: very pleasant hast thou been unto me.] His grief was as great for his death, as the pleasure had been which he took in his company while he lived.

Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women.] No less ardent, sincere, and sweet, than the highest conjugal affection. Which ought to be (as Strigelius here glosses) ardent without simulation, sincere without any suspicions, and sweet without morosity or disdain.

Ver. 27. How are the mighty fallen.] This is repeated three times in this song: being an interlocutory verse.

And the weapons of war perished!] All military glory gone from Israel.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, that after this David inquired of the Lord.] By Abiathar the high-priest, as he had often done before, (1 Sam. xxvi. 9. and other places.)

Saying, Shall I go up into any of the cities of Judah?] Which was his own tribe, where he had most friends; and therefore it was proper, he thought, to address himself to them, who were best affected to him. But though he had a right to the kingdom by God's designation, yet he would not enter into possession, nor take upon him the administration of affairs, without God's advice and direction.

And the Lord said, Go up.] He approved of his going up into that tribe; and thereby gave him hope of success.

And he said, Whither shall I go up?] He asked these questions distinctly, as the Jews say the manner was to do, and not two questions at once. (See upon 1 Sam. xxiii. 11. and see what I have further noted, xxx. 8.)

And he said, Unto Hebron.] Which was a principal city in that tribe; and in the middle of it: where the people might more conveniently and easily resort to him, than in Ziklag. Which was his own town by the gift of Achish, and at first in the lot of Judah. (See 1 Sam. xxvii. 6.)

Ver. 2. So David went up thither, he and his two wives, Ahinoam the Jezreelite, and Abigail, Nabal's wife, the Carmelite.] Who being hitherto companions in his troubles, were now advanced to be partakers of his prosperity. This Theogena the wife of Agathocles (as Strigelius observes) made the character of a good wife, who in marriage enters into society with a husband, in all things, both good and evil.

Ver. 3. And his men that were with him did David bring up, every man with his household.] He took care to provide for his followers, and their families, according to every one's merit. But this, it is likely, was not done till he was settled: for to go up with so many armed men, had been to frighten them into compliance.

And they dwelt in the cities of Hebron.] Which was given to the priests to be a city of refuge, (Josh. xxi. 11, 12.) and therefore could not contain all David's followers; but only him and his court. The rest were disposed of in the cities depending upon Hebron.

Ver. 4. And the men of Judah came.] The principal persons, who represented the rest.

And there they anointed David king.] Who had been anointed privately by Samuel some time ago; but that was only a designation of him to the kingdom: into which he was now solemnly inaugurated by this public unction.

Over the house of Judah.] Who would not presume to know the sense of all Israel: though they hoped they would follow this example; as they afterward did, and anointed him again, (chap. v. ver. 3.)

And they told David, That the men of Jabesh-Gilead were they who had buried Saul.] Which it seems he had not heard of while he was in Ziklag; but now (by some discourse about Saul's death) that noble action was related to him; which is recorded, to their honour, in 1 Sam. xxxi. 11—13.

Ver. 5. And David sent messengers to the men of Jabesh-Gilead, saying, Blessed be ye of the Lord, that ye have shewed this kindness to your lord, even unto Saul, and have buried him.] This demonstrates, both the great piety and the great prudence of David. For he testified the true kindness he had for Saul, though his virulent enemy: and by wishing so heartily the men of Jabesh might be rewarded for what they had done, he invited them (who were Israelites on the other side of Jordan) to own him for their king.

Ver. 6. Now the Lord shew kindness and truth unto you: and I also will requite you this kindness, because ye have done this thing.] He doth not content himself merely with praying God to reward them (which he repeats again), but promises that he would take care of them, by defending them from the Philistines, if they should offer to invade them, for entering their country without leave, and taking from thence the trophies of their victory.

Ver. 7. Now, therefore, let your hands be strong, and be ye valiant.] As they had been to a high degree, (1 Sam. xxxi. 12.)

For your master, Saul, is dead.] Or, though your master, Saul, be dead.

And also the house of Judah have anointed me king over them.] He would not have them discouraged, because they wanted one to head them; for he, being invested with the royal dignity by the tribe of Judah, would look upon himself as bound to protect them also: though they had not owned him for their sovereign.

Ver. 8. But Abner the son of Ner, captain of Saul's host.] A man of the greatest authority in Israel, after Saul was dead, being general of all their forces.

Took Ish-bosheth, the son of Saul.] Called Esh-Baal, 1 Chron. viii. 33. as there are several other names which end indifferently, either in Bosheth, or Baal. For instance, Gideon is called Jerubbaal, Judg. ix. 1. and Jerubbesheth, 2 Sam. xi. 21. and Mephibosheth is called Meribbaal, 1 Chron. viii. 34. For Bosheth signifies shame and confusion; and Baal being an infamous idol, the Holy Scripture makes these names end promiscuously either in Baal, or Bosheth, or Besheth.

And brought him over.] The river Jordan.

To Mahanaim.] A place in the tribe of Gad, (Josh. xiii. 26.) So called from the appearance of a host of angels to Jacob, as he came to Padan-Aram, with his household, (Gen. xxxii. 1.) Here Abner thought he might most securely do what follows, being at a distance from David, under whom he could not promise himself that command and authority, which he hoped to maintain under Ish-bosheth.

Ver. 9. And he made him king over Gilead.] Over all the tribes on the other side Jordan; which are comprehended under this name.

And over the Ashurites.] The Chaldee paraphrast understands hereby, the tribe of Asher; who, though remote from Mahanaim, were forward to acknowledge him.

And over Jezreel.] A large and noble valley, on the borders of Zebulun, Issachar, and Naphtali: who are all comprehended under this word.

And over Ephraim, and over Benjamin.] Under whom the Simeonites are comprehended.

And over all Israel.] All the tribes on this side Jordan, save the tribe of Judah.

Ver. 10. Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, was forty years old when he began to reign.] Therefore he was born that very year in which Saul was made king; for he reigned forty years, as St. Paul tells us, Acts xiii. 21.

And reigned two years.] Before there was any hostility between him and David. So Ralbag expounds it, who makes this cohere with ver. 12. it being a mere fancy of the Jews, in Seder Olam Rabba, that the throne was vacant, and there was no king in Israel for five years. Victorinus Strigelius's conjecture is far better; who, after he had given the foregoing interpretation of Ralbag, adds, that after the war broke out between David and Ish-bosheth, and David waxed stronger and stronger, (iii. 1.) Ish-bosheth being an unactive prince, and unfit to command, Abner took the administration of the government upon himself, and managed the war the other five years which passed before David came to the throne of Israel. These five years the Scripture doth not reckon as a part of Ish-bosheth's reign; because he had the mere name of a king, but no authority at all.

But the house of Judah followed David.] Stuck close to him, and were entirely at his command.

Ver. 11. And the time that David was king in Hebron over the house of Judah was seven years and six months.] So long, therefore, Ish-bosheth reigned over Israel. Unless we will suppose, either that the Israelites were five years deliberating whether he or Mephibosheth should be king (whose right it was by the laws of succession), or that he reigning two years immediately after the death of Saul, they were five years deliberating whether they should own David or not: neither of which is probable, as Ralbag thinks; who judiciously observes, that those words, he reigned two years, are to be joined with ver. 12. And Abner, the son of Ner, went out, &c. That is, saith he, the two first years of his reign there was no war between the house of Saul and David: and there had been no open war, if Abner had not been the author of it, &c.

Ver. 12. And Abner the son of Ner, and the servants of Ish-bosheth the son of Saul.] The principal officers about the king.

Went out from Mahanaim to Gibeon.] They passed over Jordan into the country of Benjamin, where Gibeon was, (Josh. xviii. 25.) to fight with Judah, and to bring them into the obedience of Saul's son. It is observable, that David did not begin any hostility; but waited to see how God would dispose things in his favour.

Ver. 13. And Joab the son of Zeruiah, and the servants of David, went out.] To oppose the designs of the Israelites; for Joab was the chief commander of David's forces; whom the principal officers of his household attended.

And they met together by the pool of Gibeon: and they sat down, the one on one side of the pool, and the other on the other side of the pool.] The two armies faced one another (as we now speak), being parted only by the pool that was between them.

Ver. 14. And Abner said unto Joab.] I suppose David had commanded Joab not to begin the quarrel, but only stand upon his defence. For he had sworn to Saul, that he would not cut off his seed; and therefore would not willingly engage against Ish-bosheth, (1 Sam. xxiv. 21.)

Let the young men arise, and play before us.] He desires that some soldiers might be picked out from the rest, and make the two armies sport, as the gladiators were wont to do in aftertimes among the Romans: whereby also they might make a trial of their courage and strength. So Josephus saith, Abner was desirous to learn, πότερος αὐτῶν ἀνδρειοτέρους στρατιώτας ἔχῃ, which of they two had the bravest soldiers.

Ver. 15. Then there arose, and went over.] The pool of Gibeon.

Twelve of Benjamin, which pertained to Ish-bosheth the son of Saul.] They still were forward to begin the hostility; and Abner chose this number out of Benjamin, for the honour (I suppose) of his own tribe, and because they were a valiant sort of people, as appears by the story in Judg. xx.

And twelve of the servants of David.] Whose valour, no doubt, had been tried in other exploits.

Ver. 16. And they caught every man his fellow.] That is, the servants of David, last mentioned, caught each of them every one of the Benjamites that was his opposite.

By the head.] That is, by the hair of his head, which they wore very long in those days.

And thrust his sword in his fellow's side.] That is, David's men killed every one of the Benjamites with whom they were engaged: so, some say, Josephus understood it; though I can find no such thing in him.

So they fell down together.] All the twelve men of Benjamin fell down dead together.

Therefore was the place called Helkath-hazzurim, which is in Gibeon.] The Hebrew words signify, the field of strong men; as hard and firm as a rock.

Ver. 17. And there was a very sore battle that day.] The men of Israel, enraged at the loss of their valiant men, maintained a furious fight the rest of that day.

And Abner was beaten, and the men of Israel, before the servants of David.] But still success followed the men of Judah.

Ver. 18. And there were three sons of Zeruiah there.] She was David's sister: and therefore these were his nephews.

Joab, Abishai, and Asahel.] All three very valiant men, and great commanders, as appears from 1 Chron. xxvii. 7. where the last of them is mentioned as one of David's twelve captains over four-and-twenty thousand men. (See also chap. xi. 26. of that book.)

And Asahel was as light of foot as a wild roe.] I noted in the foregoing chapter, and in other places, that to be swift of foot to pursue an enemy, was a quality highly esteemed in warriors. And therefore Plato, I remember, would have this to be one of the exercises wherein youth should be trained up, viz. racing: Ἔστι γοῦν πάντων πολεμικώτατον ἡ σώματος ὀξύτης πάντας· ἡ μὲν ἀπὸ τῶν ποδῶν, ἡ δὲ ἀπὸ τῶν χειρῶν, &c. (lib. viii. De Leg. p. 852. edit. Serrani.)

Ver. 19. And Asahel pursued after Abner.] Being desirous of the glory, either of taking or killing the greatest man in Israel.

And in going he turned not to the right hand nor to the left from following Abner.] Nothing could turn him aside to pursue any other design: but he went right forward, having Abner only in his eye.

Ver. 20. Then Abner looked behind him, and said, Art thou Asahel? And he answered, I am.] He speaks to him civilly, having no mind to kill him.

Ver. 21. And Abner said unto him, Turn thee aside to thy right hand or to thy left, and lay thee hold on one of the young men, and take his armour.] That he might not return without some spoil, he bids him take one of his attendants, his arms and all; and be content with this glory of carrying away such a prisoner. Thus Kimchi expounds it. Others think he bids him try his valour upon one of his servants, and disarm him, and not venture to encounter him, who was an old soldier.

But Asahel would not turn aside from following him.] Being possessed with a vain desire, of more glory than it was reasonable to expect.

Ver. 22. And Abner said again to Asahel, Turn thee aside from following me: wherefore should I smite thee to the ground? how shall I hold up my face to Joab thy brother?] Who was a fierce man, and he knew would study revenge.

Ver. 23. Howbeit he refused to turn aside: so Abner, with the hinder end of his spear, smote him under the fifth rib, that the spear came out behind him.] Pierced quite through his liver and bowels. (See xx. 10.) So R. Johannes, in the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 6. sect. 7. saith the fifth rib is the place where the liver and the gall are seated.

And he fell down there, and died in the same place.] He died immediately upon the spot (as we speak), not being able to go so much as one step further. So dangerous it is to confide in a man's own natural strength, or to refuse offers of peace, or despise a flying enemy, as Pellicanus here observes. The old saying was, "If an enemy fly, make way for him."

And it came to pass, that as many as came to the place where Asahel fell down and died stood still.] Ceased the pursuit: fearing perhaps the same fate; or that Asahel's body should be exposed to any indignity.

Ver. 24. Joab also and Abishai pursued after Abner; and the sun went down when they were come to the hill of Ammah, that lieth before Giah, by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon.] They were not so nimble as Asahel, and therefore could not overtake Abner: yet so furious, that the death of Asahel could not stop them till they came to this place.

Ver. 25. And the children of Benjamin gathered themselves together to Abner, and became one troop, and stood on the top of a hill.] Some of this tribe, of which Abner was, and who were valiant people, as I observed before, rallied, as we now speak; and stood in a body, as if they would renew the fight.

Ver. 26. And Abner called to Joab.] Who was on the top of another hill, (ver. 24.)

And said, Shall the sword devour for ever?] There ought to be a measure set to our anger: which ought to go down with the sun, as the apostle speaks.

Knowest thou not that it must be bitterness in the end?] In civil wars, as Cicero speaks (in his fourth book of his familiar Epistles), all things are miserable, and nothing more miserable than victory itself: which makes the conqueror do many things against his will, to satisfy those by whom he conquers. Therefore he saith in another place, "Extremum omnium malorum est belli civilis victoria;" victory in a civil war is the greatest of all evils. Such was this; as he puts him in mind in the next words, that they who killed one another were brethren.

How long shall it be ere thou bid the people return from following their brethren?] They were all descended from one common father: and all worshipped one and the same God.

Ver. 27. And Joab said, As God liveth, unless thou hadst spoken, surely then in the morning the people had gone up every one from following his brother.] He wishes he had been of this mind in the morning; for then there had been no fighting at all, if he had not desired it, (ver. 14.) So Dr. Lightfoot paraphrases this verse, If thou hadst not said what thou didst in the morning (Let the young men arise, and play before us), surely the people had gone every one from his brother; and there had been never a blow struck, but that thou didst provoke it.

Ver. 28. So Joab blew the trumpet.] Caused a retreat to be sounded.

And all the people stood still, and followed after Israel no more, neither fought they any more.] Neither at that time, nor any other.

Ver. 29. And Abner and his men walked all that night through the plain, and passed over Jordan.] They made all the haste they could home: being fearful to trust themselves near to the army that had beaten them.

And went through all Bithron, and they came to Mahanaim.] Some think by Bithron is meant the mountain of Bethor, mentioned Cantic. ii. 15.

Ver. 30. And Joab returned from following Abner: and when he had gathered all the people together.] Returning from the pursuit, every one resorted to the company to which he belonged.

There lacked of the servants of David nineteen men and Asahel.] This is an argument that the twelve men of Judah, who began the fight in a combat with as many of Benjamin, were not killed: for if they were, then there would have been no more than seven men killed in the battle: which is not probable.

Ver. 31. And the servants of David had smitten of Benjamin, and of Abner's men, so that three hundred and threescore men died.] This loss was not great in itself: for it is likely David had given order his men should be as sparing as they could, in killing their brethren; who were, he knew, to be his subjects.

Ver. 32. And they took up Asahel, and buried him in the sepulchre of his father, which was in Beth-lehem.] I think Josephus takes this right: who saith, Joab and his men lodged all night in the place of battle, and buried their dead; and then next morning carried Asahel to be buried among his ancestors.

And Joab and his men went all night.] Having buried Asahel, they marched all the next night towards Hebron.

And they came to Hebron at break of day.] Where they gave David an account of all this action.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. NOW there was long war between the house of Saul and the house of David.] Their enmity continuing throughout the whole reign of Ish-bosheth, it is likely there were many bickerings and skirmishes between Israel and Judah; but no pitched battle that we read of. The contrary rather seems to be affirmed in the foregoing chapter, ver. 28.

But David waxed stronger and stronger, and the house of Saul weaker and weaker.] In all their rencounters (as we now speak) David had the better: and it is likely many of the Israelites fell off to him: which very much added to his strength, and weakened the house of Saul.

Ver. 2. And unto David were sons born in Hebron.] He had no children it seems during his exile: or, if he had, they were daughters.

His first-born was Amnon, of Ahinoam the Jezreelitess.] She was his wife before Abigail, and brought forth his first-born son: who proved a great affliction to him.

Ver. 3. And his second, Chileab, of Abigail the wife of Nabal the Carmelite.] Of whom we have no further account any where: only he is called Daniel in 1 Chron. iii. 1. And the Hebrew doctors give this reason of both names: He called him, say they, when he was born, Daniel (which was his fundamental, that is, his primary name), because, said he, God hath judged or vindicated me from Nabal. And afterward he called him Chileab, as much as to say, like to his father: because in his countenance he resembled David. And this he did, for this reason, to silence the mockers of that age: who said Abigail had conceived by Nabal, whose son this was. For the confuting of which calumny, God was pleased to order that the fashion of his face should be perfectly like to David's.

And the third, Absalom, the son of Maacah, the daughter of Talmai king of Geshur.] We read of the Geshurites in the foregoing book, (xxvii. 8.) upon whom, it is there said, David made an inroad; and brought away this fair captive, a little before Saul's death. And when he came to Hebron, and she was sufficiently instructed and prepared to be a proselyte, he made her his wife. Thus the Jews tell the story: which doth not seem to be true, because it is said in that invasion he slew all the women. We must look therefore for other Geshurites, whom we find in the north, as the forenamed were in the south. (See Deut. iii. 14. Josh. xii. 5.) How David came by the daughter of the king of these people, it is not easy to tell. Perhaps he thought it policy to make a friend of the king of Geshur, who lay near to Ish-bosheth, and might be a curb to him, and give him a diversion, if he attempted any thing against Judah: and therefore married his daughter.

Ver. 4. The fourth, Adonijah, the son of Haggith: the fifth, Shephatiah, the son of Abital.] Of the former of these, we read in the beginning of the next book, how his ambition led him to destruction (as Absalom's did), but nothing of the other.

Ver. 5. The sixth, Ithream, by Eglah, David's wife.] This only being called his wife (though the rest were so likewise) hath led the Jews into an opinion, that Michal, who was his first wife, is here called Eglah: because she was a lovely woman, in whom he much delighted, when he first married her. It is said, indeed, in vi. 23. she had no child until the day of her death: but the meaning of that is, she was barren after she had taunted David for dancing before the ark; not that she never had a child before that time.

These were born to David in Hebron.] During the six years and a half that he reigned there. I do not know what weight there is in the observation of Conradus Pellicanus on this place, but leave it to the judgment of the reader: God so dispensed things, that men in those days, of many wives, seldom produced many children, "quasi natura reclamante rei indignitatem," as if nature abhorred the indignity of the thing, and approved the conjunction of one man with one woman. He did well to say seldom; for we read of one who had threescore and ten sons by many wives (viz. Gideon), though they came to nothing.

Ver. 6. And it came to pass, while there was war between the house of Saul and the house of David, that Abner made himself strong for the house of Saul.] Went up and down through all the tribes of Israel, to strengthen his interest, and confirm them in their allegiance to Ish-bosheth: as the same Pellicanus expounds it.

Ver. 7. And Saul had a concubine, whose name was Rizpah, the daughter of Ajah.] By whom he had two sons, (xxi. 8.)

And Ish-bosheth said to Abner, Why hast thou gone in to my father's concubine?] The Jews look upon it as a very great crime for any man, though never so great, to marry the widow of the king: for it was esteemed an affectation of the kingdom; as appears in the case of Adonijah. Therefore Ish-bosheth had reason to be angry with Abner, though he was so unseasonably.

Ver. 8. Then was Abner very wroth for the words of Ish-bosheth.] He was grown so haughty, and thought his merit so great, that he thought he might do any thing without reprehension.

And said, Am I a dog's head.] He thought Ish-bosheth used him not as a captain of the host of Israel, but as if he had been a keeper of dogs. So the word head signifies, as the Jews generally explain it. Rasi for instance; I am treated as if I was a commander that hath only the custody of dogs. To the same purpose Kimchi: and R. Esaias more largely (as Bochart observes), When I am leader of all Israel, thou hast cast contempt upon me, as if I was only set over a company of dogs. So the Syriac here translates dog in the plural: captain of a pack of dogs. Which was a vile employment, because a dog is generally accounted the vilest animal, (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 56.)

Which against Judah do shew kindness this day to the house of Saul thy father, to his brethren, and to his friends, and have not delivered thee into the hand of David.] He insolently reckons up his great services to him and to his family, when he could have ruined him, if he had pleased, by making David king, as easily as he had done him.

That thou chargest me with a fault concerning this woman?] He upbraids him with ingratitude, in taking notice of such a small fault (as he accounted it) of lying with Rizpah. For, as Peter Martyr thinks, he did not intend to have her for his wife; but used her as his harlot.

Ver. 9. So do God to Abner, and more also, except, as the Lord hath sworn to David, even so I do to him.] These words shew he knew very well God had unalterably resolved to bestow the kingdom of Israel upon David; and yet his ambition led him hither to oppose not only David, but the Lord himself.

Ver. 10. To translate the kingdom from the house of Saul, and to set up the throne of David over Israel, and over Judah, from Dan even to Beer-sheba.] A wonderful change! which the study of revenge wrought in him: that he who lately went about the country, confirming the Israelites in their opposition to David, now resolved to bring them all over to him. "Such is the genius of many great courtiers, who are irritated upon slight occasions: and rather rule over kings, than are ruled by them." They are the words of Conradus Pellicanus.

Ver. 11. And he could not answer Abner again; because he feared him.] He was afraid to provoke him to a higher degree, by answering him again: and therefore now was silent when it was too late.

Ver. 12. And Abner sent messengers to David on his behalf.] Having thus incensed his master, he thought it not safe to delay the execution of what he had threatened. Yet thought it neither safe nor prudent to go himself to David, until he tried his inclinations by messengers, whom he privately sent to treat with him.

Saying, Whose is the land?] This was as much as to say, that he owned him to be lord of all the country, by God's special gift.

Saying also, Make thy league with me, and, behold, my hand shall be with thee, to bring about all Israel to thee.] He desires all enmities might be forgotten, and that David would make a league of friendship with him: and then he undertook, having a great power over Israel, to make them all his subjects.

Ver. 13. And he said, Well, I will make a league with thee.] He soon agreed to the motion; with which he could not but be well pleased. But some think he did ill, to make a league with such a wicked man; especially since he did not inquire of God, whether he should do it or not. But this is more than any body can tell; for many things were done that are not recorded.

But one thing I require of thee, that is, Thou shalt not see my face except thou first bring Michal, Saul's daughter, when thou comest to see my face.] This was a very reasonable condition, if Abner was able to effect it; both upon David's own account and hers: for she was his first and beloved wife; and she was by force given to another man: who could not lawfully enjoy her; David having given her no bill of divorce. And therefore Phalti, the Jews think, being a good man, never knew her: (as I observed on the foregoing book, xxv. 44.) so that she lived unhappy, in a double state of separation, from David and from her present husband. There was something of policy also in this demand; that he might ingratiate himself with the Israelites, by shewing great love to the house of Saul.

Ver. 14. And David sent messengers to Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, saying.] We do not read what answer Abner gave to David, when he required the forenamed condition of him. But it is probable he let David know, as the truth was, that it was not in his power to bring Michal without Ish-bosheth's consent, whose sister as well as subject she was: at least, it was not safe to attempt it; and therefore he advised him to send to her brother, who could not easily deny what he desired: which Abner also, it is likely, undertook to represent as a most just demand.

This counsel of Abner David followed, and it had the success he wished.

Deliver me my wife Michal, which I espoused to me for a hundred foreskins of the Philistines.] Whom he purchased of Saul with the hazard of his life.

Ver. 15. And Ish-bosheth sent, and took her from her husband.] He is called her husband, says the Gemara Sanhedrin, (cap. 7. sect. 2.) because he loved her with a conjugal affection: though he did not enjoy her. This was an honourable action of Ish-bosheth, to restore David his lawful wife: like to which Strigelius here notes in several great men. Particularly in the famous Scipio, who restored Allucius's wife to him, who had been taken by his soldiers: and Pausanius, general of the Lacedemonians; who, after the fight at Platea, sent Coa, who was a captive, unto her relations.

Even from Phaltiel the son of Laish.] Called Phalti in 1 Sam. xxv. 44. The word el is here added, say the Jews, because God interposed all the time he had her to keep them from sin. For he put a sword between Michal and him when he went to bed to her, signifying he should be cut off if he lay with her. Kimchi and Ralbag follow this fancy of the Talmudists: but others dislike it, and think that David had given her a bill of divorce. Unto which he being compelled by Saul's violence, and not doing it willingly, they think it was null; and that David might lawfully take her again, though Phalti had enjoyed her. But Abarbinel confutes both these opinions, and thinks that Saul was not so impious as to take a wife from her husband, and give her to another: nor David in such need of a wife as to send for Michal, if she had lived in wedlock with another man. And therefore he observes, that Saul is not said (in 1 Sam. xxv. 44.) to give her to wife unto Phalti, but only to give her: that is, to commit her to his care and custody in the absence of her husband, that she might live virtuously, and not follow after David. For he supposes Phalti to have been an old, grave, and pious man, who might be trusted with her, as he was with the children of Merab, the other daughter of Saul, who sent them to Phalti to be educated, and to bear Michal company. As for his being called her husband (in this verse and the next), he observes the word is not baalah, but only ishah, which is used, he saith, for one that is the keeper and overseer of another person.

Ver. 16. And her husband went with her along weeping behind her to Bahurim.] Being very loath to part with her company, which was delightful to him.

Then said Abner unto him, Return. And he returned.] Abner intended to have the honour of presenting her unto the king: and would not have the old man appear to disturb their meeting with his tears.

Ver. 17. And Abner.] Having seen David, and given him assurance of his fidelity, as David him of his friendship.

Had communication with the elders of Israel, saying.] Went back to persuade all to do as he had done: and by bringing over the great men to David, he doubted not the multitude would follow.

Ye sought for David in times past to be king over you.] For after the slaughter of Goliath he was very gracious in the eyes of all the people, and was much beloved by them, (1 Sam. xviii. 5. 16.) And when he was forced to fly, a great many of Israel came over to him while he dwelt at Ziklag: of the Benjamites, 1 Chron. xii. 2, &c. and the Gadites, ver. 8, 9, &c. and the Manassites, ver. 19, &c. and after he came to Hebron more went over to him out of all the tribes of Israel, ver. 23. and the following part of that chapter. And it is highly probable, that as soon as Saul and Jonathan were dead, they all generally inclined to make David their king: if Abner, by his great authority, had not set up one of the family of Saul.

Ver. 18. Now then do it.] Fulfil your own desires and intentions.

For the Lord hath spoken of David, saying, By the hand of my servant David I will save my people Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, and out of the hand of all their enemies.] We no where read these words recorded; but, it is likely, Samuel had often spoken them: if not at length, yet they are included in the words of God to Samuel, when he commanded him to anoint David king over Israel; (1 Sam. x. 1. 12.) for this was the intention of giving them a king, that he might fight their battles, (1 Sam. viii. 29.)

Ver. 19. And Abner also spake in the ears of Benjamin.] Where he had more interest than among the rest, being of that tribe: whom it was necessary to take some pains withal to gain their affection to David. Therefore he seems to have spoken, not only with their elders, but to have gone through the several families in the tribe: who were much devoted to the house of Saul, and had stuck close to it; and were the first that attempted any thing against David, (ii. 15.)

And Abner went also to speak in the ears of David in Hebron all that seemed good to Israel.] He went and reported to David privately the sense of all the people.

And that seemed good to the whole house of Benjamin.] Particularly he related how all Benjamin stood affected to him: whom he brought over so effectually, that they never forsook the house of David when all the rest of the tribes did.

Ver. 20. And Abner came to David in Hebron, and twenty men with him.] Now he appeared publicly, and declared himself for David.

And David made Abner, and the men that were with him, a feast.] Not merely as a token of kindness, but to make a league with him, (as he had desired, and David promised, ver. 12, 13.) Into which it had been an ancient custom to enter by eating and drinking together, Gen. xxvi. 30. xxxi. 44. and other places.

Ver. 21. And Abner said, I will arise and go, and will gather all Israel together unto my lord the king, that they may make a league with thee.] He intended to bring all the chief men of Israel to own him for their king, as he had done; and promise to be his faithful subjects: which he knew he could effect, because they had already declared their mind in the private conferences he had had with them, (ver. 17, &c.)

That thou mayest reign over all that thy heart desireth.] That is, over all the tribes of Israel.

And David sent Abner away; and he went in peace.] They parted as good friends do, with wishes of all happiness on both sides.

Ver. 22. And, behold, the servants of David and Joab came from pursuing a troop, and brought a great spoil with them.] In those times of distraction between Judah and Israel, we may well think their neighbours, who were enemies to both, the Philistines, Edomites, Moabites, and others, made many inroads upon the country to get spoil. When Joab and the great men about David watched, and at this time had overtaken them, in their return home, and recovered a great booty from them

But Abner was not with David in Hebron; for he had sent him away, and he was gone in peace.] Though Abner was not there when Joab returned victorious, yet he seems to be but just gone a little way out of the city, (ver. 26.)

Ver. 23. And when Joab and all the host that were with him were come.] That is, the captains of the host, or principal officers, were come to give an account of their success.

They told Joab, saying, Abner came to the king, and he hath sent him away, and he is gone in peace.] Some officious courtiers informed him of what had passed in his absence: as it is likely they were wont to do of all that the king did. For he that commanded all the forces, had in effect every body else at his command.

Ver. 24. Then Joab came to the king, and said, What hast thou done? behold, Abner came unto thee; why is it that thou hast sent him away, and he is quite gone?] He chides the king, as if he did not understand his own interest; but was to be taught by him. Which high presumption he was constrained to endure, because of his great power with the military men.

Ver. 25. Thou knowest Abner the son of Ner, that he came to deceive thee, and to know thy going out, and thy coming in, and to know all that thou doest.] It is likely that Joab himself did not believe, that Abner came with a design only to learn how David's affairs stood, and to make his advantage of it: but he would have David believe so, that he might have the better colour for his wicked design of dispatching Abner.

Ver. 26. And when Joab was gone out from David.] He seems to have gone out in a huff; not staying for an answer.

He sent messengers after Abner.] In the king's name, I suppose, as if he had something further to communicate to him: for otherwise it is not credible that Abner would have returned.

And brought him back from the well of Sirah.] It is not certain where this well was: but it is probable not far from Hebron. Josephus saith, twenty furlongs distant from thence.

But David knew it not.] Gave him no such order, as he pretended.

Ver. 27. And when Abner was returned to Hebron, Joab.] Who waited for him at the entrance of the city.

Took him aside in the gate.] Which being a public place, where men met to do business, and where the courts of judgment sat, it made Abner suspect no danger.

To speak with him quietly.] Especially since he took him by the hand in a friendly manner, to have some discourse with him.

And smote him under the fifth rib, that he died.] Immediately, without speaking a word. (See the foregoing chapter, ver. 23.)

For the blood of Asahel his brother.] This was one reason; but the chief was, his fear that Abner would overtop him, if he brought all Israel to submit to David; being a man longer versed in military affairs than himself; and who had governed Israel in the time of Saul's distraction, and since Ish-bosheth was made king by him. So Josephus: He was afraid lest Abner should receive from David, πρώτην τάξιν, the highest place above himself. Upon which he makes this reflection, ὁσάκι πηλίκα, &c. What will not men dare to do, who are covetous, ambitious, and will be inferior to none, for to obtain what they desire? They will commit a thousand crimes: and rather than lose what they have got, they will not fear still to commit greater wickednesses.

Ver. 28. And afterward, when David heard it, he said, I and my kingdom are guiltless before the Lord for ever from the blood of Abner the son of Ner.] He lifted up his hands to God (as Josephus explains it), and with a loud voice cried out publicly, that God knew he was innocent in this matter: and therefore trusted he would not let him and his kingdom suffer for it.

Ver. 29. Let it rest on the head of Joab.] The guilt and punishment lie upon him; who was the sole committer of this murder.

And on all his father's house.] His indignation at the fact seems to have transported him too far; making him wish all Joab's family might suffer for it: which was against the law of God, (Deut. xxiv. 16.) that children should not suffer for their father's sin. It may be looked upon, therefore, as a prophetical prediction, rather than as a private imprecation: or as words spoken in a great passion; which made him think the punishment could not be too sore, or too lasting, for so horrid a crime. In the guilt of which Joab endeavoured to involve the king, by sending for Abner back in the king's name (as Josephus takes it), and so might be thought to have killed him by his order.

And let there not fail from the house of Joab one that hath an issue.] Which was such a very noisome disease, that, by the law of the Jews, it made the very bed on which a man, that had it, lay, or the seat on which he sat, unclean. In short, he was no less abominable among them than a menstruous woman. (See Lev. xv.)

Or that is a leper.] How filthy he was accounted, see Lev. xiii. where by the law he was secluded from all society.

Or that leaneth on a staff.] By reason of some great weakness, or lameness: having the gout, as Pellicanus takes it.

Or that falleth on the sword.] This, in our language, signifies that maketh away himself.

Or that lacketh bread.] Is a beggar, and ready to starve.

Ver. 30. So Joab and Abishai his brother slew Abner, because he had slain their brother Asahel at Gibeon in the battle.] It seems Abishai was near at hand, ready to assist in the murder; if there had been any need of his help.

Ver. 31. And David said to Joab, and to all the people that were with him.] To the whole court.

Rend your clothes, and gird you with sackcloth, and mourn before Abner.] These were all outward expressions of very great sorrow: which Joab himself was forced to make a show of.

And David himself followed the bier.] Was the chief mourner. In which the Jews think David's passion made him again exceed his bounds: for Maimonides saith, it was not lawful, by their constitutions, for a king to accompany a dead corpse to the grave; but he ought to mourn at home. This is their doctrine in Sanhedrin, cap. 2. sect. 13. and the Gemara there, cap. 2. n. 5. (See Cocceius's Annotations.) But a famous writer among them (Mikotzi) saith it was indifferent: the king might do as David did, if he pleased: for which he quotes R. Jehuda. Therefore, though perhaps it was not commonly done, yet David, to purge himself from all suspicion of this crime, and to shew his extreme great grief for it, thought fit to do Abner this public honour. (See Guil. Schickardus, in his Jus Regium, cap. 4. Theor. 13.)

The word we here translate the bier, is, in the original, the bed: on which persons of quality were wont to be carried forth to their graves, as ordinary people were upon that which we call a bier. And kings were sometimes carried out upon beds very richly adorned; as Josephus tells us Herod was, in the latter end of his first book of the Jewish Wars, Κλίνη μὲν ὁλόχρυσος, &c. The bed was all gilded, set with precious stones, and a purple cover curiously wrought, &c.

It is but a fancy that they were wont to follow the bier, and not to go before it: to signify that they looked upon their dead friends not as lost, but only gone before them, "Præmissi, non amissi," as Seneca speaks.

Ver. 32. And they buried Abner in Hebron: and the king lifted up his voice, and wept at the grave of Abner; and all the people wept.] By this it appears he was buried in pomp, and with a long train of people attending his corpse, as there did the widow's son in Luke vii. 14. When they came to the grave, and laid the corpse there, it was the custom to make great and loud lamentations; which are sometimes called howlings in the prophetical language. And commonly before the word weeping, there is mention in Scripture of lifting up the voice in doleful cries. This is as ancient as Abraham's time; (Gen. xxi. 16.) and we find Joseph weeping so loud, upon a different occasion, that all the house of Pharaoh heard him, (Gen. xlv. 2. 14, 15.) The forms of lamentation are noted by the prophets, (Jer. xxii. 18. Micah v. 16.)

Ver. 33. And the king lamented over Abner, saying.] Josephus looks upon what follows as a kind of epitaph upon Abner, whom David buried magnificently, as he speaks, Θάψας δ' αὐτὸν μεγαλοπρεπῶς καὶ ἐπιταφίους συγγραψάμενος ᾠδήνους, &c.

Died Abner as a fool dieth?] By a fool in Scripture is often meant a wicked man, a malefactor; and so the sense, according to this translation, is, Did he die by the hand of justice, for some notorious crime committed by him? Or, Did he die by his own folly? No such matter. But the words may be translated out of the Hebrew, How like a fool died Abner? Or, Should Abner have died like a fool? That is, what pity is it, that such a valiant man should die on this fashion! By treachery, without any power to defend himself.

Ver. 34. Thy hands were not bound, nor thy feet put into fetters.] He was not a prisoner, but had both hands and feet at liberty, and yet could make no use of them for his own preservation. Victorinus Strigelius thinks that David, in these words, distinguishes him from those criminals, whose hands being tied behind them, are carried to execution; and from those idle soldiers, who, being taken captive in war, have fetters clapped upon their legs, to keep them from running away. He was none of these; neither a notorious offender, nor a coward: but perfidiously murdered by one in seeming friendship with him. But the plain meaning seems to be, that if his enemy had set upon him openly, he had been able to make his part good with him.

But as a man falleth before wicked men, so fellest thou.] That is, before a secret murderer.

And all the people wept again over him.] Upon this speech of the king, which was mournfully spoken, they were so affected, that it drew tears more plentifully from them.

Ver. 35. And when all the people came to cause David to eat meat while it was yet day.] This was a custom among the Hebrews, whose friends were wont to come, after the funeral was over, to comfort those who had buried their dead, and send in provisions to make a feast. It being supposed, that they themselves were so sorrowful, as not to be able to think of their necessary food. (See Jer. xvi. 5. 7, 8. Ezek. xxiv. 17. and Grotius upon that place.)

David sware, saying, God do so to me, and more also, if I taste bread, or aught else, till the sun be down.] He resolved to keep a strict and rigid fast, which did not end till the sun was set. Hence it appears that they buried their dead in the day-time.

Ver. 36. And all the people took notice of it.] Of his great grief.

And it pleased them; for whatsoever the king did, pleased all the people.] They were pleased with the honour he had done this great man: whereby he so ingratiated himself with the people, that they were disposed to put a kind construction upon all his actions, as wise and well becoming him.

Ver. 37. For all the people.] Of Judah, or all those that were about the king.

And all Israel, understood that day, that it was not of the king to slay Abner the son of Ner.] That he neither ordered it, nor consented to it, nor any way approved it, but was heartily grieved for his death.

Ver. 38. And the king said unto his servants.] Who, perhaps, were not sensible enough of this loss; or thought he bewailed it too much.

Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?] He bids them consider his birth, and his power, authority, and valour, with all his other excellent qualities: and they would not think it strange that he buried him with so much pomp, and mourned so heavily for him.

Ver. 39. And I am this day weak.] In the Hebrew it is tender; that is, his kingdom was young (as we speak), and not settled and confirmed.

Though anointed king.] Or, as the words may be translated, and anointed king. That is, not born to a kingdom, but newly called to it, without any hereditary right to the authority; which made it more slender, than if it had been of long standing. This seems to have been the reason why he did not punish Joab for this murder, because he himself was not well established. He had also been very faithful, and stuck close to him in his adversity; and had a mighty power among the military men (as I said before), and was also an excellent soldier himself; which made him very necessary to David in a time of civil war and discord between Judah and Israel. Therefore prudence made him defer his punishment till a better opportunity. As God himself ordinarily doth not call men to an account immediately for their sins, but takes a time to do it more severely, than if it were done presently.

And these men the sons of Zeruiah are too hard for me.] He and his brother had got such an interest in the soldiery, and among the people both in the court and country, that he knew not how to deal with them. Yet he not only sufficiently shewed that he detested their actions, but that he did not stand in awe of them. For he commanded Joab to attend Abner's funeral, with his clothes rent, and in sackcloth: and to his face commended Abner highly, and condemned his murder of him, (ver. 31. 33, 34.) which was a great mortification to him; and a kind of penance which he made him do for his crime.

The Lord shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness.] He was confident God would punish him as he deserved, if he could not do it himself. And this may be looked upon as a prayer, that God would not suffer him to escape his vengeance.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. AND when Saul's son heard that Abner was dead in Hebron, his hands were feeble.] Having lost his supporter and defender; and hearing he was gone over to David, as appeared by his dying in Hebron.

And all the Israelites were troubled.] Because by his death the treaty with David was broke off; or there was none to manage it with such authority and prudence as Abner had: and they foresaw some great change (which they knew not how it would end) by the loss of this great man. For so Plato observes, from long experience, Ὅταν μέλλει κακῶς πράττειν πόλιν, ἐξαιρεῖται τοὺς ἀγαθοὺς ἄνδρας ἐκ ταύτης τῆς πόλεως ὁ Θεός: When any calamity is to befal a city, God is wont to take away excellent men out of that city.

Ver. 2. And Saul's son had two men that were captains of bands.] Captains, perhaps, of two companies of guards about the king.

The name of the one was Baanah, and the name of the other Rechab, the sons of Rimmon a Beerothite, of the tribe of Benjamin.] The king's own tribe, which made him repose the greatest trust and confidence in them.

For Beeroth also was reckoned to Benjamin.] Though it was now in the hand of the Philistines, yet it belonged to the tribe of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 25.)

Ver. 3. And the Beerothites fled to Gittaim.] When Saul was slain, several Israelites left their cities and fled, and the Philistines took possession of them: among which, this city, it seems, was one forsaken by its inhabitants, (1 Sam. xxxi. 7.) There was a place called Gittaim, in the same tribe of Benjamin, (Nahum xi. 53.) But it is not likely that was the place here mentioned: for the Beerothites would, in all probability, fly further off from the Philistines.

And were sojourners there to this very day.] When this book was written, they were not returned to their own country: being commodiously settled, I suppose, in the other place. Why this is here related, it is hard to say: perhaps it was to shew that these were two soldiers of fortune (as we now speak), whose necessity forced them to seek for a support; which they met withal at the court of Ish-bosheth, where they came to preferment.

Ver. 4. And Jonathan, Saul's son, had a son that was lame of his feet. He was five years old when the tidings came of Saul and Jonathan.] That is, the tidings of their death, mentioned 1 Sam. xxxi.

And his nurse took him up, and fled: and it came to pass, as she made haste to flee.] Being in a very great fright.

He fell, and became lame; and his name was Mephibosheth.] This seems to be related, to shew what it was that emboldened these captains to do what follows: because he who was the next avenger of blood was very young; and besides was lame and unable to pursue them.

Ver. 5. And the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, Rechab and Baanah, went, and came about the heat of the day to the house of Ish-bosheth, who lay on a bed at noon.] As the manner was, and still continues, in hot countries.

Ver. 6. And they came thither into the midst of the house, as though they would have fetched wheat.] In the Hebrew, carrying wheat. Which they either brought into the king's granaries, for the use of his household, or carried forth for the supply of their soldiers, who were maintained at the king's charge.

And they smote him under the fifth rib: and Rechab and Baanah his brother escaped.] They gave him a mortal wound, and nobody suspecting them, they easily made their escape.

Ver. 7.] For when they came into the house, he lay on his bed in his bedchamber.] In a private room; into which he was wont to retire from company, when he had a mind to repose himself.

And they smote him, and slew him, and beheaded him, and took his head.] The privacy of the place gave them the opportunity to do all this without discovery.

And gat them away through the plain all night.] From Mahanaim to Hebron it was, for the most part, a flat country, till they came to ascend the mountain, on whose side Hebron stood.

Ver. 8. And they brought the head of Ish-bosheth unto David to Hebron, and said to the king, Behold the head of Ish-bosheth, the son of Saul, thine enemy, which sought thy life; and the Lord hath avenged my lord the king this day of Saul, and of his seed.] For they were all now extinguished, except his grandson Mephibosheth, who was of no account because of his lameness.

Ver. 9. And David answered Rechab and Baanah his brother, the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite.] One of them only spake to the king, but related what they both had done, and therefore he directed his speech to them both.

And said unto them, As the Lord liveth, who hath delivered my soul out of all adversity.] Together with his thankful acknowledgment of God's care of him hitherto, in all his straits, he suggests to them that he needed not the help of such men as they, for his future preservation and preferment by wicked acts.

Ver. 10. When one told me, saying, Behold, Saul is dead (thinking to have brought good tidings), I took hold of him, and slew him in Ziklag, who thought I would have given him a reward for his tidings.] He put them in mind of the story of the Amalekite (chap. i. of this book), which they could not but have heard, and thereby might have learnt what reception they were likely to find with David.

Ver. 11. How much more, when wicked men have slain a righteous person.] For so Ish-bosheth was, in respect of them: to whom he had done no wrong; but preferred them to a place of trust and honour.

In his own house upon his bed?] This aggravated their crime; and made it vastly different from that of the Amalekite.

Shall I not therefore require his blood at your hand, and take you away from the earth?] As persons unworthy to live; who had slain their master, and he a king, in his own house, when he was taking his repose under their safeguard.

Ver. 12. And David commanded his young men.] Who were of his guard; ready at hand to execute his commands.

And they slew them, and cut off their hands and their feet.] By David's order, no doubt; they having slain their master with their hands, and made their escape from justice with their feet.

And hanged them up over the pool of Hebron.] Exposed them in an open, public place.

But he took the head of Ish-bosheth, and buried it in the sepulchre of Abner in Hebron.] It seems David had done Abner the honour to make him a particular sepulchre: where he privately interred the head of Ish-bosheth. Whose body, no question, was buried by the Israelites, with such honours as were suitable to his dignity.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. THEN came all the tribes of Israel to David unto Hebron.] That is, ambassadors were sent from every tribe, by a common agreement among them.

And spake, saying, We are thy bone and thy flesh.] They were not overcome by the arms, but by the piety and justice of David, to acknowledge him their king: for which they gave several reasons. The first is general; that he was qualified by the law of God, (Deut. xvii. 15.) which required they should choose one of their brethren, and not a stranger. Now he was of the same blood with them, being descended from the same common father, Israel.

Ver. 2. Also in time past, when Saul was king, thou wast he that led out and brought in Israel.] They were induced also by his valour and conduct, which he had shewn, they well remembered, in the reign of Saul: when he was so successful in many expeditions, that he became the darling of all the people, (1 Sam. xviii. 5. 15, 16. 30.)

And the Lord said to thee, Thou shalt feed my people Israel, and thou shalt be captain over Israel.] This was the chiefest argument of all; that God they knew had designed him long ago to be their king: having said by the prophet Samuel, that he should feed, that is, rule and govern them, and fight their battles. We do not read these words any where recorded before now: but Samuel having anointed him, no doubt frequently spake of his office, under the name of the pastor of the people.

And it is the first time we find a governor described by this name in Scripture: though much used afterward by the prophets, who speak in this language; particularly Ezek. xxxiv. 23. and many other places. Whence our Lord Christ is called the good Shepherd, and the great Shepherd; that is, ruler of his people: and both the Greeks and the Romans have borrowed this word, to express a supreme governor. And truly such rulers as take care of their people, as a shepherd doth of his flock, are Divine blessings: whom Isaiah calls nursing fathers, xlix. 23. On the contrary, they who lay heavy burdens on their people, fleecing, or rather flaying, them by cruel oppressions, are called by the prophets roaring lions, hungry bears, and devouring wolves, Ezek. xix. 2. xxii. 27. Nahum ii. 11, 12. Habak. i. 8. Zephan. iii. 3. Prov. xxvii. 15.; companions of thieves, Isa. i. 23.; whales, dragons, or rather crocodiles, Ezek. xxix. 3. Psal. lxxiv. 13, 14.; leopards, Jer. v. 6. and such-like odious names.

Ver. 3. So all the elders of Israel came to the king in Hebron.] He gave the messengers such a kind reception, and so thankfully declared his acceptance of the offer they made him, that, upon their return with his answer, the elders of Israel came to wait upon him. By whom some understand the senators of the great Sanhedrin: but that is a fancy which I have often confuted. The plain meaning is, that the chief persons of authority, in every tribe, came in the name of the rest of that tribe, whom they represented.

And king David made a league with them in Hebron.] It is not said what the contents of this league or contract was. The Jews think it was principally, that there should be an act of oblivion of all the injuries which the people of Israel had done to Judah, or they to them, in the reign of Ish-bosheth. But this is too narrow a sense: it is more probable, that he assured them he would govern them justly and kindly, according to the law of God; and they promised to obey him sincerely and faithfully, according to the same law.

Before the Lord.] The ark of God's presence was not in Hebron; and therefore it is a question how it could be said, that he made a league before the Lord. But see what I have said of this, Judg. xx. 1.

And they anointed David king over Israel.] They desired the high-priest to anoint him, whose office it was: and thereby expressed their consent he should reign over them. So Procopius Gazæus interprets these words, (as he doth ii. 4.) Iterum suffragiis, &c. All the tribes again chose him, by their votes, to be their king. He was anointed three times; first by Samuel, in his father's house; (1 Sam. xvi. 13.) then when the tribe of Judah owned him for their king; (chap. ii. of this book, ver. 4.) and now when all Israel did the same. For which Abarbinel gives this reason: "David's unction was repeated so often, that it might be the foundation, and root, and principle, of all his posterity;" who needed no unction, being anointed in him: unless there was any controversy about the succession.

Ver. 4. David was thirty years old when he began to reign; and he reigned forty years.] It is uncertain how old he was when he was first anointed by Samuel; and how long after he came to the court of Saul; and how long he was in exile from it. About which men's opinions are very different: for some think, as the Jews do in Seder Olam Rabba, that he was near nine-and-twenty years old when Samuel first anointed him: and consequently but one year in exile. Others (which is the truer opinion) that he was twenty years old at his first unction, and so almost ten years in exile. But it is sufficient for us to know, what we are here told, that he was thirty years old at his second unction in Hebron, immediately after Saul's death.

Ver. 5. In Hebron he reigned over Judah seven years and six months; and in Jerusalem he reigned thirty and three years over all Israel and Judah.] By this it appears, that immediately after his third unction, he made his attempt upon Jerusalem, as it here follows, otherwise he could not have reigned there so long.

Ver. 6. And the king and his men went to Jerusalem.] His first warlike enterprise, after he was their king, was against Jerusalem, which he resolved to reduce out of the hands of the Jebusites; who hitherto possessed a noble part of it, viz. the fort of Zion, which they held, though the Israelites dwelt in the other part of the city.

Unto the Jebusites, the inhabiters of the city.] That is, of that part of the land. (Josh. xv. 63. Judg. i. 21. xix. 10, 11.)

Which spake unto David.] When he came to set down his army against the fortress.

Saying, Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither: thinking, David cannot come in hither.] They imagined their fortress to be so impregnable, that, by way of contempt and scorn, they told him, the blind and the lame were able to defend it against him, and all his forces. So Bochartus translates these words, "Non huc accedes," &c. Thou shalt not come up hither, but the blind and the lame will drive thee away; i. e. the most feeble and cowardly among us. Which he thinks is so plain a sense, that he wonders men of great learning should seek for any other. (Lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 36.) But so it is, a great many by the blind and the lame understand the images of their gods (particularly our learned Gregory hath a whole dissertation about it). As if they had said, Our gods, whom ye call blind and lame, that have eyes and see not, feet and walk not, (as it is Psal. cxv.) they shall defend us: and you must overcome them, before you overcome us. Luther himself thus explains the sense: "These blind and lame (saith he) were the idols of the Jebusites; which, to irritate David, they set upon their walls, as their patrons and defenders: and they did as good as say, Thou dost not fight with us, but with our gods; who will easily repel thee." As for the fancy of R. Eliezer, in his Pirke, cap. 36. it is altogether groundless; which is, that when Abraham bought the burying-place, in Machpelah, of the children of Heth, he sealed a covenant with them, that when his seed should possess the land of Canaan (as they believed they would), they should not possess the city of Jebus. Which covenant they now engraved upon brazen statues, and set them upon their walls; saying, Thou canst not enter here, unless thou break the oath of Abraham. (See also Bartoloccius, in his Kirjath-sepher, par. ii. p. 89, &c.)

Ver. 7. Nevertheless David took the strong hold of Zion: the same is the city of David.] Their taunts and jeers did not discourage David, but he assaulted the fort and took it, and made it his royal seat.

Ver. 8. And David said on that day.] When the assault was made.

Whosoever getteth up into the gutter, and smiteth the Jebusites, &c.] i. e. Cuts off their pipes of water, or their cisterns into which the water fell; for the Hebrew word tzinnor, which we translate gutter, is no where found but in this place, and in Psal. xlii. 7. and by St. Jerome is translated fistulæ. But I know not how we come to transpose the words, he that smiteth the Jebusites, behind the other, which in the Hebrew are first. He that smiteth the Jebusites, let him throw down into the ditch (which was by the wall) both the blind and the lame, which David extremely hates. Thus Bochart translates the words in the place abovenamed, which, if it be admitted, there is no need to add those words (out of 1 Chron. xi. 6.) to make out the sense, he shall be chief and captain: for the sense is complete without them.

Wherefore they said, The blind and the lame shall not enter into the house.] Or, as it is in the margin, Because they had said, even the blind and the lame, He shall not come into the house. That is, because they had taunted him with the blind and lame, as if they could defend the fort, and hinder him from coming into it; therefore he was highly provoked to wish they might be thrown down headlong from their walls into the ditch. And then by the house is meant, neither the house of David, nor the house of the Lord (as many take it), but that very fort wherein the Jebusites had dwelt; from which hereafter they were excluded. And indeed it is a very large word in the Hebrew, signifying any place. If we could admit the fancy of R. Eliezer, that the Jebusites engraved the oath of Abraham upon brazen statues, whereby they pretended that fort was secured to them and their posterity, such an abominable forgery must needs highly incense David, whose soul hated such impudent frauds.

Ver. 9. So David dwelt in the fort, and called it, The city of David: and David built round about, from Millo and inward.] The fort was not wide enough to contain the whole court, and all his guards, and others that had occasion to come hither: and therefore he built round about it from Millo. Which some take for that low place which lay between the fort and the city: which was now filled with people, and thence called Millo.

Ver. 10. And David went on, and grew great.] He proceeded to enlarge his dominions, as well as his royal city.

And the Lord God of hosts was with him.] This was the cause of his great prosperity, that God, who commands all the armies of heaven and earth, directed and blessed him in all his enterprises.

Ver. 11. And Hiram king of Tyre sent messengers unto David.] To compliment him upon his succession to the throne, and taking Jerusalem. Which was a great honour; for Hiram was a potent prince, and yet courted David's friendship; because he saw how prosperous he was. And this friendship continued all David's days, unto the reign of Solomon. When his son, of the same name, expressed the same affection to him, that his father had done to David.

And cedar-trees, and carpenters, and masons: and they built David a house.] Hearing David intended to settle in the fort he had taken, Hiram sent him both materials and artificers to build him a palace. For the Jews being given to feeding cattle, and husbandry, were not very skilful in manufactures.

Ver. 12. And David perceived that the Lord had established him king over Israel.] For he had both subdued his enemies, and raised him up friends.

And that he had exalted his kingdom for his people Israel's sake.] It is an excellent reflection which Conradus Pellicanus made long ago upon these words: "This is the greatest grace of a king, that he certainly believes himself to be made a king by God, for the sake of the people: and let him often call to mind, the people were not created or ordained by God for the king."

Ver. 13. And David took him more concubines and wives out of Jerusalem, after he came from Hebron.] The difference between a wife and a concubine, the Talmudists generally say, was, that the latter had neither dowry settled upon her, nor was taken with all the rites and solemnities of marriage: yet was a wife of a lower rank, as well as the former which had both. See Selden, lib. de Successionibus, cap. 3. and what I have already noted, Gen. xxii. 24 and elsewhere. How many David had of both sorts, it is not certain: but we read of six wives he had before, iii. 2, &c. And the Jews, after their way, endeavour to prove from xi. 8. of this book, that he had eighteen in all: which number it was not lawful for the king to exceed; unless he divorced any of them, and took others in their room. (See Schickard, de Jure Nepo, cap. 3. Theor. 9. and Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 5. sect. 9. and my notes on Deut. xvii. 17.)

And there were yet sons and daughters born to David.] It was looked upon as a piece of political wisdom in princes, to endeavour to have many children: that, by matching them into many potent families, they might strengthen their interest, and have the more supporters of their authority.

Ver. 14. And these be the names of them that were born to him in Jerusalem; Shammuah, and Shobab, and Nathan, and Solomon.] These are the very same names with those in 1 Chron. iii. 5. only a little variation in the first.

Ver. 15. Ibhar also, and Elishua, and Nepheg, and Japhia.

Ver. 16. And Elishama, and Eliada, and Eliphalet.] Here are only seven sons mentioned in these two verses: but in 1 Chron. iii. 8, &c. there are nine. Of which Kimchi gives this account; that here he mentions only the sons he had by his wives; but there are some added which he had by his concubines: which doth not well agree with what there follows, (ver. 9.)

Ver. 17. But when the Philistines heard that they had anointed David king over Israel.] So that now Israel and Judah were united under one head, they thought it behoved them to bestir themselves: whereas they seem to have been quiet while the war lasted between Israel and Judah in the time of Ish-bosheth, hoping they might destroy one another.

All the Philistines went up to seek David.] They raised all the forces they were able, to find out David and fight him, before he was settled in his new kingdom. The friendship between him and king Achish was so great, that one would have thought they should have lived in peace. But either Achish was dead, or the lords of the Philistines, who were very powerful, overruled him, as they did when they forced him to send David out of their army, (1 Sam. xxix. 6, &c.)

And David heard of it, and went down to the hold.] Intelligence being brought him of their motions, he went from the fort of Zion, to some other strong place below; where his army might conveniently have their rendezvous.

Ver. 18. The Philistines also came and spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim.] Which in Josh. xv. 8. we translate the valley of giants, lying westward of Jerusalem; which perhaps they thought to assault.

Ver. 19. And David inquired of the Lord, saying, Shall I go up to the Philistines? wilt thou deliver them into my hand?] Though David went into a strong hold, he did not trust to that, nor intend merely to stand upon his defence: yet would not give them battle, till he was encouraged by God to do it.

And the Lord said, Go up; for I will doubtless deliver the Philistines into thy hand.] A full assurance of victory took away all fear of their great numbers, which is expressed by their spreading themselves in the forenamed valley.

Ver. 20. And David came to Baal-perazim.] For thither the Philistines marched from Rephaim, where they first pitched: as appears from 1 Chron. xiv. 11.

And David smote them there.] Routed their army, and slew a great many of them in that place.

And said, The Lord hath broken forth upon mine enemies before me, as the breach of waters.] Overpowered and scattered them; as waters, when they make a breach in a bank, overflow and carry all before them.

Therefore he called the name of that place Baal-perazim.] That it might put him and his posterity in mind of God's great power and goodness, which he shewed in this place, where the Philistines were put into such a consternation, that they forgat, when they fled, to carry away their gods with them; as it here follows.

Ver. 21. And there they left their images.] Which they had brought into the field with them; to be carried before their host, as a token of the presence of their gods with them. Thus we read in 2 Chron. xxv. 14. that the Edomites had their gods along with them when they fought with Amaziah. And perhaps they learnt this from the Israelites, who carried the ark (the symbol of God's presence) in their army when they went to fight with these Philistines: who saw it, and took it, as the Israelites now did their images, 1 Sam. iv. 4, 5, &c. But behold here the difference between the ark and these images. For when the ark fell into the hands of the Philistines, it sorely plagued them, as we read in the foregoing book: but their images had no power to hurt the Israelites, nor secure themselves from being burnt by them, as it here follows.

And David and his men burnt them.] According to the command of God, Deut. vii. 5.

Ver. 22. And the Philistines came up again, and spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim.] They saw that their all lay at stake, and therefore they mustered up their whole strength; and perhaps procured the assistance of other people, to try their fortune (as we now speak) in another battle. So Josephus relates, that the Syrians and Phœnicians joined them, and came up, τριπλασίῳ στρατῷ, with an army three times as big as the former.

Ver. 23. And when David inquired of the Lord.] Though he had been so successful, yet he would attempt nothing without God's direction; to whom, he knew, he owed the former victory.

He said, Thou shalt not go up.] That is, not directly; to fight in a pitched battle, as they did before. So the following words explain it.

But fetch a compass behind them.] Where they suspected no danger.

And come upon them over against the mulberry-trees.] A place well known to David; who was taught by God himself, not to expect victory always by main strength; but sometimes to make use of stratagems.

Ver. 24. And let it be, when thou hearest the sound of a going in the tops of the mulberry-trees.] In the Hebrew it is beroshe, which should not be rendered in the tops (for men do not walk on the tops of trees), but in the beginnings: in the very entrance of the place, where the mulberry-trees were planted; where God intended to make a sound, as if a vast number of men were marching to fall upon the Philistines. There is no doubt but the Hebrew word rosch signifies not only the head, but the beginning of any thing. So Bochart observes, in his Phaleg. lib. iii. cap. 22. as in Nahum iii. 10. the top (as we translate it) the head of every street, is the beginning of those streets.

And Isa. li. 20. Jer. xxii. 6. Gilead is called the head of Libanus, because Libanus begins where Gilead ends.

Then bestir thyself.] Fall upon the Philistines.

For then shall the Lord go out before thee, to smite the host of the Philistines.] By making such a noise of a mighty host coming to assault them, that they should be amazed, and have no apprehension of David's army coming behind them.

Ver. 25. And David did so, as the Lord commanded him; and smote the Philistines from Geba until thou come to Gazer.] He pursued them to the very confines of their own land; for Josephus saith concerning Gazer, ἤδε ἐστὶν ὅρος αὐτῶν τῆς χώρας, that it was the border of their country.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. AGAIN, David gathered together all the chosen men of Israel, thirty thousand.] Having defeated the Philistines, and enjoying some peace, he thought it a seasonable time to fetch up the ark, and settle it in an honourable place: and for that end summoned the principal persons in Israel to attend it. Or, as others will have it, the most mighty men in all Israel, to the number of thirty thousand; to be a guard to it, in case any of their enemies should attempt to disturb the solemnity he intended.

Ver. 2. And David arose, and went with all the people that were with him.] Not only those thirty thousand, but a vast number of the common people, as we learn from 1 Chron. xiii. 2. 5.

From Baale of Judah.] Which is the same with Kirjath-jearim, 1 Chron. xiii. 6. called Baalah, Josh. xv. 9. and Kirjath-Baal, Josh. xv. 60. xviii. 14. and here Baale of Judah, because (as this place shews) it belonged to that tribe. But some think there is a great difficulty here, where it is said they went from Baale, when in 1 Chron. xiii. 6. it is said they went to Baalah. But there is no disagreement in these two places: for they must go to it, before they could come from it: and here he speaks of their motion from thence, after they had gone to it.

And brought from thence the ark of God.] Where it had been a long time in the house of Abinadab, whose son was sanctified to attend it. (See 1 Sam. vii. 1.)

Whose name is called by the name of The Lord of hosts.] Or, because of which the name is proclaimed, the name of the Lord of hosts. For by reason of the mighty miracles which were done before the ark, the name of the Lord was highly extolled and magnified, not only among the Israelites, but the Philistines. And by this, saith Abarbinel, it was made known, that God dwelt among the Israelites: so that not only the Philistines were affrighted when this ark of God's presence came among them, (1 Sam. iv. 7, 8.) but the men of Beth-shemesh also, (vi. 20.)

That dwelleth between the cherubims.] The learned Lud. de Dieu thinks the most simple and genuine construction of all these words to be, by referring the word ascher (which) not to the ark, but unto God, and translating them thus: who is called the name, the name of the Lord of hosts, sitting on the cherubims, upon it. Which, saith he, is an egregious commendation of the ark, that it is the ark of that God, who, being incomprehensible and unbounded in his essence, is called absolutely the name, (see Lev. xxiv. 11. 16.) even the name of the Lord of hosts, who sitteth on the cherubims over the ark.

Ver. 3. And they set the ark of God upon a new cart.] Which ought to have been carried upon the shoulders of the Kohathites; (Numb. vii. 9.) for which reason no waggons were allowed to them, as there were to the rest of the Levites, to carry several parts of the tabernacle. And so David himself saith afterward it ought to be carried, 1 Chron. xv. 2. 15. And so, after the following miscarriage, it is plain from the thirteenth verse of this chapter it was so carried. How they came to forget themselves now, so as to put it upon a cart, one can but conjecture. They seem to have imitated the custom of other nations, who were wont to carry their mysteries in a chest upon a cart, drawn by oxen, or kine, as the Philistines did the ark itself, (1 Sam. vi. 7, 8.) Who not being punished for putting it upon a new cart, the Israelites followed their example the more securely. And, that they were wont also to carry their mysteries in a great deal of pomp (as David here did, ver. 5.) is manifest from abundance of authors. Sanchoniathon mentions an image in a shrine in Phœnicia, drawn after the same manner; in Eusebius's Præpar. Evangel. lib. i. cap. 15. (See our very learned Dr. Spencer, p. 816.) But that they learnt this from the Jews, not the Jews from them, seems to me most probable: though I can give no account how they came to put the ark now upon a new cart, unless it were in imitation of the Philistines.

And brought it out of the house of Abinadab that was in Gibeah.] Or, on the hill, as we read 1 Sam. vii. 1.

And Uzzah and Ahio, the sons of Abinadab, drave the new cart.] It seems Eleazar (who was sanctified to take care of the ark, as we read in the abovenamed place) was dead, or stayed at home to look after his father, who was now grown aged: so these two took upon them to be the bubulci (as Bochart calls them) who drave the oxen.

Ver. 4. And they brought it out of the house of Abinadab which was at Gibeah, accompanying the ark of God.] That is, when it was brought out of his house, the people flocked together to attend it.

And Ahio went before the ark.] He led the oxen, I suppose; and Uzzah went behind the cart, to take care the ark fell not out.

Ver. 5. And David, and all the house of Israel, played before the Lord.] Who was present where the ark was.

On all manner of instruments made of fir-wood, even on harps, and on psalteries, and on timbrels, and on cornets, and on cymbals.] Where Rasi notes, that these words becol atze beroshim, do not signify any particular instrument, but (as we translate it) the wood of which the following instruments are made; viz. either fir or box. As for the instruments themselves, it will be to no purpose to describe them. The learned reader may see an account of every one of them, in Bartoloccius's Kirjath-sepher, tom. ii. p. 190, &c.

Ver. 6. And when they came to Nachon's threshing-floor.] It is commonly thought that Nachon was the name of a man: but Bochartus thinks it rather the name of a place; so called by anticipation, for the stroke upon Uzzah. For nacha signifies to smite, and Nachon signifies percussion; so this floor was called ever after the floor of percussion; because God smote Uzzah in this place. And accordingly in 1 Chron. xiii. 9. it is called the floor of Chidon; which is the very same: for Chid signifies destruction.

Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of God, and took hold of it; for the oxen shook it.] There is no greater difference among interpreters about the signification of any word, than this word sametu, which we translate shook it. That which is nearest to the truth, Bochartus thinks, is our marginal translation, they stumbled. Yet this is mere guessing, for it hath no foundation either in the Hebrew or the neighbouring languages. But from the Arabic he takes this to be the sense; that the oxen, coming into a dirty place, stuck in the mire; and could not get out their feet: which Uzzah seeing, and fearing the king and the people, by this accident, might be stopped too long in their procession, took hold of the ark: intending, perhaps, to carry it, together with his brethren, to Mount Zion, which was not far off: but this should have been done at first; and because he did it not, he was punished by God.

Ver. 7. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzzah; and God smote him there for his error.] Or, for his rashness, in touching the ark: some think it was because he was not a Levite, and therefore should not have touched it. But it is pretty plain that he was; being the brother of Eleazar, who was consecrated to look after the ark: which was the office of a Levite, (1 Sam. vii. 1.) But being a Levite, he was guilty of a double error: first, in not carrying the ark upon his shoulders, together with his brethren; and secondly, in touching it; which he ought not so much as to have seen: but it being covered by the priests, the Levites were to take hold of the staves, and carry it, (Numb. iv. 15.)

And there he died by the ark of God.] Or, before the Lord, as it is expressed 1 Chron. xiii. 10. because the ark was the symbol of God's special presence. Some think he was suddenly choked; others that his arm and his shoulder, upon which he should have carried the ark, were dried up; others that he was blasted with lightning. But all these, and the like conjectures, are uncertain: it is enough to know, that he died suddenly, not from any natural cause, but struck by the hand of God. See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 13. who truly observes, that though his intention, perhaps, was good, yet that would not excuse an offence against the express law of God. Abarbinel also adds this as a cause of his punishment, that he wanted faith in God: who would not have suffered his ark to fall into the dirt; but supported it himself, without Uzzah's help.

Ver. 8. And David was displeased, because the Lord had made a breach upon Uzzah.] He took it very heavily: and was angry (as the word signifies), that there was any cause for such a breach; that is, such a destruction. For it detracted much from his authority and esteem, to have such an accident in the beginning of his reign, and at such a solemnity of great joy: which was hereby disturbed and interrupted. Perhaps he was troubled, being afraid that he also might suffer, for taking no better care about the carrying of the ark.

And he called the name of the place Perez-Uzzah to this day.] In memory of this dreadful stroke: whereby the Levites and all others might be admonished of their duty.

Ver. 9. And David was afraid of the Lord that day, and said, How shall the ark of the Lord come to me?] By this it appears he had some fear, that he himself was in danger: and therefore durst not bring the ark into his city. Either thinking, in great humility, that he was unworthy to have it so near him: or that he did not sufficiently understand how to treat it. Which he understood better afterward, as we learn from 1 Chron. xv. 2. 13—15.

Ver. 10. So David would not remove the ark of the Lord unto him into the city of David; but David carried it aside into the house of Obed-Edom the Gittite.] He is not called a Gittite from his being born or dwelling in Gath (which was a city of the Philistines), but from Gath-rimmon, a Levitical city, (Josh. xxi. 24, 25.) For it is certain Obed-Edom was a Levite, (1 Chron. xv. 18. 21. 24. xvi. 5.) who, I suppose, was willing to entertain the ark: resolving to treat it with such reverence, that he might not offend the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 11. And the ark of the Lord continued in the house of Obed-Edom three months.] A short time, in comparison with that which it continued at Kirjath-jearim. But all this time it was without the tabernacle. Which from Gilgal being removed to Shiloh, after the death of Eli, was carried to Nob; and after the death of Samuel, to Gibeon: where it remained till Solomon's temple was built, and then carried thither, as we read 1 Chron. xvi. 39. and 2 Chron. i. 3.

And the Lord blessed Obed-Edom, and his household.] Made them exceeding prosperous in all their affairs.

Ver. 12. And it was told David, saying, The Lord hath blessed the house of Obed-Edom, and all that pertaineth to him, because of the ark of God.] They could not tell to what to impute the extraordinary happiness that attended him, but to his religious care about the ark.

So David went and brought up the ark of God from the house of Obed-Edom into the city of David.] Hoping God would bless him, and his city, as he had done Obed-Edom, and his house.

With gladness.] All the people, I suppose, again accompanied him, playing on all manner of musical instruments, as they did before, ver. 5.

Ver. 13. And it was so, that, when they that bare the ark had gone six paces.] Without any mark of God's displeasure, as before, ver. 7.

He sacrificed oxen and fatlings.] As a thanksgiving to God for his goodness, upon an altar erected on purpose, on this extraordinary occasion. Some think he repeated these sacrifices seven times, at the end of every six paces. The word we translate fatlings, is, in the Hebrew, meri: whose signification is uncertain. For some take it for a lamb, others for a ram, and others put a different meaning on it. But Bochartus, with great probability, thinks it was a kind of ox, being commonly joined with oxen in Scripture, not only here, but in 1 Kings i. 9. 19. 25. Isa. i. 11. xi. 6. Nor doth 1 Chron. xv. 26. contradict this, where it is said, they offered bullocks and rams. For those are not the same sacrifices as these, which were offered by David; whereas those in the Chronicles were offered by the Levites. (See his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 19.)

Ver. 14. And David danced before the Lord with all his might; and David was girded with a linen ephod.] He laid aside his royal ornaments, and was girded only with a simple ephod: which was, I observed upon 1 Sam. ii. 18. an honorary garment, used by those who were no priests. He is said to dance before the Lord, because the ark was the symbol of the Divine presence. And from hence, it is probable, the heathen learnt to dance before their gods: as Callimachus mentions the chori, and dancings of youth at the altar of Apollo. And as there were παιδικοὶ χοροὶ, so there were also ἀνδρικοὶ, and among the Lacedemonians of old, men also. And Plato observes, that, among the Egyptians, all kinds of music, and songs, and dances, were consecrated to their gods, (lib. iii. de Legibus, p. 799.) See that great man, Ezek. Spanhemius's observations on Callim. Hymn. in Apollinem, ver. 8.

Ver. 15. So David and all the house of Israel brought up the ark of the Lord with shouting, and with the sound of the trumpet.] Such Ὀλολυγμοὶ, as the Greeks call them, were used before their gods: of which the great man now mentioned, gives a large account in his observations upon Callimachus's hymn ad Delum, ver. 258. where he observes, that ὀλολύζειν anciently signified to shout for joy: and in like manner the Latin word ululare is used by Statius for exultare. And this sort of rejoicing is at this day used by the Abyssines, in the evening of our Lord's resurrection: when men and women clap their hands, and dance to several instruments of music, till morning light: and all this in their churches. Which in all likelihood came from the Jews, who still dance in some of their festivals. See Ludolphus, in his comment upon his Historia Ethiopia. p. 381. where he observes, that David, in all probability, did not now dance alone, but in company.

Ver. 16. And as the ark of the Lord came into the city of David, Michal, Saul's daughter, looked out through a window, and saw king David leaping and dancing before the Lord; and she despised him in her heart.] Imagining that he debased himself, by stripping himself of the ornaments of majesty, and dancing among the common people. But she understood not, as Procopius Gazæus here glosses, ardoris stimulos, those stings of Divine love which David declared to her afterward.

Ver. 17. And he brought in the ark of the Lord, and set it in its place, in the midst of the tabernacle that David had pitched for it.] The ancient tabernacle made by Moses remained still, as I observed before, at Gibeon: from whence David did not think fit to fetch it, because he intended shortly (as Pellicanus well observes) to build a temple to settle it in. For the present, therefore, he only hung some curtains round about it, after the fashion of the tabernacle. (See vii. 2.)

And David offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings before the Lord.] To implore the continuance of his mercies to them; and to thank him for those they had received.

Ver. 18. And as soon as David had made an end of offering burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, he blessed the people in the name of the Lord.] He prayed God to bless them; and pronounced them blessed in his name.

Ver. 19. And he dealt among the people, even among the whole multitude of Israel, as well women as men, to every one a cake of bread, and a good piece of flesh, and a flagon of wine.] The Talmudists have a conceit, that the Hebrew word eshpar, which we translate a good piece of flesh, signifies the sixth part of a bullock: deriving it from three words put into one; viz. echad one, shesh six, and par a bullock. But every one sees this is a very forced fancy; and it is not in itself credible, that he could, among such a multitude, deal a sixth part of a bullock to every one; or that they could well carry it away, with the bread and wine. Bochartus more reasonably thinks (as some of the Jews do) the word is derived from shapar, which signifies decorus: and so the meaning is, as we translate it, he gave to every one a handsome or decent portion of flesh. (See his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 18.)

So all the people departed every one to his house.] Well satisfied with their prince's bounty to them, and his piety to God.

Ver. 20. Then David returned to bless his household.] As he had done the people.

And Michal, the daughter of Saul, came out to meet him, and said, How glorious was the king of Israel to-day.] This she spake ironically, by way of derision and contempt.

Who uncovered himself to-day.] Stripped himself of his royal robes, and put on a linen ephod, (ver. 14.)

In the eyes of the handmaids of his servants.] The women, perhaps, bare a part in these dances, as they did in Exod. xv. or at least were spectators of all the solemnity: from which none were excluded, though ever so mean.

As one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovereth himself!] Throws off all his clothes, and cares not who sees him, nor with what company he dances. This was spoken by way of reproach, that he mixed himself with the multitude; and seems to intimate that he had immodestly exposed himself, as shameless fellows do: which is not credible. But thus in a fit of passion she aggravates this action as very mean, yea, base, and much below himself. For no doubt David kept himself within the rules of modesty, when he was thus jocund, being about a sacred business; and did according to the command of God, who required the Israelites to rejoice in their feasts, (Deut. xii. 7. xvi. 1.) not with a futilous, lascivious, and petulant joy, but with a pious and moderate: as having God himself present. And thus Plato observes, lib. vii. de Legibus, that some dances are ἐμμελῶς, with modest and decent motions of the body: others πλημμελῶς, immodest and wanton. The latter of which, none can imagine David would be guilty of before God: but danced with composed and decent, not desultorious and light motions, such as vain fellows are wont to use. For as it is joy that excites men to leap and dance, so Divine joy moves them to do it after a manner becoming the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 21. And David said to Michal, It was before the Lord, which chose me before thy father, and before all his house, and appointed me ruler over the people of the Lord, over Israel: therefore will I play before the Lord.] Who had done so much for him, that he thought he could not shew himself thankful enough to so great a benefactor. He thought fit to take down her pride, by putting her in mind, how God had rejected all her family, and advanced him to the throne of Israel.

Ver. 22. And I will yet be more vile than thus, and will be base in my own eyes.] He thought nothing too mean for him to stoop unto; if thereby he could do any honour unto God. Otherwise, to dance in the streets before all the people had been very unbecoming the majesty of a king: as Nero (we are told by Suetonius) and Caligula were condemned for it, among the Romans. For among them it was not usual, nor was it done in honour of their gods. Whereas in David's time the greatest persons thus expressed their joy and thankfulness to God, by public leaping, dancing, shouting, and clapping their hands.

And of the maid-servants which thou hast spoken of, of them shall I be had in honour.] The more he humbled himself to do honour unto God, the more he was confident he should be magnified, and had in honour by his people. The esteem of the meanest of which, upon that account, he valued far more than all the vain-glorious praises Michal could bestow on him, for taking state upon him, and neglecting God's service.

Ver. 23. Therefore Michal, the daughter of Saul, had no child unto the day of her death.] Which is thus explained, in the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 2. sect. 8. She had children before this fact, but none after it as long as she lived. (See iii. 5.) David, perhaps, quite left her bed.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when the king sat in his house, and the Lord had given him rest round about from all his enemies.] Enjoyed himself in the palace Hiram had built for him, (v. 11.) having no disturbance from the Philistines, or other neighbouring nations.

Ver. 2. That the king said unto Nathan the prophet, See now, I dwell in a house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains.] Like a religious prince, he spent much of his time in pious meditations: and among other things reflected upon the meanness of God's habitation, in comparison with the splendour of his own. Which he thought ought not to be endured, and therefore resolved to build a stately house for God to dwell in.

Ver. 3. And Nathan said unto the king, Go, do all that is in thine heart: for the Lord is with thee.] He spake that as a prudent man, not as a prophet. For (as Procopius Gazæus here observes) the prophets did not see all things; but those only which the Divine grace revealed to them: as Samuel was ignorant which of Jesse's sons was to be anointed, till God told him. But Nathan had great reason for what he said, because he observed that the Lord had an extraordinary kindness for David, and prospered him in all that he went about. And David withal being a prophet as well as himself, he might presume this intention was suggested to him from God.

Ver. 4. And it came to pass that night, that the word of the Lord came to Nathan, saying.] God would not suffer him long to remain in an error; but corrected it the very next night.

Ver. 5. Go and tell my servant David.] He speaks very kindly of him: though he did not approve of his design.

Thus saith the Lord, Shalt thou build me a house for me to dwell in?] The meaning is, he should not build one. But this manner of speech declared his mind something sharply: to reprove him for his forwardness (without asking God's consent), not only in designing, but in making a vow, that he would forthwith build God a house. For it is probable, that upon Nathan's approving his intention, he made that vow mentioned Psal. cxxxii. 3—5. "Surely I will not go up to my bed, nor give sleep to mine eyes, &c. till I have found out a place for the Lord, a habitation for the mighty God of Jacob."

Ver. 6. Whereas I have not dwelt in any house since the time I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt, unto this day.] As much as to say, How comest thou to design me a fixed house, since neither I, nor any one else, thought of one from the time you have been a people?

But have walked in a tent and a tabernacle.] Contented myself with a moveable house, consisting of a tent and a tabernacle: in which I was always present to conduct and lead my people from place to place. By a tent is meant the inward hangings of the house, which were of curious work: and by the tabernacle, the boards to which they were fastened; and the badgers' skins, &c. wherewith all was covered.

Ver. 7. In all the places wherein I have walked with all the children of Israel spake I a word with any of the tribes of Israel.] That is, of the judges of Israel, as it is interpreted, 1 Chron. xvii. 6. For the word shibte signifies not only tribes but sceptres; and, consequently, supreme governors and rulers: such as the judges were who had the supreme authority in Israel. And so the following words explain it.

Whom I commanded to feed my people Israel.] He did not command the tribes, but the supreme governors of them, to feed, that is, to rule his people, and take care of their happiness. Here, again, feeding is governing; (as I observed, v. 2.) and the Hebrew word for feed being raga, as some pronounce it (in the Syriac, rega), very learned men thence derive the Latin words regere and reges: kings being designed by God to be the pastors of their people.

Saying, Why build ye me not a house of cedar?] God was the properest judge what house was agreeable to him, and he never signified that he disliked his present, and desired a more stately habitation.

Ver. 8. Now therefore so shalt thou say unto my servant David.] He would not have him think he took it ill that he should design what he never signified to be his desire; but owned him to be his faithful servant, and therefore accepted his pious intentions: as we read expressly 1 Kings viii. 18. which is signified in this message.

Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I took thee from the sheepcote, from following the sheep, to be ruler over my people Israel.] Therefore he needed not to make any doubt, but that God accepted his gratitude in designing to make him a house.

Ver. 9. And I was with thee whithersoever thou wentest.] In the time of his banishment, when he was remarkably preserved by God.

And have cut off all thine enemies out of thy sight.] Both those in Israel and those in the neighbouring countries.

And have made thee a great name, like to the name of the great men that are in the earth.] Famed in all the countries round about as a potent prince and a mighty warrior: and perhaps as a holy prophet, greatly beloved of God and of all his people.

Ver. 10. Moreover, I will appoint a place for my people Israel.] Or, I have constituted (or established) a place for my people; viz. the land of Canaan.

And will plant them.] Make them take root there.

That they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more.] No longer wander, as they did in the wilderness.

Neither shall the children of wickedness.] The idolatrous people round about them.

Afflict them any more, as beforetime.] When they were in the land of Egypt.

Ver. 11. And as since the time that I commanded judges to be over my people Israel.] In whose days they were sorely afflicted by the Moabites, Canaanites, Midianites, and other people.

And have caused thee to rest from all thine enemies.] Given him a quiet possession of the whole kingdom of Israel; which never was in so happy a condition as now. A flourishing people is a great blessing to the king that governs them: and therefore mentioned in this verse, as God's kindness to David. But this promise was with some exceptions, in case they became disobedient: which provoked God to chastise them.

Also the Lord telleth thee, that he will make thee a house.] A family, or royal offspring, that shall reign for many generations; which was a special favour of God to David: there being none of the Roman emperors, till the time of Antoninus, whose children from the reign of Julius Cæsar succeeded them in the empire, but only Vespasian.

Ver. 12. And when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee.] To sit upon his throne.

Which shall proceed out of thy bowels.] This shews that he speaks of one who was not yet born, viz. Solomon: and that Absalom, Adonijah, and the rest who pretended to the kingdom, were not designed for it: being already proceeded from him.

And I will establish his kingdom.] He reigned a long time himself; and so did his posterity after him.

Ver. 13. He shall build a house for my name; and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever.] The latter part of this verse can belong to none but the Messiah; if the words for ever be taken in their full extent.

Ver. 14. And I will be his father, and he shall be my son.] This the apostle shews is meant of Christ, Heb. i. 5. For though Solomon was called Jedidiah, in token that he was beloved of God, yet, in the complete sense of the words, Christ only is intended: who is God's beloved Son, in whom he is well-pleased.

If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men.] This is a mixed prophecy, some part of which belongs to Christ, and the other part to Solomon, and his successors in the kingdom of Israel: who, it is plain, is solely intended in these words. And by the rod of men, and the stripes of the children of men, is meant gentle correction; such as parents give their children.

Ver. 15. But my mercy shall not depart from him, as I took it from Saul, whom I put away before thee.] He promises not to translate the kingdom into another family; as he took it from Saul, to give it to David: but the kingdom shall continue in his line.

Ver. 16. And thy house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee: thy throne shall be established for ever.] That is, saith Kimchi, for a long time, between four and five hundred years, which was a rare thing, and seldom known, that the kingly authority continued in any one family so long. But this is chiefly intended of the kingdom of Christ, as Procopius Gazæus here observes: from whence the Jews said, (John xii. 34.) "We have heard out of the law that Christ abideth for ever." This is confirmed by the rule which Maimonides lays down in his More Nevochim, that though olam alone doth not necessarily signify eternally, yet when it is joined with ath, either before or after it, it doth so signify. And that is the case here; this kingdom is said to be established ath olam: which can belong to none but Christ; for David's kingdom had an end, but Christ's hath none; (par. ii. cap. 28.)

Ver. 17. According to all these words, and according to this vision, so Nathan spake unto David.] This shews the integrity of the prophet; who was not ashamed to retract his own words when he was better taught of God. And, as Dionysius observes, in an epistle to Novatus, μεῖζον ἔσται τοῦ σφάλματος τὸ κατόρθωμα, the correction of his fault was more eminent and remarkable than the fault itself.

Ver. 18. Then went king David in, and sat before the Lord.] That is, before the ark; which, as I have often said, was the symbol of his Divine presence. Sitting, among the heathens, was thought a posture proper enough in the Divine service; as Vossius hath observed, lib. ii. de Orig. et Progressu Idololat. cap. 34. "Quippe index animi magis compositi, et hoc agentis;" being an indication of a more composed mind, and attending to what they were about. But among the Israelites none were allowed to sit in the temple, except the king: unto whom this was indulged, if we can believe the Talmudists: whose general maxim was this, "It was not lawful for any one to sit in the court of the house of God; but only for the king of the house of David." (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 13. sect. 4.) But they have framed this notion merely from this single passage; there being no other place in the whole Scripture to support this assertion, that the king might sit at prayer: but, on the contrary, on the sabbath, and on festival days, when he came to the temple, he stood by the exterior pillar of the inward court of the house of God; as may be learnt from Ezek. xlvi. 1, 2. compared with 2 Kings xi. 14. and 2 Chron. xxiii. 13. Nor is there any other posture of worship mentioned in Scripture, but standing, or kneeling, or falling on the face. And therefore Abarbinel ingenuously confesses, that this is not the opinion of all their doctors, several of which in this forsake the Talmudists; and allege a weighty reason for it: because the angels themselves, who are higher than kings, are not permitted to sit before the Lord: but Isaiah saith, vi. 2. that the seraphim stood about the throne; and Micaiah saith, he saw the host of heaven stand before the Lord, 1 Kings xxii. 19. and see Zech. iii. 7. From which they conclude, if there be no sitting allowed above, by what right was it granted to the kings of David's family here below? Many great men, therefore, translate the Hebrew word jashab, not sat, but remained before the Lord: particularly Vetablus, upon 1 Chron. xvii. 16. And others, who allow the king might sit in the temple, yet confess he might not sit at prayer: and therefore expound this place thus: He took his seat in the tabernacle before the ark; and then he made the following prayer, standing up, as the manner was, when they worshipped God.

And he said, Who am I, O Lord God? and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?] He begins his address to God in a very becoming manner; with a most profound debasement of himself, and confession of his own unworthiness, to receive such blessings as God had already bestowed on him.

Ver. 19. And this was yet a small thing in thy sight, O Lord God; but thou hast spoken of thy servant's house for a great while to come.] Next, he magnifies the loving-kindness of God, who did not think it enough that he had made him a great king, but promised his posterity, and at last the Lord Christ, should sit upon his throne. So Abarbinel himself expounds these words, a great while to come: intimating, saith he, the Messiah, the son of David.

And is this the manner of men, O Lord God?] He acknowledges there was no example of such kindness to be found in this world: where kingdoms are not perpetuated, as Abarbinel observes; but this is the manner of angels, who always continue in their dignity.

Ver. 20. And can David say more unto thee?] There was nothing he could desire beyond this. (See 1 Chron. xvii. 18.)

For thou, Lord God, knowest thy servant.] But he thought he might leave all to God, who loved him and took care of him (for that is to know him) as his faithful servant.

Ver. 21. For thy word's sake, and according to thine own heart, hast thou done all these great things.] For God, he knew, would fulfil his own promise made by Samuel and by Nathan: to the making of which he had no other motive but his own good will; from whence alone all the great things proceeded which he had done for him.

To make thy servant know them.] That David might know how much God loved him by what he did for him.

Ver. 22. Wherefore thou art great, O Lord God.] He could not therefore but acknowledge his omnipotent power and the greatness of his goodness, which bestows such benefits upon unworthy creatures.

For there is none like the Lord, neither is there any god besides thee.] According to what Hannah had said in her song, wherein she prophesied of him, (1 Sam. ii. 2.)

According to all that we have heard with our ears.] Which their forefathers had reported of the wonders he had done, by Moses and Joshua, and in the time of the Judges.

Ver. 23. And what one nation in the earth is like thy people, even like Israel, whom God went to redeem for a people unto himself.] He seems to imitate the words of Moses in Deut. iv. 7. 34.

And to make him a name.] That all the world might know how powerful he was.

And to do for you great things, and terrible, for thy land.] To introduce them into the land of Canaan.

Before thy people, which thou redeemedst to thee from Egypt, from the nations and their gods?] Some understand by gods their rulers: but their gods were no more able to save the nations whom he drove out, than their kings and rulers were.

Ver. 24. For thou hast confirmed to thyself thy people Israel to be a people unto thee for ever: and thou, Lord, art become their God.] This is the sum of the covenant (as P. Martyr observes) between God and them: that they should be his obedient people, and he would bless them, and bestow all manner of good things upon them.

Ver. 25. And now, O Lord God, the word that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant, and concerning his house, establish it for ever, and do as thou hast said.] After his thankful acknowledgments, he makes his humble prayer to God, that he would perform his promise to him. For though he did not doubt of it, yet it became him to make it his request.

Ver. 26. And let thy name be magnified for ever, saying, The Lord of hosts is the God over Israel: and let the house of thy servant David be established before thee.] Yet he did not desire it merely for his own sake; but that God might be glorified in what he did for him: and men might always acknowledge, that the God of Israel was the Lord of heaven and earth; and faithful in his promise to the house of David.

Ver. 27. For thou, O Lord of hosts, God of Israel, hast revealed to thy servant, saying, I will build thee a house: therefore hath thy servant found in his heart to pray this prayer unto thee.] That he might not be thought too bold in his request, he professes he should not have taken this confidence, if God himself had not encouraged it, by his own most gracious promise to him.

Ver. 28. And now, O Lord God, thou art that God, and thy words be true, and thou hast promised this goodness unto thy servant.] He professes his belief of the unchangeableness of God's nature, and of the truth of all that he said: upon which he relied with an unshaken faith.

Ver. 29. Therefore now let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant, that it may continue before thee for ever: for thou, O Lord God, hast spoken it; and with thy blessing let the house of thy servant be blessed for ever.] Since God had been so gracious as to make such promises, and his word could not fail; he grows more confident to repeat his petition, which he had made before. Which is not the vain repetition, condemned by our Saviour: but proceeded from the abundant affection of a heart devoutly affected; which could not sufficiently acknowledge the goodness of God, and express his full assurance that he would fulfil his word. To this purpose Abarbinel; David did not multiply prayer for want of faith, because he distrusted the power of God; or thought his will was mutable; or that he doubted of his prophecy concerning him: but rather, this shews that he steadfastly rested assured of all this.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. AND after that it came to pass, that David smote the Philistines, and subdued them.] In the beginning of his reign they invaded him twice, (v. 17. 22.) But now David invaded their country, and made a conquest of it: and brought it in subjection to the Israelites.

And David took Metheg-Ammah out of the hand of the Philistines.] That is, the famous city of Gath, and the territories thereof, (as it is expounded, 1 Chron. xviii. 1.) which is called Metheg-Ammah, because it stood upon Mount Ammah: and was as a bridle to the whole country, whereby it was kept in obedience. So our translators understand the word Metheg in the margin of our Bibles. But R. Solomon takes it for a goad, or a staff; this city domineering over the Philistines. For we read of no king in any of their other cities: either in Gaza, or Ashdod, or Ekron, or Askelon; but only in this: where Achish formerly reigned, but, it is likely, was dead. There are several other interpretations in Bochart's Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 18. par. i.

Ver. 2. And he smote Moab.] Now was fulfilled the prophecy of Balaam, Numb. xxiv. 17.

And measured them with a line.] Having conquered the whole country, he took an exact survey of every part of it.

Casting them to the ground.] Laying level their strong holds and fortified places.

And with two lines measured he to put to death.] He divided the country into three equal parts; condemning two of them to be destroyed.

And with one line he saved alive.] A third part he preserved, that he might not be quite dispeopled. This severity, the Jews say, he exercised because they had slain his parents, and his brethren, whom he committed to the custody of the king of Moab during his exile, (1 Sam. xxii. 3, 4.) But, in truth, because the Moabites had always been implacable enemies to the Israelites: their kindness to David, beforementioned, proceeding from their hatred to Saul.

And so the Moabites became David's servants, and brought gifts.] And paid David a constant tribute, which continued all his days, and in the reign of Solomon: and after the kingdom was divided, it was paid to the kings of Israel; till after the death of Ahab they refused to pay it, as we read 2 Kings iii. 4, 5.

Ver. 3. And David smote also Hadadezer, the son of Rehob.] Who is called also Hadarezer: for the change of these two letters, daleth and resch, is very frequent, as Bochartus hath shewn in many instances, par. ii. Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 7. Nicolaus Damascenus, in a fragment of his, recorded by Josephus, (lib. vii. Antiq. cap. 6.) simply calls him Adad: which was a common name of the kings of Syria: who, according to the manner of the eastern princes, took their titles from the celestial bodies, as Sir John Marsham observes; and Adad was the name of the most glorious of them, viz. the sun, as Macrobius tells us: who truly saith, it signifies unus, one.

King of Zobah.] Zobah was a part of Syria, whose eastern border was Euphrates, as the western was the land of Canaan, and the kingdom of Damascus. It is frequently called Aram-Zobah in Scripture; of which Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 7. where he observes the nearness of Zobah to Judea, from the frequent wars the Israelites had with that people, in the days of Saul, 1 Sam. xiv. 47, and David, chap. x. of this book; and Solomon, 2 Chron. viii. 3. and they of Damascus came to help them, which is a sign they were near them (ver. 5. of this chapter), and Rezin fled from thence to Damascus, (1 Kings xi. 24.) And especially he observes, that the cities Solomon built in the wilderness, viz. Palmyrene, and others, (1 Kings ix. 17, 18.) are said to be in Hamath, 2 Chron. viii. 4. which shews the situation of Zobah.

As he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates.] That is, as David went to extend the limits of his kingdom (according to the ancient prophecy, Gen. xv. 18.) towards the river Euphrates, he smote this king, who came out, perhaps, to oppose him. See 1 Chron. xviii. 3. where it is said, he went to establish his dominions by the river Euphrates: which seems to relate to David, not to Hadadezer.

Ver. 4. And David took from him a thousand chariots.] The word chariot is not in the Hebrew: but it is well supplied by our translators, out of 1 Chron. xvi. 4. in which book many things are explained, which are briefly related here.

And seven hundred horsemen.] Here again is an ellipsis, as in the foregoing words: for in 1 Chron. xviii. 4. it is said seven thousand. But as after a thousand something is to be understood, viz. chariots: so after seven hundred something is to be understood, viz. captains (as Abarbinel explains it), under whom a great many others served; so that commanders and soldiers made, in all, seven thousand. Such an ellipsis is observed in this very book, v. 8. whosoever smites the Jebusites, and the blind, and the lame, &c. It is not said what shall be their reward; which is plainly mentioned 1 Chron. xi. 6. where it is said, he shall be chief. (See L'Empereur on Bava-kama, cap. 7. sect. 7.)

And twenty thousand footmen: and David houghed all the chariot horses.] Here again is the same ellipsis, for there is no word in the Hebrew for horses. Yet the meaning can be nothing else, but that he cut the hamstrings of the horses that drew their chariots, and made them unserviceable hereafter. (See Josh. xi. 9.) Thus, in x. 18. David is said to have slain seven hundred chariots; that is, the horses of so many chariots: and in Psal. lxviii. 18. by the chariots of the Lord, some understood horsemen: and lxxvi. 6. the chariot and horse, &c.; that is, as well the horses that drew the chariot, as they that rode in it. (See Bochartus, in his Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 6.)

But reserved of them for a hundred chariots.] For his guard, I suppose, not for war: God having commanded them not to multiply horses, Deut. xvii. 16. (See there.)

Ver. 5. And when the Syrians of Damascus came to succour Hadadezer king of Zobah.] For they were neighbours to him, as I observed on ver. 3.

David slew of the Syrians of Damascus twenty thousand men.] Which facilitated the conquest of their country: which follows in the next verse.

Ver. 6. Then David put garrisons in Syria of Damascus.] Aram-Damasek, which we translate Syria of Damascus, was that part of Syria which lay between Libanus and Antilibanus; whose chief city was Damascus, situated in a valley called by several names in Scripture, as Bochartus notes; viz. Hoba, Gen. xiv. 15. the valley of Aven, and Beth-eden, i. e. the place of pleasure, Amos i. 5. and Hadrach, Zech. ix. 1. It was watered by five rivers; the two principal of which descended from Mount Hermor, viz. Abana and Pharphar, (2 Kings v. 12.) The last of which ran by the walls of Damascus; the other ran through it, and divided the city into two parts.

And the Syrians became servants to David, and brought gifts.] In token of their subjection to him.

And the Lord preserved David whithersoever he went.] Kept him from all the dangers to which he was exposed in these wars.

Ver. 7. And David took the shields of gold that were on the servants of Hadadezer, and brought them to Jerusalem.] The Hebrew particle el, which we translate on, may better be translated with; that is, in the custody of Hadadezer's servants, who were officers in his treasury: for it is not likely they brought them into the field of battle.

Ver. 8. And from Betah, and from Berothai, cities of Hadadezer, David took exceeding much brass.] These two cities are called by very different names in 1 Chron. xviii. 6. though perhaps of the same signification in the language of that country, with these in the Hebrew language. Or there were four cities, perhaps, from whence he took much brass; two here mentioned, and two in the book of Chronicles. It is the opinion of some learned men, that these cities were situated at the foot of the Mount Libanus, between Emath and Damascus: which mount, they say, abounded with brass. But Bochartus could find no mention of the brass of Libanus in any ancient or modern writer. And the kingdom of Sobah lying about Palmyra, he takes the city called Berothai to be the same with that which Ptolemy calls Βαράθημα in Arabia Deserta; which is very remote from Libanus, (par. ii. Hierozoicon, lib. vi. cap. ult.)

Ver. 9. When Toi king of Hamath heard that David had smitten all the host of Hadadezer.] This city was also in Syria, and was called afterward Epiphania, as St. Jerome says, and lay north of Judea. (See Bochart, in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 37.)

Ver. 10. Then Toi sent Joram his son.] Called Hadoram, 1 Chron. xviii. 10.

Unto king David.] At Jerusalem, I suppose.

To salute him, and bless him.] To congratulate his good success in the war with Hadadezer; and to wish him continued prosperity.

Because he had fought against Hadadezer, and smitten him (for Hadadezer had wars with Toi).] And was too hard for him.

And Joram brought with him vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and vessels of brass.] As a present to king David: whose friendship he sought by this embassy.

Ver. 11. Which also king David did dedicate unto the Lord.] As he did what he took from Hadadezer.

With the silver and gold that he had dedicated of all people that he had subdued.] These words seem to import, that he was so far from multiplying silver and gold to himself, (which Moses forbade, Deut. xvii. 16.) that he put all this spoil, or the greatest part of it, into God's treasury: for the building of the temple, which he designed, and his son was to accomplish, (vii. 13.)

Ver. 12. Of Syria, and of Moab, and of the children of Ammon, and of the Philistines, and of Amalek, and of the spoil of Hadadezer, the son of Rehob, king of Zobah.] Here he reckons up all the countries, besides Hadadezer's, from whence he brought spoil to the treasury of God.

Ver. 13. And David gat him a name when he returned from smiting the Syrians.] His victory over that people, (mentioned ver. 5.) when they came to succour Hadadezer, gained him a great reputation, as a potent prince, and a mighty warrior.

In the valley of Salt, being eighteen thousand men.] There is nothing in the Hebrew answering to the word being: which therefore should be translated, in the valley of Salt eighteen thousand men. That is, he slew of the Edomites so many, besides the two-and-twenty thousand of the Syrians. So we read expressly, 1 Chron. xviii. 12. and in the title of the sixtieth Psalm it is said, they were Edomites, not Syrians, who were slain in this valley. Only in that place of the Psalms, there is mention of no more than twelve thousand slain: which makes some think it speaks of a distinct battle from this. But Abishai, who began the fight, perhaps, slew six thousand, and then Joab, coming in with his reserve, slew twelve thousand more; which, in all, make eighteen thousand. By the valley of Salt, Epiphanius understands the Dead Sea, which was formerly a famous valley, or rather it was a valley near that sea. But neither of these opinions has any good foundation, as Salmasius shews: who takes this valley of Salt to have been in the country of Edom, where this battle was fought; and to be called by this name, either from the salt springs which were therein, or from the salt that was digged up there. (See his Exercit. Plinianæ, cap. 35. p. 613, 614.)

Ver. 14. And he put garrisons in Edom; throughout all Edom put he garrisons.] Having conquered the whole country, he garrisoned the strongest places in it, with his own men; to keep them in subjection to him. Some of the Jews translate these words, he put captains or commanders in Edom; that is, great men to govern them, and, as his deputies, to keep them under and raise tributes, &c.

And the Lord preserved David whithersoever he went.] God's providence continued still over him to protect him, as formerly, (ver. 6.) in all these expeditions.

Ver. 15. And David reigned over Israel.] He had no disturbance at home, whilst he made wars abroad: but all Israel obeyed him.

And David executed judgment and justice to all his people.] And having finished his foreign wars, he applied himself to the civil government of his people, according to the law of God: which he executed duly by himself, or by his judges. Or rather, while he was engaged in so many wars abroad, he did not neglect his people at home; but took care that justice should be administered to them. And so he performed both parts of such a king as the Israelites desired, (1 Sam. viii. 20.)

Ver. 16. And Joab, the son of Zeruiah, was over the host.] According to the promise made to that person, who should first enter the strong fort of Zion, when he assaulted it, (1 Chron. xi. 6.)

And Jehoshaphat, the son of Ahilud, was recorder.] The Hebrew word mazkir, importing something of keeping in memory, or bringing to remembrance, moved our translators to render it recorder, or remembrancer, as if he wrote the acts of every day, which afterward were digested into annals. But this sure was not so considerable an employment as to make him that had it the prime civil officer in the kingdom, as Joab was the military. Therefore Victorinus Strigelius takes him to have been the chancellor of the kingdom: which is more likely than their opinion, who take him for the master of requests, who presented petitions, and put the king in mind of them.

Ver. 17. And Zadok, the son of Ahitub, and Ahimelech, the son of Abiathar, were the priests.] These two were the chief of the family of priests; next to the high-priest, which was Abiathar: called second priests in 2 Kings xv. 18. The former was of the family of Eleazar, (1 Chron. vi. 5.) the other of Ithamar. And Zadok is put first, as more acceptable to David than the other: and therefore, it is likely, constantly attended at court; the family of Eli now beginning to decline, as in the next reign the other was advanced to the high-priesthood, and Abiathar and his posterity quite thrown out. (See Selden, lib. i. de Success. ad Pontific. cap. 4.) Cornelius Bertram hath a peculiar conceit, that as Abiathar was always acknowledged by David as God's high-priest, and accordingly took care of the ark at Jerusalem, so Zadok, as principal priest among the rest, was set over the tabernacle at Gibeon. But Abarbinel's opinion is farthest from truth, that Zadok was now high-priest, and Abiathar but his vicar: which is directly against the Scripture, which shews Abiathar to have been high-priest until the days of Solomon. Yet to justify this, he thinks fit to tell a fabulous story out of Joma, and other books, which say that David removed Abiathar from his office when he fled from Absalom. For commanding him to inquire of God for him, by urim and thummim, God was pleased to give him no answer; but Zadok inquiring, had an answer. Whereupon David concluded the Spirit of God was gone from Abiathar, and that it was time to fulfil the prophecy against the house of Eli: and so thrust him out of his office. For which they have no other ground but this, that David spake first to Zadok, chap. xv. of this book, ver. 24. (See J. Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 1608, 1609.)

And Seraiah was the scribe.] Secretary of state, as we now speak; or, as others imagine, clerk of the council, who set down all acts and decrees; others, the keeper of the public accounts. But the Hebrew word sopher (which we translate scribe) importing something of learning (as the word scribe in the New Testament doth), I take him to have been his prime counsellor in the law, who always attended him. Constantine L'Empereur thinks there were two sorts of scribes, an ecclesiastical and a civil; and here understands the latter: and would have him signify no more than the muster-master of the army. (See his Annot. on Bertram de Repub. Jud. p. 383, &c.)

Ver. 18. And Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada, was over the Cherethites and the Pelethites.] Or, the Crethites and the Plethites, as some pronounce these words. What they were is variously conjectured. The most idle conceit is that of some of the Jewish doctors, who take them for the members of the great Sanhedrin, nay, for urim and thummim. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 15. p. 601. and cap. 16. p. 668.) Certain it is that they were soldiers, as appears from xv. 18. xx. 7. 1 Kings i. 34. where they are mentioned as present at the proclaiming king Solomon against Adonijah: which could not have been done safely without some armed force; and if they were not the persons, there were none. Yet they were not common soldiers, but the constant guards of David's person; like the prætorian bands among the Romans. So Josephus calls them σωματοφύλακες, keepers of the body, who never departed from the place where the king was: as we may be satisfied by this, that they had a peculiar commander, and were not under Joab, the captain of the host; but are distinguished from his soldiers, xx. 6, 7. Some make them men of a gigantic stature, but I know no ground for that; though, no doubt, they were proper men, as we speak, robust, and of tried fidelity: who, in the rebellion against David, did not desert David, but stuck close to him, (xv. 18.) It is further probable, that they were selected out of a certain nation or family. For the Cherethites inhabited part of Palestine, and were indeed the same with the Philistines, as I observed upon 1 Sam. xxx. 14. and see Zeph. ii. 5. The Pelethites, it is likely, were a family in Israel: for we find two of the name of Peleth mentioned in Scripture: one of the tribe of Reuben, Numb. xvi. 1. another of Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 33. Their arms were bows and arrows, and slings, if we may believe the Chaldee interpreter, who calls them archers and slingers: as Procopius Gazæus calls them jaculatores et sagittarios. Which may be confirmed by this conjecture, that the Philistines having sorely galled the Israelites, in the fatal battle with Saul, by their archers, David took care not only to have his people instructed in the use of the bow, but also procured some archers from the Cherethites, who were a part of the Philistines, to be his guard: as some princes now get the Switzers. (See my notes upon 1 Sam. xxxi. 3. and upon the first chapter of this book, ver. 18.) The number of them may be probably gathered from the targets and shields of gold that Solomon made, which were five hundred, (1 Kings x. 16, 17.) and were for the use of his guard, (2 Chron. xii. 9—11.) and kept in the guard-chamber.

They that would see more of them, may look into a little treatise of Opitius, which is wholly upon this subject: and Fortunatus Scacchus treats largely of them in his Myrothecium, iii. cap. 16—18. where he hath this singular opinion, p. 181. that the Cherethites were inferior to the Pelethites: but, I think, with reason concludes, that they were the king's domestics, and lay in his palace, or about it, in the night: which he gathers from 1 Kings i. 33. where David bids Nathan, and Zadok, and Benaiah, take with them the servants of their lord, and make Solomon king; and accordingly they took the Cherethites and the Pelethites with them; (ver. 38.) and from the story of that brave man Uriah, who would not go to his own house to his wife, when Joab and the host lay in the field; but went and slept at the door of the king's house with the servants of his lord; that is, with these Cherethites and Pelethites, (chap. xi. of this book, ver. 9.)

And David's sons were chief rulers.] So the Hebrew word cohen often signifies, not only a priest, but a prince; as many learned men have observed: particularly Hackspan, in his Miscellanea, lib. i. cap. 5. sect. 15. but especially Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 16. p. 671, &c. where he shews, that the Hebrew word signifies any minister, either of God or of man: as, in the twentieth chapter of this book, (ver. 26.) Ira, the Jairite, is said to be a cohen, which we translate chief ruler about David; and so the Chaldee, and the Spanish Jews, a principal officer. But by the law, neither he nor David's sons could be priests. There can be, therefore, no doubt of this, that they were the principal officers in the court of David, the prime ministers of his household: such as, among us, are the lord high-chamberlain, steward, treasurer, &c. as appears from 1 Chron. xviii. 17. where this matter is thus explained, they were at the hand of the king: waiting on him, as chief officers in his court, or, as Cornelius Bertram explains it, "publicos et primarios ministros," the public and principal ministers of state. (See Bochartus, lib. ii. Canaan, cap. 17.) And this was the reason, they say, of Absalom's discontent, that he was not one of these Αὐλάρχαι; or, had not a place according to his mind.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. AND David said, Is there yet any that is left of the house of Saul, that I may shew him kindness for Jonathan's sake?] Having ended his wars, and settled his kingdom and court, now he considers what private obligations he had; especially to the house of Saul, but above all to Jonathan. For he promised Saul, with an oath, that he would not cut off his seed, (1 Sam. xxiv. 21, 22.) and had made a covenant of friendship with Jonathan and his posterity for ever; confirmed also by an oath, (1 Sam. xx. 14—17. 42. xxiii. 18.)

Ver. 2. And there was of the house of Saul a servant, whose name was Ziba.] He had been employed in some business in Saul's family; but being a Canaanite (as some of the Jews will have it), he did not recover his liberty with the death of Saul, but still continued in servitude under David.

And when they had called him unto David, the king said unto him, Art thou Ziba? And he said, Thy servant is he.] He was in such an inferior station, that David did not know him; though some among his courtiers did.

Ver. 3. And the king said, Is there yet any of the house of Saul, that I may shew the kindness of God unto him? And Ziba said unto the king, Jonathan hath yet a son, which is lame on his feet.] Here David, like a good man, and a worthy friend, and a noble prince, thinks how he may perform his promise to Jonathan, 1 Sam. xx. 14. where he obliged himself to shew the kindness of the Lord, that is, great kindness, to his posterity.

Ver. 4. And the king said unto him, Where is he? And Ziba said, He is in the house of Machir, the son of Ammiel, in Lo-debar.] A place on the other side Jordan, in Mount Gilead, (see xvii. 27.) where, it is likely, his friends thought him safe: being far from David; whom they looked upon as an enemy. (See ver. 7.)

Ver. 5. Then king David sent, and fetched him out of the house of Machir, the son of Ammiel, from Lo-debar.] It is likely he sent Ziba to bring him to court, and to assure him of the king's kindness.

Ver. 6. Now when Mephibosheth.] Called also Meribbaal, 1 Chron. viii. 34. ix. 40.

The son of Jonathan, the son of Saul, was come to David, he fell on his face, and did reverence.] As the manner was when men came into the presence of the king, or the king's son: for thus David himself did to Jonathan, (1 Sam. xx. 41.)

And David said unto him, Mephibosheth! And he answered, Behold thy servant!] The king spake in a very friendly manner to him: and he answered as humbly.

Ver. 7. And David said unto him, Fear not.] This intimates that he had apprehensions David might have an evil eye upon him, as one that had a pretence to the kingdom.

For I will shew thee kindness for Jonathan thy father's sake, and will restore thee all the land of Saul thy father.] Which he had purchased before he was king, or acquired afterward, or was descended to him from his father: but had been confiscated (as D. Kimchi observes) to the king's exchequer, because Ish-bosheth and the house of Saul had rebelled against David, who was the Lord's anointed. And accordingly afterward David gave all this land to Ziba, when he accused Mephibosheth of treason against him, xvi. 6. (See Selden, de Succession. ad Leges Hebræorum, cap. 25. fol. 89.)

And thou shalt eat bread at my table continually.] As one of his own children, (ver. 11.)

Ver. 8. And he bowed himself.] In token of his thankfulness.

And said, What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?] This is a high expression of his unworthiness of any favour. For a dog was accounted a vile and unclean creature, and a dead dog was of no use at all. See iii. 8. 1 Sam. xxiv. 15. where David spake thus to Saul, as Helena (Bochart observes) did to Hector. There being no greater expression of humility than this, for one to be so abject as to call himself a dog. In like manner, he that calls another so, (as Abishai doth Shimei, and Ulysses doth the wooers, to whom he calls ὦ κύνες, Odyss. x.) expresses the utmost contempt of him.

Ver. 9. Then the king called to Ziba, Saul's servant, and said unto him, I have given unto thy master's son all that pertained to Saul, and to all his house.] Some understand by his master's son the son of Mephibosheth, (called Micah, ver. 12.) because Ziba was not to provide for Mephibosheth himself, who was to be maintained by the king at his royal table. But it may as well be thought to be meant of Mephibosheth, who had this estate given him for such uses as he should think fit to appoint.

Ver. 10. Thou therefore, thy sons, and thy servants, shall till the land for him, and thou shalt bring in the fruit, that thy master's son may have food to eat.] This may seem to favour what was said before, that he was to manage the land for the benefit of Micah the son of Mephibosheth and his household, who were to be maintained out of the product of it: but the following words, I think, shew the contrary.

But Mephibosheth thy master's son shall eat bread always at my table.] Now he declares publicly what he had said privately to Mephibosheth. Who being the person here plainly called his master's son (i. e. the son of Jonathan), it inclines me to conclude that he is understood before by that name: whose family was to be maintained by the fruit of the estate that David gave him, though he himself was to eat always with David.

Now Ziba had fifteen sons and twenty servants.] Who were sufficient to manage a very great estate.

Ver. 11. Then said Ziba unto the king, According to all that my lord the king hath commanded his servant, so will thy servant do. As for Mephibosheth, said the king, he shall eat at my table, as one of the king's sons.] Those words, said the king, are not in the original text: so that these words may be thought to be Ziba's: who said he would keep a table for Mephibosheth also, if David pleased, and entertain him royally, the land being sufficient to afford it. But I do not see how he could call it my table; which must be the language of David: who now repeated what he had said before, that Ziba should take no care of Mephibosheth.

Ver. 12. And Mephibosheth had a young son, whose name was Micah.] Who had many sons, from whom issued a numerous progeny, which lasted many generations, (1 Chron. viii. 34, 35, &c. ix. 40, 41, &c.)

And all that dwelt in the house of Ziba were servants unto Mephibosheth.] And consequently accountable to him for all that they received out of the estate: which, it appears by this, was settled upon him.

Ver. 13. So Mephibosheth dwelt in Jerusalem.] Ziba went to take care of his land, which was at Gibeah of Benjamin, but Mephibosheth stayed with the king, that he might partake of his bounty.

For he did eat bread continually at the king's table; and was lame on both his feet.] Though he could not go, yet he was carried thither; for so the words may be translated, though he was lame, &c. This defect and blemish did not hinder him from being entertained by the king with the greatest kindness: which procured him, though despicable in his person, honour from the people, as one in great favour with their king.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass after this, that the king of the children of Ammon died.] Who, it appears by the next verse, was Nahash: to whom Saul gave a very great defeat at Jabesh-Gilead, (1 Sam. xi.)

And Hanun his son reigned in his stead.] For it seems that was an hereditary kingdom, as most were in those countries and times.

Ver. 2. Then said David, I will shew kindness to Hanun the son of Nahash, for his father shewed kindness unto me.] All generous minds are full of gratitude and compassion, as Strigelius here observes out of several heathen authors. But there is no example of it greater than in David, who remembers ancient benefits received from Nahash, and pitied his son who had lost such a father. What those benefits were is uncertain. Some of the Jews say he fled to him, when he durst not stay with Achish, and he received him kindly; others, that he entertained his relations, when the king of Moab, to whom David committed them, slew some of them: but it is most probable, that, being an enemy to Saul, who had given him a great overthrow, he proved a friend to David when he was persecuted by him, and sent him relief and assistance, and perhaps offered him his protection.

And David sent to comfort him by the hand of his servants for his father.] According to the present custom among princes, who send some of their courtiers to condole the loss of those with whom they live in friendship.

And David's servants came into the land of the children of Ammon.] Where they had audience of Hanun, and delivered their message: which his court sinistrously interpreted, as appears by the next verse.

Ver. 3. And the princes of the children of Ammon.] Who bare a great sway in all public affairs.

Said unto Hanun their lord, Thinkest thou that David doth honour thy father, that he hath sent comforters unto thee?] They measured his affection by their own: who having no kindness for David, imagined he had as little for them.

Hath not David rather sent his servants to search the city, and to spy it out?] Nothing so well meant but may be ill interpreted; and is wont to be so by men who love nobody but themselves!

To overthrow it.] They persuade him that these ambassadors came only to observe where the city was weakest, and might be most successfully assaulted and taken.

Ver. 4. Wherefore Hanun took David's servants, and shaved off one half of their beards.] He was not only very credulous, but very ill natured; for otherwise he would have civilly dismissed them, whatsoever his courtiers suspected, or kept them in an honourable custody till the truth had been discovered. But this was the highest disgrace that could be put upon them: for all people thought their hair a great ornament, and never shaved their heads or their beards but in case of mourning: which was forbid to the Israelites, (Lev. xix. 27. Deut. xiv. 1.) And therefore, when he had caused one half of their beards to be cut off, they abhorred to cut the other; which made them look ridiculously. (See Isa. xv. 2. Jer. xli. 5. xlviii. 37.) We learn what a foul disgrace, yea, a heavy punishment, this was in ancient times, from Nicolaus Damascenus, mentioned by Stobæus, tit. 42. who says, that among the Indians the king commanded the greatest offenders to be shaven, κελεύει κείρασθαι ὡς ἐσχάτης τιμωρίας, as the heaviest punishment he could inflict upon them. And Tacitus saith, that there were few adulteresses among the ancient Germans, whose punishment was left to the husbands: and they were wont to cut off their hair, and turn them naked out of doors, and whip them through the streets. (See Georg. Ritterhusius de Jure Asylorum, cap. 10.) And at this day this is the greatest indignity that can be offered to any man in Persia, to cause his beard to be shaved off: as Tavernier relates in his Indian Travels, p. 121. where he tells us the sophi caused an ambassador of Aurengzebe to be thus used, telling him he was not worthy to wear a beard, and thereupon commanded it to be shaved off. Which was just like this act of Hanun. And Aurengzebe most highly resented the affront that was offered him in the person of his ambassador, as David did this which was offered him in his.

And cut their garments to the middle, even to their buttocks, and sent them away.] Long garments down to the heels were worn in those countries, especially by honourable persons: and therefore the king of Ammon still put a further indignity upon them, in cutting their garments short, even to the middle: whereby those parts were exposed which required to be covered. For the Israelites did not wear breeches, as we do: so that their long garments being cut to the middle, their nakedness might be seen. (See Isa. xx. 4.)

Ver. 5. And when they told it unto David, he sent to meet them, because they were greatly ashamed.] Therefore he sent, no doubt, clothes to cover them, together with the following advice.

And the king said, Tarry at Jericho.] Which was the first place to which they came in the land of Canaan: and now a private village, where they might obscure themselves, till they were fit to appear in public.

Until your beards be grown, and then return.] For it was a reproach in that country to have no beard. And though it was well known how they came to be deprived of them, yet it was not fit that persons of their quality should appear unlike all other men.

Ver. 6. And when the children of Ammon saw that they stank before David,] They wanted not intelligence how heinously David resented the barbarous usage of his ambassadors: which is expressed by a phrase, which signifies that they were become very odious to him. (See Gen. xxxiv. 30.)

The children of Ammon sent and hired the Syrians of Beth-rehob.] They distrusted their own strength, and therefore hired auxiliary forces of their neighbours: particularly those of Beth-rehob, which was a city belonging to the Canaanites rather than the Syrians (as Bochart observes), who were only borderers upon it.

And the Syrians of Zobah, twenty thousand footmen.] Concerning Zobah, see viii. 3.

And of king Maacah a thousand men.] Maacah also was a city in Palestine, beyond Jordan, in the tribe of Manasseh, as Rehob was in the tribe of Asher, (Josh. xiii. 11. xix. 28.) but the Canaanites kept them out of the possession of both, (Josh. xiii. 13. Judg. i. 31.) Therefore Bochartus confutes those who think Aram-Maacah was the country of Comagena: for though Aram commonly signifies Syria, which was divided into many countries, yet the Scriptures shew these places were not in Syria. But the people of them were called Syrians, because they imitated their manners: as the woman in the gospel is called Syro-Phœnician, though she was a woman of Canaan, Matt. xv. 22. Mark vii. 26. (See his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 6. latter end.)

And of Ish-tob twelve thousand men.] Or, of the men of Tob: a country unto which Jephthah fled from his unkind brethren. (See Judg. xi. 3.)

Ver. 7. And when David heard of it, he sent Joab, and the host of the mighty men.] He did not think it prudent to stay till they assaulted him in his own country, but went and invaded theirs.

Ver. 8. And the children of Ammon came out, and put the battle in array at the entering in of the gate.] They drew up their army either before Rabbah, the metropolis of their country, or before Medeba (in the borders of it), where their confederates were pitched, (1 Chron. xix. 7.)

And the Syrians of Zobah, and of Rehob, and Ish-tob, and Maacah, were by themselves in the field.] They kept their mercenary forces in the field, and would not let them come into their cities.

Ver. 9. And when Joab saw that the front of the battle was against him before and behind,] In the Hebrew, the face of the battle, &c. i. e. they had divided their forces; the Syrians appearing before him, and the Ammonites behind him.

He chose of all the choice men of Israel, and put them in array against the Syrians.] He also, like an expert commander, presently divided his army into two bodies, and picked out the best soldiers to engage the Syrians, who, it seems, were the strongest, or most valiant.

Ver. 10. And the rest of the people he delivered into the hand of Abishai his brother, that he might put them in array against the children of Ammon.] He was also an experienced captain, who seems to have to deal with that body of the enemies which was behind them, as Joab with those before him.

Ver. 11. And he said, If the Syrians be too strong for me, then thou shalt help me; but if the children of Ammon be too strong for thee, then I will come and help thee.] Send a detachment, as they now speak, from the strongest body to that which proved weaker.

Ver. 12. Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people, and for the cities of our God.] The words were not spoken, I suppose, to Abishai alone; but to all the army by their officers; that they might not be disheartened at the sight of such numerous forces, as in a manner encompassed them: but be so much the more resolute, for the preservation of their country.

And the Lord do that which seemeth him good.] If they did their duty, he trusted God's providence would favour them: however, it would be some comfort, that they had done their best.

Ver. 13. And Joab drew nigh, and the people that were with him, unto the battle against the Syrians: and they fled before him.] He did very prudently in assaulting the mercenary army first; for they that are hired to fight generally have a great care to save themselves: having no regard to the cause for which they fight.

Ver. 14. And when the children of Ammon saw that the Syrians were fled.] On whom they principally relied.

Then fled they also before Abishai, and entered into the city.] They seem not to have struck a stroke; but provided also for their safety, in the city near to which their army was drawn up.

And Joab returned from the children of Ammon, and came to Jerusalem.] Here is no account of the number of the slain, which, I suppose, were few or none, because they did not fight, but flee. The year also seems to have been so far spent, that it was not a season fit for laying a siege to the city. (See the next chapter, ver. 1.)

Ver. 15. And when the Syrians saw that they were smitten before Israel, they gathered themselves together.] Fearing David would fall upon them for assisting his enemies, they resolved to be beforehand with him; and therefore levied a new army to invade him.

Ver. 16. And Hadadezer.] Who was the king of Aram-Zobah, in Mesopotamia.

Sent, and brought out the Syrians that were beyond the river.] i. e. Beyond Euphrates; which was the bound of his territories eastward. (See viii. 3.)

And came to Helam.] A place, I suppose, on the borders of Hadadezer's country, westward.

And Shobach, the captain of the host of Hadadezer, went before them.] Commanded both his forces and theirs which came to his assistance.

Ver. 17. And when it was told David, he gathered all Israel together, and passed over Jordan, and came to Helam.] In this expedition David seems to have commanded his army in his own person.

And the Syrians set themselves in array against David, and fought with him.] They seem to have begun the fight.

Ver. 18. And the Syrians fled before Israel; and David slew the men of seven hundred chariots.] That is, seven thousand men, who belonged to those seven hundred chariots, as it is explained in 1 Chron. xix. 18.

And forty thousand horsemen.] In that place of the Chronicles it is said forty thousand footmen. Which teaches us how to explain the words here; viz. that they were mixed together, horse and foot: and that in all there were slain forty thousand of them, part horsemen and part footmen.

And smote Shobach, the captain of their host, who died there.] Was slain upon the spot (as we speak); being a valiant man, who chose to be killed, rather than fly.

Ver. 19. And when all the kings that were servants of Hadadezer saw that they were smitten before Israel.] There were several petty kings that were subject to Hadadezer: who was the most powerful prince thereabout.

They made peace with Israel, and served them.] As, I suppose, Hadadezer himself also did: whereby God fulfilled his promise to Abraham (which was renewed to Joshua) of enlarging the dominion of his posterity, as far as Euphrates. (See Gen. xv. 18. Josh. i. 2—4.)

So the Syrians feared to help the children of Ammon any more.] But left them to shift for themselves: insomuch that, as it follows, David conquered their country.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, that after the year was expired.] In the Hebrew, at the return of the year: that is, in the spring-time, he sent forth his armies to do that which he could not do in the conclusion of the former year; when the season was not fit for action, as I observed upon the fifteenth verse of the foregoing chapter. For the year ending with the month Adar, the next year began in the month Nisan: which was a fit time to march into the field to make war; and so commonly employed, that it seems to have had its name (as Bochartus observes) from Nisim: which signifies military ensigns, which were wont to be advanced in that month. And, in like manner, the month we call March, had its name among the Romans from Mars, their god of war: because then they began their military expeditions. (See his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50.)

At the time that kings go forth to battle.] These words, to battle, are added for explication's sake: but they are not in the Hebrew; in which language to go forth signifies to go forth to war. (See Gen. x. 11. Isa. xlii. 13. Zech. xiv. 3. and other places, mentioned by the same great man, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 2.)

That David sent Joab, and his servants with him, and all Israel.] All his soldiers.

And they destroyed the children of Ammon.] Laid waste their country, and killed all the people they could meet with.

And besieged Rabbah.] The royal city of the Ammonites, (Deut. iii. 11.)

But David tarried still at Jerusalem.] He committed the care of this war to Joab, and did not himself go out to fight: as he had done before against Hadadezer.

Ver. 2. And it came to pass in an evening-tide.] In the afternoon, when the sun was declining.

That David rose from his bed.] Where he had lain down to sleep, in the heat of the day; as the manner was in those countries, (iv. 5.)

And walked upon the roof of his house.] To take the fresh air: for their roofs were flat. (See Deut. xxii. 8.)

And from the roof he saw a woman washing herself.] In her garden, where she bathed; or in her chamber, the casements being open. The first is most probable: and that she washed to cleanse herself from such legal impurities as are mentioned Lev. xv. 19. which is more likely than that she did it for pleasure, or merely to cool herself in a hot day, as some understand it. The fourth verse sufficiently explains this matter.

And the woman was very beautiful to look upon.] Of a delicate shape, and lovely countenance and complexion. Thus Jupiter is said to have seen Proserpina washing herself, and exposing her whole body to his view: which inflamed his lust after her.

Λουομένης ὅλον εἶδος ἐδέρκετο Περσεφονείης.

As Nonnus hath it in his Dionys. (See Spanhemius ad vers. 53. Callim. Hymn. in Lavacrum Palladis.)

Ver. 3. And David sent and inquired after her.] That if she was a single woman he might take her for his wife.

And one said, Is not this Bath-sheba, the daughter of Eliam, the wife of Uriah the Hittite?] This seems to be the answer of him who was sent to inquire about her, that he need not trouble himself any farther, for she was another man's wife. Who is called a Hittite, because he was so by nation, but a proselyte to the Jewish religion: and for his valour made one of the king's guard among the Cherethites and the Pelethites, which was the reason, perhaps, that he had a house so near the king's.

Ver. 4. And David sent messengers to her, and took her.] Notwithstanding he was informed she was another man's wife, he sent messengers to her to invite her to his palace: into which he received her. This was a very great crime, being done deliberately and advisedly: and is here recorded for several great ends and purposes. First, that the best men may be sensible in what need they stand continually of the Divine assistance: which, therefore, they ought to pray for earnestly, and watch as well as pray, that they fall not into temptation. And we should all learn from hence, that they are but men whose examples are set before us; and therefore we must live by rule, and not merely by example. And that we ought to take heed of sloth and idleness: being always well employed, and not giving ourselves liberty to gaze upon temptations.

And she came in unto him, and lay with him (for she was purified from her uncleanness).] Which shews the reason why she conceived so quickly. (See Grotius.)

And she returned to her house.] Early in the morning, I suppose, that she might not be discovered. The Talmudists are so desirous to excuse their ancestors from all blemishes, that they say David committed no sin in lying with Bath-sheba: but only in causing Uriah to be killed. For, when any man went to war, he gave his wife, they pretend, a bill of divorce: so that if he was killed in the war, it was not adultery in another man, who lay with her, as soon as the bill was given. This monstrous opinion is seriously maintained by R. Samuel Laniado against Abarbinel; who honestly acknowledges, and strenuously proves, David was guilty of a very foul adultery: which was the more criminal, because it was with the wife of a faithful servant of his, who then served him in his wars. (See Buxtorf. de Sponsal. et Divort. sect. 43, &c. and Selden, in his Uxor. Hebraica, lib. iii. cap. 19. p. 441.)

Ver. 5. And the woman conceived, and sent and told David, saying, I am with child.] She was afraid of infamy, and, perhaps, of the severity of her husband; who might cause her to be stoned: and therefore prays David to consult her honour and her safety.

Ver. 6. And David sent unto Joab, saying, Send me Uriah the Hittite. And Joab sent Uriah to David.] With an account of the state of the war; which David, it is likely, desired.

Ver. 7. And when Uriah was come unto him, David demanded of him how Joab, and how the people did, and how the war prospered.] Some think (particularly P. Martyr) that these were such ordinary questions, as betrayed this was not the business for which he commanded him to be sent: but the last words import, that after the common questions of Joab's and the people's health, he inquired how the siege went on; what approaches they had made to the city; what hopes they had of taking it; in what time; with other things of like nature, which were of importance.

Ver. 8. And David said, Go down to thy house and wash thy feet.] As the manner of travellers was: this being a great refreshment after their journey.

And Uriah departed out of the king's house, and there followed him a mess of meat from the king.] In token of his extraordinary favour and kindness to him: and that, eating freely of good cheer, he might be the more desirous to enjoy the company of his wife. Abarbinel thinks this was a very sinful contrivance of David, to endeavour to have his child thought the child of Uriah: or, at least, it was very much below his dignity, he thinks, to have one of his own progeny pass for an ordinary man.

Ver. 9. But Uriah slept at the door of the king's house with the servants of his lord, and went not down to his house.] Like a true soldier, he lay all night in the guard-chamber (with the Cherethites and Pelethites), and not with his wife. By which means God's providence so ordered it, that the crime of this prince (who had been so admirably instructed in his duty) should not be concealed, as he intended.

Ver. 10. And when they had told David, saying, Uriah went not down to his house.] They that carried the mess of meat after him gave David this information.

David said unto Uriah, Camest thou not from thy journey? wherefore then didst thou not go down to thine house?] He still pretended kindness to him, and great care of him: telling him he expected no service of him here; especially after a journey.

Ver. 11. And Uriah said unto David, The ark, and Israel, and Judah, abide in tents.] It seems they still continued the custom which we read of 1 Sam. iv. 4. of carrying the ark into the field, as a token of the Divine presence with them, and favour to them: and that they might consult the Divine Majesty in any difficult cases.

And my lord Joab, and the servants of my lord, are encamped in the open field.] Where they lay upon the ground in their tents. It is an idle conceit of Laniado, beforementioned, that Uriah was guilty of treason, in calling Joab my lord, in the presence of David: for which he pretends David might lawfully put him to death.

Shall I then go unto my house, to eat and to drink, and to lie with my wife? As thou livest, and as thy soul liveth, I will not do this thing.] These are not two oaths, but the repetition of the same: which was pronounced with such vehemence, that David's heart, it might have been expected, should have been deeply touched, to think how he had abused so brave a man: and made him reflect how vilely he indulged himself in sinful pleasure, whilst this man and the rest gloriously endured all manner of hardships, and refused the most innocent pleasure, for the service of their country: but he was so corrupted for the present, that he was troubled to find Uriah so true a soldier.

Ver. 12. And David said to Uriah, Tarry here to-day also, and to-morrow I will let thee depart. So Uriah abode in Jerusalem that day and the morrow.] He still pretended more kindness to him in giving him time to rest himself after his journey: and perhaps pretended, also, that he himself could not sooner finish his dispatches.

Ver. 13. And when David had called him.] Invited him to supper the night before he went away.

He did eat and drink before him; and he made him drunk: and at even he went out to lie on his bed with the servants of his lord, and went not down to his house.] The Hebrew word doth not certainly signify that he was quite drunk; but that he drank so much, that he was very merry. However, Plutarch observes, that brave men, even when they have drunk too much, preserve their modesty and gravity: just as good horses are orderly, even when their reins are let loose. This was an addition to David's sin, that he endeavoured to intoxicate Uriah, and thereby make him forget his oath beforementioned.

Ver. 14. And it came to pass in the morning, that David wrote a letter to Joab, and sent it by the hand of Uriah.] Who, if he suspected any thing of the adultery, as some think he did (and therefore, resolving it should be discovered, would not go home to his wife), yet was so trusty a servant, he would not open the letter, to find what was in it.

Ver. 15. And he wrote in the letter, saying, Set Uriah in the forefront of the hottest battle, and retire ye from him, that he may be smitten, and die.] Thus one sin begets many, depriving men of the use of their understanding. For he might better, as Abarbinel observes, have told Uriah the truth, and begged his pardon, and obliged him to stay with him until the child was born, and then secretly put it out to nurse: whereby the matter might have been so managed, that it should not have been commonly divulged, or not certainly believed. But his eyes were blinded; and his very nature was altered, and become base and degenerate, now he had given himself up to sensuality. For he that formerly spared Saul, when he could have destroyed him, and no one have known who did it, seeks the death of a faithful servant after a most unworthy manner.

Ver. 16. And it came to pass, when Joab observed the city, that he assigned Uriah unto a place where valiant men were.] Ordered him to attack a part of the city which he knew would be valiantly defended: or, to make good a breach, out of which the best men they had in the city would issue out against them. Joab was herein also deeply guilty, in complying with such a command: unless we suppose that he might imagine Uriah had committed some great crime; for which David, consulting Uriah's honour, would not punish him openly.

Ver. 17. And the men of the city went out, and fought with Joab.] They seem to have made a sally out of the city upon the Israelites, when they saw they were preparing for an assault.

And there fell some of the people of the servants of David, and Uriah the Hittite died also.] This was a further aggravation of David's sin, that he not only exposed an innocent and a valiant faithful servant to be killed, but other persons also with him, who might have lived to do good service to their country: for it is not to be imagined that one person alone was set in the forefront, where the service was hottest, (as David ordered, ver. 15.) but there was a party of stout men with Uriah, whom he led on.

Ver. 18. Then Joab sent and told David all things concerning the war.] How it was managed, and what ill success they had in one engagement.

Ver. 19. And charged the messenger, saying, When thou hast made an end of telling the matters of the war unto the king.] Especially this last action.

Ver. 20. And if so be the king's wrath arise, and he say unto thee, Wherefore approached ye so nigh unto the city when ye did fight? knew ye not that they would shoot from the wall?] All good kings are careful to preserve their subjects; and therefore it must be supposed David would be angry when he heard of this loss; till he reflected upon the reason why they were exposed to such danger.

Ver. 21. Who smote Abimelech the son of Jerubbesheth?] These are still the words the king might be supposed to say; How came Abimelech to lose his life? Was it not by venturing too near the wall? He calls him the son of Jerub-besheth, who in the book of Judges is called the son of Jerubbaal: of which see upon the second chapter of this book, ver. 8.

Did not a woman cast a piece of a millstone upon him from the wall, that he died in Thebez? Why went ye so nigh the wall?] Having such an example, to make you more cautious.

Then say, Thy servant Uriah the Hittite is dead also.] Which he knew would soon pacify him.

Ver. 22. So the messenger went, and came and shewed David all that Joab had sent him for.] The whole process of the war hitherto, but more particularly the event of the last engagement, as it here follows.

Ver. 23. And the messenger said unto David, Surely the men prevailed against us, and came out unto us into the field, and we were upon them even unto the entering of the gate.] The account he gives of the last action is this: that the Ammonites made a sally, and were too hard for the Israelites, whom they put into some disorder; but they, plucking up their courage, rallied again, and beat the Ammonites back, following them to the very gate of their city.

Ver. 24. And the shooters shot from off the wall upon thy servants; and some of the king's servants be dead, and thy servant Uriah the Hittite is dead also.] These shooters were either archers, or such as managed the machines (which perhaps they had in these days, as they had afterward among the Romans), out of which they shot arrows and stones. Vitruvius says, that out of their catapultæ and scorpiones they shot arrows, and out of their balistæ they shot stones. Others say the quite contrary, as Goteschalchus Stewecius shews, in his learned commentary on the fourth book of Vegetius, lib. de Re Militari, p. 446, &c.

Ver. 25. Then David said unto the messenger, Thus shalt thou say unto Joab, Let not this thing displease thee.] That is, be not disheartened by this loss. David shewed no sign of displeasure, expecting to hear the news he desired of Uriah's death.

For the sword devoureth one as well as another.] Makes no distinction between good and bad.

Make thy battle more strong against the city, and overthrow it.] He would have this defeat make them more resolute, to assault the city with greater force, till they were masters of it.

And encourage thou him.] i. e. Joab and his soldiery.

Ver. 26. And when the wife of Uriah heard that her husband was dead, she mourned for her husband.] But not long: for then David could not have taken her soon enough into his house to cover his adultery. The common time was seven days, (1 Sam. xxxi. 7.)

Ver. 27. And when the mourning was past, David sent, and fetched her to his house, and she became his wife, and bare him a son. But the thing that David had done displeased the Lord.] This whole business was evil in the eyes of God (as the words are in the Hebrew), not only his adultery, and the murder of Uriah; but also his taking Bath-sheba to be his wife. For, according to the Hebrew doctors, it was utterly unlawful for any man to marry the wife of one whom he had defiled. Which hath made some of the Jews so laborious to excuse David from the crime of adultery. For Laniado himself acknowledges, that if David had committed adultery with Bath-sheba, she had been perpetually prohibited, and unlawful to him, as his words are. But though this ought not to have been done, yet, being done, the marriage held good; and the children he afterward had by her were legitimate. (See Buxtorf. de Sponsalibus et Divortiis, sect. 43.)

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord sent Nathan unto David.] To awaken him out of his sleep, and give him a sight of his sins.

And he came unto him, and said unto him, There were two men in one city; the one rich, and the other poor.] This was a prudent and respectful way of awakening David by an apposite parable: which was so managed, that the prophet did not condemn David, but made him condemn himself. And many have very pertinently observed from hence, that there is never more use of wisdom and discretion than in the contrivance of reprehension: especially of princes and great persons, whom the ministers of Christ ought to admonish and reprove in an humble and reverend representation of their sins to them, not with rude exprobations of them, and declamations against them. It is not necessary to apply every word of this parable to David's case (as the beginning of it is exactly fitted), because in parables several things are added, which serve only to make them decorous and handsome. Yet Abarbinel (as I shall shew in the conclusion of it) hath endeavoured to give an account of every part of it.

Ver. 2. And the rich man had exceeding many flocks and herds.] As David had many wives and concubines, with which he might have been well satisfied.

Ver. 3. But the poor man had nothing, save only one little ewe-lamb.] Perhaps Uriah had only one wife, with whom he contented himself, or rather was highly pleased, she being mild and gentle as a lamb.

Which he had bought, and nourished up.] They frequently purchased their wives in those days; giving to their parents a sum of money for them. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Uxore Hebr. cap. 20.)

And it grew up together with him, and with his children: it did eat of his own meat, and drank of his own cup, and lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter.] That is, was exceeding dear to him, and beloved by him. This is a resemblance not unlike the truth, unto those who understand how fond many persons were anciently, not only of lambs, but of several other creatures, which they suffered to eat with them at their tables, and to lie with them in their beds, as Bochart shews in his Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 43.

Ver. 4. And there came a traveller to the rich man.] This may be applied to David's straggling affection, which he suffered to wander from his own home, and to covet another man's wife. The Jewish doctors say it represents that which they call jetzer hara, the evil disposition, or desire that is in us, which must be diligently watched and observed when we feel its motions. For they have this ingenious observation concerning it, in Bereschith Rabba and other books: "In the beginning it is but a traveller; but in time it becomes a guest; and in conclusion, is the master of the house." For he, say they, who is called a traveller in the beginning of this verse, is called isch, a man, in the conclusion of it.

And he spared to take of his own flock, and his own herd, to dress for the way-faring man that was come to him.] Wherewith he might have satisfied his appetite.

But took the poor man's lamb, and dressed it for the man that was come to him.] He touches not in this parable upon the murder, for that was committed to cover the adultery, which led the way to the other crime. And Abarbinel gives a reason why it is not mentioned in his explication of the parable: which is this:—The rich man, saith he, plainly signifies David; his flocks and herds, David's wives and concubines: the poor man represents Uriah, who, he thinks, was a widower, and had several children alive by a former wife, when he married Bath-sheba. Whom he compares to a lamb which he bought, because he solemnly espoused her; and with tender affection he cherished her, and she grew up with him, and with his children, which he had by his former wife. This lamb being taken by the rich man from the poor, to gratify a wanton appetite, signifies David's taking Bath-sheba and lying with her. And it would have made the resemblance more complete, if he had added, that the rich man killed the poor man, from whom he took the lamb. But this is omitted, Abarbinel thinks, in the parable, that David might not readily apprehend Nathan's meaning; and so be induced unawares to pronounce a sentence of condemnation upon himself. And then he had a fixed opportunity to shew him, that if the rich man who took away the poor man's lamb deserved death, according to his own judgment, how much more did he deserve it, who had not only taken another man's wife, but also caused him to be slain by the enemies of Israel?

Ver. 5. And David's anger was greatly kindled against the man; and he said, As the Lord liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die.] Punishments sometimes extended beyond the law, because of the great atrocity of the crime.

Ver. 6. And he shall restore the lamb fourfold.] This was agreeable to the law, (Exod. xxii. 1.).

Because he did this thing, and because he had no pity.] Because he took away the lamb, he condemned him to make restitution fourfold: and because he had no pity (it being his only lamb), he condemned him to die. Kimchi will have it, that the word signifies twice fourfold; because it is in their dual number: so that this punishment also is beyond the law. But all the ancient interpreters are against him. But the Jews here observe that these words were ominous: so many of David's sons perishing, as he said the rich man should restore lambs, viz. the child he had by Bath-sheba, Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah. (See Bochartus, in his Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 40.)

Ver. 7. And Nathan said unto David, Thou art the man.] Who had pronounced a dreadful sentence against himself. Though reproofs of men in authority are to be managed very mannerly, as to the form wherein they are delivered; yet as to the matter they are to be plain and downright, so that they may be made sensible of their guilt.

Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I anointed thee king over Israel, and delivered thee out of the hand of Saul.] Who sought to hinder his advancement to the kingdom, by destroying him. Thus he aggravates David's sin, from the obligations he had to God: who had preferred him to the highest dignity, when he was in a low, and sometimes a desperate condition.

Ver. 8. And I gave thee thy master's house.] His kingdom.

And thy master's wives into thy bosom.] For the wives of a king went along with his lands and goods unto his successor: it being unlawful for the widow of a king to be wife to any but a king; as appears by the story of Adonijah. But this doth not signify that David married any of them; but only that they were delivered into his possession, as all other things belonging unto Saul were. So Maimonides: and more than this, the Jewish doctors say, no subject might have so much as the horse of the king, no more than his sceptre and crown: much less his widow, or one divorced by him, who was to remain a widow to the day of her death. So the same Maimonides: The wife of a king is to be married to none else; for even the king cannot legally marry the widow of his predecessor, or one divorced by him. (See Selden, lib. i. de Uxore Hebr. cap. 10. and Carpzovius upon Schickard's Jus Regium, p. 441.) But there are those, who, to avoid all controversy about this matter, interpret the word nase, not wives, but mere women, belonging unto Saul.

And gave thee the house of Israel and of Judah.] Dominion over all the twelve tribes.

And if that had been too little, I would moreover have given thee such and such things.] He need but have asked, and God would have given him all that he could reasonably desire: but he ought not to have taken what he pleased himself. The Jews refer this to the wives he would have given him: and gather from hence, that their king might have eighteen wives, and no more. (See upon Deut. xvii. 17.) But it is evident these words, such and such things, do not signify a certain number of any thing, but indefinitely other benefits of any kind: as Theod. Hackspan observes out of many like places, particularly Isa. vii. 20. (See his Disput. 4. n. 3.)

Ver. 9. Wherefore hast thou despised the commandment of the Lord, to do evil in his sight?] These words, and David's own confession, (ver. 13.) might have ashamed the Talmudists, one would think, from framing excuses for David's sin, and absolving him from any guilt. Bartoloccius hath given a large account of their lewd prevarication in this matter, in his Kirjath-sepher, tom. ii. p. 102, 103, &c.

Thou hast killed Uriah the Hittite with the sword.] For he contrived his death, which was as bad as if he had killed him himself.

And hast taken his wife to be thy wife.] After he had first committed adultery with her.

And hast slain him with the sword of the children of Ammon.] This highly aggravated his crime, as Abarbinel observes, that he caused him to be slain by the professed enemies of God; who triumphed in the slaughter of so great a man. And in this, Laniado himself confesses David sinned, though in nothing else.

Ver. 10. Now therefore the sword shall never depart from thine house.] That is, as long as he lived there should be slaughters in his family. Which was fulfilled in the violent death of his children, Amnon, and Absalom, and (about the time of his death) Adonijah.

Because thou hast despised me, and hast taken the wife of Uriah the Hittite to be thy wife.] Which, it appears by this repetition, was a very great offence, but not greater than his adultery, as Procopius Gazæus thinks it was.

Ver. 11. Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house.] That is, his own family: which was notoriously fulfilled in Absalom's conspiracy against him.

And I will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of this sun.] For Absalom had a tent spread in the house-top, and there went in unto them, (xvi. 21, 22.) Which is said to be done before David's eyes, because, though he did not see it, yet it was done so publicly that he could not but know it, and yet was not able to hinder it.

Ver. 12. For thou didst it secretly; but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the sun.] For it was notorious to all how David fled in haste from his son, and left his concubines behind him, (xv. 14—16.)

Ver. 13. And David said unto Nathan, I have sinned against the Lord.] This confession was made in a few words; but, no doubt, with many sobs and great grief, compunction and contrition of heart.

And Nathan said unto David.] Not presently, but after he had bewailed his sin so bitterly that his repentance appeared to be hearty.

The Lord also hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die.] He was guilty of death upon a double account, as an adulterer and as a murderer, as Procopius Gazæus observes. But upon his repentance the prophet pronounces an absolution to him, thus far, that he should be pardoned the guilt and part of the punishment. That is, he should not perish eternally (as Rasi and others interpret the words, thou shalt not die), nor here suffer the death he had deserved. For though when God gave them a king like other nations, he did not intend that he should be above all law, and not be bound to the laws he himself had given (as Abarbinel observes), yet he was not subject to the punishment of the law, which no magistrate could inflict, because he was the supreme: but God reserved his punishment to himself, and threatens to inflict it when inferior officers could not. Which threatening did not take away from him the power of pardoning and releasing the punishment, but he left that entire to himself, and here uses it; but in such a manner, that he freed David only from the punishment of death, and the loss of his kingdom: otherwise he was to suffer a great many and sore calamities as long as he lived. (See J. Benedict. Carpzovius upon Schickard's Jus Regium, cap. 2. Theor. 7. p. 137.) Whereby it appears how false the doctrine of the Talmudists is concerning the power of the great Sanhedrin, who they say had power to scourge their kings, &c. Which we never find was attempted, though Saul and David, and especially Manasseh, committed most heinous sins, which deserved severe correction.

Ver. 14. Howbeit, because by this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, the child also that is born unto thee shall surely die.] This was an additional punishment, to be inflicted presently: because his sin was highly aggravated, in that the nations about them might thereby be tempted to have him and his Divine law in great contempt: which they saw no more regarded by the best men that professed it. Or, they might blaspheme God, as a respecter of persons, who had rejected Saul, and yet kept David on the throne, who had done worse than he. Or, the Ammonites, perhaps, insulted over Israel and their God, when they had killed Uriah and others with him. Yet Procopius Gazæus here well observes, there was some mercy mixed with this punishment; for if the child had lived, it would have been a standing monument of his adultery. And therefore it may be thought, that, in favour of David, God took him away, that he might remove his reproach.

But this verse suggests a wonderful thing to us, that David remained many months insensible of what he had done (so bewitching is sensual pleasure); for the child begotten in adultery was born before Nathan came to rouse him out of his lethargy.

Ver. 15. And Nathan departed unto his house: and the Lord struck the child that Uriah's wife bare unto David, and it was very sick.] Of some sudden sore distemper: which appeared, at first, as if it were mortal.

Ver. 16. David therefore besought the Lord for the child.] He thought the threatening might not be absolute: the will of God being not always manifested entirely at once, but he reserves still something to himself. As when he commanded Abraham to offer his son: and when he told Hezekiah he should die.

And David fasted, and went in.] To his closet, I suppose, or some place of retirement.

And lay all night upon the earth.] Humbling himself greatly for his sin, which had deserved this, and far sorer punishment. Salvian (in his second book, De Gubern. Dei) describes this admirably:—He put off his purple, saith he, threw away his royal ornaments, laid down his diadem, wholly stripped himself of his kingship, and appeared as a penitent, in a squalid, rueful garb; fasting, lying on the ground, confessing, mourning, repenting, deprecating, &c. and yet, with all his humiliation and compunction, he could not obtain a revocation of this punishment. By this, and the story of Absalom, it appears that David was a great lover of his children: many of which proved great afflictions to him.

Ver. 17. And the elders of his house.] The principal officers belonging to the court.

Arose, and went to him to raise him up from the earth.] By their earnest entreaties, to have a care of his own health.

But he would not, neither did he eat bread with them.] As he was wont to do at other times, when the principal persons of the court sat at table with him. But it is not to be thought that David ate nothing all the time the child was sick, but only after he began to despair of his life; or perhaps, all the time he ate nothing till the evening; and then abstained from all delicate food, and contented himself with coarser fare.

Ver. 18. And it came to pass, that on the seventh day the child died.] Either the seventh day after its birth, before it was circumcised, or the seventh after it fell sick. This was the first beginning of the Divine animadversion upon him (as Salvian speaks), "Fuit utique primum, sed non solum," it was indeed the first, but not the alone: for there followed a long train of exceeding great troubles.

And the servants of David feared to tell him the child was dead: for they said, Behold, while the child was yet alive, we spake unto him, and he would not hearken unto our voice; how will he then vex himself, if we tell him the child is dead?] Thus they whispered and reasoned among themselves, so that he might not hear them, as appears by the next verse.

Ver. 19. And when David saw that his servants whispered, David perceived that the child was dead.] He guessed what the matter was.

Therefore David said unto his servants, Is the child dead? And they said, He is dead.] They would not acquaint him with it abruptly, for fear he should fall into too great a passion.

Ver. 20. Then David rose up from the earth, and washed, and anointed himself, and changed his apparel.] Put off the habit of a mourner, and prepared himself decently to appear before God. For it is certain the Jews were wont to wash before they went into the house of God, either their whole body, or their hands; which was usual among the gentiles also. And some have imagined the Jews learnt it from them; because we find no mention of it, as they say, till the time of Judith, xii. 7. (See Dr. Spencer, dissert. 3. cap. 2. sect. 11.) But that is a mistake; it being mentioned not only here in this place, but in the book of Psalms, xxvi. 6. For God having anciently commanded them to wash themselves, before they appeared in his presence at Mount Sinai, (Exod. xx. 20.) they thence, it is likely, concluded it was fit to prepare themselves for all their holy assemblies after the same manner.

And came into the house of the Lord, and worshipped.] This was done like a truly good man, who, before he would go to his own house, went to God's, and there gave him thanks, we may suppose, for the pardon of his sin, and not cutting him off as he had done his child. He acknowledged also the justice of God, and did not complain of his severity. He submitted to his holy will, and beseeched him, perhaps, that the remaining afflictions might be moderated, and made profitable to him.

Then he came to his own house; and, when he required, they set bread before him, and he did eat.] I suppose he was in some retired room of his own house, where he lay upon the earth mourning, and would not eat: from whence he would not remove to any other part of it, till he had been first at the house of God, and there worshipped.

Ver. 21. Then said his servants to him, What is this that thou hast done? Thou didst fast and weep for the child when he was alive; but when the child was dead, thou didst rise and eat bread.] His great officers, who sat at the table with him, I suppose, said this.

Ver. 22. And he said, While the child was yet alive I fasted and wept; for I said, Who can tell whether God will be gracious unto me, that the child may live?] They thought him preposterous in mourning while the child was alive, and cheering up himself when it was dead. But he shews what reason he had for both: it being possible God might be so kind as to reverse the sentence of death which he had pronounced against the child, upon David's humiliation, repentance, and earnest prayer to him for mercy.

Ver. 23. But now he is dead, wherefore should I fast? can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me.] But now God's will being declared to be absolute, it was in vain to solicit for the child's life; which he could not hope to see restored by fasting and prayers, or any other means: but he must rather prepare to go to it, than think of bringing it back to him. Maimonides says, that they did not lament infants who died before they were thirty days old, but carried them in their arms to the grave, with one woman and two men to attend them; without saying the usual prayers over them, or the consolations for mourners. But if an infant was above thirty days old when he died, they carried him out on a small bier, and stood over him in order, and said the prayers and consolations. If he was a year old, then he was carried out upon a bed. This custom Gierus thinks David followed, in making no mourning for his child when it was dead: though there is no ground to think such customs as Maimonides describes were used in these early days. (See L. de Luctu Ebræorum, cap. 3.)

Ver. 24. And David comforted Bath-sheba his wife.] Who, no doubt, was deeply afflicted for the loss of her child: which was a strong bond while it lived, to tie David's affection to her: but being dead, she might fear he would no longer have any concern for her; but, perhaps, divorce her, as having been the occasion of great evil to him. It is observable, that there is not one word said of Bath-sheba in all this relation, either concerning her guilt or her punishment. She was punished, I suppose, in the calamities that befel David: who enticed her, not she him, to commit the foul sin of adultery, and was innocent in the murder of Uriah.

And went in unto her, and lay with her.] Which it was not lawful to do, as Maimonides observes, while the days of mourning lasted: for then they might not so much as marry, though they did not lie together. But those days being ended, he enjoyed her company. The same Gierus hath collected a great deal to this purpose, in the forenamed book, cap. 21.

And she bare him a son, and called his name Solomon.] Some think his mother first gave him this name, as soon as he was born.

And the Lord loved him.] As the Lord told him, it is likely, by Nathan the prophet: who comforted him, after his great humiliation, with this good hope, that notwithstanding his sin God would have a kindness for this son, and make him very famous. Such is the wonderful goodness of God to truly-penitent sinners, who testify the sincerity of their repentance by humble submission to whatsoever punishments God thinks fit to inflict upon them (as David did to the death of the former child), and thereby incline the Divine Goodness to shew further mercy to them.

Ver. 25. And he sent by the hand of Nathan the prophet; and called his name Jedidiah.] But David hereupon sent to give his child another name; signifying the love which he was assured God had to him. But the Scripture never calls him by this name, but always Solomon: which name the people loved, because he built the house of the Lord in peaceable times.

Because of the Lord.] Because he had so graciously declared his love to him. For the name imports, as is noted in the margin of the Bible, beloved of the Lord.

Victorinus Strigelius translates the first words of this verse thus, "Tradidit eum in manum Nathan;" &c. He committed him to the hand of Nathan the prophet; that he might educate him, and bring him up in piety, and in the knowledge of all things necessary for a prince to be acquainted withal. For the most excellent natures are apt to err in many things (as he observes) without learning; and therefore, though Hercules had a very great genius, yet he was put into the hands of learned men to instruct him; as appears by the verses of Theocritus, which recite his masters. Thus Alexander was bred up by Aristotle in all manner of learning: and if Constantine, together with his piety, had not been furnished with a great deal of knowledge, he could not have managed the cause of Christ against the Arians so well as he did in the council of bishops.

Ver. 26. And Joab fought against Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and took the city.] That part of the city where the royal palace was; which lay upon the water that ran by the city, as the next verse seems to interpret it. It is not to be imagined that Joab continued the siege so long, as till David had two children by Bath-sheba: but this was done after the death of Uriah; when David commanded them to make their assault stronger against the city, (xi. 25.)

Ver. 27. And Joab sent messengers to David, and said, I have fought against Rabbah, and have taken the city of waters.] That part of this city which lay upon the water: the other part, which was the heart of the city, being yet untaken. But it being supplied with water from this part, of which Joab had got possession, it could not hold out long, but would be forced to surrender, because Joab cut off their water from them. So Josephus understood it, τῶν ὑδάτων αὐτοὺς ἀποτέμνόμενος, lib. vii. cap. 7. And thus some learned men translate the last words of this verse, by adding the particle mem before eth, He took from the city the waters.

Ver. 28. Now therefore gather the rest of the people together, and encamp against the city, and take it; lest I take the city, and it be called by my name.] As, from the conquest of Africa, Scipio was called Africanus. By this it appears, that though Joab had many faults, yet he loved his prince, and endeavoured to raise his glory.

Ver. 29. And David gathered all the people together.] All that were fit for war.

And went to Rabbah, and fought against it, and took it.] The army being reinforced with such great recruits, they did not merely block up the city to starve it, and force it to surrender, but took it by storm, and permitted the soldiers to plunder and take the spoil of it; as Josephus writes, διαρπάσαι τοῖς στρατιώταις ἀφῆκεν.

Ver. 30. And he took the king's crown from off his head.] This was the king's part of the spoil: and the Talmudists also say, that all the household-stuff of the conquered king belonged to the king that was victorious. (See Grotius, lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 23. sect. 24.)

The weight whereof was a talent of gold.] Or rather, the price, or value of it: as the Hebrew word frequently signifies, and not only weight. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 37. p. 380.) And so it is to be taken here; for who was able to carry on his head such a weight as a talent, which they say was a hundred twenty-five pounds?

With the precious stones.] Which made the value of it so great. Josephus here saith, that there was one stone of great price, ἐν μέσῳ, in the middle of the crown; which he calls a sardonyx. The original of which fable Bochartus hath ingeniously conjectured in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. v. cap. 7. where he mentions other conceits of the Jews about this stone.

And he brought forth the spoil of the city in great abundance.] This passage is thus rendered by Josephus, πολλὰ δὲ καὶ ἄλλα σκύλα λαμπρὰ καὶ πολύτιμα εὗρεν ἐν τῇ πόλει. He found more and other prey in the city very splendid, and of great price.

Ver. 31. And he brought forth the people that were therein, and put them under saws, and under harrows of iron, and under axes of iron, and made them pass through the brick-kilns.] Some of the inhabitants he caused to be sawn in sunder; over others horses drew harrows with great iron teeth; others were drawn over sharp sickles, or sharp stones, which perhaps he means by brick-kilns: for so some interpreters understand it, that he dragged them through the place where bricks were made; and there grated their flesh upon the ragged pieces of broken bricks. Though some will have this word malken to signify the place where the Ammonites offered their sacrifices to their god Moloch, or Malcome (as he is often called), and made the people there to pass through the fire. So the Vulgar translates it, fornacem Moloch, the furnace of Moloch. This dreadful punishment was to terrify other countries from violating the right of nations, by abusing public ambassadors. Though many have thought it too severe, and looked upon it as an argument, that David did this in the state of his impenitence: when the mild and gentle Spirit of God was departed from him, and he was become cruel and furious, as well as lustful.

And thus did he unto all the cities of the children of Ammon.] This will not let us think that he punished so cruelly only those who advised the using of his ambassadors shamefully, or applauded it (as many it is likely did, that lived in Rabbah), for he treated all the cities in the country in the same rigorous manner.

So David and all the people returned to Jerusalem.] After they had brought all the country into subjection to him, and secured the possession of it. For it is not likely all the country people, women and children, were thus used; but only the military men, who had levied war against David, and called the Syrians to their assistance, and since put him to the trouble and charge of a long siege of Rabbah.

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass after this, that Absalom the son of David had a fair sister, whose name was Tamar, and Amnon the son of David loved her.] Now begun a sad scene to be opened, of the calamities which Nathan foretold David should befal his house, (xii. 10.) It is the common opinion of the Jews, that in the war king David had with the king of Geshur, he took his daughter captive; who being very beautiful, he lay with her once (as they fancy the law, Deut. xxi. 11. allows), and begat of her this daughter. And afterward, she becoming a proselyte, he married her; and begat Absalom. So this daughter being begot while her mother was a gentile, they fancy she was not his legal child; and consequently Amnon might have married her. (See Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 23. and Cocceius upon the Sanhedrin, cap. 2. n. 8. annot. 7. of which more upon ver. 13. see there.)

Ver. 2. And Amnon was so vexed, that he fell sick for his sister Tamar; for she was a virgin: and Amnon thought it hard to do any thing to her.] The passion of his mind disordered his body, because he could not compass his desire: for she being a virgin, was under a strict guard (as virgins used to be), so that it was difficult for him to enjoy her company. For to do any thing to her, signifies to do what he desired: as to do signifies not only in the Hebrew, but in other languages.

Ver. 3. And Amnon had a friend, whose name was Jonadab, the son of Shimeah, David's brother.] That is, his cousin-german, who are often called brothers in Scripture.

And Jonadab was a very subtle man.] To find means to compass an end.

Ver. 4. And he said unto him, Why art thou, being the king's son.] And the eldest son who was next heir to the crown, (iii. 2.)

Lean from day to day.] In the Hebrew the words are morning by morning. For whatsoever diversions he might find in the day, he had restless nights, which made him look pale and wan when he arose.

Wilt thou not tell me?] For men are not wont to hide any thing from their friends.

And Amnon said unto him, I love Tamar, my brother Absalom's sister.] From these words the Jews are wont to argue, that Tamar was nothing of kin to Amnon; for he calls her not his sister, but his brother Absalom's sister. But this is a very frivolous observation, for in the two next verses he calls her my sister; and ver. 7. David calls him her brother; and see ver. 11.

Ver. 5. And Jonadab said unto him, Lay thee down on thy bed, and make thyself sick.] He advises him to feign himself to be so ill, that it constrained him to keep his bed. Instead of doing the true office of a friend, he flatters his passion to his utter undoing.

And when thy father comes to see thee.] As he knew he would when he heard of his sickness: for, as I observed before, he was a great lover of his children.

Say unto him, I pray thee, let my sister Tamar come and give me meat, and dress the meat in my sight, that I may see it, and eat it at her hand.] He would have him pretend that his stomach was so nice and squeamish, that he could like nothing that his servants dressed; and therefore desired his sister, who understood how to make delicate dishes, might come and prepare something that he could relish.

Ver. 6. And Amnon laid down, and made himself sick.] He easily followed bad counsel, to attain a bad end.

And when the king was come to see him, Amnon said unto the king, I pray thee, let Tamar my sister come and make me a couple of cakes in my sight, that I may eat at her hand.] She was peculiarly noted, I suppose, to be very curious in making these lebiboth, as the Hebrew calls them: which the Greeks translate κολλυρίδας, and are by interpreters thought a delicious sort of cakes: though some take κολλυρὶς to have been an excellent broth, or some other supping meat, which cannot be meant here, because she is said, ver. 8. to bake the cakes.

Ver. 7. Then David sent home to Tamar, saying, Go now to thy brother Amnon's house, and dress him meat.] He suspected no fraud; and Jonadab was so wicked as not to discover it, and thereby prevent the mischief.

Ver. 8. So Tamar went to her brother Amnon's house (and he was laid down). And she took flour, and kneaded it, and made cakes in his sight, and did bake the cakes.] She shewed herself an obedient daughter, and a kind sister.

Ver. 9. And she took a pan.] Wherein they had been baked.

And poured them out before him.] Into a dish.

But he refused to eat.] Pretending he had no appetite.

And Amnon said, Have out all men from me. And they went out every man from him.] He commanded all his servants that attended him to leave him alone; that he might take some rest.

Ver. 10. And Amnon said unto Tamar, Bring the meat into the chamber, that I may eat of thy hand.] He removed, I suppose, into an inner room (where he thought he might more privately enjoy her), and pretended to be so refreshed by the change, that his stomach was come to him.

And Tamar took the cakes which she had made, and brought them into the chamber to Amnon her brother.] Her innocence made her think herself safe; especially with a brother.

Ver. 11. And when she had brought them unto him to eat, he took hold of her, and said unto her, Come lie with me, my sister.] She sat down it is likely, suspecting no evil, upon his bedside to minister unto him: which gave him the opportunity to lay violent hands upon her.

Ver. 12. And she answered him, Nay, my brother, do not force me.] She having not strength enough to get from him, resists him with strong reasons: praying him to consider first that she was his sister. Unto which relation she hoped he would have such a reverence, as not to meddle with her, though she were willing: much less offer violence to her, which was abominable to do to a stranger.

For no such thing ought to be done in Israel.] Whatsoever other nations did (among whom idols were worshipped with filthy lusts), she prays him not to defile the church of God, whose glory was holiness and purity. The Jewish doctors say, this gave such a scandal, that the people began to speak thus one to another: If the king's daughter be thus used, what will become of the children of private men? And if men be so bold with chaste women, what will they be with those that are wantonly inclined? And at this time, they say, a decree was made, that two young people should not be alone together. (Gem. Sanhedrin, cap. 2. n. 8.)

Do not thou this folly.] That is, this wickedness. She prays him to consider the foulness of the sin; which would highly provoke the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 13. And I, whither shall I cause my shame to go?] She beseeches him, beside the sin against God, to consider the disgrace it would be to her: who should not be able to look any body in the face; nor would any body think of marrying her.

And as for thee, thou shalt be as one of the fools in Israel.] Utterly lose his reputation; and be looked upon as a man void of all sense of religion, honour, or humanity.

Now therefore, I pray thee, speak unto the king; for he will not withhold me from thee.] The Jews commonly fancying that she being begot, as I said before, of a captive woman before David married her, there was no such kindred between her and Amnon, but that he might lawfully have her to wife. But others think, that she, being a young woman, unacquainted with the law, imagined that they who had not the same mother might lawfully marry; or that the power of the king was so great, that he might dispense with the law in this case: or rather, she said any thing that came into her mind, which she thought might deliver her from the present danger: and this I take to be the truest interpretation. For Abarbinel hath at large confuted the opinion of her being begotten of Maacah before marriage, when she was a gentile. For, as the Scripture saith no such thing, so he thinks it altogether improbable, that such a man as David would have any thing to do with her, till she became a proselyte. And therefore, he saith, she spake these words, not as if she thought it lawful for the king to give her to Amnon for his wife; but that she might get rid of his solicitations by fair speeches. For she having urged him with the foregoing arguments, viz. the heinousness of the action itself, the dishonour it would be to her, and no less reproach to himself, and he persisting still blindly in his wicked resolution, she adds these words to give him hope, that he might have satisfaction without acting so brutishly, if he did but ask his father's consent. As if she had said, If thou art so sick with love, that thou art ready to die, speak to the king, unto whom thy life is very dear, and he will preserve it, by granting thy desire: for though by the law thou canst not enjoy me, yet he will rather choose to let me have thee, than see thee die. This, saith Abarbinel, is the sense of these words, he will not withhold me from thee. Which she said to withhold and divert him from his purpose at that time. Which R. Samuel Laniado (who endeavours to support the forenamed opinion of their doctors) doth but very weakly oppose. (See Buxtorf. de Sponsal. et Divortiis, sect. 20. and my notes upon chap. iii. 3.)

Ver. 14. Howbeit he would not hearken unto her voice; but, being stronger than she, he forced her, and lay with her.] As the nightingale in Hesiod sung in vain to the ravenous hawk (as Strigelius glosses upon these words), so Tamar said all this to a deaf man, who was wholly under the power of his furious lust, which would not suffer him to mind either God, or men, or himself.

Ver. 15. Then Amnon hated her exceedingly; so that the hatred wherewith he hated her was greater than the love wherewith he had loved her.] The Jews are much concerned to give a reason of this hatred. And Rasi and others say, that in her struggling with him to resist his attempt upon her, she hurt those parts wherewith he offended: which extremely enraged him. This is not improbable; but others think it a better account to say, that she reproached him so bitterly with what he had done, that he could not endure to hear it; and perhaps his own conscience began to fly in his face.

And Amnon said unto her, Arise, be gone.] He doth not so much as speak one kind word to her, nor call her sister (as Pellicanus observes), but in a rude manner bids her be gone, as if she had been a common strumpet.

Ver. 16. And she said unto him, There is no cause.] For this hard usage.

This evil is greater than the other that thou didst unto me.] It was not a greater sin, but it did her the greater mischief, because it published her shame, and made that known to all which was done secretly.

But he would not hearken to her.] This was very barbarous, to thrust her out of doors immediately, and in the day-time, without consulting how to cover, if it were possible, so foul a fact. So Josephus, He would not let her stay till night, but commanded her to be put out while it was day-light, ἵνα καὶ μάρτυσι τῆς αἰσχύνης παραπέσοι, that she might meet with witnesses of her shame.

Ver. 17. Then he called his servants that ministered unto him, and said unto them, Put now this woman out from me, and bolt the door after her.] This was a new violence to her, to be turned out of doors with such contemptuous language, as if she had been an impudent intruder.

Ver. 18. And she had a garment of divers colours upon her: for with such robes were the king's daughters that were virgins apparelled.] This was such a garment as Joseph, the beloved son of Jacob, wore. (See upon Gen. xxxvii. 3.)

And his servants brought her out, and bolted the door after her.] A high contempt of a king's daughter, which they knew her to be by her apparel, if by nothing else. But their dependence on their master overruled all the respect due to her.

Ver. 19. And Tamar put ashes on her head, and rent her garment of divers colours that was upon her.] Both these were expressions of the greatest grief, which she was not able to suppress.

And laid her hands on her head, and went on crying.] Bewailing her calamity. Laying her hands on her head was also a token of great trouble and grief; she covering thereby her face, as one ashamed. Thus Jeremiah saith, the children of Israel should go forth from Assyria, with their hands upon their head; (xi. 37.) that is, saith Abarbinel, "like a woman who bewails her misfortune; and there is none to deliver her." St. Jerome and Theodoret more plainly, they shall go forth with their hands on their heads, "in signum pudoris et doloris," in token of their shame and of their grief. Spreading forth their hands is the same. (Lam. i. 17.)

Ver. 20. And Absalom her brother.] Unto whose house she went.

Said unto her, Hath Amnon thy brother been with thee?] A modest expression for the foul rape he had committed: at which he conceived great indignation; and therefore, in scorn, doth not call him her brother Amnon, but Aminon. So the words are in the Hebrew, Hath Aminon thy brother been with thee?

But hold thy peace, my sister: he is thy brother; regard not this thing.] He seems to desire her to put up the injury in silence; that it might not bring too much disgrace on their family; but, indeed, that he might dissemble the revenge he intended, upon occasion, to take of him.

So Tamar remained desolate in her brother Absalom's house.] She would see nobody, I suppose, but only those that waited on her in her brother's family.

Ver. 21. And when king David heard of all these things, he was very wroth.] But, out of his great indulgence, inflicted no sort of punishment upon him, that we read of: πρεσβύτατος γὰρ ἦν υἱὸς αὐτῷ (as Josephus observes), for he was his eldest son, which made him spare him.

Ver. 22. And Absalom spake unto his brother Amnon neither good nor bad.] Never said a word to him about this matter, when they met together.

For Absalom hated Amnon, because he had forced his sister Tamar.] Though he hated him in his heart, yet he never expressed the least resentment. So the particle ki should be translated, not for, but though. By this means Amnon was lulled asleep into a belief that Absalom would not trouble him for what he had done, because he did not threaten, nor so much as expostulate with him, nor take any notice of what had passed. Though in reason he ought to have been more afraid, that he was meditating a terrible revenge: according to the fable of the little mouse, who, when the dunghill-cock came into the parlour, clapping his wings, and making a great noise, was very much affrighted at it, but minded not the cat which came gently creeping towards her; whom her mother chid for her folly, telling her there was no danger from the fluttering, clamorous cock; but from the silent cat she was to expect present death. So Victorinus Strigelius glosses upon this place.

Ver. 23. And it came to pass after two years.] In all which time Absalom had said nothing to Amnon about his abused sister; that he might think he was ignorant of it, or did not regard it, or had forgot it.

That Absalom had sheep-shearers in Baal-hazor, which is beside Ephraim: and Absalom invited all the king's sons.] For the time of sheep-shearing was a kind of harvest in those countries; and therefore full of joy; which they expressed by making a feast upon those days. We read of it early in the book of Genesis, viz. of Laban's going to shear his sheep; (xxxi. 19.) and Judah, after his mourning for his wife's death, went to refresh himself at a sheep-shearing with his friends, (xxxviii. 12, 13.) And it was at a time of such joy, that David sent to Nabal for some relief, (1 Sam. xxv. 8.)

Ver. 24. And Absalom came to the king, and said, Behold, now, thy servant hath sheep-shearers: let the king, I beseech thee, and his servants, go with thy servant.] He had no mind the king should go; but invited him, to avoid all suspicion.

Ver. 25. And the king said to Absalom, Nay, my son, let us not all go.] For he seems to have invited all his family: when he beseeched him and his servants to go with him.

Lest we be chargeable unto thee. And he pressed him: howbeit he would not go, but blessed him.] Gave him thanks for his invitation, and prayed God to bless him.

Ver. 26. Then said Absalom, If not, I pray thee, let my brother Amnon go with me.] To cover his design, he pretended, I suppose, a special kindness for him: or at least desired the king to do him the honour, to let him have the company of his eldest brother.

And the king said unto him, Why should he go with thee?] Being the next person in the kingdom to the king, it is likely David thought it would make the entertainment too chargeable.

Ver. 27. But Absalom pressed him, that he let Amnon and all the king's sons go with him.] Who might have taken exceptions, if Amnon alone had been entertained by him: therefore his importunity prevailed to have the company of them all.

Ver. 28. And Absalom had commanded his servants, saying, Mark ye now when Amnon is merry with wine.] And had no thoughts of any danger.

And when I say unto you, Smite Amnon; then kill him, fear not: have not I commanded you? be courageous, and be valiant.] He encourages them to hope, that he, being the king's son, and next heir to the crown when Amnon was gone (for Chileab seems now to be dead), would stand between them and danger of being called to an account for what they did.

Ver. 29. And the servants of Absalom did as Absalom had commanded: then all the king's sons arose, and gat every one upon his mule and fled.] Fearing he might destroy all the royal family; for ambition was as strong in him as revenge; which appeared afterward in his endeavours to dethrone his father. Mules began to be much in use in David's days (as Bochart observes), who appointed Solomon to be carried on his own mule, and declared king, (1 Kings i. 33.) And Solomon had a present of them made to him, (1 Kings x. 23.) And they were not used only to ride on, but for carriage of burdens, (1 Chron. xii. 40.) and to draw chariots, as the LXX. understand, Isa. lxvi. 20. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 19.)

Ver. 30. And it came to pass while they were in the way, that tidings came to David, saying, Absalom hath slain all the king's sons, and there is not one of them left.] He that saw Amnon killed, presently ran away in a great fright, imagining all the king's sons were so served.

Ver. 31. Then the king arose, and tare his garments, and lay on the earth; and all his servants stood by with their clothes rent.] This was a natural expression of great grief, to throw themselves not upon their beds (as Maimonides observes), but upon the ground. Otherwise, they turned their beds upside down, and so lay as hard as if they lay upon the ground. (See Gierus de Luctu Hebr. cap. 18. sect. 8.)

Ver. 32. And Jonadab, the son of Shimeah, David's brother, answered and said.] Who was noted before to be a very subtle man, (ver. 3.) and understood all the intrigues (as we now speak) about the court.

Let not my lord suppose they have slain all the young men the king's sons; for Amnon only is dead.] This he spake not from any certain intelligence he had received from Absalom's house; but from rational conjecture, out of what he had learnt concerning Absalom's resentment.

For by the appointment of Absalom this hath been determined, from the day that he forced his sister Tamar.] He had talked, I suppose, among his familiars, that he would take a time to revenge the injury done his sister, though for the present he took no notice of it. Which Jonadab, being a prying man, had some way or other discovered.

Ver. 33. Now therefore let not my lord the king take the thing to his heart, to think that all the king's sons are dead: for Amnon only is dead.] He affirms this with the greater confidence, because he never heard (though he was of a very inquisitive temper) of any quarrel Absalom had with the rest of the king's sons, but only Amnon.

Ver. 34. But Absalom fled.] With all his servants who committed the murder. For he soon found it was not in his, nor any body's power to protect them.

And the young man that kept the watch lifted up his eyes and looked.] Round about him.

And, behold, there came much people by the way of the hill-side behind him.] They did not think fit to keep the direct road from Baal-hazor to Jerusalem (for what reason we cannot now know), but went about; so that they came not before the watchman, but behind him.

Ver. 35. And Jonadab said unto the king, Behold, the king's sons come: as thy servant said, so it is.] Hearing a company was coming, he went out, it is likely, to descry who they were; and seeing the king's sons, made haste and carried David the good news.

Ver. 36. And it came to pass, as soon as he had made an end of speaking, that, behold, the king's sons came.] They trod upon Jonadab's heels, as we now speak.

And lifted up their voice and wept; and the king also and all his servants wept very sore.] See iii. 32. But we read of no public funeral and lamentations which he made for him, as he did for Abner.

Ver. 37. But Absalom fled, and went to Talmai, the son of Ammihud, king of Geshur.] For no city of refuge in his own country could give him protection, having committed a designed murder; therefore he fled out of the kingdom to his mother's father. (See iii. 3.)

And David mourned for his son every day.] Either for the loss of Amnon or for Absalom: who was lost, as to any comfort he could have from his company. It seems to be meant of the latter; for it is said he was comforted for Amnon: and therefore his continued affliction for three years together was upon the account of Absalom.

Ver. 38. And Absalom fled, and went to Geshur, and was there three years.] This is repeated to shew, that he found such favour with his grandfather, that he went no further; but continued with him three years in safety. Geshur, it appears from xv. 8. was a part of Syria.

Ver. 39. And the soul of David longed to go forth unto Absalom.] He had a vehement desire to see him. Though some, even of the ancients, translate the words, he ceased to pursue after Absalom: as if he had at first endeavoured to seize him, either in his flight to Geshur, or afterward, when at any time he went abroad. But ours appears to be a true translation, from the beginning of the next chapter: where David's heart is said to be towards Absalom.

For he was comforted concerning Amnon, seeing he was dead.] He was unwilling to want the comfort of both his sons; and since it was impossible to bring Amnon back again, he longed to bring back Absalom: but he had committed so horrid a crime, that he durst not venture to restore him in his favour.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. NOW Joab the son of Zeruiah perceived the king's heart was towards Absalom.] That he longed to see him, and have him restored to his own country; if it could be contrived by some handsome pretence for it: which Joab therefore endeavoured to bring about, knowing he was dear to the people, as well as to David: and he might by his reduction ingratiate himself with Absalom, whom he looked upon as next heir to the crown.

Ver. 2. And Joab sent to Tekoah.] A city in the tribe of Judah, (2 Chron. xi. 5, 6.) but at a distance from Jerusalem: and the further off the better for his purpose; because the case which the woman was to represent to the king, could not easily be inquired into, if he desired to know the truth. The Jews say it was in the tribe of Asher; the place where the prophet Amos was born.

And fetched thence a wise woman.] A woman was the fittest for this purpose; especially a widow: who was proper to move compassion. And a grave woman, as Josephus calls her (πρεσβύτις), was still more proper.

And said unto her, I pray thee, feign thyself now to be a mourner, and put on now mourning apparel, and anoint not thyself with oil, but be as a woman that had a long time mourned for the dead.] Who put on no ornaments, nor used any ointment; but appeared in a sordid neglected condition.

Ver. 3. And come to the king, and speak on this manner unto him. So Joab put the words into her mouth.] And, in all probability, introduced her into the king's presence; and then left her to manage the matter with him, according to her prudence. Or, as seems to be suggested, (ver. 21.) he stood by at some distance, whilst she addressed herself to the king.

Ver. 4. And when the woman of Tekoah spake to the king, she fell on her face to the ground, and did obeisance.] This was the humblest posture of reverence.

And said, Help, O king!] Relieve a poor distressed widow.

Ver. 5. And the king said unto her, What aileth thee? And she answered, I am indeed a widow woman, and my husband is dead.] Which made her the greater object of pity.

Ver. 6. And thy handmaid had two sons, and they two strove together in the field, and there was none to part them, but the one smote the other, and slew him.] This, and the foregoing, and the next verse, represent her condition as very lamentable: that she had lost her husband, and one of her sons, and was in danger to be deprived of the other: which was all she had.

Ver. 7. And, behold, the whole family is risen against thine handmaid, and they say, Deliver him that smote his brother, that we may kill him.] Put him to death, as the law required, (Numb. xxxv. 18, 19.)

For the life of his brother which he slew; and we will destroy the heir also.] These words, if spoken by the kindred, shew it was not love to justice, but a desire to have the inheritance, which moved them to prosecute the murderer.

And so they shall quench my coal which is left.] Deprive me of the little comfort of my life which remains (and is in a manner buried as a coal in the ashes), and ruin my family.

And shall not leave to my husband neither name nor remainder upon earth.] Utterly extinguish her husband's memory. In all this she intended to frame a case as like to David's as she could devise: by determining which in her favour, he might judge how much more reasonable it was to preserve Absalom. But there was a wide difference between her case and his, how plausible soever their likeness might appear. For her son she pretended was slain in a scuffle with his brother, and was no premeditated murder, as Absalom's was. It was also in the field, where there were no witnesses whether it was wilful or not: whereas all the king's sons saw Amnon barbarously murdered by his brother. And in this last passage the difference is as great as in any; for David's family was not in danger to be extinguished, if Absalom were lost also: he having many children, and also many wives, whereby he might have more. And therefore in that likewise this case differed from hers who was a widow.

Ver. 8. And the king said, Go to thine house, and I will give charge concerning thee.] He promises he would take care the matter should be thoroughly examined, and justice done her.

Ver. 9. And the woman of Tekoah said unto the king, My lord, O king, the iniquity be on me, and on my father's house; and the king and his throne be guiltless.] She desires a speedy sentence might be given in her favour, which, if it proved wrong by her misinforming the king, she prays the guilt might light on her and her family, and the king and his be innocent.

Ver. 10. And the king said, Whosoever saith aught unto thee, bring him unto me, and he shall not touch thee any more.] If any one endeavoured to lay hold on her son, he bids her bring that person before him (for which end he commanded his officers to be assistant to her), and he would punish him so that none should dare to meddle with him any more.

Ver. 11. Then she said, I pray thee, let the king remember the Lord thy God.] She seems to desire him to confirm what he had said by an oath. For men swore by remembering (or making mention of) the name of the Lord. Others think she only prays him to remember how merciful and gracious God is, and had been to himself, even in pardoning the murder of Uriah.

That thou wouldest not suffer the avengers of blood to destroy any more.] In the Hebrew, to multiply to destroy: that is, after she had lost one son, to take away the life of the other, as the next words explain it.

Lest they destroy my son.] Or, let them not destroy my son, which remains.

And he said, As the Lord liveth.] Though it was a bold request in the woman to desire him to confirm what he said by an oath; yet, such was his pity, to her, that, to send her away entirely satisfied, he solemnly swears he would preserve her son.

There shall not one hair of thy son fall to the earth.] He should not suffer the least harm upon this account.

Ver. 12. Then the woman said, Let thy handmaid, I pray thee, speak one word unto my lord the king. And he said, Say on.] Now she designed to open her meaning in this parable, and plainly desire the king to make her case his own. But it would take up some time, and therefore she bespeaks his favour to hear her patiently.

Ver. 13. And the woman said, Wherefore then hast thou thought such a thing.] As that which she had hitherto been speaking of.

Against the people of Israel?] Who were in danger to lose Absalom, the heir of the crown; which was far worse than the private loss of her son.

For the king doth speak this thing as one that is faulty, in that the king doth not fetch home his banished.] In the sentence he had pronounced for her, he had condemned himself, because he had not called Absalom from his exile. This looks like too bold a speech: but the sense is no more than this; Do not judge otherwise in thy own case, than thou hast done in mine. For all the world allows (as Strigelius here observes) the reasonableness of that saying, Odi sapientem qui sibi non sapit. Her reasoning indeed was infirm, his case and hers being very unlike upon several accounts, which I before observed. But though the supposed killing of her son was casual, but Amnon's murder designed; and she had no more sons, and David had many, &c. yet David perceiving how the people stood affected towards Absalom (otherwise he knew this woman durst not have spoken after this manner), and it being his own desire, as much as theirs, to have him recalled, he overlooked all the differences there were in his case, and did not go about to shew her the weakness of her discourse.

Ver. 14. For we must needs die, and are as water spilt upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up again.] She pleads for further pity towards him, from the consideration of our common mortality; and represents that death comes on apace, and we need not hasten it: and when we are dead, we can no more be recovered, than water when it is spilt on the ground, which is presently sucked up and seen no more. This is also a weak, though plausible argument; for by this reasoning all malefactors should be spared, because it will not be long before death cuts them off: but when we have a mind to a thing, all reason seems strong to persuade us to it. Some apply this to his mourning for Amnon; as if she had said, Dost thou still weep for thy other son? he must have died; and now he is gone, thy tears cannot call him to life again. But this is not probable, because it is said in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, He was comforted concerning Amnon, seeing he was dead.

Neither doth God respect any person.] If this be a right translation, the meaning is, that David himself was mortal, though a great king. But I think the Hebrew words, issa nephesh, never signify respect to persons; but the word panim is used in that sense, not nephesh, which signifies the soul, as the other doth the face, or countenance. Therefore these words should be translated, God doth not take away the soul, or life. She argues from the sparing mercy of God, who doth not presently inflict the punishment of death when men have deserved it. And perhaps she had in this a particular respect to Absalom, whom God had not cut off, but let him live; and therefore she desires David to imitate God.

Yet doth he devise means that his banished be not expelled from him.] Or, according to the foregoing words, But he doth devise means, &c. God provided many cities of refuge, she means, to which he that slew another unawares might flee: where, though he was banished from his habitation for a time, he was not quite expelled, but might return again after the death of the high-priest. From whence she argues, that kings being the images of God, nothing could more become them than clemency and mercy; in mitigating the punishment of offenders, though there was just cause of anger against them. Which still was short of the present case; for God was not so merciful as to provide for the safety of a wilful murderer. But such specious arguments are good enough, when men are willing to be persuaded: and nothing more moving than the example of God, who doth not delight in the death of a sinner.

Ver. 15. Now therefore that I am come to speak of this thing unto my lord the king, it is because the people have made me afraid.] This sounds as if the people talked so discontentedly about Absalom's banishment, that it was another motive to her to make this address to the king. But it doth not seem to me to be likely that the people were dissatisfied, because he was not recalled: but rather David was afraid the people would be dissatisfied if he did recall him. I said indeed before, (ver. 13.) that David imagined by her speech that they were desirous of his return from banishment; but he did not think so before: and whatsoever their desires might be, they did not express any discontent because he was not; for then there would not have been any need of this woman to bring that about which he desired more than they. Therefore I think the last words should be translated, not because, but though the people made me afraid. That is, those she advised withal told her it was too bold an attempt: but this did not discourage her; because she presumed the king would be so good as to give her a favourable audience, and not be angry with her, since what she said was well intended. So the next word is to be translated but, not and.

But thy handmaid said, I will now speak unto the king; it may be that the king will perform the request of his handmaid.] This is, notwithstanding the fears which some put into her, she resolved to make this petition: and she gives her reason for it in the next verse.

Ver. 16. For the king will hear, to deliver his handmaid out of the hand of the men that would destroy me and my son together out of the inheritance of God.] Clemency and kindness are the properties of good kings; and such she saith she knew the king to be, who would take pity upon her and her son, in whose preservation her life was bound up. And when she calls the land of Israel the inheritance of God, who dwelt among them there, she secretly puts the king in mind how dangerous it was to let Absalom (unto whom she had adventured to apply her case) to continue in an idolatrous country; where God was not worshipped, as he was in the land of Israel.

Ver. 17. Then thine handmaid said, The word of my lord the king shall now be comfortable.] Thereupon she grew confident that the king's answer would be according to her heart's desire: it being the highest glory of a prince (as the emperor Titus was wont to say) not to send any petitioner away sad and sorrowful. And, indeed, the king's great patience, in attending to so long an address, might make her presume to receive a gracious answer.

For as an angel of God, so is my lord the king, to discern both good and bad.] To discern between just and unreasonable petitions, as well as patiently to hear both those things which are grateful, and those which are less acceptable. And therefore she doubted not of such a kind answer as the angels bring, who are messengers of Divine mercy.

Therefore the Lord thy God will be with thee.] To direct him to judge aright and to shew mercy. There is a great deal of artifice in all this. For to presume upon the kindness of another, and to expect gracious answers from their noble qualities, is very moving: men being very loath to defeat those who think so highly of them, according to that of Aristotle, in the second book of his Rhetoric, "We love those that admire us."

Ver. 18. Then the king answered and said unto the woman, Hide not from me, I pray thee, one thing that I shall ask thee. And the woman said, Let my lord the king now speak.] As much as to say, And I will answer truly.

Ver. 19. And the king said, Is not the hand of Joab with thee in all this?] His prudence made him suspect that a woman durst not have adventured upon this speech, but by the counsel and contrivance of some greater person. And none more likely than Joab, whom he knew to be a cunning man and a friend to Absalom.

And the woman answered and said, As thy soul liveth, my lord the king, none can turn to the right hand or to the left from aught that my lord the king hath spoken.] As much as to say in our language, it is even so. And therefore she did not seek by any windings or turnings this way or the other to dissemble the matter, but plainly confessed it, as it follows. Concerning the phrase, turn to the right hand or left, see upon Gen. xxiv. 49.

For thy servant Joab, he bade me, and he put all these words in the mouth of thy handmaid.] The sense of them, which he left her to manage to the best advantage.

Ver. 20. To fetch about this form of speech hath thy servant Joab done this thing.] The meaning is, Joab instructed her, that having obtained pardon for her son, she should turn about the face of her speech (as the words are in the Hebrew) another way, and transfer it to Absalom, as a parallel case with her own. And so Josephus expresses her sense, lib. vii. Antiq. cap. 8. "When she had thanked the king for his pity towards her, she said, But that I may be more certain of thy clemency, receive thy own son into thy favour; for how is it possible for me not to doubt of the favour thou promisest me, when thou still sufferest thy own son to lie under thy indignation for the like fault?"

And my lord the king is wise, according to the wisdom of an angel of God, to know all things that are done in the earth.] That is, in the whole kingdom, where nothing could be hid from him, but he knew all men, and their counsels; and likewise knew what was fit to be done in answer to their desires. She still persists in her admiration of the king, that she might the more incline him to grant her request.

Ver. 21. And the king said unto Joab, Behold now, I have done this thing: go therefore, and bring the young man Absalom again.] The king turned from her to him (who seems to have stood in some part of the room while she delivered her petition), as the principal agent in this business, whom he was pleased to gratify in his request.

Ver. 22. And Joab fell to the ground on his face, and bowed himself.] As the woman did when she entered into his presence to present her petition, (ver. 4.)

And thanked the king.] For favours are to be no less humbly acknowledged than humbly begged.

And Joab said, To-day thy servant knoweth that I have found grace in thy sight, my lord, O king, in that the king hath fulfilled the request of his servant.] He looked upon it as a mark of the king's great kindness, who was not angry, but granted so bold a request, in which he was mistaken; for though he passed by the murder of Amnon, yet he remembered Joab's murder of Abner to his dying day.

Ver. 23. So Joab arose, and went to Geshur, and brought Absalom to Jerusalem.] St. Ambrose mentions this as an instance of the wonderful affection which parents have to their children, though degenerate and wicked; by which we may raise our thoughts to comprehend a little of the inconceivable love of our heavenly Father (as Strigelius here meditates) towards his own eternal Son, and towards mankind for his sake.

Ver. 24. And the king said.] When he heard he was come to Jerusalem.

Let him turn to his own house, and let him not see my face.] His affection to him did not so blind his eyes, but he still saw it would not be for his honour to let him come into his presence.

So Absalom returned to his own house.] This intimates as if he came not only to Jerusalem, but to the king's court.

And saw not the king's face.] Which was some humiliation to him, and put him upon repentance; for he saw he had not a full pardon, being not entirely restored to the king's favour. The people also were convinced by this how detestable his crime was in the king's account; and that he would not easily pass by the like in any other person, since he could not endure the sight of a son, whose hand was defiled with the blood of his brother.

Ver. 25. But in all Israel there was none to be so much praised as Absalom for beauty: from the sole of the foot even to the crown of the head there was no blemish in him.] For his father and mother were both very lovely persons: but this proved the occasion of his ruin; for he grew proud, because he was so much admired; and forgetting his cruel murder of his brother, it tempted him to rely upon the favour of the people in committing of a greater crime, which was seeking the life of his father.

Ver. 26. And when he polled his head (for it was at every year's end that he polled it; because the hair was heavy on him, therefore he polled it).] It is not certain tha the cut his hair once a year: for the words in the Hebrew are, from the end of days to days, without any particular designation of the time. And therefore the Targum translates it, at stated times; that is, when it grew too heavy, which might be once in two years, more or less, as Bochartus observes.

He weighed the hair of his head at two hundred shekels after the king's weight.] In those days hair was accounted a great ornament, and the longer it was the more it was esteemed. And therefore no wonder Absalom nourished his with much care, and let it grow to great length, which made him look more like a goodly person. Insomuch that, in after-ages, they were wont to use art (as perhaps they did now) to make the hair grow, and grow thick and strong (as the same Bochartus hath shewn); and they anointed their hair also with fragrant oils, of myrrh, cinnamon, and such-like; and after that powdered it with the dust of gold: all which made it very ponderous. So that Absalom's hair weighed, when it was cut off, two hundred shekels: which he demonstrates was no more than three pounds and two ounces of our weight. This is not at all incredible, considering that he let it grow as long as he was able to bear the weight of it; which was increased, it is likely, by such additions as I have mentioned; for a king's son would not want any thing that might add to his splendour. Josephus also informs us, that such ostentation was in use among the Jews in those days; for, speaking of the noble guard which attended king Solomon, with long hair flowing about their shoulders, he saith that they scattered in their hair every day ψήγματα τοῦ χρυσίου, little particles of gold, which made their hair shine and sparkle by the reflection of the sun's rays upon the gold. As for their interpretation, who think that Absalom's hair did not weigh thus much, but was sold for two hundred shekels, Bochartus shews how absurd it is to imagine a king's son would sell his hair, or that any one would buy it, especially at that rate, there being no perukes worn in those days. And besides, the text confutes it, he weighed the hair of his head, &c. whereas, if it had been sold, the buyer would have weighed the money, not Absalom; as Abraham did when he bought the field of Ephron, (Gen. xxiii. 16.) and Jeremiah when he bought the field in Anathoth, xxxii. 9. (See his epistle to Michael Faukellius, at the end of the third edition of his Geographia Sacra.)

Ver. 27. And unto Absalom were born three sons, and one daughter, whose name was Tamar: she was a woman of a fair countenance.] How the LXX. in the Vatican edition came to add here, that Tamar was afterward the wife of Rehoboam, and bare him Abijah, I cannot tell, but I suppose it was from some Jewish tradition.

Ver. 28. So Absalom dwelt two full years in Jerusalem, and saw not the king's face.] He lived privately, having the company only of his own family. For, it is likely, he was, by the king's command, confined to his house, where he had few visitants, being under the king's displeasure.

Ver. 29. Therefore Absalom sent for Joab, to have sent him to the king.] He did not employ his privacy so well as he should have done; but had ambitious designs in his head, if he could be restored to the king's favour, and enjoy greater liberty; for which he intended to make Joab his intercessor.

But he would not come to him: and when he sent again the second time, he would not come.] Josephus thinks that Joab only took time to consider whether he should do what was desired: but Absalom was in haste, and could not endure any delay, and therefore did as follows. Or, perhaps, Joab thought he had done enough, and was afraid the king might be angry if he pressed him further.

Ver. 30. Therefore he said unto his servants, See, Joab's field is near unto mine, and he hath barley there; go and set it on fire. And Absalom's servants set the field on fire.] He had those still about him who were ready to execute any command, though never so unjust; as they did when he bade them kill Amnon. And it appears by this what a daring person Absalom was, who durst affront such a man as Joab after this manner.

Ver. 31. Then Joab arose, and went to Absalom unto his house, and said unto him, Wherefore have thy servants set my field on fire?] This carried Joab presently to his house, to expostulate with him about the damage he had done him; for which we do not find he offers any satisfaction; which may make it seem strange that so furious a man as Joab should not immediately revenge himself, by ordering his field to be burnt, or some such way: but he was so wise as to consider, that being the king's son he might some time or other be reconciled to his father, and do him a prejudice.

Ver. 32. And Absalom answered Joab, Behold, I sent unto thee, saying, Come hither, that I may send thee to the king.] He seems to have no sense of any injury he had done Joab, but thought he had just cause to complain that he would not come to him.

To say, Wherefore am I come from Geshur?] These were words too insolent to be sent to the king; therefore one would think he only expressed himself thus to Joab.

It had been better for me to have been there still.] He might have found means to return thither, if he had not had other designs in his head; which made him desire to have his full liberty.

Now therefore let me see the king's face; and if there be any iniquity in me, let him kill me.] He could not but know there was iniquity in him: but he pretends, if the king would not pardon it, he had rather die than not see his father's face.

Ver. 33. So Joab came to the king, and told him: and when he had called for Absalom.] These passionate expressions, that he was weary of life, while he continued banished from the king's presence; nay, that he desired to die, so he might but see him, moved Joab to intercede for him, and David to receive him into his favour.

He came to the king, and bowed himself on his face to the ground before the king.] Begging pardon, as Josephus explains it, for the sin he had committed.

And the king kissed Absalom.] In token of reconciliation. Josephus saith the king raised him up from the ground, καὶ τῶν γεγονότων ἀμνηστίαν ἐπαγγέλλεται, and promised him an oblivion of what was past. Which was a great weakness in David: for impenitent persons become more wicked by a full pardon of their offences; as Absalom did. Who being thus received into the king's favour, became more gracious with the people: who before looked upon him as an excommunicated person, and would have nothing to do with him.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass after this.] When he thought he had established himself in his father's good affection.

That Absalom prepared himself chariots and horses, and fifty men to run before him.] He took great state upon him, and made him, as we now speak, a splendid equipage: being royally attended, as the next heir to the crown (for we hear nothing of Chileah, who it is likely was dead), designing to draw the eyes of the people to him. Who, as they were much in love with his beauty, so were mightily taken with this unusual fine sight of chariots and horses; which the law did not allow: but David was so indulgent that he took no notice of it.

Ver. 2. And Absalom rose up early in the morning.] He accustomed himself to rise betime in the morning, to make a show of his great care for the public good.

And stood beside the way of the gate.] Not of the king's palace, some think, but of the city, where was the seat of judgment. But since he speaks of coming to the king for judgment, it is likely he sat in his own palace, at the gate of which Absalom was wont to stand.

And it was so, that when any man that had a controversy came to the king for judgment.] Who reserved all weighty causes for his own hearing: and appeals were made to him from the other courts, as Corn. Bertram observes, cap. 10. de Republ. Judaica.

Then Absalom called unto him, and said, Of what city art thou?] He kindly inquired where he dwelt; and, it is likely, what he was, and of what family, &c. as if he intended to take a particular care of him.

And he said, Thy servant is of one of the tribes of Israel.] That is, of such or such a tribe, and of such a city in that tribe as he named to him.

Ver. 3. And Absalom said unto him, See, thy matters are good and right.] He was so officious as to look into their cause awhile, and examine it: flattering every one into an opinion, that in his judgment he had right on his side. So that if their cause went against them, they might conclude that if Absalom had been judge, it would have gone otherwise.

But there is no man deputed of the king to hear thee.] The king he pretended was old, and unfit to judge causes, until some others had first heard them, and opened the matter to him. And his sons (who, being principal officers in his family, see chap. viii. ult. were the fittest to bring business to him) were men of pleasure, and did not mind public affairs. Thus he struck not only at his father, but at all his brethren; and principally, it is likely, at Solomon; who he was afraid would be preferred before him by his father, being a beloved son, and born of an Israelite, whereas he was begot of a stranger, the daughter of the king of Geshur. Who, it is probable, might put him upon this course; and his banishment for three years had also exasperated him: and his being secluded for two years more from seeing his father, was so far from bringing him to any sense of his guilt, that it more enraged him against his father, and all his family.

Ver. 4. And Absalom said moreover, Oh that I were made judge in the land, that every man that hath any suit or cause might come unto me, and I would do him justice!] Though he was admitted to come to court, and see the king, yet he had no office there, as the rest of the king's sons had: which he took ill, and endeavoured the people should do so too; by magnifying his care, if he were in authority, to do them speedy justice.

Ver. 5. And it was so, that when any man came nigh to him to do him obeisance.] To honour him as the king's son.

That he put forth his hand, and took him.] About the neck, I suppose, in token of great familiarity and kindness.

And kissed him.] A most vile piece of flattery: but people are pleased with such unwonted compliments. For so Plato observes, that when any person intended to make himself a tyrant in a popular state, he no sooner entered upon the government, but προσγελᾷ τε καὶ ἀσπάζεται πάντας ᾧ ἂν περιτυγχάνει, he smiled upon all, and kindly saluted them, wheresoever he met them: avowing that he hated tyranny, and promising great things, both privately and publicly, καὶ πᾶσιν ἵλεώς τε καὶ πατρῷος εἶναι προσποιεῖται, seeming to be mild, gentle, and fatherly unto all, (lib. viii. de Republ. p. 566. edit. Serrani.)

Ver. 6. And after this manner did Absalom to all Israel that came to the king for judgment.] He continued this course a long time: till he had inveigled the people, and gained their hearts to him. For, as Aristotle observes in his Politics, (lib. v. cap. 4.) all changes in commonwealths are made by one of these two ways, ὅτε μὲν διὰ βίας, ὅτε δὲ δι' ἀπάτης, either by force and violence, or else by deceit and craft. Now there is not a more famous instance in history of the latter than this of Absalom, who, by flattering speeches, and large promises, cunningly alienated the hearts of the people from his father.

So Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel.] Robbed his father of the affections of the people, and possessed himself of them: some admiring his beauty and gallantry; others his courtesy and civility: others being taken with his magnificent promises of the noble things he would do if he were their king. Just as Virgil saith, in book vii. of his Æneids, that Turnus drew the hearts of some to follow him in the wars, because he was a most graceful person; others, because he was descended from an ancient royal race; and others were moved by the noble acts he had done: (ver. 473, 474.)

> "Hunc decus egregium formæ movet atque juventæ, > Hunc atavi reges, hunc claris dextera factis."

Thus Absalom was young and wonderfully beautiful, descended from kings by his father and mother's side; and though he had done no great things, yet boasted of what he would do, when he had opportunity. Ludov. de Dieu thinks there is a peculiar meaning in this phrase, that he drew their affections to him, concealing in the mean time his intentions: upon John x. 24.

Ver. 7. And it came to pass after forty years.] One would think, that in the copy which Josephus used, it was written arba, four, not arbaim, forty years: for his words are, μετὰ δὲ τὴν τοῦ πατρὸς καταλλαγὴν τεττάρων ἐτῶν ἤδη παραληλυθότων, four years after his father was reconciled to him. But there are no warrants now for this reading: but the forty years here mentioned are not to be understood, as if this happened after David had reigned forty years, that is, in the last year of his reign: for he was now very vigorous, which he was not a little before he died: but, as our great primate of Ireland in his Annals understands it, forty years after David was anointed by Samuel. That is, when he was threescore years old, ten years before he died. Then his son conspired against him between the feast of the Passover and Pentecost; as some gather from Barzillai's presenting him with parched corn and new fruits, when he fled from Absalom, (xvii. 28.) And so Strigelius. But the Talmudists in Seder Olam, and other books, will have these forty years to commence from the time that the Israelites asked a king to reign over them. And, after all, Abarbinel is of opinion, that the plainest sense is after forty years of David's reign; so that it was about the latter end of his life, when this great calamity befel him, though not in the very last year of it. For it is not said in the fortieth year, but about the end of forty years. (See Buxtorf. Anticritica, p. 1004.)

That Absalom said unto the king, I pray thee, let me go and pay my vow, which I have vowed unto the Lord, in Hebron.] Now he pretends religion, as before he did the public good.

Ver. 8. For thy servant vowed a vow while I abode at Geshur in Syria, saying, If the Lord will bring me again indeed to Jerusalem, then will I serve the Lord.] With a solemn sacrifice.

Ver. 9. And the king said unto him, Go in peace.] It is much he should dismiss him without any suspicion; when he had deferred so long to perform this vow, and made such court to the people, as he could not but be informed.

So he arose, and went to Hebron.] Which was a high place, where they were wont to sacrifice till the temple was built. And it being the place of his birth, where the royal seat had been in the beginning of David's reign, he thought it the most commodious city, next Jerusalem, for his purpose.

Ver. 10. And Absalom sent spies throughout all the tribes of Israel.] To try how the people stood affected to him.

Saying, As soon as you hear the sound of the trumpet, then ye shall say, Absalom reigneth in Hebron.] This was the signal which was to be given, that they should take arms. For as soon as they heard the sound of the trumpet (which he took care should be blown in all the tribes), these spies were to proclaim that Absalom was crowned in Hebron. Whereupon, all his partakers, it is likely, shouted, God save king Absalom!

Ver. 11. And with Absalom went two hundred men out of Jerusalem, that were called.] Invited by him to feast with him upon his sacrifice. And it is likely they were principal persons of the city; whom he drew in, to avoid suspicion.

And they went in their simplicity, and they knew not any thing.] Of his design; but went only to wait upon him, as the king's son; who did them the honour to invite them to a holy feast. Among these two hundred men, the Jews fancy were all those of the grand Sanhedrin, who thought they had been called by David's order to attend his son. For which there is no ground; though Mr. Selden has produced a great deal out of the Talmudists concerning this matter, lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 16. But I have shewn elsewhere, there was no such Sanhedrin in these times.

Bartenora upon Sota hath a conceit, that Absalom begged of the king (for he had stolen his heart before he stole the people's) that he would grant him liberty, under his hand, to choose two persons whom he liked best, to be his companions; which being obtained, he went with this writing from two to two, till he had gathered two hundred; part of which were the men of the great Sanhedrin, whose examples others followed; all believing they had been warranted by David to attend his son.

Ver. 12. And Absalom sent for Ahithophel the Gilonite, David's counsellor, from his city, even from Giloh.] None are more capable to do mischief to kings, than those that know their secrets; having been of the privy-council. And it is supposed by the Jews, that Ahithophel was incensed against David for abusing Bath-sheba, whom they take to have been his grand-daughter, she being the daughter of Eliam, (xi. 3.) and Eliam being the son of Ahithophel. (xxiii. 34.)

While he offered sacrifices.] Or rather, after he had offerred sacrifices, while he sat at dinner, he sent for him to come to him.

And the conspiracy was strong; for the people increased continually with Absalom.] Most of which, it is likely, intended no harm at the first, but came merely to do honour to the king's son, and to partake of his bounty. Nay, Abarbinel is of opinion, that neither Absalom, nor the elders of Israel, nor the rest of the people, who were misled by them, had any intention to divest David of his crown and dignity, much less to take away his life; but only to substitute Absalom as a coadjutor to him, for the executing of the royal authority during David's life, and to be his successor after his death. And, indeed, as it was very monstrously unnatural in Absalom to design the destruction of such a kind father, so it is not very probable that he should gain such a number as he had to assist him in such a villanous enterprise. And yet, notwithstanding this, David looked upon this as a treason against his life, as appears from ver. 14. and xvi. 11. because he knew, whatsoever they intended, they would be carried further, though they meant no more than Abarbinel supposes. And more than that, if this opinion of his were true, it is evident, they themselves did proceed so far as to design (contrary to their first intentions) to kill David for their own greater security. For so Ahithophel advised, and they all consented to it, (xvii. 2, 4.) which shews how dangerous it is to go out of the right way; for they do not know into what precipices they may fall. And it should be a warning to all men never to begin any thing that is wrong, which may lead them to commit that in the issue which they abhorred at the first; when they find they cannot be safe in one wickedness, unless they commit a greater.

Ver. 13. And there came a messenger unto David, say- ing, The hearts of the men of Israel are after Absalom.] Some of the two hundred men, who went innocently along with him from Jerusalem, it is likely, sent this intelligence. Which did not come presently: but when the conspiracy was plain and open, by a great concourse of people to him; and the elders of Israel, and the military men (who are called all Israel, as Fortunatus Scacchus thinks), declared for him.

Ver. 14. And David said unto all his servants that were with him at Jerusalem, Arise, let us flee; for we shall not else escape from Absalom.] Though Jerusalem, at least the fort of Zion, was a strong place, yet they could not have time to lay in provision to endure a siege: and beside, he was not willing to be cooped up there; but chose rather to go into the country, where he hoped to find friends and followers.

Make speed to depart, lest he overtake us suddenly, and bring evil upon us, and smite the city with the edge of the sword.] He knew Absalom would lose no time to accomplish his end; and therefore requires them immediately to be gone, and prevent a surprise. He was desirous also to preserve Jerusalem from being sacked: being the royal city; upon which he had bestowed much cost.

Ver. 15. And the king's servants said unto the king, Behold, thy servants are ready to do whatsoever my lord the king shall appoint.] One seems to have spoken in the name of the whole court: and it was some comfort to him, that he had a company of such faithful servants about him, as were ready to execute whatsoever he commanded.

Ver. 16. And the king went forth, and all his household after him.] In the Hebrew the words are, all his household at his feet. Which shews that he went on foot, and would not make use of his mule; being in a mournful state, and desirous to move his people's compassion to him.

And the king left ten women, that were concubines, to keep the house.] For their sex, and their quality, might be thought to be a sufficient protection to them. What became of his wives is not here related; it is probable they went along with him to take care of him, as the other were left to take care of the house.

Ver. 17. And the king went forth, and all the people after him.] That is, all the people of Jerusalem, who were well-affected to him.

And tarried in a place that was far off.] At a good distance from the city, where, it is likely, he put the people that came out confusedly after him into good order, and waited to see what other friends would come to him.

Ver. 18. And all his servants passed on beside him.] His household servants, I suppose, marched on both hands of him.

All the Cherethites and all the Pelethites.] Who these were, I have shewn at large upon viii. 18. and it is possible they now brought up the rear.

And all the Gittites, six hundred men which came after him from Gath, passed on before the king.] These marched in the front of his little army; but who they were it is hard to tell; for we read nothing of them before. Some take them to have been proselytes born in Gath of the Philistines, who came with Ittai to David; being attracted by the fame of his piety, and happy successes. Others take them to be Jews, who had fled to David in his exile, when he was at Gath; and accompanied him ever after, not only in the time of Saul's persecution, but after he came to the crown of Judah and Israel.

Ver. 19. Then the king said to Ittai the Gittite, Wherefore goest thou also with us?] He seems to have been the commander of those six hundred men beforementioned. And the Jews make him the son of Achish king of Gath; who out of religion and friendship came to David.

Return to thy place.] That is, to Jerusalem.

And abide with the king.] For so Absalom was by usurpation.

For thou art a stranger, and an exile.] Who upon that account might hope to be civilly treated; at least, being none of David's family, and a new comer, he thought it was not fit to engage him in their broils.

Ver. 20. Whereas thou camest to us but yesterday, should I make thee this day go up and down with us?] He was newly settled at Jerusalem; and therefore David thought it unreasonable he should be so soon unsettled again.

Seeing I go whither I may.] Especially since he knew not whither he should betake himself for safety; and therefore would not have Ittai expose himself to such uncertainties. (See concerning this phrase, 1 Sam. xxiii. 13.)

Return thou, and take back thy brethren.] Some understand by his brethren, the six hundred men that came from Gath: but it is not probable David would part with such a guard as they were, in this time of extreme danger, unless they had desired to be gone; therefore he rather means those persons that attended him, or were of his family, who came to sojourn with him in Judea.

Mercy and truth be with thee.] In the Hebrew the words are, with thee mercy and truth. Which some take to signify, thou art a right honest and good man. But our translation seems better, which makes them a form of a blessing, or prayer to God, that he would requite the kindness and fidelity of Ittai, by shewing mercy to him, and faithfully fulfilling his promises made to those who came to put their trust in him.

Ver. 21. And Ittai answered the king, and said, As the Lord liveth, and as my lord the king liveth, surely in whatsoever place my lord the king shall be, whether in death or in life, even there also will thy servant be.] A marvellous fidelity in a stranger, when a son was a rebel against him. And David's humanity is no less admirable in offering to dismiss him so freely, yea, earnestly pressing him to return, because he was a stranger; though he was in the greatest need of all the assistance he could get to defend him.

Ver. 22. And David said to Ittai, Go and pass over.] There was not a word more to be said, now he had sworn he would not leave him.

And Ittai the Gittite passed over.] The brook Kidron, as it follows in the next verse.

He and all his men, and all the little ones that came with him.] This shews that his whole family were come, as I noted before, to sojourn in this country.

Ver. 23. And all the country.] About Jerusalem.

Wept with a loud voice,] Being extremely afflicted to see their prince, under whom they had lived in great peace and prosperity, reduced to such extremities.

And all the people passed over.] All that continued faithful to David in those parts.

The king also himself passed over the brook Kidron.] He stayed till the last, that he might take notice who appeared for him, as they passed over before him.

And all the people passed over towards the way of the wilderness.] And when they were over, they marched through the wilderness, that lay between Jerusalem and Jericho.

Ver. 24. And lo Zadok also, and all the Levites went with him, bearing the ark of the covenant of the Lord.] That is, all the Kohathites that were at Jerusalem, whose office it was to carry the ark, and take care of it.

And they set down the ark of God.] When they came to David, they set down the ark in the place where he was, to signify that God would be with him, and accompany him; and that the people might thereby be excited to follow him, who had the token of the Divine presence with him.

And Abiathar went up.] To the top of the Mount Olivet.

Till all the people had done passing out of the city.] From the mount he could behold, when the people, who would follow David, were come out of the city. And then, I suppose, he came down; and desired that the ark and the king might move up the hill also.

Ver. 25. And the king said unto Zadok.] The Talmudists have a fancy that the king spake to Zadok, not to Abiathar, because he had removed Abiathar from the high-priesthood; upon this account, that, he consulting by urim and thummim, God gave no answer; but when Zadok inquired, God did answer. Whereupon David understood the Spirit of God was departed from Abiathar, and therefore turned him out of his office; which is notoriously false, for he was not turned out till the reign of Solomon.

Carry back the ark into the city.] For he did not think it decent to have it wander about with him he knew not whither, as Abarbinel observes: and perhaps he thought God might be angry with him, should he let it be carried out of its place. As if he trusted in the ark, which was but the token of his presence, more than he did in God himself, who had preserved him in the persecution of Saul when he had no ark with him.

If I find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again, and shew me both it and his habitation.] It was not for the honour of the ark, as I said, to take it out of the place which he had made for it: which he calls God's habitation, because there he dwelt by this special token of his presence in it. And if he had a favour to him, he knew he could preserve him without the ark, as well as with it; and bring him again to worship him in his proper place.

Ver. 26. But if he say, I have no delight in thee; behold, here am I, let him do to me as seems good in his sight.] He was very sensible of his own ill deservings; and humbly submits to whatsoever punishment, even the heaviest, that God would think fit to inflict upon him.

Ver. 27. And the king said also unto Zadok the priest.] He is frequently called by Josephus, the high-priest: particularly in lib. vii. Antiq. cap. 6. where he saith David made him, Ἀρχιερέα μετ' Ἀβιαθάρη, φίλος γὰρ ἦν αὐτῷ, high-priest together with Abiathar: for he was his friend. But hereby we are only to understand that he was the sagan, as the Jews call the vicar or deputy of the high-priest: who is called the second priest, 2 Kings xxv. 18. (See Selden, de Success. in Pontif. Hebræ. lib. i. cap. 4.)

Art thou not a seer?] A very wise man, or a prophet, who could not but discern in what state things were likely to be, and that he might serve David better by staying in Jerusalem than going along with him.

Return into the city in peace, and your two sons with you, Ahimaaz thy son, and Jonathan the son of Abiathar.] This was another reason for sending back the ark: for as it was not fit to keep it with him, and the priests and Levites also to attend it, so they might do him more service elsewhere than in his camp.

Ver. 28. See, I will tarry in the plain of the wilderness.] He put an entire confidence in them, that they would not betray him, by acquainting them where he meant to rest awhile, to wait for intelligence from them.

Till there come word from you to certify me.] What Absalom designed; and accordingly he intended to steer his course.

Ver. 29. Zadok therefore and Abiathar carried the ark of God again to Jerusalem; and they tarried there.] Mention being made both here and also ver. 33. of Zadok before Abiathar, it seems to intimate some preference to him, and to justify what Josephus saith, that he was the king's friend; and being constantly with him, was more honoured than Abiathar.

Ver. 30. And David went up the ascent of Mount Olivet, and wept as he went up, and had his head covered, and went barefoot.] Dejected, as Salvian glosses, into the condition of a servant; or rather in the habit of a mourner. For covering the head was a token of shame and confusion, and great trouble: and so was going barefoot. Which was used on the great fast, or day of expiation, as we find in Codex Joma, cap. 8. though the doctors say, they might put on woollen or linen socks, but no leathern shoes. And this was observed also in funerals, as Buxtorfius shews in his Synagoga Judaica, cap. 49. which was a custom in the days of Ezekiel, (xxiv. 17.) Nor were the heathen strangers to it: but in times of great calamity went barefoot, as that excellent person Ezekiel Spanhemius observes in his notes upon Callimachus's hymn, ad Cererem, ver. 125.

And all the people that were with him covered every man his head, and they went up, weeping as they went up.] Going barefoot also, it is most probable, as the king did: whose example they followed.

Ver. 31. And one told David, saying, Ahithophel is among the conspirators with Absalom.] This touched him very nearly; because he was a very wise man, and one whom he took for his friend, (Psal. lv. 13.)

And David said, O Lord, I pray thee turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness.] He prays that he might give foolish counsel; or that it might be contemned and looked upon as foolish; or that it might miscarry in the execution.

Ver. 32. And it came to pass, that when David was come to the top of the mount, where he worshipped God.] Looking towards the ark in the house of God: which he could see from the top of the mount.

That Hushai the Archite came to meet him.] There was a city in the tribe of Ephraim called Archi, (Josh. xvi. 2.) where this person, in all likelihood, was born and bred, and coming to Jerusalem, became one of David's privy-council; being famous for wisdom; otherwise Absalom would not have so readily entertained him, and admitted him to his secrets.

With his coat rent, and earth upon his head.] Which were expressions of great sorrow. Joh. Braunius hath demonstrated, the garment called ketonah was round, like our surplices, with sleeves to put the hands and arms into it. Which was worn by great persons, not only among the Jews, but the Egyptians, Tyrians, and Assyrians, he observes, (lib. ii. de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. cap. 2. sect. 13, 14.) which may incline us to a belief, that Hushai was no mean man, but a person of quality.

Ver. 33. Unto whom David said, If thou pass along with me, then thou wilt be a burden to me.] For he was not provided with maintenance for his own family: and Hushai, being no soldier, but a counsellor, could not be so useful to him in the field as he might be at the court.

Ver. 34. But if thou return to the city, and say unto Absalom, I will be thy servant, O king.] So he was to call him, because he had taken upon him that title.

As I have been thy father's servant hitherto, so will I now also be thy servant.] He would have him pretend he would be as faithful to him as he had been to David; and it was very well known he had done him good service. This was not honest; but it was according to the policy practised in those days, and indeed in all ages. Which Procopius Gazæus approves so far as to say, that "a lie which is told for a good end, is equivalent to truth." But I dare not justify such doctrine; though what Hushai undertook to do was not to get money, or to do others hurt, but to preserve a good king, and a prophet, and a friend.

Then mayest thou for me defeat the counsel of Ahithophel.] God he thought had sent this man, in answer to his prayer, (ver. 31.) if he would but follow his direction.

Ver. 35. Hast thou not with thee there Zadok and Abiathar the priests? therefore it shall be, that whatsoever thou shalt hear out of the king's house, thou shalt tell it to Zadok and Abiathar the priests.] Whom he looked upon as trusty persons, and faithful to his interest: and so they proved.

Ver. 36. Behold, they have there with them their two sons, Ahimaaz, Zadok's son, and Jonathan, Abiathar's son; and by them ye shall send unto me every thing that ye can hear.] They were not with their fathers in Jerusalem, but lay close in a place not far off, ready to carry any message that was sent by them. (See xvii. 17.)

Ver. 37. So Hushai, David's friend, came into the city, and Absalom came into Jerusalem.] Where Hushai, I suppose, waited for his coming: having got thither before him, and so ordered his affairs, that it was not known he had been to offer his service to David: or, those that knew it, out of reverence to him, and affection to David, did not discover it.

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. AND when David was a little past the top of the hill.] viz. Mount Olivet, (xv. 30.)

Behold, Ziba, the servant of Mephibosheth, met him, with a couple of asses saddled, and upon them two hundred loaves of bread, and a hundred bunches of raisins, and a hundred of summer-fruits, and a bottle of wine.] They put their wine into bottles, or bags, some of which were large vessels, and contained a great deal of wine. Such, no doubt, was this, which had liquor in it, proportionable to the rest of the present.

Ver. 2. And the king said unto Ziba, What meanest thou by these? And Ziba said, The asses are for the king's household to ride on.] For his wives and children, if they were weary with travelling on foot; as they now did.

And the bread and summer-fruits for the young men to eat.] For the refreshment of the king's attendants.

And the wine, that such as be faint in the wilderness may drink.] This argues great consideration of David's condition: to which he suited his present; which in a wilderness came very seasonably, and was very noble. Perhaps the bunches of raisins were intended for David's own support.

Ver. 3. And the king said, And where is thy master's son?] He desired, I suppose, to know whether this present was from himself, or from Mephibosheth.

And Ziba said unto the king, Behold, he abideth at Jerusalem: for he said, To-day shall the house of Israel restore me the kingdom of my father.] This seems to be a fiction; but well contrived: for the family of David being so broken, he might think it probable the crown would fall to him.

Ver. 4. Then said the king to Ziba, Behold, thine are all that pertained unto Mephibosheth.] We read ix. 2. that Ziba was but a servant (see there), but now David makes him a freeholder; giving him a great estate: which, if he said true, was forfeited to the king for treason, as it had been before in the time of Ish-bosheth, and thereupon given to Mephibosheth. But in this David seems to have been too credulous, and rashly condemned Mephibosheth before he heard what he could say for himself: but he imagined, perhaps, that Ziba durst not tell so notorious a lie, which might shortly be disproved. And beside, a man that comes to relieve another who is in great distress, easily wins his good opinion.

And Ziba said, I humbly beseech thee that I may find grace in thy sight, my lord, O king.] He pretends to value the king's favour more than the gift he had bestowed upon him.

Ver. 5. And when king David came to Bahurim.] A city in the tribe of Benjamin, (xix. 16.) into the territories of which David was now come: though not as yet into the town itself, as appears from ver. 14. The Targum calls it Almoth; which is of the same signification with Bahurim; the one importing young men, and the other youth.

Behold, thence came out a man of the family of the house of Saul, whose name was Shimei, the son of Gera: he came forth, and cursed still as he went.] Out of an inveterate hatred to David; whom he looked upon as the great enemy of his family.

Ver. 6. And he cast stones at David.] In contempt of him. Or, as some fancy, to reproach him with the adultery he had committed; for which he deserved to have been stoned.

And at all the servants of king David.] This shews it was done only in contempt of them: as if they had been a company of dogs.

And all the people, and all the mighty men, were on his right hand and on his left.] He was under such a strong guard, that Shimei's rage was little less than madness: for he could not hurt David, but might have been immediately killed himself.

Ver. 7. And thus said Shimei, when he cursed, Come out, come out.] As much as if he had said, Get thee out of the kingdom; from whence thou deservest to be expelled. So the words are in the Hebrew, Go out, go out: the doubling of which words expresses his vehement detestation of him.

Thou man of blood, thou son of Belial.] So they called all those that made their will their law. But R. Levi ben Gersom thinks he hath respect in these last words to the adultery committed with Bath-sheba; as, in the first, he might have to the killing of Uriah.

Ver. 8. The Lord hath returned upon thee all the blood of the house of Saul.] This was perfect railing: for David had shed none of their blood; but he maliciously imputes to him the death of Abner, and of Ish-bosheth.

In whose stead thou hast reigned.] In effect, he calls him an usurper.

And the Lord hath delivered thy kingdom into the hand of Absalom thy son: and, behold, thou art taken in thy mischief, because thou art a bloody man.] He still vomits out the same reproaches, with a most wicked spirit, which the Greeks call ἐπιχαιρεκακία, rejoicing in iniquity; to see Absalom so prosperous in his horrid rebellion.

Ver. 9. Then said Abishai, the son of Zeruiah, unto the king, Why should this dead dog curse my lord the king?] See iii. 8.

Let me go over, I pray thee, and take off his head.] There was admirable discipline observed in this small army, none of which durst stir without David's order or leave. And this, according to human reason, was a just motion which Abishai made; he being very near of kin to David, as Shimei was to Saul; and therefore a fit person to stop the mouth of such a mad dog, by cutting off his head.

Ver. 10. And the king said, What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah?] He speaks this with some indignation; and reflects upon Joab, as well as Abishai, who had been the occasion of these reproaches.

So let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, Curse David.] God neither bade him curse David, nor excited him to it; but finding his heart full of malice and rage, gave him an opportunity to vent it, as a punishment unto David. Unto which the good king humbly submits; looking upon it as coming from the hand of God, who delivered him up to this contempt. And in this David's virtue was admirable; for it is not an easy thing to stifle all motions to revenge, when it is easy to take it, and there is a high provocation to it. It is an observation, indeed, of Cicero's (Orat. de Auruspicum Responsis), that "perditi hominis profligatique maledictis, nullius gloria dignitasque violatur;" by the reproaches of a wicked, profligate fellow, no man's glory or dignity is hurt or violated. But David doth not scorn these curses, out of mere greatness of spirit, as coming out of the mouth of a base wretch, not worthy to be regarded; but acknowledges the justice of them, and bears them with a singular patience, out of humility and reverence to God, who had so ordered it.

Who shall then say, Why hast thou done so?] He doth not mean, who should ask Shimei such a question, but who should take upon him to find fault with God, who had just reason to suffer this? Though Grotius thinks David excuses Shimei in these words. For, speaking concerning the respect that is to be used to kings, in not giving them public reproaches, he excepts those which are given by a prophet, who had a special command from God for it. Upon which account he saith, when David was openly upbraided by Shimei as a murderer, he had no excuse to make for him but this, that perhaps God had commanded him to do it; shewing that this alone could make it lawful to speak evil of the king, if God, in a special manner, enjoined it. (Lib. de Imperio Summar. Potest. circa sacra, cap. 9. sect. 19.)

Ver. 11. And David said unto Abishai, and to all his servants, Behold, my son, which came forth of my bowels, seeketh my life: how much more may this Benjamite do it? Let him alone, and let him curse; for the Lord hath bidden him.] His passion seems not to have been at all stirred by this impotent railer, and endeavours to quiet the spirits of others, calmly reasoning himself and them, with admirable consideration, into an humble patience: for what were the revilings of a stranger to the murderous intentions of a son? And how could he withstand God, who inflicted this punishment upon him for his sins?

Ver. 12. It may be the Lord will look upon my affliction, and that the Lord will requite me good for his cursing this day.] He durst not be confident, being conscious of his ill deservings; but he had some hope, that God would be as gracious to him as this man was malicious.

Ver. 13. And as David and his men went by the way.] Taking no notice of him.

Shimei went along on the side of the hill over against him, and cursed as he went, and threw stones at him, and cast dust.] Neglect of him made him more outrageous: which gave David occasion to exercise the greater patience under so long a vexation.

Ver. 14. And the king, and all the people that were with him, came weary.] Not only with their journey, but with grief.

And refreshed themselves there.] At Bahurim, (ver. 5.)

Ver. 15. And Absalom, and all the people of the men of Israel, came to Jerusalem, and Ahithophel with him.] As soon as David was got into the wilderness, he took possession of Jerusalem, and the king's palace.

Ver. 16. And it came to pass, that when Hushai the Archite, David's friend, was come unto Absalom.] Among others that came to welcome him to Jerusalem.

That Hushai said unto Absalom, God save the king, God save the king.] He not only owned his authority, but with great affection seemed to desire its countenance. Which was an egregious piece of flattery and dissimulation.

Ver. 17. And Absalom said, Is this thy kindness to thy friend? why wentest thou not with thy friend?] Absalom had not so little sense as not to consider, that no man ought to forsake a friend in his distress: though at the same time he did not reflect, how he had not only forsaken, but forced away his own father. So that one might have said to him, Is this thy duty to thy father?

Ver. 18. And Hushai said unto Absalom, Nay; but whom the Lord, and this people, and all the men of Israel choose, his will I be, and with him will I abide.] The voice of the people he pretends to look upon as the voice of God; and that he was bound to prefer the public good before his own private obligations or affections.

Ver. 19. And again, whom should I serve? should I not serve in the presence of his son? As I have served in the presence of thy father, so will I be in thy presence.] He gives a second reason; that he should not offend against David, in giving good counsel to his son.

Ver. 20. Then said Absalom to Ahithophel, Give counsel among you what we shall do.] I suppose Ahithophel was made president of the council (as we now speak), who required the rest to deliver their opinions after he had delivered his.

Ver. 21. And Ahithophel said unto Absalom, Go in unto thy father's concubines, which he hath left to keep the house.] It appears by this he was a profane politician, who did not regard by what means, how wicked soever, he compassed his ends. The Hebrews think, also, that by this counsel Ahithophel gratified his own revenge, because David had lain with his grand-daughter, as I before noted.

And all Israel shall hear that thou art abhorred of thy father.] That he and his father were become irreconcilable enemies. For Ahithophel involved him in a greater sin than that for which he killed Amnon: it not being so foul a crime to lie with his sister, as it was to commit incest with his father's wives.

Then shall the hands of all that are with thee be strong.] When they were possessed with an opinion, that the father and son could never come to an accommodation. Which might have been hoped between such near relations; and then the people had been in an ill condition: for David might not have been reconciled to them, though he was to his son. But after this detestable crime there was no likelihood that they would ever be friends again.

Ver. 22. So they spread Absalom a tent upon the top of the house; and Absalom went in unto his father's concubines in the sight of all Israel.] Who were strangely depraved, in that none of them should cry out against such abominable wickedness.

Ver. 23. And the counsel of Ahithophel, which he counselled in those days, was as if a man had inquired at the oracle of God.] It was so sure and safe, that it was commonly followed, without any doubting of the success. Such was this counsel which he now gave: for there was no greater danger to him and all Israel, than for Absalom to repent, and submit to his father: therefore he endeavoured, as I said, to make them irreconcilable, by doing his father the highest injury. Such was this to which he advised, as we learn by Jacob's resentment of it in his son Reuben, and many other examples, for which I refer to Grotius. He made the breach therefore thus wide, that it might never be healed: for if it had, David might have called him and others, in due time, to an account for their treason.

So was all the counsel of Ahithophel, both with David and with Absalom.] While David was in prosperity he gave him faithful counsel: but now in his distress as wisely consulted his ruin. For, as Procopius Gazæus observes, "accommodavit se rebus præsentibus:" he was one of those who complied with the present state of things; and now, with great reason, advised to make haste to dispatch David: fearing lest natural affection should work a reconciliation, and he should be punished for his perfidiousness.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. MOREOVER, Ahithophel said unto Absalom, Let me now choose out twelve thousand men.] Out of the whole multitude of the Israelites that followed Absalom: a thousand choice men, I suppose, out of each tribe. For he knew it would take up too much time to gather all the forces of Israel together, and give David an opportunity to escape.

And I will arise and pursue after David.] It seems he was a soldier as well as a counsellor: or, at least, he thought his counsel so sure of being successful, that he undertook himself to put it in execution. He was afraid, also, that if Absalom should command them himself, natural affection might make him spare his father, and not take away his life; or perhaps work an agreement between them: and so leave him in danger, as I said before, to be called to an account for his rebellion.

This night.] The next, I suppose, after David went away. For speed was the main thing on which he depended.

Ver. 2. And I will come upon him while he is yet weary.] With a long march.

And weak-handed.] Before he had got more forces together.

And I will make him afraid.] Strike a terror into him by this sudden attack; and in the night, when he was ill provided.

And all the people that are with him shall flee.] Finding how unable they were to resist such a force.

And I will smite the king only.] And spare all the people, whom he would not pursue.

Ver. 3. And I will bring back all the people unto thee.] By this means he doubted not to make an end of the war presently, and to bring all Israel to be his subjects.

The man whom thou seekest is as if all returned.] By smiting David, with whom alone was his quarrel, the whole nation would come into him: there being no other to whom they should submit when he was dead.

So all the people shall be in peace.] Thus they should have a peace without war; by taking and killing him; which would preserve both the people which were with Absalom, and those with David. They should all be saved, and he alone destroyed.

Ver. 4. And the saying pleased Absalom well, and all the elders of Israel.] For it was very sound advice; it being dangerous to deliberate long about such wicked designs; which must be executed speedily. So Tacitus well observes, "Scelera impetu, bona consilia mora valescunt;" Wicked counsels prevail by sudden violence, but good by delays.

Ver. 5. Then said Absalom, Call now Hushai the Archite also, and let us hear likewise what he saith.] It was a proverb, it is likely, before Solomon's time, that in a multitude of counsellors there is safety: by which Absalom resolved to govern himself. But the providence of God is chiefly to be here noted; who made Absalom irresolute and doubtful, even in that counsel which was approved by all the elders of Israel, and was, evidently, the wisest that could be given.

Ver. 6. And when Hushai was come to Absalom, Absalom spake unto him, saying, Ahithophel hath spoken after this manner.] Relating what he had said, ver. 2, 3.

Shall we do after his saying?] Follow his advice.

If not, speak thou.] He gives him full liberty to speak freely, if he were of another opinion; which he might deliver without offence, either to him or any body else.

Ver. 7. And Hushai said unto Absalom, The counsel that Ahithophel hath given, is not good at this time.] He confessed him to be a man of extraordinary judgment; but no man is wise at all times: and he thought now he was in an error for the following reason.

Ver. 8. For (said Hushai) thou knowest thy father and his men, that they be mighty men.] Old soldiers, who are aware of the danger wherein they are; and will provide against it, that they be not easily surprised.

And they be chafed in their minds.] So extremely provoked and exasperated, that it would be dangerous to fall upon them with so small an army as Ahithophel proposed. For such desperate persons would sell their lives at a dear rate.

As a bear robbed of her whelps in the field.] All men know that a bear is a very fierce creature: and good authors, particularly Aristotle, observe, that she-bears are fiercer than the male; especially when they have whelps to take care of, as the same philosopher writes, lib. vi. Hist. Animal. cap. 18. But most of all enraged, when their whelps are killed, or taken away from them; which is mentioned often in Holy Scripture, Prov. xvii. 12. Hosea xiii. 8. where Kimchi observes, that they bring forth their whelps wrapped up in a very thick skin, which it costs them a great deal of pains to free them from; and therefore grieves them more, when they find they have laboured in vain. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 9.)

And thy father is a man of war, and will not lodge with the people.] Of such experience in warlike affairs, that as his men would defend him stoutly, and with great fury, so, when all was done, it was probable Ahithophel would not know where to find him; for great captains having disposed their force to the best advantage, and set their guards, oftentimes retire themselves from the camp, and lodge in some secret place.

Ver. 9. Behold, he is hid now in some pit, or in some other place.] Some cave, or other lurking-place; as he was in the days of Saul, who was never able to catch him.

And it shall come to pass, when some of them.] That is, of Absalom's forces.

Be overthrown at the first.] As might well be supposed, if David's men should come on a sudden upon them, out of an ambush, and put the first ranks into disorder, if not make a slaughter among them.

That whosoever hears it will say, There is a slaughter among the people that follow Absalom.] This news would presently be spread through the whole army, and fear make them think the slaughter greater than it was.

Ver. 10. And he also that is valiant, whose heart is as the heart of a lion, shall utterly melt.] For men are apt to conjecture of successes by the beginning; and it is a great encouragement to men to fight when they prosper at the first onset; and mightily disheartens those that are beaten. Lions are not only very strong, but very furious creatures; and therefore valiant men are said to have the hearts of lions, and the faces of lions, (1 Chron. xii. 8.) and the army of locusts to have the teeth of lions, (Joel i. 6.) But no men are so terrible, but they may be terrified, when they are suddenly and unexpectedly surprised by men as terrible as themselves; and far more incensed and justly enraged.

Vossius thinks that the word lebi, which in Hebrew signifies a lion, comes from the word leb, which in that language signifies the heart; as much as to say, Cordatus, a hearty creature, full of courage: whence the Greeks call a valiant and generous man, θυμολέοντα and λεοντόθυμον. (See him, lib. iii. de Orig. et Progr. Idol. cap. 52. and Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 2.)

For all Israel know that thy father is a mighty man, and they that be with him are valiant men.] Who would pursue any advantage with the greatest courage and resolution.

Ver. 11. Therefore I counsel, that all Israel be generally gathered unto thee, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, even as the sand that is by the sea in multitude.] He means all the fighting men throughout the country, which were very numerous. In which advice, his chief aim was to gain time for David to raise an army by the help of his friends; for all Israel could not presently be gathered together, and put into order of battle.

And that thou go to battle also in thy own person.] Which would encourage the people to fight valiantly, when he was at the head of them; and would win him great glory, in owing his victory to his own conduct, and not to other men's.

Ver. 12. And so shall we come upon him in some place where he shall be found, and we will light upon him as the dew falls upon the ground.] He compares the multitude of their soldiers to the drops of dews, which cover the face of the whole earth; so that if David was in the field, he could not escape, but he would fall into the hands of some or other of them.

And of him, and of all the men that are with him, there shall not be left so much as one.] For his army would be so large as to spread itself over all the country, and ferret David and his men out of all their holes, by searching every one of them. This counsel was very plausible to one who relied upon the greatness of a host; and Hushai was also so cunning as to speak as if he would accompany him.

Ver. 13. Moreover, if he be got into a city, then shall all Israel bring ropes to that city, and we will draw it into the river.] He represents a further advantage of such a multitude; that if David quitted the field, and got into the strongest of their cities, encompassed with high walls, and a deep ditch, they were enough to begirt it round, and, by ropes put about the walls, draw them down and all the houses of the city, into the ditch that run about it. There was no such thing, that we read of, practised in war; therefore some by chabalim (which we translate ropes) understand troops, or bands of men, who by machines drawn with ropes could batter down walls and houses: or rather, this is a bragging hyperbolical speech, that they should be so numerous as to be able to do this, if there were no other way to reduce the city.

Until there be not one small stone found there.] Much less any man remaining there.

Ver. 14. And Absalom and all the men of Israel said, The counsel of Hushai is better than the counsel of Ahithophel.] For so it would naturally seem to men that had a bad cause, and were cowardly, having nothing but their numbers to depend upon.

For the Lord had appointed to defeat the good counsel of Ahithophel, to the intent that God might bring evil upon Absalom.] But the chief reason was, that God blinded their eyes, and infatuated their judgments, that they could not discern what was best, but take that course which would ruin Absalom. Such is the wonderful overruling providence of God, in more cases than we are aware of; for, as St. Hilary speaks, concerning the rage of heretics, "Si quantum audet impietas, tantum consuleret prudentia, difficile esset veritatis causam agere;" If wickedness were as wise and prudent in counsel, as it is bold and daring in attempts, it would be hard to maintain a good cause.

Ver. 15. Then said Hushai to Zadok and Abiathar the priests, Thus and thus did Ahithophel counsel Absalom and the elders of Israel; and thus have I counselled.] He acted the part of a true friend to David, but not of a trusty servant to Absalom, whose counsels he betrayed.

Ver. 16. Now therefore send quickly, and tell David.] Carry him this intelligence with all speed.

Saying, Lodge not this night in the plain of the wilderness, but speedily pass over.] The river Jordan.

Lest the king be swallowed up, and all the people that are with him.] For fear Absalom should change his resolution, and incline again to the counsel of Ahithophel; who being a man of great authority, might persuade him his advice was the truest.

Ver. 17. Now Jonathan and Ahimaaz stayed by En-rogel.] A place near Jerusalem, (Josh. xv. 7, 8.) which the Targum translates the fuller's well; because, as Kimchi says, the fullers there trod their cloth with their feet; for he derives rogel from the word regel, which signifies a foot.

(For they might not be seen to come into the city).] Their fathers charged them to stay in this place; because it would have been difficult to send them out of the city without being discovered.

And a wench went and told them.] Pretending, perhaps, to go thither to scour some clothes.

And they went and told king David.] After a little stop in their way, as it here follows.

Ver. 18. Nevertheless a lad saw them, and told Absalom.] Some of whose troopers, who were scouting thereabouts (as Josephus understands it), discovered them before they had gone two furlongs.

But they went both of them away quickly, and came into a man's house in Bahurim.] They suspected they were discovered, and therefore turned out of the public road (as Josephus explains it) and made haste to this village, and perhaps to that man's house where David refreshed himself, (xvi. 5. 14.)

Which had a well in his court; whither they went down.] For at that time of the year their wells in many places were dry, or had little water in them. And it would not be easily suspected that they would stay in an open court.

Ver. 19. And the woman took and spread a covering over the well's mouth, and spread ground corn thereon.] Corn newly thrashed out, which she pretended to dry in the sun.

And the thing was not known.] By this means they lay undiscovered.

Ver. 20. And when Absalom's servants.] Who were sent to pursue them.

Came to the woman of the house.] For some had informed them that they had turned this way.

They said, Where is Ahimaaz and Jonathan?] They were known persons, being the sons of the most eminent among the priests; or, perhaps, they described them to her, so that she could not but know whether two such persons came thither, or passed that way.

And the woman said unto them, They be gone over the brook of water.] Which came, I suppose, from the fountain of En-rogel. It seems to have been a common opinion in those days, that these officious lies, for the safety of innocent persons, had no hurt in them; for we find many instances of them, which cannot be justified. (See upon Josh. ii. 5.)

And when they had sought them and could not find them, they returned to Jerusalem.] For the woman told them, as Josephus says, that they made no stay at her house; but after they had asked for a little drink, made haste away. Though if they pursued them speedily, she believed they might overtake them.

Ver. 21. And it came to pass, after they were departed, they came up out of the well, and went and told David.] As soon as the pursuers were returned back to Jerusalem.

And said unto David, Arise, and pass over the water: for thus hath Ahithophel counselled against you.] And they did not know but he, by his great wisdom, might overrule the counsel of Hushai (with which, no doubt, they also acquainted David), and persuade Absalom to hearken to his; and then David was in extreme danger.

Ver. 22. Then David arose, and all the people that were with him, and they passed over Jordan: by the morning-light there lacked not one of them that was not gone over Jordan.] By this it appears, that they passed over in the night, either at the fords, or in boats: and that not one of them miscarried in the passage, or ran away from him.

Ver. 23. And when Ahithophel saw that his counsel was not followed.] Soon after Ahimaaz and Jonathan were gone to David, it publicly appeared, that the counsel of Ahithophel was rejected, and Hushai's entertained.

He saddled his ass, and arose, and gat him home to his house, to his city, and put his household in order.] Settled his affairs, and disposed of his estate.

And hanged himself.] Being confident that David would get the better of Absalom; and that then he should be put to death for his treason; which made him choose to be his own executioner. So we understand it; though some of the Jews will have it that he died of grief, being choked with a quinsy. For it is not likely, they think, so wise a man as he would hang himself: but, being full of anguish, anger, and vexation (arising not merely from his pride, which enraged him to see any man's counsel preferred to his; but to the foresight, as I said, of danger, if David prevailed, as he was sure he would), these passions cast him into so violent a distemper, that he was strangled by it. And so some interpret the word ἀπήγξατο, in Matt. xxvii. 5.

And died, and was buried in the sepulchre of his father.] Where perhaps he would not have had the honour to be interred, if he had been executed, by David.

Ver. 24. Then David came to Mahanaim.] A place in the tribe of Gad. (See chap. ii. 8. of this book.)

And Absalom passed over Jordan, he and all the men of Israel with him.] As soon as he had gathered them together, which required some time: during which David had opportunity to strengthen himself by gathering an army also. Which was after the death of Ahithophel (who saw what delays were made by gathering Israel together, and what the consequence would be), and after relief was sent him by several persons: particularly by Shobi of the children of Ammon, (ver. 27.) who were neighbours to this part of the country of Israel, though at a good distance from Mahanaim.

Ver. 25. And Absalom made Amasa captain of the host instead of Joab: which Amasa was a man's son whose name was Ithra, an Israelite.] By religion, though by birth an Ishmaelite. (See 1 Chron. ii. 27.) Abarbinel thinks the quite contrary, that he was an Israelite by birth, but had lived long in the land of the Ishmaelites. And by the son of a man he understands an illustrious person.

That went in to Abigail the daughter of Nahash.] That is, he married one of the daughters of Jesse, who is here called Nahash. For, as Kimchi observes, many persons had two names: and this signifies a serpent. From whence it is, that when Isaiah saith, xiv. 29. out of the serpent's root (or the root of Nahash) shall come forth a cockatrice, or basilisk; the Chaldee paraphrase expounds it, out of the root of Jesse shall come forth the Messiah. Who was typified by the brazen serpent in the wilderness.

Sister to Zeruiah, Joab's mother.] So Amasa was cousin-german to Joab: and David was uncle to them both. Absalom, one would think, should not have trusted in such an office so near a relation of David: but he himself was much nearer; and he took Amasa to be as ambitious as himself.

Ver. 26. So Israel and Absalom pitched in the land of Gilead.] Waiting an opportunity to fight David.

Ver. 27. And it came to pass, when David was come to Mahanaim, that Shobi, the son of Nahash of Rabbah of the children of Ammon.] This was a comfort to David, to see himself honoured in his distress by one of a strange country: which he had made his enemy by the terrible execution he had made among them, (xii. 26, &c.) But it is thought, that this Shobi, the brother of Hanun, abhorring the base affront which he put upon David, was preserved by him, and made king of the country in the room of Hanun. And shewed his gratitude for so great a kindness, by coming to his relief, and perhaps to his assistance in his extreme necessity.

And Machir the son of Ammiel of Lo-debar.] Who bred up Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan, till David sent for him, (ix. 5.)

And Barzillai the Gileadite of Rogelim.] Who was a man of great wealth, (xix. 32.) and of as great goodness: for he maintained David while he was in those parts.

Ver. 28. Brought beds, and basons, and earthen vessels.] All manner of household stuff, which they now wanted.

And wheat, and barley, and flour, and parched corn, and beans, and lentiles, and parched pulse.] All sorts of provision, which were necessary for the sustenance either of man or beast. And they brought it of their own accord, without asking, which was a token of their affectionate loyalty. The word kali is twice repeated among these provisions, and is first joined with wheat, barley, and flour. And properly signifies, tostas fruges, parched corn, as we well translate it. And in the latter end of the verse, after beans and lentiles, it must signify, as Bochart observes, "tostum aut frictum aliquod legumen, viz. frictum cicer," some parched or fried sort of pulse, to wit, fried vetches: which grew plentifully in Judea; as it was common among both Greeks and Romans in their food, as Bochart shews, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 7. where he observes that it is called kali by the Arabians to this day. And here we may learn, by the way, from this story, and the present made him by Abigail, and by Ziba, what was the ordinary victuals used in those days. Grain and pulse made up a great part of it, which were the common food of the ancient Egyptians. And the Romans, in their best times, when they most of all applied themselves to agriculture, did scarcely live upon any thing else: whence came the illustrious names of Fabius, Piso, Cicero, and Lentulus.

Ver. 29. And honey.] Milk and honey in those times were reckoned the greatest delicacies, and were the food of kings and great persons; as the same Bochart observes, lib. iv. cap. 11.

And butter, and sheep, and cheese of kine, for David, and for the people that were with him, to eat.] The making of butter, I have observed elsewhere, was early known in these countries; and so was cheese. For, as the author now mentioned observes, though these words saphoth lachar be very variously interpreted, yet the Chaldee and Syriac, as well as all the Hebrews, understand by saphoth, cheese made of cow's milk: from the Hebrew and Chaldee word saphar, which signifies to strain; cheese being made by pressing the whey out of the curds. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 33.) Here is no mention of any flesh-meat but sheep, which were very plentiful in those countries: and so was fish also, but we never read any mention of its being eaten, till the latter times. For it is supposed by learned men, that the ancients despised it, as too light and delicate for strong stomachs. Whence they observe that Homer never speaks of it, nor any Grecian writer of the heroic times.

For they said, The people are weary, and hungry, and thirsty, in the wilderness.] Where there was scarcity of provision, and therefore they needed refreshment, when they were come out of it. Which moved these good people to bring them beds to rest themselves in, after their journey: and all these good things which this rich country afforded, to satisfy their hunger: and it is highly probable, bottles of wine were not wanting, to make their entertainment more noble.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. AND David numbered the people that were with him.] And found them sufficient to make a considerable army.

And set captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds over them.] Formed them into regiments and companies (as we now speak), and set proper officers and commanders over them.

Ver. 2. And David sent forth a third part of the people under the hand of Joab.] Who was the general of the whole host: but now David intended to command in chief himself (as we read in the end of this verse), and therefore committed only a third part of the army to the conduct of Joab.

And a third part under the hand of Abishai, the son of Zeruiah, Joab's brother, and a third part under the hand of Ittai the Gittite.] Order and discipline is of more force in a battle than great numbers: therefore David disposes his little army, for so it was in comparison (Josephus saith but four thousand men), into three bodies, under three eminent commanders: who were to succour one another as they saw occasion.

And the king said unto the people, I will surely go forth with you myself also.] Which he thought would be a great encouragement to them, and make them fight the more valiantly.

Ver. 3. But the people answered, Thou shalt not go forth: for if we flee, they will not care for us; neither if half of us die, will they care for us.] They did not think it advisable that he should hazard himself: for which they give a good reason. That if they should be routed, and half of them slain, Absalom would not think himself a conqueror as long as David was alive: who might raise new forces, and give him battle again. And, as Josephus adds, they might possibly think the king had another army to guard his person.

But now thou art worth ten thousand of us.] Whose person, therefore, ought not to be exposed to danger.

Therefore now it is better that thou succour us out of the city.] By sending them, if there were need, a fresh supply of men, which he kept with him as a reserve in the city: and provision also, with counsel and advice, as occasion required.

Ver. 4. And the king said unto them, What seemeth you best I will do.] He submitted to their opinion; for it was not a time now to oppose the sense of his people.

And the king stood by the gate-side, and all the people came out by hundreds, and by thousands.] Whom, Josephus saith, he exhorted to be faithful and courageous, remembering what he had done for them, νικὴν αὐτοῖς ἐπευξάμενος, praying God to make them victorious.

Ver. 5. And the king commanded Joab, and Abishai, and Ittai, saying, Deal gently for my sake with the young man, even with Absalom.] If they got the better, he prayed, or rather required them, to spare Absalom's life: though he did not deserve it, yet because David desired it, whose affection was wonderfully great to him as his son; and in hope, perhaps, to reclaim him and bring him to repentance. He considered him also as a rash young man, and therefore an object of his and their pity.

And all the people heard when the king gave all the captains charge concerning Absalom.] So that no private soldier might voluntarily kill him.

Ver. 6. And the people went out into the field against Israel: and the battle was in the wood of Ephraim.] Josephus saith, that Joab drew up his men, ἐν τῷ πεδίῳ μεγάλῳ, in a large field, which had a wood behind it. Which is called the wood of Ephraim, not because it belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, for they had no possessions on this side Jordan, where the battle was fought: but the Gileadites gave it that name in memory of the great slaughter Jephthah made of the Ephraimites hereabout, mentioned Judg. xii.

Ver. 7. Where the men of Israel were slain before the servants of David.] They who fought for Absalom being called the men of Israel, it looks like an argument that David's army was principally gathered out of his own tribe of Judah. But it will appear from xix. 11. that this is not true: and therefore by Israel we are to understand the tribes on the other side Jordan, who pursued David into the land of Gilead, where he had got together a small army.

And there was a great slaughter that day of twenty thousand men.] For the fight was obstinate, as Josephus thinks, both sides having great reason to stand stoutly to it, lib. vii. Antiq. cap. 9.

Ver. 8. For the battle was there scattered over the face of all the country.] Thereabout, both in the field and in the wood.

And the wood devoured more people that day than the sword devoured.] Some think the wood is said to devour them, because they fell into pits, or stumbled upon stumps of trees, or pressed one another to death as they came into strait places, or were killed by wild beasts. But the most simple meaning is, that there were more slain in the wood than in the field. That is, more in flight than in the fight: so Josephus, ὡς φεύγονται πεσεῖν πλείονας ἢ μαχομένους. For they could not run away so fast in the wood as in the open field. Many also being weary, it is likely, got into lurking-places, and were there killed like wild beasts.

Ver. 9. And Absalom met the servants of David.] In this flight through the wood, he chanced to meet with some of David's soldiers, who would not kill him, nor so much as stop him, much less seize him: for so it seems they understood David's commandment, that they should not meddle with him. But though they let him go, yet God met with him, and put a stop to his flight, as it here follows.

And Absalom rode upon a mule.] Full speed, as fast as it could carry him.

And the mule went under the thick boughs of a great oak, and his head caught hold of the oak.] His neck, I suppose, stuck fast between the boughs of this oak.

And he was taken up between the heaven and the earth; and the mule that was under him went away.] He hung there, having nothing to support him: and his neck was so wedged between the boughs, by the swift motion of the mule, that he was not able to disengage himself. I do not see any colour for their opinion who think he hung by his hair, which being very long, was wrapped about the boughs of the tree: nor is it probable he was without a helmet, which covered his hair. And besides, it is said afterward, that Joab smote him while he was yet alive, in the middle of the oak, (ver. 14.) Which had been no wonder, if he had only hung by his hair; which would not have killed him: whereas when Joab came to him, he was only not quite dead, but very near it. Yet that great man Bochartus, in his epistle about the weight of Absalom's hair, supposes it to have been so thick, and so strong, that the weight of his whole body could not break it when he hung thereby. Though in his last work he saith, "Hæsit inter ramos arborum, et jumento prætergresso pependit inter cœlum et terram." He stuck between the boughs of trees, and his beast going from under him, he hung between heaven and earth. (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 11.)

Ver. 10. And a certain man saw it, and told Joab, and said, Behold, I saw Absalom hanged in an oak.] But not dead.

Ver. 11. And Joab answered to the man that told him, And, behold, thou sawest him; and why didst thou not smite him there to the ground? and I would have given thee ten shekels of silver, and a girdle.] A military belt, which was much esteemed, (1 Sam. xviii. 4.)

Ver. 12. And the man said, Though I should receive a thousand shekels of silver in my hand.] In ready money (as we speak) paid down beforehand.

Yet would I not put forth my hand against the king's son: for in our hearing the king charged thee, and Abishai, and Ittai.] It was a thing notoriously known, not only to him, but to all the army.

Saying, Beware that none touch the young man Absalom.] Do him no hurt; but leave me to punish him.

Ver. 13. Otherwise I should have wrought falsehood against my own life.] Not only been false and disobedient to the king, but brought his own life in danger; and therefore not have been true to himself.

For there is no matter hid from the king; and thou thyself wouldest have set thyself against me.] He knew the genius of Joab so well, that he was sure he would have been as forward as any, both to inform the king of what he had done, and to have him punished for disobeying his sovereign. Joab also knew this to be so true, that he doth not rebuke him for this bold saying.

Ver. 14. Then said Joab, I may not tarry thus with thee.] Lose time in such discourse.

And he took three darts into his hand.] From the Hebrew spatim, which we translate darts, comes the Latin word spatha: which was a sort of weapon among the ancient Gauls, as Bochartus shews, called by the Chaldee gisæ; from whence the Latin gesum: which Festus saith, was grave jaculum, a heavy dart, being made all of iron. (See his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 42.)

And thrust them through the heart of Absalom, while he was yet alive in the midst of the oak.] Not through that part which is strictly called the heart (for then he would have died immediately, and there would have been no need of his soldiers falling upon him, as we read they did in the next verse), but through the midst of his body; which did not kill him outright, but there was still some life remaining in him.

Ver. 15. And ten young men that bare Joab's armour.] Who waited upon his person, as general of the army.

Compassed about, and smote Absalom, and slew him.] Surrounded him, and thrust their spears or swords through him; and so put an end to his life. Joab, I suppose, thought himself not safe as long as Absalom was alive. For some unquiet people, he thought, who were deeply engaged in this rebellion, would move new disturbances to set him on the throne. Therefore he did not as David commanded, but as he imagined he should have commanded. Kimchi hath a conceit that some of Absalom's crimes are legible in his punishment: for he was thrust through with three darts, having stolen the heart of the king, and then of the two hundred men that followed him out of Jerusalem, and then of all Israel. And as he committed incest with his father's ten concubines; so ten young men compassed him about, and killed him.

Ver. 16. And Joab blew the trumpet.] Sounded a retreat.

And the people returned from pursuing after Israel: for Joab held back the people.] This was done like a good man: for he knew the people were drawn into this rebellion, and would return to their duty, now they had none to head them. Thus Cæsar, after the defeat of Pompey, and the scattering of his army, cried, "Miles parce civibus;" Soldiers, spare your fellow-citizens.

Ver. 17. And they took Absalom, and cast him into a great pit in the wood.] They would not bring his body to be disposed of by his father's order, lest it should too much move his passion.

And laid a great heap of stones upon him.] So that after a sort he was stoned: as the law ordered a rebellious son to be, (Deut. xxi. 20, 21.) Adricomius, in his description of the holy land, saith this heap remained to his days; and all travellers, as they went by it, were wont to throw a stone to add to the heap, in detestation of his rebellion against his father.

And all Israel fled every one to his tent.] See 1 Sam. iv. 10.

Ver. 18. Now Absalom in his life-time had taken and reared up for himself a pillar, which is in the king's dale.] This dale is mentioned Gen. xiv. 17. and was not far from Jerusalem: there he thought to perpetuate his memory (which had better been forgotten) by a very magnificent structure; as Rasi, and several other Jewish doctors fancy: and some that have been in the holy land, tell us of such a noble fabric in the valley of Jehoshaphat. But this is a supposititious monument, as Wagenseil observes upon Sota, p. 221. For Josephus, who is more to be believed than these later authors, saith, that it was only a pillar, lib. vii. Antiq. cap. 9. where he calls it, στύλος λίθου μαρμαρίτου, a pillar of marble; which he saith was two furlongs from Jerusalem: in a place where the king's horses run races, as some say, and other exercises used to be performed.

For he said, I have no son to keep my name in remembrance.] We read before, xiv. 27. that he had three sons and one daughter: but, as Kimchi and other Hebrew doctors say, they were all dead: so that he had no hope to make his name survive him by any other means but this.

And he called the pillar after his own name: and it is called unto this day Absalom's Place.] In the Hebrew the word which we translate place is jad, which signifies a hand. As much as to say, his work: though Kimchi observes, that this word sometimes is the same with makom, a place, as in Isa. lvi. 5. And when this book was written, it bare Absalom's name: though it is likely it did not last very long: for such works of vanity are commonly short-lived. Of which the most famous instance we meet with in history is recorded by Pliny, lib. xxxvii. Natural. Hist. cap. 6. where he saith, Demetrius Phalereus had as many statues erected to him in Athens as there are days in the year, viz. three hundred and sixty; "nondum anno hunc numerum dierum excedente;" which is more, he thinks, than ever man had. But they were all thrown down, and broken in pieces, before a year was expired.

Ver. 19. Then said Ahimaaz the son of Zadok, Let me now run and bear the king tidings, how the Lord hath avenged him of his enemies.] By this it appears Ahimaaz did not return to Jerusalem after he carried intelligence to David, but stayed with him, and was in this battle; for the priests bore arms as well as other men: and particularly performed the office of trumpeters to the army, (2 Chron. xiii. 12.) And here it is observable what strict discipline was kept in those days: that no man durst stir to carry the news of what had been done without the leave of the commander-in-chief.

Ver. 20. And Joab said unto him, Thou shalt not bear tidings this day, but thou shalt bear tidings another day.] Some reward, no doubt, was wont to be given to him that brought good tidings, especially of a great victory: which made him so desirous to be the messenger.

But this day thou shalt bear no tidings, because the king's son is dead.] Which he knew would be unwelcome news to David, and procure no good to Ahimaaz.

Ver. 21. Then said Joab to Cushi.] An Ethiopian by birth, as some think, but had embraced the Jewish religion: and it is probable, was one of those ten young men who attended on Joab, and was present when Absalom was killed; and helped perhaps to dispatch him, (ver. 15.)

Go tell the king what thou hast seen.] He mentioned, it is likely, the particulars: which he would not put in writing, but have him deliver by word of mouth. For he himself would not relate what he had done to Absalom.

And Cushi bowed himself unto him, and ran.] It was a great honour to be a messenger of such good tidings, as the defeat of the king's enemies.

Ver. 22. Then said Ahimaaz, the son of Zadok, yet again to Joab, But, howsoever, let me, I pray thee, also run after Cushi.] We cannot tell what made him so earnest to carry tidings, unless it was hope of reward, and confidence that his own swiftness would make him the first messenger of good news. For Josephus saith, he told Joab he would relate nothing to the king, but περὶ μόνης τῆς νικῆς, only concerning the victory: ἡσυχάσειν δὲ περὶ τῆς Ἀβσαλώμου τελευτῆς, but say not a word about the death of Absalom.

And Joab said, Wherefore wilt thou run, my son, seeing thou hast no tidings ready?] Concerning the particulars of the fight, which he had not time to acquaint him withal. He calling him my son, it signifies he had a great affection to him, and therefore had denied his first request: for Joab knew the king better than Ahimaaz did; who had a mind to run, because he imagined the king would be pleased to hear he was out of danger: whereas Joab knew the king loved Absalom so dearly, that nobody would be acceptable to him that could not assure him he was safe.

Ver. 23. But, howsoever, said he, let me run.] He did not understand Joab's kindness, and therefore presses him again to grant his desire.

And he said unto him, Run. Then Ahimaaz ran by the way of the plain, and overran Cushi.] There were two ways from hence to the place where David was: one over the mountains, which was the shorter way; the other by the plain, which, though the longer, according to the proverb, proved the nearest. Or, as Josephus understands it, Ahimaaz ran a more compendious way, which he alone knew, ἐπιτομοτέραν ἐμβαλὼν τῶν ὁδῶν, μόνος γὰρ αὐτὴν ἐπιγίνωσκεν.

Ver. 24. And David sat between the two gates.] The gate was a very large place, where public meetings used to be; and had an inward and an outward door, between which David sat to hear news.

And the watchman went up to the roof over the gate unto the wall.] Over the gate there was a watch-tower, from whence they might see round about, whether any were coming, and from what quarter.

And lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold a man running alone.] Whom he spied at some distance, but could not discern who he was.

Ver. 25. And the watchman cried, and told the king: and the king said, If he be alone, there is tidings in his mouth.] He took it for a sign that he was a messenger sent from Joab, and that he brought good news: for if they had been routed, there would have been more than one seen running away.

And he came apace, and drew near.] So that, in a little time, he could discern who he was.

Ver. 26. And the watchman saw another man running; and the watchman called unto the porter, and said, Behold, another man running alone. And the king said, He also brings tidings.] More news than the former.

Ver. 27. And the watchman said, Methinks the running of the foremost is like the running of Ahimaaz, the son of Zadok.] Who was remarkable, it seems, for his speed in running.

And the king said, He is a good man, and comes with good tidings.] He was one true to the king's interest, and therefore, he concluded, would not bring bad news.

Ver. 28. And Ahimaaz called, and said unto the king, All is well.] He was in haste to let the king know the good success they had in the battle, and therefore seems to have said at a distance, before he came up to him, Peace; which is the word in the Hebrew, signifying all happiness and prosperity.

And he fell down to the earth upon his face before the king.] When he approached nearer to him.

And said, Blessed be the Lord thy God, which hath delivered up the men that lifted up their hand against my lord the king.] Like a truly religious man, he ascribes the victory they had got unto the Lord; who still shewed his mercy unto David, and continued to be his God; i. e. his benefactor.

Ver. 29. And the king said, Is the young man Absalom safe?] He would not express his joy until he heard that Absalom was preserved.

And Ahimaaz answered, When Joab sent the king's servant, and me thy servant.] This seems to signify that Cushi was one belonging to the court.

I saw a great tumult, but I knew not what it was.] He dissembled his knowledge of Absalom's death; and perhaps in this said true, that he did not know the particular manner of it; though it appears plainly (from ver. 20.) that he knew he was dead.

Ver. 30. And the king said unto him, Turn aside, and stand here. And he turned aside, and stood still.] He would not have him go away until Cushi came, supposing he might find more of the truth, by examining them both together.

Ver. 31. And, behold, Cushi came.] Not long after Ahimaaz had delivered his message.

And Cushi said, Tidings, my lord the king: for the Lord hath avenged thee this day of all them that rose up against thee.] He said no more than Ahimaaz had done; thinking it would be unacceptable news to mention Absalom's death.

Ver. 32. And the king said unto Cushi, Is the young man Absalom safe? And Cushi answered, The enemies of my lord the king, and all that rise against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man is.] This was a decent manner of speech to inform him that he was dead.

Ver. 33. And the king was much moved.] So that we do not find he inquired after the manner of his death, nor after any of the particulars of the victory.

And went up to the chamber over the gate.] See xix. 8.

And wept.] Being extremely disturbed, he retired as far as he could from all company, ἐπὶ τὸ ὑψηλότατον τῆς πόλεως (as Josephus speaks), to the highest part of the city, where he bewailed his son, knocking his breast, and tearing his hair (as the same author's words are), καὶ παντοίως αὐτὸν αἰκιζόμενος, afflicting himself all manner of ways.

And, as he went up, he said.] When he came into the chamber, it was not so easy to know what he did, or hear what he said, because he shut up himself privately; but as he went up the stairs, he thus bemoaned the loss of his son.

O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!] No words can be more passionate; and it is likely his wish, that he had died in Absalom's stead, was only the effect of excessive love to him, and grief for him, which made him vent himself in expressions which were not considerate. But Pellicanus (in which he follows St. Austin) thinks this was a deliberate wish, because Absalom died impenitent, and might have lived to be a better man; but if David had died, he had good hope of his own salvation. But I take this not to be well-grounded; for if David had died, in all likelihood his son would not have been sorry for it, but triumphed in his good success, and proved a wicked tyrant over a base people. The stupidity of the Jewish doctors is inconceivable, who fancy Absalom would have cut his hair, by which he hung, with his sword, had he not seen hell gaping for him, if he fell down; which made him choose to die in the oak: but his father, by his lamentation over him, crying seven times, my son, my son, delivered him from the seven gates of hell, and brought him into paradise. (See Bartoloccius, in his Kirjath-sepher, tom. ii. p. 128, &c. 162.)

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. AND it was told Joab, Behold, the king weepeth and mourneth for Absalom.] For Joab was now come to the city himself, to give the king an account of the fight; and it is likely Ahimaaz, or Cushi, informed him how heavily the king took the news of his son's death.

Ver. 2. And the victory.] That is, the joy for the victory.

That day was turned into mourning unto all the people: for the people heard say that day, how the king grieved for his son.] They had so great a regard to their prince, that when they heard of his affliction, they were afflicted with him; and instead of triumphing, they also made lamentations.

Ver. 3. And the people gat them by stealth that day into the city.] Not by the gate where David was, but by some secret way, that he might not see them. Just like thieves, who are afraid to be discovered and punished for what they have done.

As people being ashamed steal away when they flee in battle.] As if they had lost the day, and not been victorious.

Ver. 4. And the king covered his face.] Such was the custom of deep mourners (as Kimchi here observes), that they might neither see, nor be seen. As being ashamed (saith R. Levi) any should behold their rueful looks.

And the king cried with a loud voice, O my son Absalom! O Absalom, my son, my son!] It is observed by many learned men, that the oriental people expressed their passions with greater vehemence than we are wont to do in these parts of the world. Where crying out aloud with a doleful voice, called howling in Scripture, is not usual; but was common among the Jews, as we see before in David, (iii. 32.) and at the laying the foundation of the temple after the captivity, when they that wept with a loud voice, drowned the voice of those that shouted for joy, (Ezra iii. 12, 13.)

Ver. 5. And Joab went into the house of the king.] It seems by this, that David was removed before Joab came from the top of the gate, and gone to his house, where he was wont to reside.

And said, Thou hast shamed this day the faces of all thy servants.] Making them hang down their heads, as if they had committed such a crime that they were ashamed to look men in the face.

Which this day have saved thy life, and the lives of thy sons and of thy daughters, and the lives of thy wives, and the lives of thy concubines.] Of all that was dear unto him.

Ver. 6. In that thou lovest thine enemies, and hatest thy friends.] In whose preservation he seemed to take no pleasure, but only to grieve for the loss of a rebellious son.

For thou hast declared this day, that thou regardest neither princes nor servants.] Neither himself, nor Abishai, nor Ittai, nor any of the great officers and faithful soldiers, who had adventured their lives for him.

For this day I perceive, that if Absalom had lived, and all we had died this day, then it had pleased thee well.] This was spoken by Joab too sharply, and insolently; yet it was something necessary at this time to awaken David out of a strange lethargy, which made him take notice of nobody, but behave himself as if he had no concern for any person in the world, but for Absalom alone, who was gone out of it.

Ver. 7. Now therefore arise, go forth, and speak comfortably to thy servants.] He wishes him to go and shew himself to his people, and acknowledge their good service, praise their courage, and congratulate their happy success: giving the honours and largesses that were due unto them, or promising them rewards proportionable to their merits.

For I swear by the Lord, if thou go not forth.] Unto the people, and declare how sensible he was of their services.

There will not tarry with thee one man this night.] He resolved, and confirmed it with the most solemn oath, that he would lead his whole army away from him, and leave him alone. David seems to have answered nothing to all this discourse, which moved Joab to conclude with these harsh words.

And that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that befel thee from thy youth until now.] For during the cruel persecution of Saul, as well as in this exile, he had a good company of faithful persons with him. Josephus expresses this threatening very well, τότε σοι πικρότερον, καὶ ἀληθὲς ποιήσω τὸ πένθος, I will make thee weep for something (as we speak), and more bitterly than ever.

Ver. 8. Then the king arose, and sat in the gate.] Where the concourse of people used to be about business. For the gate was a spacious place, and the same thing with the exchange, or the forum among the Romans. The market for commodities was held here, as we learn from the prophecy of Elisha, who foretold corn should be sold at such a rate the next day in the gate of Samaria, (2 Kings vii. 2.) which was a very large place, since Ahab assembled there four hundred false prophets, (1 Kings xxii. 10.) In these gates also there was some building, wherein were seats for the elders and judges: for Boaz having a cause to be heard, went up to the gate, and sat down there, (Ruth iv.

1, 2.) And so many public assemblies being held here, it makes it probable that the chamber over the gate (mentioned in the foregoing chapter), where David went to weep, was the place where the privy-council were wont to meet.

And they told unto all the people.] That were in the city and elsewhere.

Saying, Behold, the king doth sit in the gate. And all the people came before the king.] To congratulate to him his safety, and to receive the tokens of his favour.

For all Israel had fled, every man to his tent.] Until the people heard the king appeared publicly, and no longer bewailed Absalom.

Ver. 9. And all the people were at strife through all the tribes of Israel.] Who should be forwardest to bring back the king: blaming one another's slackness in it.

Saying, The king saved us out of the hand of our enemies, and he delivered us out of the hand of the Philistines, and now he is fled out of the land for Absalom.] They call to mind what benefits they had received by his means, in their deliverance from many enemies; especially the Philistines, who had grievously oppressed them: and also their great ingratitude to him in driving him out of Jerusalem, and forcing him to flee over Jordan, for the sake of Absalom.

Ver. 10. And Absalom, whom we anointed over us, is dead in battle.] We do not read of his being actually anointed: but they chose him for their king, and obeyed him as if he had.

Now therefore why speak ye not a word of bringing the king back?] They spake this to their elders; who seem to have been dubious what to do until they heard the sense of the people.

Ver. 11. And David sent to Zadok and to Abiathar the priests.] By their sons, whom he had with him.

Saying, Speak unto the elders of Judah.] The priests were men of great authority, especially the high-priest and his deputy, and most proper to be employed to deal with the elders.

Saying, Why are ye the last to bring the king back to his house?] That which made them so cold, was, I suppose, the sense of their guilt in joining with Absalom: who began his conspiracy in Jerusalem itself, and perfected it in Hebron, both cities of Judah. Whose revolt was the baser, because he was of their tribe, and had long shewn his great kindness to them, (1 Sam. xxx. 26, &c.) the conscience of which made them afraid to bring him again to Jerusalem.

(Seeing the speech of all Israel is come to the king, even to his house).] These last words, even to his house, seem to be but a repetition of what was said before, to his house; viz. at Jerusalem: the other words being a parenthesis.

Ver. 12. Ye are my brethren, ye are my bones and my flesh.] That is, he had much kindred among them.

Why are ye then the last to bring the king back?] He expresses the greater kindness to them, lest they should be so desperate as to defend Jerusalem against him.

Ver. 13. And say unto Amasa, Art not thou of my bone, and of my flesh?] That is, his sister's son: whom he bids them particularly court; for, being general of Absalom's forces, he might through shame and fear be very loath to look his uncle in the face.

God do so to me, and more also, if thou be not captain of the host before me continually in the room of Joab.] He solemnly promises to prefer him to the highest command in the kingdom: for now he thought it a fit time to depress Joab; who was grown insufferably insolent and imperious. For he had slain Abner most perfidiously in cold blood; and killed Absalom against the king's command; and now lately insulted him in his sorrow: threatening (if we may believe Josephus) τὴν βασιλείαν ἑτέρῳ παραδοῦναι, that he would depose him, and deliver the kingdom to some other person. This promise David endeavoured to perform; bidding Amasa take upon him to assemble all the men of Judah, (xx. 4.) yet leaving Joab (ver. 7.) the command of his own legion. Which he took so heinously, that he killed Amasa; and was captain of the host again, more out of fear than any favour David had for him: for if Amasa had lived, David would have humbled him. For Amasa had a great interest in Israel, over whom he had commanded in chief; especially in the tribe of Judah, whose heart he bowed to receive David again, as it here follows.

Ver. 14. And he bowed the heart of all the men of Judah, even as the heart of one man.] Either this disposition was wrought in them by Amasa; or the kind words delivered from David by Zadok and Abiathar overcame them.

So that they sent this word unto the king.] By some messenger of their own.

Return thou, and all thy servants.] Assuring him they were ready to receive him, and return to their obedience.

Ver. 15. So the king returned, and came to Jordan.] Began to return back, and came as far as Jordan: which parted the country where he was from the land of Canaan.

And Judah.] That is, the elders of Judah.

Came to Gilgal, to go to meet the king, to conduct the king over Jordan.] This was an expression of their great affection, to come thus far to attend him, and to furnish him, I suppose, with accommodations in his journey: for Gilgal was near Jordan; on the other side of the river.

Ver. 16. And Shimei, the son of Gera, a Benjamite, which was of Bahurim, hasted, and came down with the men of Judah to meet king David.] Hoping David would receive him kindly in such good company.

Ver. 17. And there were a thousand men of Benjamin with him.] He was nobly attended, to shew how powerful he was, and what an interest he had in his country: and yet came to implore the king's mercy. Perhaps he was a captain of a thousand in his own tribe: who came with him to intercede for his pardon.

And Ziba, the servant of the house of Saul, and his fifteen sons and his twenty servants with him.] See ix. 10.

And they went over Jordan before the king.] They were so officious as to go further than the men of Judah, to the other side of Jordan, where the king was: before whom they passed over.

Ver. 18. And there went over a ferry-boat.] Prepared, as many suppose, by the men of Judah. Josephus will have it a bridge; composed, perhaps, of many boats joined together.

To carry over the king's household, and to do what he thought good.] To carry over what he pleased to order.

And Shimei the son of Gera fell down before the king, as he was come over Jordan.] As soon as he landed.

Ver. 19. And said unto the king, Let not my lord the king

impute iniquity to thy servant, neither do thou remember that which thy servant did perversely in the day that my lord the king went out of Jerusalem, that the king should take it to his heart.] Resent it so deeply, as to be revenged of him.

Ver. 20. For thy servant doth know that I have sinned.] He professes himself sensible of the crime he had committed, and was sorry for it.

Therefore, behold, I come the first this day of all the house of Joseph to go down to meet my lord the king.] To shew by his example what the rest should do: and, as the Hebrew doctors gloss upon it, they would all see in him an instance either of David's clemency, or severity; and accordingly behave themselves. He was not properly of the house of Joseph, but of a tribe near of kin to it: so that at this time, it seems, they looked upon themselves as members of the same body; being descended from the same mother: and they continued so till the kingdom was rent. For Benjamin is placed between Ephraim and Manasseh (the two sons of Joseph) in Psal. lxxx. 2. and they marched under the same standard, Numb. ii. 18, 19, &c.

Ver. 21. But Abishai the son of Zeruiah answered and said, Shall not Shimei be put to death for this, because he cursed the Lord's anointed?] He would have gone and done execution upon him, at that time when he cursed, (xvi. 9.) and now he imagined there could be no reason to spare him.

Ver. 22. And David said, What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah.] It seems Joab joined with his brother: who thought to govern all the king's motions as they pleased. But he bids them, in a disdainful manner, stand aside, and not meddle in this matter.

That ye should this day be adversaries unto me?] Hinder me from following my own inclinations, and set my people against me. For by following this advice, he might have alienated the hearts of all Israel from him, and made them fear the like punishment for their revolt.

Shall any man be put to death this day in Israel?] In a time of universal joy, he would not have any family have cause to make lamentation. It was accounted an ill omen among other nations, if any man was put to death on the king's birth-day: and this was a second natalis imperii, birth-day of David's empire; which he would not have sullied with any cloud of sorrow.

For do I not know that I am this day king of Israel?] He had power to punish, or to pardon, as he pleased: and being restored to his kingdom, would not enter upon it with blood.

Ver. 23. Therefore the king said unto Shimei, Thou shalt not die: and the king sware unto him.] That he would not put him to death. But this did not oblige him not to give such a charge as he did to Solomon, to do justice upon him for any new disobedience. Nothing is more glorious than mercy and clemency, as the heathens themselves were sensible. Cæsar saith in a letter of his to Oppius and Cornelius (which is among Cicero's Epistles), "Hæc nova est vincendi ratio," &c. This is a new way of conquering, to fence ourselves by mercy and liberality, (lib. ix. Epist. ad Atticum.)

Ver. 24. And Mephibosheth the son of Saul.] That is, his grandson.

Came down to meet the king, and had neither dressed his feet.] But wholly neglected himself, as they used to do in a time of public sorrow. For the not dressing his feet signifies (as Schickard and others understand) that he had not cut the nails of his toes; but let them grow, as he did his beard. It may be understood of his not washing his feet; the neglect of which made men very sordid. For in those countries, they lying upon beds when they ate (as Scaliger observes in his sixth book de Emend. Temporum), put off their shoes, and washed their feet, "ne pulverosis pedibus strata inquinarent," lest they should defile the carpets with their dusty feet. Besides, in hot weather the smell of their feet without washing was offensive.

Nor trimmed his beard.] He not only let the hair grow, but took no care to put it in good order. For the words in the Hebrew are, he had not done any thing to his feet, nor any thing to his beard.

Nor washed his clothes.] His shirt, nor any of the linen which he wore. As for their woollen garments, they were not wont to wash them.

From the day the king departed until the day he came again in peace.] This long-continued mourning argued him to be really afflicted for the king's exile.

Ver. 25. And it came to pass, when he was come to Jerusalem to meet the king.] It is manifest from the foregoing verse, that he came down from some other place to Jerusalem to meet the king: but could not meet him sooner, as others had done, because Ziba had got his estate, and, it is likely, would not furnish him with an ass, no more than he had done when David fled away.

That the king said unto him, Wherefore wentest thou not with me, Mephibosheth?] As prudence, as well as gratitude, obliged him.

Ver. 26. And he answered, My lord, O king, my servant deceived me: for thy servant said, I will saddle my ass, and ride thereon, and go to the king; for thy servant is lame.] He had ordered an ass to be made ready for him, to carry him to David: instead of which, Ziba saddled it for himself; and went with that false story, which is mentioned xvi. 3.

Ver. 27. And he hath slandered thy servant unto my lord the king; but my lord the king is an angel of God.] To discern between truth and falsehood.

Do therefore what is good in thy sight.] And therefore he submits himself entirely to his judgment, and trusted to his kindness.

He had great reason so to do, as he confesses in the next words.

Ver. 28. For all my father's house were but dead men before my lord the king; yet didst thou set thy servant among those that did eat at thy own table.] The undeserved benefits he had received from David made him absolutely resign himself to his will and pleasure.

What right therefore have I yet to cry any more to the king?] He did not challenge any thing as his right, nor thought it decent to trouble the king further with his complaints.

Ver. 29. And the king said unto him, Why speakest thou any more of thy matters?] As if he had said, Enough, enough; I desire to hear no more of the injuries done me by the house of Saul.

I have said, Thou and Ziba divide the land.] Some of the Hebrew doctors understand this, as if he now parted the estate formerly given to Mephibosheth between him and Ziba; partly out of shame, lest he should appear too rash and hasty of belief in giving all to Ziba, and partly out of suspicion that the too great wealth of Mephibosheth might make him ambitious. But they acknowledge this sentence to be unjust, Ziba making no defence for himself. And some of them say, a voice from heaven was heard thereupon, saying, That God would make the like division of David's kingdom, between Rehoboam and Jeroboam. But if we carefully attend to the words, they carry another sense in them; being as much as if he had said, My first grant shall stand; when he decreed that Mephibosheth should be lord of the land, and Ziba should manage it for him, ix. 10. (See Selden, de Successionibus, cap. 25. fol. 89, 90. where he makes out this very clearly.)

Ver. 30. And Mephibosheth said unto the king, Yea, let him take all, forasmuch as my lord the king is come again in peace unto his own house.] Nothing could be more generously spoken, nor signified greater affection, than that he was content to be a beggar, now that the king was restored to his kingdom.

Ver. 31. And Barzillai the Gileadite came down from Rogelim.] A place in Mount Gilead.

And went over Jordan with the king, to conduct him over Jordan.] Merely to bring him on his way so far, and then return.

Ver. 32. Now Barzillai was a very aged man, even fourscore years old.] Which was a great age in David's days, (Psal. xc. 10.)

And he had provided the king of sustenance while he lay at Mahanaim; for he was a very great man.] And had a very large heart, which moved him to supply the wants of David, and all his family and attendants, as long as he stayed at Mahanaim, which was a considerable time. Pliny relates, that Crassus denied any man to be rich, who was not able to maintain a legion, lib. xxxiii. Natural. Hist. cap. 10. where he mentions one that entertained all Xerxes' army at a feast: but here was a far more rare example of virtue in Barzillai, who maintained not a prosperous prince in all his glory, but a distressed prince in his exile, when no hope appeared of a reward.

Ver. 33. And the king said unto Barzillai, Come over with me, and I will feed thee with me at Jerusalem.] Entertain him at his own table, as a singular friend.

Ver. 34. And Barzillai said unto the king, How long have I to live, that I should go up with the king unto Jerusalem?] He excuses himself, by several reasons, for not accepting the king's kindness; and the first is, because, as he was unfit for travel so far, so, for so short a time as he had to live, it was not prudent to change his dwelling.

Ver. 35. I am this day fourscore years old; and can I discern between good and evil?] These general words are explained by the particulars which follow.

Can thy servant taste what I eat and drink? can I hear any more the voice of singing-men, and singing-women?] His second reason is, that the king's kindness would be ill bestowed upon one that had no relish left of any of the pleasures of a court.

Wherefore then should thy servant be a burden unto my lord the king?] A third is, that instead of doing the king any service he should prove a burden to him; for old men must have some to wait on them, and take care of them.

Ver. 36. Thy servant will go a little way over Jordan with the king.] Express his dutiful affection to him, as far as he was able.

And why should the king recompense me with such a reward?] Since he had but done his duty to his sovereign, he did not expect to be so highly rewarded for it.

Ver. 37. Let thy servant, I pray thee, turn back again, that I may die in my own city, and be buried by the grave of my father and of my mother.] He beseeches him, for a fourth reason, not to press him to go further; but suffer him to enjoy that which old men naturally desire; to die in the place where they have lived, and to be buried with their ancestors.

But behold thy servant Chimham; let him go over with my lord the king, and do unto him what shall seem good unto thee.] That he might not seem rude in refusing the king's gracious offer, he desires him to translate his kindness to his son, and bestow upon him what he pleased.

Ver. 38. And the king answered, Chimham shall go over with me, and I will do unto him that which shall seem good unto thee.] He would not have it left to his choice what he should do for Chimham; but desires the good old man to say what he would have for him, and it should be done. We do not read what Barzillai asked, or what David did for him: but there being mention made in Jer. xli. 17. of the habitation of Chimham, and that near to Beth-lehem, it is a very reasonable conjecture of Grotius, in his annotations on that place, that David, having a patrimony in the field of Beth-lehem, the place of his nativity, "Jus ibi habitandi, et fructus quosdam suos faciendi dedit Chimhamo," he bestowed it upon Barzillai's son; and from thence this place took the name of Chimham, which remained until the days of Jeremiah.

And whatsoever thou shalt require of me, that will I do for thee.] He promises withal, that when Barzillai was gone home, if he had any occasion to petition him, his request should be granted.

Ver. 39. And all the people went over Jordan. And when the king was gone over, the king kissed Barzillai, and blessed him.] They parted with great kindness, and the king prayed God to requite what Barzillai had done for him.

And he returned to his place.] With great satisfaction, that he had seen his sovereign in his way to be restored to his kingdom.

Ver. 40. And the king went on to Gilgal, and Chimham went with him.] As one of his near attendants.

And all the people of Judah conducted the king, and also half the people of Israel.] That is, the elders and great men both of Judah and Israel. To gratify his own tribe, David marched on, not expecting the coming of all the great men of Israel, who were making themselves ready to wait upon him.

Ver. 41. And, behold, all the men of Israel came to the king, and said unto the king.] When the other half of the Israelites were got together, they thus expostulated with the king.

Why have our brethren, the men of Judah, stolen thee away, and have brought the king and his household, and all David's men with him, over Jordan?] That is, why did they make such haste, and not expect our consent and assistance, who were as zealous as themselves to bring the king back? They seem to take it ill, that not only David and his family, but all his men, i. e. his soldiers and guards, should be brought over Jordan; as if they would force their way, whether the Israelites would or no.

Ver. 42. And all the men of Judah answered the men of Israel, Because the king is near of kin to us.] Being of their tribe, which justly required they should be more forward than others in his service.

Wherefore then be ye angry with us?] For our affection to him.

Have we eaten at all of the king's cost? or hath he given us any gift?] We get nothing by it, but have only done our duty, and testified our great affection. Abarbinel thinks these words, given us any gift, import expiation and pardon; as in Gen. xviii. 26. Numb. vi. 26. and are as much as if they had said, Hath he granted us a pardon for what we did in the business of Absalom? Whereby they suggested, that the Israelites were the principal actors in that rebellion, and needed an act of oblivion, though they did not.

Ver. 43. And the men of Israel answered the men of Judah, and said.] The words are not as before, all the men of Israel: which is a sign some of them were cooled, though most of them continued violent.

We have ten parts in the king.] By the king is here meant the kingdom: ten parts of which they say were theirs (whereas there were eleven tribes besides Judah), because Simeon, being intermixed with Judah, it is likely, now came along with them.

We have also more right in David than you.] As David was a private person, Judah had more interest in him than the rest, because he was of their tribe: but, as he was a king, the Israelites had more, being the far greater part of his subjects.

Why then did ye despise us, that our advice should not be first had in bringing back our king?] They looked upon it, therefore, as a great neglect, if not contempt, of them, that they had not the precedence in this business.

And the words of the men of Judah were fiercer than the words of the men of Israel.] More vehement: or, they were too hard for them in their argument. David did not think fit to interpose; which made the men of Israel think he favoured Judah, and thence arose a new rebellion.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. AND there happened to be there.] When this contention fell out between the men of Israel and Judah.

A man of Belial, whose name was Sheba the son of Bichri, a Benjamite.] Who perhaps was of kin to Saul, as Shimei was, (xvi. 5.) and one of the commanders in Absalom's army, next to Amasa. For so Victorinus Strigelius understands the Hebrew words, isch Bichri, to signify unus ex proceribus, a nobleman, of great power and authority among the people: like Catiline at Rome.

And he blew a trumpet, and said, We have no part in David, neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse.] As much as to say, Let the men of Judah have him to themselves. He cares not for us, and we care not for him.

Every man to his tents, O Israel.] He wishes all the men of Israel, since David expressed no more regard to them, to go to their homes, and trouble themselves no further in bringing him back.

Ver. 2. So every man of Israel went up from after David, and followed Sheba the son of Bichri.] Instead of going home, they followed their seditious incendiary: taking it in snuff (as we speak) that the king did not expect till they, who were the majority, came to conduct him: but relied solely on the men of Judah, as if they were able, without the rest of Israel, to re-establish him in his throne.

But the men of Judah clave unto their king, from Jordan even to Jerusalem.] Not a man of them stirred from him, but conducted him from Jordan to Jerusalem. And we must not think that all the men of Israel forsook him: but a very great number of them. For Shimei, in all likelihood, and his thousand men, stuck to him, though of the same tribe with Sheba; otherwise David would have punished him, when this rebellion was quelled.

Ver. 3. And David came to his house at Jerusalem, and the king took the women his concubines, whom he had left to keep the house, and put them in ward.] Shut them up close under a guard, and fed them. Nobody came to them, but only to bring them daily provision for their sustenance.

But went not in unto them.] Never lay with them; but looked upon them as become impure to him, having been defiled by his son.

So they were shut up unto the day of their death, living in widowhood.] They were not fit for any body else, being royal wives; and therefore he did not give them a bill of divorce, but shut them up close, that no man might enjoy them. And indeed it was not prudent to let them be so much as seen abroad; which would have renewed the remembrance of Absalom's filthiness.

Ver. 4. Then said the king unto Amasa, Assemble me the men of Judah.] He makes good his promise to Amasa, which was a great encouragement to others in the tribe of Judah, to stick fast to their king. And by this means also the seditious Israelites might be the sooner brought to reason, when they saw their old general in the field against them.

Within three days.] Because the business required speedy dispatch.

And be thou here present.] To receive his orders.

Ver. 5. So Amasa went to assemble the men of Judah: but he tarried longer than the set time which he had appointed him.] He was not treacherous unto David (as the Jewish doctors in the Sanhedrin say Joab represented him, and made it the reason of his killing him), but he found difficulty in the business; because the people had a high opinion of Joab, and would not easily be brought to serve under a new general. This Amasa, it is likely, was loath to report to the king, because it would diminish his authority, and represent him as incapable to serve the king in the office wherein he had placed him.

Ver. 6. And David said to Abishai.] He persisted in his resolution to depress Joab; but employed his brother, who was the next great commander in the army. Whom he doth not create captain of the host; but for fear this delay should prove prejudicial, bids him take such forces as he found ready in Jerusalem, and pursue Sheba.

Now shall Sheba the son of Bichri do us more harm than did Absalom.] If he had time to gather an army: the people being highly incensed by the provocation the men of Judah had given them.

Take thou therefore thy lord's servants.] The guards that attended David, and the standing forces, which were always kept on foot.

And pursue after him, lest he get him fenced cities, and escape us.] So that they must be put to the trouble of laying a long siege to the place where he was.

Ver. 7. And there went out after him Joab's men.] A body of men whom he particularly commanded.

And the Cherethites, and the Pelethites, and all the mighty men.] See upon viii. 18.

And they went out of Jerusalem to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri.] For David thought himself safe enough in the love of the city of Jerusalem, and the rest of the people thereabout.

Ver. 8. And when they were at the great stone which is in Gibeon.] The place of rendezvous (as we now speak), appointed by Amasa for the men of Judah. Which was, as Josephus saith, a hundred furlongs from Jerusalem.

Amasa went before them.] As their commander-in-chief.

And Joab's garment that he had put on.] As soon as Amasa arrived at the army, Joab also came there as a volunteer, of his own accord: or rather, was there before with Abishai. Yea, Josephus takes it, as if David had spoken those words ver. 6. unto Joab, telling him it was not safe to delay, and therefore bids him take such forces as they had ready, and go with his brother Abishai. Ἰωβὸς δὲ οὐκ ἔτι μέλλειν ἔκρινεν, ἀλλὰ τόν τε ἀδελφὸν καὶ τοὺς ἑξακοσίους παρέλαβε, &c. He resolved not to stay to gather more forces: but with his brother, and six hundred men, and all the force they had in Jerusalem, marched out to pursue Sheba.

Was girded unto him, and upon it a girdle with a sword fastened to his loins in the sheath thereof.] He had no armour on, but such a garment as soldiers wore, closely girt to him: and upon it a belt, in which a sword hung by his side. Yet Josephus saith he had a breast-plate, θώρακα ἐνδεδυμένος, as well as μάχαιραν περιζωσάμενος, begirt with a sword.

And as he went forth.] To meet Amasa, πολλὴν δύναμιν ἀναγόντος, who led numerous forces to that place, as the same author speaks.

It fell out.] He had hung it so, that it might drop out of the sheath when he pleased. And it fell out just as he went to salute and embrace Amasa: who seeing him stoop to take it up, imagined it was only to put it into the sheath again.

Ver. 9. And Joab said unto Amasa, Art thou in health, my brother?] He inquired in a friendly manner of his welfare.

And Joab took Amasa by the beard with his right hand to kiss him.] This is the custom still among the eastern people, the Indians: who take one another by the chin, or the beard, when they would give a hearty salute; and say bobba, i. e. father; or bii, i. e. brother, as the author of the voyage to the East Indies relates, at the end of Peter de Valle's Travels, p. 410.

Ver. 10. And Amasa took no heed to the sword that was in Joab's hand.] Which he thought he had put into his sheath, and did not observe that he held it in his left hand, which it seems he could manage as well as the right.

So he smote him therewith in the fifth rib.] See iii. 17.

And shed out his bowels to the ground, and struck him not again, and he died.] He gave him such a wound, that his very bowels gushed out; and there was no need to give him a second stroke.

And Joab and Abishai his brother pursued after Sheba the son of Bichri.] Hereupon Joab immediately, without any order, resumed his command, and Abishai durst not oppose him, but yielded it up to him. For his authority was so great among the soldiery, that none of Amasa's men durst stir to avenge his death; the Cherethites, and Pelethites, and all David's guards submitting to him: and besides, all Amasa's men were not yet come up, but followed by degrees, as appears by the rest of the story.

Ver. 11. And one of Joab's men stood by him.] By the command of his master; who knew this would make some disorder among Amasa's soldiers.

And said, He that favoureth Joab, and he that is for David.] He cunningly joins these two together, as if their interest was inseparable.

Let him follow after Joab.] He was grown so insolent, because David durst not punish him; that, as it made him venture upon this bloody fact, so he presumed, that though the sight of Amasa's dead body might stop the march of those that came by it; yet, upon the declaration his officer made, that now he was become general of the army, their love to him was such, that they would make no scruple to follow him.

Ver. 12. And Amasa wallowed in blood in the midst of the highway.] He seems not to have been quite dead, though senseless: but had so much life, that he rolled to and fro in his own blood, which was a doleful sight.

And when the man saw that all the people stood still.] Joab was deceived in his measures, for the people hated this fact as much as they loved him. And therefore as many as saw it would move no further till the body was removed out of the way: so that they who were behind went without any stop after Joab.

He removed Amasa out of the highway into the field, and cast a cloth upon him, when he saw that every one that came by him stood still.] This was a prudent officer; who expected no orders, but of his own accord removed that out of sight which hindered their pursuit of Sheba.

Ver. 13. And when he was removed out of the highway, all the people went on after Joab, to pursue after Sheba the son of Bichri.] They that were behind, it is likely, did not know that Amasa was killed, and so marched on without any scruple.

Ver. 14. And he went through all the tribes of Israel.] That is, Sheba rambled about the country, from one city to another, to excite the people to take up arms against David. But Josephus refers this to Joab, that he followed Sheba from place to place, till he came where he was.

Unto Abel, and to Beth-Maacah.] Or rather unto Abel Beth-Maacah: for they were one and the same place, as appears by the next verse. And so Josephus, who saith it was a strong city, well fortified, in the tribe of Naphtali, in the northern parts of Judea, upon the borders of that part of Syria where Maacah was, (x. 8.) In this city Sheba at last settled himself, and resolved to defend it: being unable, I suppose, to raise such an army as to keep the field.

And all the Beerites.] Among whom he had been before he came hither, and got some considerable forces among them. For they were of the city Beeroth (it is probable) and the parts adjacent: which was in the tribe of Benjamin, of which he was a member, and perhaps dwelt in this city, (Josh. xviii. 25.)

And they were gathered together, and went also after him.] Unto Abel Beth-Maacah.

Ver. 15. And they came.] That is, Joab and his men pursued him thither.

And besieged him in Abel of Beth-Maacah, and they cast up a bank against the city.] Raised fortifications round about it, from whence to batter it.

And it stood in the trench.] That is, Joab's army had advanced so far that they had filled up the trench: and there stood at the very foot of the wall.

And all the people that were with Joab battered the wall, to throw it down.] Some battered it with engines from the forts: while those at the bottom of the wall undermined to throw it down. So Josephus.

Ver. 16. Then cried a wise woman of the city.] A woman of great understanding, who also could speak well. Many such there were in Israel, it appears by her of Tekoah, and Abigail, and the mother of king Lemuel.

Hear, hear; say, I pray you, unto Joab, Come near hither, that I may speak with thee.] She prays those that were at the bottom of the wall to stop their proceedings awhile: and desires Joab to come, and hear what propositions she had to make to him.

Ver. 17. And when he was come near unto her, the woman said, Art thou Joab? And he answered, I am he.] She was unwilling to treat with any one, but him who had power to agree to what she propounded.

Then she said unto him, Hear the words of thine handmaid. And he answered, I do hear.] He did not despise her because she was a woman; but, as became a wise man, gave her a favourable audience, and attended to what she said.

Ver. 18. Then she spake, saying, They were wont to speak in old time, saying, They shall surely ask counsel at Abel: and so they ended the matter.] According to this translation of the words, she praises the city of Abel as famous, time out of mind, for wisdom and giving sound advice: and now, she would have him believe, was not without persons of great prudence and fidelity also (as it follows in the next verse), who would not willingly offend their king. But there is another translation in the margin of our Bibles, which I take to be more literal, by referring the word barishonah not to old time, but to the beginning of the siege. As if she had said, When the people saw thee lay siege to the city, they said, Surely they will ask us if we will have peace, and then we shall soon come to an agreement and make an end. Whereby she secretly remembers Joab of a rule in the law, Deut. xx. 10. which commands them to offer peace to the cities of other nations when they came to besiege them; and therefore much more to a city of their own, as Abel was. To this purpose R. Solomon Jarchi; and it agrees well with what follows, that they were a peaceable people and faithful to their prince: and therefore would not have refused to yield, upon summons, to him. R. Levi ben Gersom gives another sense of them; That Sheba and his company, when they first came into the city, asked if they would follow him, and said no more: to whom the men of the city answered, We are peaceable and faithful; that is, we cannot join with thee and rebel against king David. But there is a late writer, who thinks the words will bear this sense: This was a common saying in old time, If any one asked whether Abel was a place of justice and judgment, or a den of thieves; the answer was, They are an upright people. And therefore she asks Joab, why he went about to destroy a city so famous for virtue. Thus Mayerus in his Annotations on Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 14.

Ver. 19. I am one of them that are peaceable and faithful in Israel.] She speaks in the name of the whole city: which was of a peaceable temper; and had been faithful to David in the time of the late revolt.

Thou seekest to destroy a city and a mother in Israel.] A great city, which had many towns depending on it; and therefore called a mother.

Why wilt thou swallow up the inheritance of the Lord?] Do an injury to the public; by depopulating a part of the country, which is God's peculiar.

Ver. 20. And Joab answered and said, Far be it, far be it, that I should swallow or destroy.] Do you the least hurt, if I can avoid it. He disclaims any ill intentions twice, saith R. Solomon; as if he had said, Far be it from me, far be it from the king, to design any such thing.

Ver. 21. The matter is not so.] You are not rightly informed.

But a man of Mount Ephraim.] He is said before (ver. 1.) to be of the tribe of Benjamin: but he lived, I suppose, in Mount Ephraim.

(Sheba, the son of Bichri by name), hath lifted up his hand against the king, even against David: deliver him only, and I will depart from the city.] And leave all Sheba's party at liberty to go home, without any punishment.

And the woman said unto Joab, Behold, his head shall be thrown to thee over the wall.] She had reason to be confident that both the citizens and soldiers would be glad to save themselves, by giving up him, who had brought them into imminent danger.

Ver. 22. Then the woman went unto all the people in her wisdom.] Desired they would all meet in the common hall; where she told them what terms she had made for them with Joab: unto which they immediately consented.

And they cut off the head of Sheba the son of Bichri, and cast it out to Joab.] It seems his party was not strong in the city; or, seeing it likely to be taken, they were glad to accept of the conditions the woman had made for them.

And he blew the trumpet, and retired from the city, every man to his tent.] Raised the siege, and went home.

And Joab returned to Jerusalem unto the king.] To give him an account of his good success.

Ver. 23. Now Joab was over all the host of Israel.] Now that David was restored to his kingdom, and established in it, he settled all the great officers who were to govern under him: and continued Joab in the chief command of the army, which was so much at his devotion, that he found it dangerous to displace him.

And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over the Chereth-ites, and over the Pelethites.] As he was also before, (viii. ult.) being a very valiant man, (xxiii. 20.) whom Solomon made commander-in-chief of the whole army (as now he was captain of the king's guards) after the death of Joab.

Ver. 24. And Adoram was over the tribute.] Treasurer, or receiver of the king's revenue. Which office was not settled before; because, in the beginning of his reign, it is likely David had no great revenue.

And Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud was recorder.] See upon viii. 16.

Ver. 25. And Sheva was scribe; and Zadok and Abiathar were priests.] It is uncertain whether Sheva be the same with Seraiah mentioned viii. 17. or, Seraiah being dead, or displaced, this man came in his room. Concerning these priests, see viii. 17.

Ver. 26. And Ira also the Jairite.] He had his original in the country of Jair the Gileadite on the other side Jordan; (Numb. xxxii. 41.) who is not mentioned before, but now was made a great officer.

Was a chief ruler about David.] The Hebrew word cohen (as hath been often observed) signifies any minister, either sacred or civil: a priest or a prince. Instances of the last are many, and the Targum thus expounds it here, Rab le David, a prince, or great man about David. And so the priest of On, Gen. xli. 50. and the priest of Midian, Exod. ii. 26. signify the priest or ruler of On and of Midian. As, in Job xii. 19. we, following the Chaldee, translate it, God leadeth princes away spoiled.

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. THEN there was a famine in the days of David, three years, year after year.] The Jewish doctors commonly say this famine was before the rebellion of Absalom. But Abarbinel will have it, that things are related here in the order wherein they were done; so that this was after that rebellion was ended.

And David inquired of the Lord.] For what sin so grievous a punishment was inflicted: suspecting (as Abarbinel thinks) God might still punish him for those sins he committed in the matter of Uriah.

And the Lord answered, It is for Saul, and for his bloody house.] God soon comforted him, by letting him know that this punishment was upon the account of Saul and his family, who had been deeply engaged in blood.

Because he slew the Gibeonites.] When he slew the whole city of Nob (saith the same Abarbinel) where the Gibeonites lived, and served as hewers of wood and drawers of water to the priests, whom Saul then cut off, (1 Sam. xxii. 18, 19.) But the same great man hereupon inquires, why God did not send this famine rather for the slaughter of the priests than of the Gibeonites? Of which he gives this account, that the slaughter of the priests was punished before, by the slaughter of Saul and of his sons in the battle with the Philistines, (1 Sam. xxxi.) and now he was punished in the sons of his concubines, and all Israel suffered with them by famine, because they did not hinder him from murdering the Gibeonites, by remembering him of the oath which was made to them; nay, perhaps they approved of what he did, being glad to see the land rid of foreigners. But why this judgment was not executed before, may seem strange, till we consider, as he observes, that the counsels of God are profound; and he hath excellent reasons why he punishes sinners not now, but hereafter: and knows which of their children are most worthy to be punished, and bear the iniquity of their fathers. And the longer he stays before he strikes, the more evident it is, that he doth not forget what the evil men have done, though he doth not presently declare his anger against it. He observes, also, that the Gibeonites being drawers of water, God put the Israelites in mind of their offence, by withholding rain from them: just as his refusing to answer Saul by urim, was a suitable punishment for his murdering the priests who consulted God by that oracle.

Ver. 2. And the king called the Gibeonites, and said unto them (now the Gibeonites were not of the children of Israel, but of the remnant of the Amorites, and the children of Israel had sworn unto them; and Saul sought to slay them in his zeal to the children of Israel and Judah).] Which transported him to violate a solemn oath: as many since have done, under pretence of the public good.

Ver. 3. Wherefore David said unto the Gibeonites, What shall I do for thee?] He asks them what satisfaction they desired, for the wrong that had been done them. Which may seem strange, unless we suppose, as Josephus doth, that God told him when he consulted him, not only for what crime he sent this punishment, but that he should take, δικὴν ἣν αὐτοὶ θέλουσιν, such a revenge for it, as the Gibeonites would have. Besides, they had never made any complaint to David of the injury which had been done them: who might therefore be the kinder to them, and give them leave to name the recompence that should be made them.

And wherewith shall I make an atonement, that ye may bless the inheritance of the Lord?] Pray to God to be pacified also; and to restore plenty unto Israel again.

Ver. 4. And the Gibeonites answered unto him, We will have no silver nor gold of Saul, nor of his house; neither for us shalt thou kill any man in Israel.] Except those that they afterward mentioned. For they seem to have been people truly proselyted to the Jewish religion, who desired nothing but equal justice; that men should suffer as they have done: and therefore Saul having not taken away their money, but their lives; they desired only that the lives of some of his family might pay for it.

And he said, What you shall say, that will I do for you.] If they had desired money, or any thing else that was in his power, they might have had it.

Ver. 5. And they answered the king, The man that consumed us, and that devised against us, that we should be destroyed from remaining in any of the coasts of Israel.] He intended, if not to kill, yet to banish them all: which had been worse than death; for it would have deprived them of the liberty of worshipping the true God.

Ver. 6. Let seven men of his sons be delivered unto us.] Some imagine, that at the first they demanded all the house of Saul to be delivered up unto them: but upon cooler thoughts they demanded only seven persons.

And we will hang them up unto the Lord.] To appease his anger, and vindicate his honour. Some think this was a barbarous custom in those days (which certainly prevailed in future times) to hang men up, to appease the anger of their gods, in time of famine. Which Johannes Geusius fancies the Gibeonites had formerly used, and now propounded it to David, as a means to make the earth more fruitful, (De Victimis Humanis, par. i. cap. 14. p. 310, &c. and par. ii. cap. 14. p. 312.) which he imagines to be the reason why it is observed (ver. 2.) that the Gibeonites were "not of the children of Israel, but of the remnant of the Amorites:" to shew whence this horrid superstition proceeded; of which some tang still remained amongst them. The Vulgar here translates it, "ut crucifigamus eos," that we may crucify them. Which misled Serrarius and some others into this error, that crucifixion was a punishment anciently among the Jews: which Casaubon, Selden, and several other great men, have shewn to be false.

In Gibeah of Saul.] To make the punishment the more remarkable and shameful: this being the city where he lived, both before and after he was king, (1 Sam. x. 26. xi. 4.)

Whom the Lord did choose.] This aggravated his guilt, that he was so highly favoured by God, and yet obeyed not his commands: but spared the Amalekites, whom God commanded him to destroy; and killed these poor Gibeonites, whom he was bound by the oath of God to preserve.

And the king said, I will give them.] This seems to be contrary to the Divine law, (Deut. xxiv. 16.) that the son should not die for his father's fault. To which some of the Jewish doctors thought it sufficient to answer, "It is better that one letter should be taken out of the law, than that the name of God should be publicly profaned:" that is, that one precept, rather than an oath, should be broken. But there is no need of this; for, as Abarbinel judiciously observes, the law in Deuteronomy is to be understood of proceedings in human courts; not of the Divine judgments: for God visits the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation, (Exod. xx. 5.)

Ver. 7. And the king spared Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, the son of Saul, because of the Lord's oath that was between them, between David and Jonathan the son of Saul.] Not merely his affection to Jonathan, but his dread of breaking the oath he had made to him, moved him to preserve Mephibosheth; lest he himself should incur the same punishment which Saul fell under, for breaking the oath made to the Gibeonites.

Ver. 8. But the king took the two sons of Rizpah the daughter of Ajah.] Who was a concubine of Saul, as we read afterward, ver. 11.

Whom she bare unto Saul, Armoni and Mephibosheth.] After whose name, perhaps, Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan was called.

And five sons of Michal the daughter of Saul, whom she brought up.] In the Hebrew, whom she bare, i. e. which were born: according to an usual manner of speaking among the Hebrews; of which see Dr. Hammond upon Luke xvi. note b.

For Adriel.] It is plain from hence, that by was born is meant, as we translate it, was brought up. For Michal was not the wife of Adriel, but was given to Phaltiel, (1 Sam. xxv. 44.) Merab her elder sister being married to Adriel, (1 Sam. xviii. 19.) by whom she had these five sons, whom Michal brought up, and therefore they are called her children. Thus the Jews say, in the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 2. Merab brought them forth, and Michal educated them. And the like we read (as they allege for the proof of this) Gen. xxx. 3. l. 23. (See Selden, de Uxore Hebr. lib. i. cap. 6.) Kimchi also here alleges the words of the women in Ruth iv. 17. There is a son born to Naomi; who was not the mother of it, but only laid it in her bosom, and became nurse to it, as is said in the precedent verse. Thus also Rasi, Ralbag, and a great many other Jews, following the Chaldee paraphrase. And we have an example of this in the heathen writers. For Agamemnon and Menelaus are called sons of Atreus, because their father being dead, he took care to bring them up. So Eustathius on the second book of the Iliads: Plisthenes (who was their father) being dead, the youths being bred up by Atreus, αὐτοῦ παῖδες ἐκλήθησαν, they were called his children.

The son of Barzillai the Meholathite.] This last word is intended to distinguish him from the other Barzillai the Gileadite: for this was of the tribe of Benjamin, to which Abel-Meholah belonged.

Ver. 9. And he delivered them into the hands of the Gibeonites, and they hanged them in the hill before the Lord.] In a conspicuous place, where they might be seen by all that passed by. David did not command his officers to hang them up, but delivered them to the Gibeonites, that they might dispose of them as they pleased.

And they fell all seven together, and were put to death in the days of harvest, in the first days, in the beginning of barley-harvest.] That is, say the Jews, on the sixteenth of Nisan, a little after the Passover.

Ver. 10. And Rizpah the daughter of Ajah took sackcloth, and spread it for her upon the rock.] It is probable, she both made a tent of it to dwell in, and spread it upon the ground to lie upon.

From the beginning of harvest until water dropped upon them out of heaven.] From the sixteenth of Nisan (as the Hebrew doctors understand it) until the seventeenth of Marchesvan; that is, from the middle of our March to the middle of October; when God shewed he was reconciled, by sending showers down upon the earth; which might be, for any thing we know, in the middle of summer. And, indeed, Abarbinel thinks this opinion of their doctors is not true; but that the plain meaning is, they hung from the beginning of harvest until God was entreated for the land, and was pleased to send them rain; for want of which they suffered by famine. And he thinks it probable, that not long after they were hung up, they had plentiful showers by the good providence of God, though it was summer-time; whereby it appeared God was appeased: but by their hanging there several days, it is manifest this was not a legal punishment (and therefore David committed it to the Gibeonites, and did not execute it by his own officers), but an extraordinary one, inflicted by those who were not bound by that law, Deut. xxii. 24. which in this case was violated.

And suffered neither the birds of the air to rest on them by day, nor the beasts of the field by night.] She had servants no doubt to attend her, who kept a constant watch day and night to fright away the birds and beasts.

Ver. 11. And it was told David what Rizpah the daughter of Ajah, Saul's concubine, had done.] Which did not displease him, nor the Gibeonites neither (as far as appears), but was accounted a laudable thing, which excited David to the imitation of her. I observed before, that Saul had but one wife, and we read of no more than this one concubine, which shews his moderation in some things, which was praiseworthy.

Ver. 12. And David went and took the bones of Saul, and the bones of Jonathan his son, from the men of Jabesh-Gilead, which had stolen them from the street of Beth-shan, where the Philistines had hanged them, when the Philistines had slain Saul in Gilboa.] See 1 Sam. xxxi. 10. This noble act of Rizpah moved David to do some honour to the carcasses of her sons, and to the whole house of Saul: and for that end he sent for the bones of Saul and Jonathan, to inter them and those children of Saul's with their ancestors. Which piece of generosity demonstrated that he had no personal enmity to the family of Saul.

Ver. 13. And he brought up from thence the bones of Saul, and the bones of Jonathan his son.] From under the tree where they were buried in Jabesh, (1 Sam. xxxi. 13.)

And they gathered the bones of them that were hanged.] Which seems to have been done some time after they were taken down, when nothing but their bones remained; and then they had all seven an honourable interment, as it here follows.

Ver. 14. And the bones of Saul and of Jonathan his son.] Together with those now mentioned.

Buried they in the country of Benjamin in Zelah.] Which was in that tribe, (Josh. xviii. 28.)

In the sepulchre of Kish his father.] It was accounted very desirable to be buried with their parents, as appears by old Barzillai, (xix. 37.)

And they performed all that the king commanded.] They that were employed in this business gave them a solemn burial, with all the mourning that was usual in the funerals of kings; as the Hebrew doctors expound it.

And after that God was entreated for the land.] When satisfaction was given to the Gibeonites for the injuries done to them, God restored plenty to the country.

Ver. 15. Moreover, the Philistines had yet war again with Israel.] That is, after all the wars beforementioned in this book with the Philistines, they again disturbed David's repose in the latter end of his reign. Some, indeed, will have these wars to have been presently after the war with the Ammonites was ended; before the rebellion of Absalom. But Abarbinel, I think, well resolves, that the history of this war is not misplaced, but that it fell out not long after the famine beforementioned.

And David went down, and his servants with him.] It is not said where this battle was fought (as the place of the other three following is mentioned), but it is likely to have been near to the country of the Philistines; unto which David went down; for it lay low, towards the sea-side.

And fought against the Philistines: and David waxed faint.] Being in his declining years; or rather of a great age, and much worn out by various troubles and afflictions.

Ver. 16. And Ishbi-benob, which was of the sons of the giant.] That is, of Goliath; who by way of eminency is called the giant; though Bochartus thinks the Hebrew word rapha signifies any giant; and so these words should be translated, of the race of the giants, i. e. of the Anakims who fled into this country, particularly to Gath, when Joshua expelled them from Canaan, (Josh. xi. 22.)

(The weight of whose spear weighed three hundred shekels of brass in weight).] This is to be understood of the head of his spear, which weighed half as much as that of Goliath, (1 Sam. xvii. 7.)

He being girded with a new sword.] The word sword is not in the Hebrew; nor is there any thing remarkable in his having a new sword; therefore it should be translated, with a new kind of weapon, or rather, with a new belt; which had been bestowed upon him as a reward of some great exploit which he had done; or as a token of some new honour, or command, conferred upon him in the army. (See xviii. 11.)

Thought to have slain David.] Being stronger than he, and having him at an advantage; when, by some accident, he was separated from his army; as Josephus understands it.

Ver. 17. But Abishai succoured him.] Came in seasonably to his relief.

And smote the Philistine, and killed him.] The words leave it doubtful whether he was slain by Abishai or by David. Our translation seems to incline to the former; but if David was not the person that killed him, I do not see how that can be verified, which is said in the end of this chapter, that all these giants fell by the hand of David and of his servants; for he slew none of them, unless it were this.

Then the men of David sware to him, saying, Thou shalt go no more out with us to battle.] They had advised this before, when they went to fight with Absalom, (xviii. 3.) but now they peremptorily decreed it, and solemnly confirmed it with an oath.

That thou quench not the light of Israel.] Lest he should be killed, and thereby they should lose the glory of having such a king reign over them; for good kings are called the light of their people, 1 Kings xi. 36. xv. 4. because, by their wise government, conduct, and courage, they made their people happy and illustrious.

Ver. 18. And it came to pass after this, that there was a battle again with the Philistines at Gob.] Which was also called Gezer, as Abarbinel thinks, 1 Chron. xx. 4. Or, they were so near one another, that the battle was in the confines of both.

Then Sibbechai the Hushathite.] One of David's worthies, (1 Chron. xi. 29.)

Slew Saph, which was of the sons of the giant.] One of the same race of the Rephaims; who seem to be descended from the Anakims.

Ver. 19. And there was again a battle in Gob with the Philistines.] This was a place, it seems, very proper for armies to draw up in; for here they fought twice.

Where Elhanan the son of Jaare-oregim a Beth-lehemite.] He is simply called the son of Jair, 1 Chron. xx. 5. and is reckoned among David's worthies, 1 Chron. xi. 26. and there said to be the son of Dodo; who, I suppose, was his grandfather.

Slew the brother of Goliath the Gittite.] The word brother is supplied out of 1 Chron. xx. 5. where his name is said to be Lahmi.

The staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam.] See 1 Sam. xvii. 7.

Ver. 20. And there was yet a battle in Gath.] In the territory belonging to it.

Where was a man of great stature.] The LXX. translate it, a man of Madon: who was born, that is, in a place called by that name.

That had on every hand six fingers, and on every foot six toes, twenty-four in number.] If we may believe Tavernier, (in his relation of the Grand Signior's Seraglio, p. 95.) the eldest son of the emperor of Java, who reigned in the year 1648, when he was in that island, had six fingers on each hand, and as many toes on each foot; all of equal length.

And he also was born to the giant.] Was one of the Rephaim of that country.

Ver. 21. And when he defied Israel.] In imitation of the great giant Goliath, confiding, as he did, in his monstrous strength.

Jonathan the son of Shimeah, the brother of David, slew him.] We read of this brother of David in 1 Sam. xvi. 9. where he is called Shammah. But this son of his is not reckoned among David's worthies, 1 Chron. xi.

Ver. 22. These four were born to the giant in Gath.] Here Rapha seems to signify Goliath, the most famous giant; if one of them had not been his brother.

And fell by the hand of David, and by the hand of his servants.] The first of them was slain by David (Abishai assisting), the rest by the great men who were about him. (See ver. 17.)

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. AND David spake unto the Lord the words of this song, in the day that the Lord had delivered him out of the hand of his enemies.] It is commonly thought David penned this psalm towards the end of his life, after all the victories mentioned in the foregoing chapter. Thus Rasi, in the time of his old age, and Kimchi, in the conclusion of his day: but Abarbinel, who contends earnestly that all things fall out in the order wherein they are related in this book, is of a quite different opinion here; and will have it that he composed this song in his youth, in the midst of all his straits and difficulties; out of which, when God delivered him, he sung this song of praise unto him. So that by the words in the day that the Lord delivered him, he thinks is meant, that every time he received any deliverance from God, his usual method was to acknowledge it thankfully in the words of this song, which was composed at first for his own private use: but in the end of his days, he thought fit to communicate it to others; and therefore put it into the book of Psalms, that it might serve for the use of those which might be in the like straits, and receive the like mercies. And then also he reviewed it, and made several alterations in it; which, little and great, amount, as he observes, to seventy-four in number. And this he did, as he thinks, to make his meaning plainer; and that the people might not mistake it. And there is some ground for part of what he saith; for the eighteenth Psalm is directed to the chief musician, which shews it was then intended for public use: whereas here is nothing said of that, and therefore it is probable it remained for some time a piece of private devotion.

And out of the hand of Saul.] He may be thought to be comprehended under the name of his enemies: but they (as the same Abarbinel observes) were properly the people of other nations, who made war upon him; of whom he speaks in Psalm cxxxix. 21, 22. "Do not I hate them that hate thee, &c. I account them mine enemies." Now though Saul cruelly persecuted David, yet it did not become David to call him his enemy, and one that he hated: for he loved Saul, and therefore doth not number him among his enemies; but, in a particular manner, to distinguish him from them, adds, and out of the hand of Saul.

Ver. 2. And he said, The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer.

Ver. 3. The God of my rock; in him will I trust: he is my shield, and the horn of my salvation, my high tower, and my refuge, my saviour; thou savest me from violence.] This great heap of metaphors, as Strigelius observes, is a large paraphrase upon the first commandment, declaring God alone to be his confidence: in whom he placed all his strength, safety, security, and happiness. The consequence of which is, that we should love God with all our heart, and soul, and strength; (as Moses adds after that precept, Deut. vi. 4, 5. x. 12.) and therefore David adds that, when he reviewed this Psalm, and begins it thus; "I will love thee, O Lord, my strength," &c. Psal. xviii. 1. (See my paraphrase upon that Psalm, where I have sufficiently explained these verses.)

Ver. 4. I will call upon the Lord, who is worthy to be praised: so shall I be saved from mine enemies.] See in that Psalm, where there are the very same words. Upon which the forenamed Strigelius piously observes; That as the Πανοπλία of a soldier doth him no service, unless he put it on to defend himself and offend his enemy, so no protection or help from God is to be expected (who is so powerful as before described), unless we apply ourselves unto him by prayer and praises.

Ver. 5. When the waves of death compassed me about, and the floods of ungodly men made me afraid.] These words in this verse differ from the words in Psal. xviii. but the sense is the same: that he was in a sinking condition, and saw no way to escape; being overpowered by troops of ungodly men, who, like a torrent, threatened to sweep him away.

Ver. 6. The sorrows of hell compassed me about, and the snares of death prevented me.] He was so entangled in their snares, that he had no more power to help himself, than a dead man bound head and foot in his grave. For so the word sheol, which we translate hell, here signifies.

Ver. 7. In my distress I called upon the Lord, and cried to my God.] He did not despair when he was at this plunge, but made his addresses to Him who is omnipotent; most earnestly beseeching him to deliver him, as he had often done.

And he did hear my voice out of his temple, and my cry did enter into his ears.] There is very little difference between these words and those in Psalm xviii. The meaning of which is, that God gave him a gracious answer from his sanctuary, or from heaven (of which the sanctuary was a type), and shewed that he was sensibly touched with his affliction.

Ver. 8. Then the earth shook and trembled.] The terror which God struck into his enemies is compared to an earthquake: which makes every body tremble, as it did the gaoler, Acts xvi. 29.

The foundations of heaven moved and shook.] In Psalm xviii. the words are, the foundations of the hills: which explains what he here means by heaven; viz. mountains lifted up to heaven. Or, he represents the dread which fell upon his enemies, by the consternation which an earthquake causes, when it is accompanied with thunder, lightning, and hail from heaven, in a great tempest. We do not read that there were literally such storms, tempests, and earthquakes, for David's deliverance: but if there were, it need not seem strange, when profane history informs us of God's interposing after this manner in some cases. For Strigelius observes out of Livy, that in the eighth year of the second Punic war, when Hannibal and the Romans were drawn up in battle and ready to fight (upon which the fortune of the city of Rome depended), there fell such a shower of rain and hail, as confounded both armies: so that being scarce able to hold their arms they retreated unto their camps. And on the next day, in the very same place, the like tempest parted them: and as soon as they came into their camps, there was a wonderful serenity and tranquillity.

Because he was wroth.] Highly displeased at their enmity to David.

Ver. 9. There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured: coals were kindled at it.] These are very high metaphors, to express the most flaming degree of anger, and the dreadful effects of it.

Ver. 10. He bowed the heavens also, and came down; and darkness was under his feet.] The Divine Majesty appeared in a glorious cloud, descending from heaven; which at the bottom was all dark, but above bright and shining, with an amazing lustre.

Ver. 11. He rode upon a cherub.] To ride, in the Hebrew language (as Maimonides observes), is to rule, to govern, to manage with an absolute power, that on which one is said to ride; and to dispose of it as he pleases. (More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 70.) And therefore to ride upon a cherub, or to make the clouds his chariot (which is the very same, because angels were wont to appear in bright clouds), is to send his heavenly ministers whither he thinks good, to execute his pleasure.

And did fly.] Made haste to succour and relieve David, when he was in great distress.

And he was seen upon the wings of the wind.] A rapid wind shewed that he was present to overturn all opposition. (See 1 Sam. v. 24.)

Ver. 12. And he made darkness pavilions round about him, dark waters, and thick clouds of the skies.] This is still a description of the angelical powers, who surrounded him on all sides, as his ministers, ready to be employed, which way he thought fit to send them. For Andreas Cæsariensis truly observes, in his commentary on the Revelation, that whensoever we read in the sacred books of clouds, or thick darkness, we are always to understand, ὑπουργὸς τῶν θείων πραγμάτων, some ministry ready to serve in Divine affairs.

Ver. 13. Through the brightness before him were coals of fire kindled.] Those heavenly ministers going forth from his glorious presence, sent hailstones and lightnings (as in the days of Joshua, x. 11.) in the face of his enemies.

Ver. 14. The Lord thundered from heaven, the Most High uttered his voice.] Thunder is called the voice of God, in Psal. xxix. Which he sent forth in such terrible cracks, accompanied with flashes of fire, that quite daunted his enemies.

Ver. 15. He sent out arrows, and scattered them; lightning, and discomfited them.] These were the weapons whereby they were vanquished; lightnings were the darts and arrows that made them turn their backs and run away.

Ver. 16. And the channels of the sea appeared, the foundations of the world were discovered, at the rebuking of the Lord, at the blast of the breath of his nostrils.] This is the description of a great earthquake, which rent it in sunder, and made such breaches in it, that the very bottom of it was discovered. And this was the effect of God's just indignation against his enemies.

Ver. 17. He sent from above, he took me.] He sent his angels to rescue and protect David.

He drew me out of many waters.] Delivered him from innumerable dangers; compared to waters breaking out upon a country, to overflow it.

Ver. 18. He delivered me from my strong enemy.] First from Goliath, and afterward from many others, as we read in the foregoing chapter, xxi. 16, 17, &c.

And from them that hated me.] The Philistines, the Syrians, and other nations, whose hatred to him made them set themselves against him, to destroy him.

For they were too strong for me.] Their forces were more numerous than his, and would have overpowered him, if the Lord had not been his helper.

Ver. 19. They prevented me in the day of my calamity; but the Lord was my stay.] When he was in a weak condition, unable to defend himself, Saul suddenly came upon him, and had destroyed him, if the Lord had not been his support. (See 1 Sam. xxii. 9. xxiii. 14. 26. xxiv. 2, 3, &c.)

Ver. 20. He brought me forth also into a large place.] When his house, for instance, was beset by Saul's officers, who watched to kill him as he came out in the morning, he escaped by the help of his wife, and got to Samuel and Ramah, where he was at liberty to go whither he pleased. (1 Sam. xix. 11. 18.)

He delivered me, because he delighted in me.] In many other straits he afterward delivered him; because he had a kindness for him, and resolved to make him king of Israel.

Ver. 21. The Lord rewarded me according to my righteousness; according to the cleanness of my hands hath he recompensed me.] God knew also that he was innocent of what he was accused; and had no design to do Saul any hurt. (1 Sam. xxiv. 11, 12, &c. xxvi. 23.)

Ver. 22. For I have kept the ways of the Lord, and have not wickedly departed from my God.] He took no unlawful courses to preserve himself; but when Saul fell into his hands, he would not hurt him, because he was God's anointed. (See there, 1 Sam. xxiv. 11—13. and xxvi. 19, &c.)

Ver. 23. For all his judgments were before me.] He made God's commands the rule of his actions.

And as for his statutes, I did not depart from them.] In Psal. xviii. the words are, I did not put away his statutes from me: that is, bid them stand aside, and give way to his interest; but strictly observed them.

Ver. 24. I was also upright before him, and kept myself from mine iniquity.] This is still spoken with respect to Saul. For though he offended afterward grievously against God's laws, yet he chose rather to suffer any thing than do Saul any harm; and nothing could tempt him to that iniquity, unto which he was invited by fair opportunities, (1 Sam. xxiv. 4. xxvi. 8, &c.)

Ver. 25. Therefore the Lord has recompensed me according to my righteousness; according to my cleanness in his eye-sight.] According to David's prayer; which is very remarkable, 1 Sam. xxvi. 23. where he desires God to deal with him as he had dealt with Saul, with whose blood he would not defile his hands, when it was in his power to take revenge.

Ver. 26. With the merciful thou wilt shew thyself merciful, and with the upright man thou wilt shew thyself upright.] This is the common method of God's providence, to do good to those that do good to others: and to do them justice, who do not swerve from the rules of righteousness, when they are injuriously treated by their neighbours.

Ver. 27. With the pure thou wilt shew thyself pure.] Faithfully keep his promises to those who are faithful to him.

And with the froward thou wilt shew thyself unsavoury.] Declare how much he distastes and abhors those that take deceitful courses to bring about their ends. In Psal. xviii. the words are, with the froward thou wilt shew thyself froward; that is, he ensnares those in their own devices, who perversely take crooked ways to compass their designs: which unexpectedly end in their destruction.

Ver. 28. And the afflicted people thou wilt save: but thine eyes are upon the haughty, that thou mayest bring them down.] He is wont to deliver poor helpless people, who humbly depend on him, and not on any unlawful means for safety: but he contrives ways to lay those low who (proud of their power) insolently oppress them.

Ver. 29. For thou art my lamp, O Lord; and the Lord will lighten my darkness.] David himself was an instance of this; whom from a despicable, God raised to an illustrious condition: and when he concluded he should perish, (1 Sam. xxvii. 1.) advanced him to royal splendour and greatness.

Ver. 30. For by thee I have run through a troop: by my God I have leaped over a wall.] Now he seems to celebrate the wonderful works of God, after the persecution of Saul was over, and he was made king. When numerous enemies assaulted him; but he broke and scattered them all. And particularly (which seems to be meant by the last words) he scaled the highest walls, whereby his enemies thought themselves securely defended. (See chap. v. of this book, ver. 6, 7, &c.)

Ver. 31. As for God, his way is perfect.] By the way of God, here seems to be meant his counsels, proceedings, and methods of his providence: which for the present may appear to us perplexed, but in the issue will be seen to be perfectly just, and agreeable to his promises; as it here follows.

The word of the Lord is tried.] The experience of all good men tells us, that he never failed to be true to his word: which is freer from all deceit, than the most refined gold is from dross.

He is a buckler to all them that trust in him.] So that none can hurt those that put themselves under his protection, with a pious confidence in him.

Ver. 32. For who is God, save the Lord?] For none can defeat his intentions, or resist his will.

And who is a rock save our God?] There are none so powerful, as to be able to hurt those whom he will protect; or to defend those whom he will destroy. Of this word rock, see Deut. xxxii. 4. 31.

Ver. 33. God is my strength and power.] What great men would Scipio and others have been, if they had been possessed with such a sense of God, as to have acknowledged that all their courage, and conduct, and mighty victories were owing to his power. But no warrior was ever like to David, who had God in all his thoughts, and acknowledged all his great acts to be performed by the Divine aid.

And he maketh my way perfect.] Removed all obstacles out of his way, to the completing of his conquests. (See v. 10.)

Ver. 34. He maketh my feet like hinds' feet.] This is commonly thought to relate to the swiftness of hinds; and so I have taken it in my paraphrase on the Psalms: but Bochartus hath made it probable, that it hath respect to the firmness of their treading; which is very remarkable, as he shews in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 17.

And setteth me upon my high places.] He was enabled to pursue his enemies with great celerity, and without tripping: even unto such places, as for their height and cragginess were thought inaccessible.

Ver. 35. He teaches my hands to war; so that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms.] He ascribes all his strength and dexterity to God: who enabled him to wrest the strongest bow out of his enemies' hands, and break it in pieces.

Ver. 36. Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation.] And when he was in great dangers, God protected him: as he did in the battle mentioned in the foregoing chapter, (ver. 16, 17.) when Ishbi-benob had slain him, if Abishai had not stepped in for his timely succour.

And thy gentleness hath made me great.] These wonderful deliverances he could ascribe to nothing but the tender mercy of God to him, when he was unworthy of his favour.

Ver. 37. Thou hast enlarged my steps under me; so that my feet did not slip.] When he was in great straits, and beset with difficulties, God opened a wide passage; and made all things succeed according to his desire. For that seems to be meant by his feet did not slip, but he went on smoothly.

Ver. 38. I have pursued mine enemies, and destroyed them; and turned not again till I had consumed them.] He got complete victories over the Philistines, Moabites, Syrians, and Ammonites. (See chap. viii. and x. of this book.)

Ver. 39. I have consumed them, and wounded them, that they could not arise.] Gave them such a blow, that they were not able to renew the fight.

Yea, they are fallen under my feet.] Submitted themselves unto him and served him. (See x. 19.)

Ver. 40. For thou hast girded me with strength to the battle: them that rose up against me hast thou subdued under me.] This was remarkably fulfilled in the rebellion of Absalom; when he was in a feeble condition, and had but few followers: but God gave them courage to fight, and such success in the battle, that they routed his army; and all Israel was brought under his obedience. (See chap. xviii.)

Ver. 41. Thou hast also given me the necks of my enemies, that I might destroy them that hate me.] This also was literally fulfilled, when Sheba raised a new rebellion; and his head was thrown over the wall of Abel to Joab, (chap. xx.)

Ver. 42. They looked, but there was none to save.] In Psal. xviii. it is, they cried: which may signify, that they sought for help from their allies and confederates: but to no purpose.

Even unto the Lord, but he answered them not.] And it was too late, when other help failed them, to seek for help from God: for he had deserted them, and would not hear their prayers.

Ver. 43. Then did I beat them as small as the dust of the earth.] In Psal. xviii. the words are, as the dust before the wind. He so entirely vanquished them, that they had no more power than the small dust of the earth: which is tossed up and down with every blast of wind.

I did stamp them as the mire of the street, and did spread them abroad.] In the forenamed Psalm, I did cast them out as the dirt in the street: that is, made them as contemptible as the dirt in the street, which every one tramples under his feet.

Ver. 44. Thou hast also delivered me from the strivings of the people, thou hast made me the head of the heathen.] The first part of these words relates to the union of the people of Israel and Judah under his government, after long contentions between them, (v. 1, 2, &c.) The other part to the enlargement of his kingdom, by subduing his neighbouring heathen people under him, (chap. viii. 10.)

A people whom I have not known shall serve me.] Such as the Syrians of Zobah, and Rehob, and Ish-tob, and Maacah: of which David, it is likely, had no knowledge, till they came to help the Ammonites, (x. 8.)

Ver. 45. Strangers shall submit themselves unto me: as soon as they hear, they shall be obedient to me.] The very report of his victories made some heartily submit themselves unto him: and others dissembled their hostility, and offered him their service, (x. 19.)

Ver. 46. Strangers shall fade away.] Fall as withered leaves do from the trees.

They shall be afraid out of their close places.] Distrusting their strong holds, that they came creeping out with fear, to surrender up themselves into his hands.

Ver. 47. The Lord liveth; and blessed be my rock.] To him he desires all the praise may be ascribed; in whose eternal power alone he still confided.

And exalted be the God of the rock of my salvation.] He desires again the Lord might be magnified with the highest praises: who had not only preserved him from perishing, but exalted him to be king of Israel. For so the last words are in the Hebrew, exalted be God, the rock of my salvation. Who safely preserved and delivered him; and now advanced him most graciously to the highest dignity.

Ver. 48. It is God that avengeth me, and that bringeth down the people under me.] He did not avenge himself, but left it to God to plead his cause: who not only punished those that were injurious to him, but brought many nations under his empire.

Ver. 49. And that bringeth me forth from mine enemies: thou also hast lifted me up on high above them that rose up against me.] In these words David made some small alteration, when he inserted this hymn into the book of Psalms for public use. Of which, Abarbinel endeavours to give a reason; but he seems too curious in his observations. The plainest and most certain of which is this; that the first part of these words respect the nations whom he subdued; who were properly his enemies: and the latter the children of Israel, when they rose up against him to dethrone him.

Thou hast delivered me from the violent man.] After he had delivered him from Saul, who violently persecuted him a long time.

Ver. 50. Therefore will I give thanks unto thee, O Lord, among the heathen, and I will sing praises unto thy name.] He resolved to make his thankful acknowledgments unto God every where: so as to make those nations whom he had subdued sensible that he ascribed all his victories unto him. In honour of whom he would sing this perpetual song.

Ver. 51. He is the tower of salvation for his king.] As he was a king by God's appointment, and not by usurpation; so he trusted in him for the support of his authority.

And sheweth mercy unto his anointed, unto David, and to his seed for evermore.] And he hoped the same mercy which had promoted him to this dignity, would be continued to him and to his posterity till the coming of the great king Messiah: whose kingdom shall have no end. (See vii. 12, 13.)

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. NOW these are the last words of David.] He spake other words recorded in the next chapter, and in the next book, before he died: but these were the last words that he spake by the Holy Ghost, as Abarbinel expounds them. Who observes, that after he had composed the book of Psalms, and added the hymn mentioned in the foregoing chapter unto it, then he spake these words; after which the influence of the Holy Spirit resided on him no more. The Chaldee paraphrase (which was always highly esteemed by the Jews) takes these words, as if they were a prophecy of the Messiah: for so it expounds them; These are the words of the prophecy of David, which he prophesied of the consummation of all things, in the day of consolation, which is to come.

David the son of Jesse said.] He remembers his low condition, when God was pleased to make choice of him to be a king.

The man who was raised up on high.] From feeding his father's sheep, to rule the people of Israel.

The anointed of the God of Jacob.] The Chaldee hath it, Anointed by the Word of the God of Jacob.

The sweet Psalmist of Israel, said.] Who was inspired to compose many delightful hymns in the praises of God.

Ver. 2. The Spirit of God spake by me, and his word was in my tongue.] He would not have those hymns, nor what he spake now, looked upon as human compositions: but as proceeding from a Divine influence, conferred upon him by the Holy Ghost.

Ver. 3. The God of Israel said, the Rock of Israel spake to me.] By Nathan or by Samuel.

He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God.] Or, as we render it in the margin, Be thou ruler over, &c. which the Chaldee expounds of the Messiah in this manner, The faithful God spake (so he interprets the word Rock), I will constitute to me a king, he is the Messiah, who shall arise, and reign in the fear of the Lord. But this relates first to David, the type of Christ; who was taught to rule justly, and in the fear of God: that is, in the exact observance of all the Divine laws. Or, as Abarbinel interprets it, When he that rules men is just, then the fear of the Lord will rule and have dominion in the earth: for all the people are apt to tread in the steps of their king: so that when he that rules is just, it is as if he did not rule, but the fear of the Lord ruled in the earth.

Ver. 4. And he shall be as the light of the morning when the sun ariseth.] The dominion of the just (as the same Abarbinel interprets it) shall be as the morning light, when the sun ariseth, and the light continually increases.

Even a morning without clouds.] Which hinder the rays of the sun from piercing through unto the earth.

As the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain.] We have in this translation quite transposed the Hebrew words, where they run thus, From splendour and from rain, grass out of the earth. The sense of which Abarbinel thinks is this, It shall be such a morning, in which there is sometimes sunshine, and sometimes showers of rain, to make grass spring out of the earth.

Ver. 5. Although my house be not so with God, yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure.] Which he thus interprets; Although the kingdom of a just man, by little and little, grows and increases; and sometimes is clouded, and sometimes the light shines upon it: the kingdom of David shall not be so, but God hath made a perpetual covenant, &c.

For this is all my salvation, and all my desire, although he makes it not to grow.] Or, as he interprets it, This is all my salvation, and my desire, that he would not make it grow or shoot up (for that supposes it to be buried), but that, as was said before, it may always remain in an equal manner ordered and conserved.

It must be acknowledged, that there are no words so obscure in this book as these two verses. The sense of which Ludovicus de Dieu seems to me to have most clearly opened:—The stability and perpetuity of his kingdom, saith he, David amplifies by a comparison from three natural things, which are very grateful to men, but not constant and stable; in a settled order and sure. For the sun arises, but goes down again; and the morning may be clear, but clouds afterward arise; and the tender grass springs up, but withers away. Not so, saith he, is my kingdom before God. It is flourishing, like all these, but perpetual: for he hath made an everlasting covenant with me; though some afflictions have befallen me; and he hath not made all my salvation and desire to grow. So he makes the first caph of similitude to stand for three; and to be repeated thrice in this manner:—

"The God of Israel said, the Rock of Israel spake concerning me; The just man ruleth among men: he ruleth in the fear of God. And as the sun ariseth, with a shining light; as the morning is without clouds, by reason of its splendour; as from rain the tender grass springs out of the earth: yet (or truly) so is not my house with God. Because he hath made an everlasting covenant with me; disposed in all things, and well kept and preserved in that order. Although he doth not make all my salvation and desire to grow (that is, though some adversities happen to me and my family), yet that always remains, which, in the covenant of God made with me, is in all things orderly, disposed, and preserved."

Ver. 6. But the sons of Belial shall be all of them as thorns thrust away, because they cannot be taken with hands.] The kingdom of impious men shall not be like the kingdom of the house of David: being so far from being like to grass, which is useful, that they are rather like thorns: which are rejected as hurtful and pernicious. That is, such wicked men are not fit for human society.

Ver. 7. But the man that shall touch them must be fenced with iron, and with the staff of a spear.] If any body will meddle with them, it must be at his peril. For so the word jimmale (which we translate fenced) signifies shall be filled, with the iron and the staff of a spear. Spears are never used to cut down thorns; but iron gives one a sore wound, like that which a man receives from a spear, when it runs into his body, iron and wood withal. So the same De Dieu very judiciously.

And they shall be utterly burnt with fire in the same place.] Therefore men burn them with fire, in the same place where they grow: and so wicked men are destroyed, where they think themselves most secure. Which the Targum applies to the judgment of the great day, saying, Their punishment is in the hand of man; but they shall be burnt up utterly, when the house of the great judgment appears: that they may sit on the throne of judgment, to judge the world.

Ver. 8. These be the names of the mighty men whom David had.] Now follows a catalogue of those valiant men who helped to raise David to his dignity, and preserve him in it: being continually with him in all his wars. There is a list of them in 1 Chron. xi. very different from this in several things. But Abarbinel thinks that it creates no difficulty, if we do but observe, that there he distinguishes them into three classes: those that had always been with him; and they that came to him to Ziklag, a little before he was made king of Judah; and they that came to him to Hebron, after he was made king of all Israel. All whose memories were fit to be preserved: but here, in this book, the Divine writer intended only to mention the most excellent heroes, who were always with him in his wars: and for whose sake he composed the precedent song of praises to God.

The Tachmonite that sat in the seat.] Or, as it is translated in the margin, Josheb-boshebat the Tachmonite: for so he is called in 1 Chron. xi. 11. Ishobeam; which may well be thought the same name abbreviated. He sat in the seat (as we translate it here) in the council of war; next to Joab: being, it is thought, his lieutenant-general. For that he was one of the Sanhedrin, who sat in the seat of judgment, as some would have it, is not probable: though it is likely these were men of great wisdom as well as valour: and this man being called a Chachmonite, Abarbinel thinks it was because he was a man of learning, being given to study as well as fighting; for in Hebrew the word chacham signifies a wise man: as this was no question in military affairs, if not in affairs of state, and other sorts of wisdom.

Chief among the captains.] The principal commander, as I said, under Joab. Who is not here mentioned, though he was a great man, inferior to none of these: but had stained himself by the base murder of two great persons, Abner and Amasa. Which some take to be the reason why he had not the honour to be put into the number of those worthies who served David.

(The same was Adino the Ezrite).] It is thought he had two names, and was of the family of the Ezrites: though Abarbinel will have his name to have been Adinohaezri.

He lift up his spear.] These words are supplied out of 1 Chron. xi. 11.

Against eight hundred, whom he slew at one time.] In that place of the Chronicles it is said he killed three hundred: that is, after the slaughter he made in one battle of eight hundred; but killed in another (as Kimchi understands it) three hundred.

Ver. 9. And after him was Eleazar the son of Dodo the

Ahohite, one of the three mighty men with David.] He was a Benjamite, for Ahoah was one of his sons, (1 Chron. viii. 4.)

When they defied the Philistines.] As Goliath had done the Israelites, (1 Sam. xvii. 1.)

That were there gathered together to battle.] In Pasdammim, as we read 1 Chron. xi. 17. which is the same with Ephes-dammim, 1 Sam. xvii. 1.

And the men of Israel were gone away.] Fled from before the Philistines, as it is explained 1 Chron. xi. 13.

Ver. 10. He arose, and smote the Philistines until his hand was weary.] With the slaughter that he made.

And his hand clave unto his sword.] Being all besmeared with blood; which drying by the heat of it, made the sword cleave to his hand.

And the Lord wrought a great victory that day.] Like that of Shamgar, Judg. iii. ult. and of Samson, xv. 13. where I have shewn these are not incredible stories; God inspiring men with wonderful courage, and striking a terror into their enemies. There were men in ancient times of prodigious strength, mentioned by Pliny, lib. vii. Nat. Histor. cap. 20.

And the people returned after him only to spoil.] They that fled rallied again, when they saw the wonders he did: and followed after him, not to fight, but only to partake of the spoil.

Ver. 11. And after him was Shammah the son of Agee the Hararite.] Who is not expressly mentioned in the book of the Chronicles; but plainly implied to be engaged in this great action. For it is said, 1 Chron. xi. 14. that they set themselves, &c. that is, Shammah and Eleazar, who joined in this enterprise. But this place in Samuel teaches us, that Shammah, the son of Agee, had the chief hand in it: and therefore it is ascribed to him.

And the Philistines were gathered together into a troop.] Or, as we translate it in the margin, for forage. For so Ralbag interprets the Hebrew word chajja (which Kimchi takes to be a city), that they came to get some sustenance out of the field.

Where was a piece of ground full of lentiles.] In the Chronicles it is, full of barley. In which there is no difficulty, one part of the field being sown with lentiles, and the other part with barley.

And the people fled from the Philistines.] Fearing to defend the place.

Ver. 12. But he stood in the midst of the ground, and defended it, and slew the Philistines.] So that they could neither burn the corn, nor carry it away, nor tread it down.

And the Lord wrought a great victory.] By his hand: who was one of the three most mighty men, though not particularly named in the book of the Chronicles. It being the manner of the Scripture, as the Jews observe, to propound that briefly in one place, which hath been at large explained in another: as this action of Shammah is here in this book.

Ver. 13. And three of the thirty chiefs.] Or, as it is in the margin, three captains over the thirty. Not the three beforementioned, but the three that follow: who were not so great as the first three; but yet greater than any of the thirty whom they commanded.

Went down, and came to David in the harvest-time.] Or rather, as the Hebrew words are, at harvest. That is, saith Abarbinel, the Philistines came to destroy the fruits of the earth, that they might famish the Israelites: whereupon David raised an army to protect and defend them in reaping of their harvest when they went about it.

Unto the cave of Adullam.] A place where he had hid himself under the persecution of Saul, (1 Sam. xxii. 1.) and where he now fortified himself against the Philistines: who in the beginning of his reign came with great forces against him. For it is plain from 1 Chron. xi. 15. that there was a rock or strong hold there.

And the troop of the Philistines pitched in the valley of Rephaim.] See 2 Sam. v. 17, 18.

Ver. 14. And David was then in the hold.] As in the place abovementioned; near Adullam, (1 Sam. xxii. 4.)

And the garrison of the Philistines was then in Beth-lehem.] They had possessed themselves of this place, and put a garrison into it.

Ver. 15. And David longed, and said, Oh that one would give me drink of the waters of Beth-lehem, which are by the gate!] The weather being very hot (as it used to be in harvest-time), David was very thirsty, and said to some about him, how glad he should be of a draught of the waters of Beth-lehem: where he was born, and had lived a long time; and therefore had been accustomed to them, and knew how very pleasant and refreshing they were. But he did not speak this, as Abarbinel observes, to the end that any men should venture their lives, to fetch him some of this water.

Ver. 16. And the three mighty men brake through the host of the Philistines, and drew water out of the well of Beth-lehem, that was by the gate, and brought it to David.] This they did without David's knowledge; and the forenamed author observes three wonderful things in this action. First, that three men could break through the whole host of the Philistines: and when they had so done, durst stay to draw water out of the well: and then carry it away with a high hand, through the same host, and bring it to David. To which he might have added a fourth thing, that they attempted this at the very gate of Beth-lehem: where, no doubt, the garrison of the Philistines kept the strongest guard.

Nevertheless he would not drink thereof, but poured it out unto the Lord.] Not in that place, where it was brought to him: but kept it (as Abarbinel thinks) till he had opportunity to go to the altar, and there poured it out unto God. Some fancy that now was the feast of tabernacles, when they used to draw water, and pour it out: and David made use of this for that purpose. (See 1 Sam. vii. 6.) There are mystical senses which the Jews please themselves withal about this water, with which I shall not trouble the reader.

Ver. 17. And he said, Be it far from me, O Lord, that I should do this: is not this the blood of the men that went in jeopardy of their lives? therefore he would not drink it.] He looked upon it no longer as water, but as the blood of those men who fetched it with the peril of their lives: and the blood of every thing belonged to the Lord; and was proper to be offered unto him. Some carry this so far to another sense, that they imagine David hereby shewed it was not material water he longed for; but the Messiah, who had the water of life. Who he knew should be born at Beth-lehem: which the Philistines therefore should not be able to destroy.

These things did these three mighty men.] They all joined in this hazardous exploit: but now follows what they did singly.

Ver. 18. And Abishai the brother of Joab, the son of Zeruiah, was chief among three.] The chief of those three mighty men beforementioned. (See 1 Chron. xi. 20.)

And he lifted up his spear against three hundred, and slew them, and had the name among three.] That is, was most eminent and famous of those three.

Ver. 19. Was he not most honourable of them? therefore he was their captain.] That is, no doubt, he was worthy to be the leader of them.

Ver. 20. And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, the son of a valiant man of Kabzeel.] He was descended from valiant ancestors: whom he far excelled. Kabzeel was in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 21.)

Who had done many acts.] As Abishai also had done (for he succoured David when a giant had like to have killed him), but their greatest acts only are here mentioned.

He slew two lion-like men of Moab.] The Hebrew word ariel signifies a lion of God, that is, a great lion. And it was the name among the Moabites for a very valiant man; who at this day, among the Arabians, is called Assedollabi, a lion of God, as Bochartus hath observed out of a great many authors in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 1.

He went down also and slew a lion in the midst of a pit in time of snow.] This action was the greater, because in the time of snow lions are fiercer for want of prey, and are then also fullest of heat and vigour. But it is not likely that Benaiah went to encounter this lion merely to shew his bravery; but, as some think, this was a lion that had done much mischief to the country; which moved him to expose himself to this combat with it. But Bochartus doth not think this likely; for he needed not have hazarded his life, but have called others unto his assistance, to destroy this ravenous beast. He thinks, therefore, that in a deep snow, the lion took shelter in a cave (for so the word we translate pit sometimes signifies), and that Benaiah being abroad in that snowy season, came into the same place to defend himself from the severity of the weather; where he was necessitated to enter into a combat with the lion; whom he found there, and came with open mouth to devour him. He compares him to Alexander the Great, upon whom a lion of great bigness running, he gave him such a wound as killed him. So did Lysimachus with another. (See Hieroz. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 5.) Abarbinel observes three great things in this action. First, that he slew a lion, which is the fiercest of all wild beasts: secondly, he slew him in a pit, where he could not turn himself as he pleased: and, thirdly, in a time of snow, when his hands and feet were cold and numb; which hindered their vital operations.

Ver. 21. And he slew an Egyptian, a goodly man.] A person of great stature. (See 1 Chron. xi. 23.)

And the Egyptian had a spear in his hand.] See there.

And he went down with a staff.] Such as men used to walk with.

And plucked the spear out of the Egyptian's hand, and slew him with his own spear.] This shews him to have been both a fearless person, and of great skill and dexterity, in managing a combat either with man or beast.

Ver. 22. These things did Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and had the name among the three mighty men.] Who the third was is not said plainly, either here or in the book of the Chronicles.

Abarbinel thinks he might possibly join with the other two, but did no mighty matter by himself; and so is not mentioned. But perhaps Adina, the son of Shiza, might be the third; because it is said, 1 Chron. xi. 42. that he was "a captain of the Reubenites, and thirty with him." Which seems to signify that he was above the thirty, as Abishai and Benaiah were.

Ver. 23. He was more honourable than the thirty, but he attained not to the first three.] Was not comparable to Adino, and Eleazar, and Shammah, who were like lions; as these were like lions' whelps, as Strigelius glosses.

And David set him over his guard.] See chap. viii. 18.

Ver. 24. And Asahel, the brother of Joab, was one of the thirty.] Now follow the names of thirty valiant men, but not equal to the worthies beforenamed. Asahel seems to have been the chief of the thirty; and so some translate the words, he was above the thirty: and so might be the last of the three of the second order of worthies.

Elhanan the son of Dodo of Beth-lehem.] Concerning whom we find nothing recorded but this: That he was born and bred (it is likely) in the same place with David.

Ver. 25. Shammah the Harodite, Elika the Harodite.] The first of these is called Shammoth in 1 Chron. xi. 27. and he is said to be an Harorite. Which is a very small variation, resch being put in the place of daleth, as is very common in Scripture, according to the various pronunciation of words in divers parts of the country. There is a greater difference in the name that follows, and in many others; it being common, as Abarbinel observes, for men to have two names. But it is plain the same persons are here mentioned that are in the book of Chronicles; though there (as he notes) are more added. For the author of that book reckons up all the chief commanders in the army; so that, though they were not heroical persons in themselves, yet, being great commanders over others, Ezra thought fit to mention them. But here, in the book of Samuel, the prophet only numbers those that were of themselves great heroes, not minding the chief commanders in the army who were not so.

Ver. 26. Helez the Paltite, Ira the son of Ikketh the Tekoite.] None of the memorable acts of these, or of the following worthies, are recorded; therefore all that I can say of them is this: That when God intended to raise a king to a great height, as he did David, he raised up the spirits of several great men to assist him. Thus he did with Alexander the Great, who had Clitus, Parmenio, Antigonus, Ptolemæus, Seleucus, Craterus, and other brave men to accompany him in all his enterprises; but David (it may be truly observed), in a less kingdom, had far more.

Ver. 27. Abiezer the Anethothite, Mebunnai the Hushathite.

Ver. 28. Zalmon the Ahohite, Maharai the Netophathite.

Ver. 29. Heleb the son of Baanah a Netophathite, Ittai the son of Ribai out of Gibeah of the children of Benjamin.

Ver. 30. Benaiah the Pirathonite, Hiddai of the brooks of Gaash.

Ver. 31. Abi-albon the Arbathite, Azmaveth the Barhumite.

Ver. 32. Eliahba the Shaalbonite; of the sons of Jashen, Jonathan.

Ver. 33. Shammah the Hararite, Ahiam the son of Sharar the Hararite.

Ver. 34. Eliphelet the son of Ahasbai, the son of the Maachathite, Eliam the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite.

Ver. 35. Hezrai the Carmelite, Paarai the Arbite.

Ver. 36. Igal the son of Nathan of Zobah, Bani the Gadite.

Ver. 37. Zelek the Ammonite, Naharai the Beerothite, armour-bearer to Joab the son of Zeruiah.

Ver. 38. Ira an Ithrite, Gareb an Ithrite.

Ver. 39. Uriah the Hittite: thirty and seven in all.] Here are only thirty and six named; therefore Joab is supposed, by Abarbinel, to be the other; who was the head of them all.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. AND again the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel.] Because they had followed Absalom, says Abarbinel, and afterward Sheba the son of Bichri: for which they had not been yet sufficiently punished. But it is more likely, it was for their luxury, now that plenty was restored to them, after the sore famine that fell upon them upon the score of the Gibeonites.

And he moved David against them.] Or, David was moved; that is, by Satan, as it is expounded in the first book of the Chronicles, xxi. 1. But Abarbinel thinks it is as if he had said, The anger of the Lord, which was kindled against Israel, moved David, &c. That is, the same sin which made God angry with Israel, was the cause that David was seduced in this thing, that they might be punished.

To say, Go, number Israel and Judah.] To give command that an account should be taken of the number of all the people.

Ver. 2. For the king said to Joab the captain of the host.] Accordingly it no sooner came into his heart, but he gave orders about it to the principal commander of his army.

Which was with him] Who always, when they were in war, attended on him.

Go now through all the tribes of Israel, from Dan even to Beer-sheba.] From one end of the country to the other. For Dan (as I have before observed) was the utmost bounds of it in the north, as Beer-sheba was in the south.

And number ye the people, that I may know the number of the people.] Joab was to take proper officers with him, to assist him in this business; so that there might be an exact account given. (See ver. 4.)

Ver. 3. And Joab said unto the king, Now the Lord thy God add unto the people (how many soever they be) a hundred-fold, and that the eyes of my lord the king may see it.] It appears by this, that Joab was a great courtier, as well as a great captain, who knew how to divert the king from what he did not like, if good words and wishes would have done it.

But why doth my lord the king delight in this thing?] For which he thought there was no reason; and as it would be troublesome and chargeable, so there might be much danger in it; as he expresses it in 1 Chron. xxi. 3.

Ver. 4. Notwithstanding the king's word prevailed against Joab, and against the captains of the host.] Who joined, it seems, with Joab to divert the king from this purpose: in which he was fixed and immoveable.

And Joab and the captains of the host went out from the presence of the king to number the people of Israel.] It is most likely, that their inferior officers went with the captains to expedite the business.

Ver. 5. And they passed over Jordan.] They went first into the eastern part of the country; and so by the northern coasts to the west; and then to the south.

And pitched in Aroer.] These words seem to import, that they pitched their tents in the field; and thither summoned the neighbouring towns to come into them; which was very troublesome, and at last proved grievous; as appears by the book of Chronicles.

On the right side of the city that lieth in the midst of the river of Gad, and towards Jazer.] We no where read of such a river; which, in the margin, is translated the valley of Gad. But Jazer was a town in that tribe, (Numb. xxxii. 35.)

Ver. 6. And they came to Gilead, and to the land of Tahtim-hodshi.] It is in vain to seek after this land, which is not mentioned in the book of Joshua, but it is likely was near to Gilead; and had been lately recovered, some think, from other people, and now inhabited by the Israelites. (See the margin of our Bibles.)

And they came to Dan-jaan, and about to Zidon.] Not to the city of Zidon, for that was not in their power, but to the coast about it.

Ver. 7. And came to the strong hold of Tyre.] To the territory near it.

And to all the cities of the Hivites, and Canaanites.] Who lived in those north-west parts of the country.

And they went out to the south of Judah.] Having taken account of all the towns upon the sea-coast (which was in the west), they turned to the south, into the tribe of Judah.

Even to Beer-sheba.] Which was in the utmost limits of the country on that side.

Ver. 8. So when they had gone through all the land.] But not numbered all the people; for the work grew so tedious, that they omitted Levi and Benjamin, as we read 1 Chron. xxi. 6.

They came to Jerusalem at the end of nine months and twenty days.] They could not well dispatch it in less time; an account being to be taken of every city and village in the whole country.

Ver. 9. And Joab gave up the number of the people unto the king.] All the officers brought in their particular sums to Joab; who cast them up, and they amounted in all to the number following.

And there were in Israel eight hundred thousand valiant men that drew the sword.] They did not, it seems, reckon women and children, and old men; nor such as were not fit for war.

And the men of Judah were five hundred thousand men.] There is a great difference between this account and that in the Chronicles. For there (1 Chron. xxi. 5.) the men of Israel are said to be three hundred thousand more than are here mentioned; and, on the contrary, the men of Judah are said to be thirty thousand less. Of the former of which there is a plain account, that in this book the standing legions are not numbered: which were very well known, they serving under twelve commanders so many months;

(1 Chron. xxvii. 1, &c.) but in the book of the Chronicles all these are taken into the number there mentioned. For the Jews observe in Halicoth Olam, that there being twenty-four thousand who waited every month (which makes in all two hundred eighty-eight thousand), allowing a thousand officers (as we cannot well allow less) to every twenty-four thousand, there will be the twelve thousand wanting; which, added to the eight hundred eighty-eight thousand, make just three hundred thousand: which, added to the eight hundred thousand here mentioned, make up the eleven hundred thousand mentioned in the Chronicles. The like account Bochartus gives of the next difficulty, that if twenty-four thousand legionary soldiers be added of the tribe of Judah to the four hundred and seventy thousand, it comes near to five hundred thousand, (Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 38.) But others think there is no need of this; it being usual in Scripture to mention a round sum: either of men or of years, when some were wanting. So that though there were no more than four hundred and seventy thousand, yet they might be said to be five hundred thousand. Or, as they say in Halicoth Olam, the tribe of Benjamin (who were neighbours to Judah) are reckoned here in this book, who were omitted in the Chronicles. (1 Chron. xxi. 6.)

Ver. 10. And David's heart smote him after that he had numbered the people.] When he ordered it, he was possessed with other thoughts; and did not seriously reflect upon what he had done, until God touched his heart with a sense of his guilt after the sin was committed.

And David said unto the Lord, I have sinned greatly in that I have done.] It is made a great doubt by interpreters what this sin was, and wherein the heinousness of it consisted. The common opinion is, that as there was something of vanity and ostentation in him, when he had a mind to know how populous his country was, so it quite made him forget the half shekel that was due upon such occasions, by the appointment of the law, Exod. xxx. 12. And this was no small sin, not to pay God his dues, in such plenty and abundance as they now enjoyed. But if that was the meaning of Moses, it cannot well be thought that David was either ignorant, or unmindful of it, having made the law his study day and night. Bertram therefore thinks his fault was, that he numbered those who were under twenty years old, contrary to the order in the law, Exod. xxx. 14. xxxviii. 26, &c. but I see no foundation for this; but rather the quite contrary is asserted in the book of the Chronicles. Therefore Dr. Lightfoot fancies David had a covetous project in his mind, to lay a capitation tax (as we now speak) upon every poll throughout the kingdom. But such conjectures being without ground, some reject all other interpretations, and rely upon this; that the numbering of the people was a thing contrary to the fundamental promise made by God to Abraham, that his seed should increase so, as to be like the stars for multitude: which is given as a reason why the number of the people was not taken exactly, 1 Chron. xxvii. 23. and seems to imply, that there was a general notion received among the Jews, that since God promised to increase them beyond number, none ought to go about to take the number of them, for this might seem to savour of infidelity, and mistrust of God's promise. But those words on which this reason relies (in 1 Chron. xxvii. 23.) only give a reason why David did not number all from twenty years old, and under: which if he had gone about to do (i. e. reckon the whole nation), it might have seemed to cross the promise: but since it was only those who were above twenty years old whom he ordered to be numbered, I cannot look upon it as a contempt or mistrust of God's word: but, after all, I think we must content ourselves with what Ralbag says (whom Abarbinel after the examination of other opinions follows), that David being the anointed of the Lord, and the sweet singer of Israel, made flesh his arm, and confided in the number of his people: in which such a king as he should not have placed his confidence, but in the Lord his God; whom none can resist, and can save by few, as well as by many. Unto which Abarbinel adds, that the greatness of a sin is not always to be measured by the sin itself, but by the quality and dignity of him that committeth it: as Moses and Aaron were punished for a small sin, which excluded them from the good land: which was not proportionable to the sin, but to the condition of the offenders, who should have given a better example to the people. Thus he.

And now, I beseech thee, O Lord, take away the iniquity of thy servant; for I have done very foolishly.] Since he condemned himself, and begged pardon, he hoped he might escape the punishment which he deserved. But he was deceived; because not only he, but his people, had offended, and upon other accounts deserved to be punished.

Ver. 11. For when David was up in the morning, the word of the Lord came unto the prophet Gad, David's seer, saying.] The words seem to import that David was not touched in conscience, till Gad came and told him how angry God was with him. He is called David's seer, because he was his domestic prophet, (who is the same with a seer, 1 Sam. ix. 9.) with whom he was wont to advise in all difficult cases, (1 Sam. xxii. 5.) and kept a record of his memorable acts, (1 Chron. xxix. 29.)

Ver. 12. Go and say unto David, Thus saith the Lord, I offer thee three things; choose one of them, that I may do it unto thee.] Now it had been a proper time, as Abarbinel observes, for David to have fallen down before God, and deprecated his displeasure in those words, (ver. 10.) "I have sinned greatly in what I have done," &c. But he saw the sentence was passed upon him absolutely; and therefore he submits unto it.

Ver. 13. So Gad came and told him.] That he was sent by God with a message to him.

And said unto him, Shall seven years of famine come unto thee in thy land?] In the book of the Chronicles only three years of famine are propounded; which is far more likely than seven: for it better agrees with the three months' flight before his enemies, and the three days' pestilence. And therefore, not only Grotius, but Bochartus also here read three years, following the LXX. who have ἔτη τρία, whom most of the ancients follow, as Bochartus observes in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 38. Yet Josephus here hath seven years: and many think that Gad at first propounded seven years: but afterward, at David's prayer, shortened them to three. Other solutions are in every interpreter, who adhere to this reading of seven years. (See Buxtorf's Vindic. Verit. Hebr. par. ii. cap. 2. and cap. 8. p. 523.)

Or wilt thou flee three months before thine enemies, while they pursue thee? or that there be three days' pestilence in thy land?] These were the three sore judgments wherewith God commonly afflicted them for their sins; who now was so gracious, as to give him his choice which of them he would suffer: for one of them was peremptorily resolved.

Now advise, and see what answer I shall return to him that sent me.] There seems to be no great need to take time to consider which of these to choose; the last being the shortest, and an immediate stroke from the hand of God, who is full of tender mercy and compassion. But in this Gad expresses the clemency of God, who would not hastily inflict any punishment upon him.

Ver. 14. And David said unto Gad, I am in a great strait; let us now fall into the hand of the Lord (for his mercies are great), and let me not fall into the hand of man.] He seems to leave it to God to send either famine or pestilence (for both come from God's hand), and desires only that men might not be the instruments of his punishment. For as they are wont to be cruel, so they make no distinction between good and bad, but destroy all alike. This is admirably expressed by the son of Sirach, in Ecclus. ii. 17, 18. They that fear the Lord will prepare their heart, and humble their souls in his sight, saying, We will fall into the hands of the Lord, and not into the hands of men; for as his majesty is, so is his mercy.

Ver. 15. So the Lord sent a pestilence upon Israel.] The symptoms of which were very diverse, if we may believe Josephus. For some, he saith, died suddenly in intolerable pain: others wasted away, and left nothing to be buried but skin and bones, their bodies being consumed by the disease: others were suddenly choked, or struck blind, &c.

From the morning.] For that time when Gad delivered the message, and David made his choice; which was in the morning, as we read before, (ver. 11.)

Even to the time appointed.] There are those who by the time appointed understand to the end of three days, mentioned by Gad, as the time appointed by the Lord for the continuance of this plague. But this is quite contrary to what follows, that God repented him of the evil; and commanded the angel that smote the people to stay his hand. Therefore the LXX. translate it better, ἕως ὥρας ἀρίστου, until dinner-time: and so Procopius Gazæus. Certain it is, that moed signifies some part of that day when the plague began: and that must be either noon, or the evening. But, as Bochartus hath observed, the morning and evening are the parts of the day most opposite in Scripture (of which he gives many instances), and therefore so he here understands it, that it continued from morning to the evening. For moed properly signifies an assembly: and therefore the time moed he thinks is the time when the people met for evening prayer; about the ninth hour of the day. Which prayer, before the building of the temple, was made at the tabernacle, or in their synagogues. And therefore the tabernacle is frequently called ohel moed: and the synagogues are called in Psal. lxxiv. 18. Moade El. So that he makes account this pestilence lasted no more than nine hours: which was the eighth part of three days.

And there died of the people, from Dan to Beer-sheba, seventy thousand men.] If it had raged three days, and in every nine hours had killed so many, above the third part of those who had been numbered would have died by this plague. But, as Kimchi here observes, by the great mercy of God, the time was contracted. It is a frivolous observation of some of the Jews, that because it is not said seventy thousand anashim, but only isch, which commonly signifies a single person, that Abishai died of this plague, who was worth seventy thousand of the common people. Nor doth the observation of Grotius seem to be altogether true; who, in his second book, (de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 21. sect. 17.) saith, "Hæc pœna erat non populi, sed Davidis;" This was the punishment, not of the people, but of David: quoting that saying of an ancient Christian writer (Quæst. ad Orthodoxos), Πικροτάτη τιμωρία τῶν ἡμαρτηκότων βασιλέων, ἡ τιμωρία τοῦ λαοῦ, The bitterest punishment of delinquent kings, is that which is inflicted upon their people. But it is certain the people here had also offended: for it is said in the very beginning of this chapter, that God was angry with Israel. And as for what David saith, (ver. 17.) These sheep, what have they done? it is spoken out of his great affection to them; whose offences he did not know so well as his own: and therefore desired they might be spared, and he punished.

Ver. 16. And when the angel stretched out his hand upon Jerusalem to destroy it, the Lord repented him of the evil; and said unto the angel that destroyed the people, It is enough; stay now thine hand.] God did not change his mind, but only revoked that which he had decreed upon a certain condition; which was, that three days' pestilence should come upon the country, unless David and the people repented; which he seeing they did, (1 Chron. xxi. 16.) he shortened the time, and would not let the angel proceed above an eighth part of it.

Ver. 17. And David spake unto the Lord, when he saw the angel that smote the people, and said, Lo, I have sinned, and I have done wickedly: but these sheep, what have they done?] Like a good man, he reflected only on his own sin, in numbering the people; but did not think of theirs in deposing him lately, and setting up Absalom (which Theodoret, Procopius Gazæus, and others, think was the crime for which they were punished), which he had forgiven, but God thought fit to punish; who by their silence may be thought to have approved the fact of David. And besides, the loss of so many people was a punishment of the king himself, as was before observed.

Let thy hand, I pray thee, be against me, and against my father's house.] That is, against his kindred, who did not dissuade him from the vanity of numbering the people, but perhaps encouraged him in it.

Ver. 18. And Gad came that day to David, and said unto him.] By the express command of the Lord, (1 Chron. xxi. 18, 19.)

Go up, rear an altar unto the Lord in the thrashing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite.] This thrashing-floor was on the Mount Moriah; the place where Abraham offered up his son, and where the temple was built by Solomon. (See 2 Chron. iii. 1.) Of which Eupolemus, a heathen writer, takes notice, saying, that God shewed David by an angel the place where the temple should be built. (See Eusebius's Præpar. Evang. lib. ix. cap. 30.) The Jews will have it, that it was here Abel and Cain offered their sacrifices; (see Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. p. 199. 431.) nay, that it was the place where Adam was created; according to a saying of their doctors, "Adam was created out of the place of his expiation." (See G. Vorstius upon Pirke Eliezer, p. 163.)

Ver. 19. And David, according to the saying of Gad, went up as the Lord commanded.] That is, he went the next moment after he received the command.

Ver. 20. And Araunah looked, and saw the king and his servants coming on towards him: and Araunah went out, and bowed himself before the king on his face upon the ground.] As the manner was, and still is, in the eastern countries.

Ver. 21. And Araunah said, Wherefore is my lord the king come up unto thy servant?] It may be he thought it too great an honour; and therefore desired to know the meaning of it.

And David said, To buy the thrashing-floor of thee, to build an altar unto the Lord, that the plague may be stayed from the people.] By offering a sacrifice to appease his anger; as he himself had ordered, (1 Chron. xxi. 26, 27.)

Ver. 22. And Araunah said unto David, Let my lord the king take and offer up what seemeth good unto him: behold, here be oxen for burnt-sacrifices, and thrashing-instruments and other instruments of the oxen for wood.] For when the angel appeared there, he was thrashing wheat, which he offered likewise to David for a meat-offering, (1 Chron. xxi. 20. 23.) And the instruments of the oxen were their yokes, and such as they drew after them to press forth the corn.

Ver. 23. All these things did Araunah, as a king, give unto the king.] The words in the Hebrew are, these things gave Araunah the king unto the king. From whence some infer, that before the taking of Jerusalem he was the king of the Jebusites; or, a man of the greatest authority among them, like a king; or was descended from the blood royal of the Jebusites, as Dr. Lightfoot expresses it. But neither the Greek, nor the Syriac, nor the Arabic copies have the word king: nor was it in many of the Vulgar till Sixtus's correction; nor in the Chaldee paraphrast in the time of Kimchi, who cites it thus; Araunah gave to the king what the king asked of him. And, as Bochartus observes, Araunah (or Ornan) being mentioned fourteen times in the holy books, it is a wonder he should not be styled a king, but only here. (Hieroz. par. i. lib. i. cap. 38.) But it is likely he was a very rich man, as Josephus reports: whom the king spared when he took the fort of Zion; either because he was a lover of the Israelites, or had done some good office unto David.

And Araunah said unto the king, The Lord thy God accept thee.] He thought himself abundantly satisfied, if God pleased to grant David's request; which he beseeched him to do; for no doubt he was a proselyte, earnestly desiring the happiness of the nation, into which he was incorporated.

Ver. 24. And the king said unto Araunah, Nay; but I will surely buy it of thee at a price: neither will I offer burnt-offerings unto the Lord my God of that which cost me nothing.] Whence is that of Solomon, (Prov. iii. 9.) "Honour the Lord with thy substance;" which the Greek thus translates, Τίμα τὸν Κύριον ἀπὸ τῶν δικαίων πόνων. Honour the Lord out of thy honest labours; that is, out of that which thou hast acquired by thy honest industry.

So David bought the thrashing-floor and the oxen for fifty shekels of silver.] In the Chronicles we read, according to our translation, that he gave him six hundred shekels of gold by weight, which Bochartus thus reconciles; that in one place he speaks of shekels of gold, and in the other of shekels of silver. Whose proportion is twelvefold; so that fifty shekels of gold are in value as much as six hundred shekels of silver. He quotes a place out of Plato in his Hipparchus, which proves that gold and silver held this proportion. And then he thus translates this place in Samuel, He bought the floor and the oxen beceseph, for money; viz. for fifty golden shekels. So the word ceseph often signifies money in general, of whatsoever metal it be; as appears from this very history, wherein David tells Ornan that he will buy the field of him, beceseph malo, which we translate, at its full price, 1 Chron. xxi. 24. And then it follows, he gave Ornan shikle zahav, shekels of gold, mishkall shesh meoth, in value six hundred vulgar, or silver, shekels. See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 38. where the word mishkall he acknowledges commonly signifies weight; yet here denotes value: as in 2 Sam. xii. 30. The design of Ezra being to shew, that the fifty shekels he gave for the floor and oxen were not silver (which were most common), but shekels of gold; every one of which was worth twelve of silver: so that those fifty shekels were equivalent to six hundred silver ones.

But there is a shorter way of solving this difficulty, by supposing, that for the thrashing-floor and the oxen he gave only fifty shekels of silver: but all the ground about it (out of which the courts of God's house were afterward made) cost him six hundred shekels of gold.

Ver. 25. And David built there an altar unto the Lord, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings.] Burnt-offerings were prayers to God that he would remove this plague: and peace-offerings were acknowledgments of God's goodness, who had already given David hopes of this mercy.

So the Lord was entreated for the land, and the plague was stayed from Israel.] As plainly appeared by God's sending fire down from heaven to consume the sacrifices: and the angel also, who appeared with a flaming sword over Jerusalem, being commanded to put it up into his sheath, (1 Chron. xxi. 26, 27.) From hence David concluded God would be more placable in this place than any other; and therefore took counsel to build the temple here.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE KINGS.

THESE two following books contain the history of the kings of Israel and Judah, from the beginning of Solomon's reign down to the captivity of Babylon: for the space of near six hundred years; taking into the account the history of the two foregoing books. It is highly probable that they were composed by Ezra, who extracted them out of the public records: which were kept of what passed in that nation; as we read of the book of the acts of Solomon, in this very book, xi. 41.: and frequently of the books of the kings of Israel, and of the kings of Judah; and of the book of Jehu, in which was written the acts of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xx. 34. And Isaiah, we read, wrote the acts of Uzziah, first and last, 2 Chron. xxvi. 22.: out of which, and such-like books, Ezra composed this brief history. In which there are several things that heathens themselves have taken notice of, as Huetius observes in his Demonstratio Evangelica, propos. iv. where he answers the trifling objections which some have made against the antiquity of these books.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. NOW David was old and stricken in years.] For he was seventy years old, as we learn from 2 Sam. v. 4, 5.

And they covered him with clothes, but he got no heat.] His blood was so chilled, that he could not be warm in his bed, much less when he was up. Dr. Lightfoot thinks he was struck with a dead palsy.

Ver. 2. Wherefore his servants.] His physicians, it is most likely, that attended him.

Said unto him, Let there be sought for my lord the king.] Those are the words of the prime physician, in the name of the rest.

A young virgin; and let her stand before the king.] Or, minister unto him in the day-time: for the very sight of a beautiful virgin very much excites the natural spirits.

And let her cherish him, and let her lie in thy bosom.] Become his wife, and in the night lie in the same bed close to him.

That my lord the king may get heat.] For nothing more effectually procures heat and healthful concoction than the application of a young body, even of a puppy, to the stomach all night: as Galen observes, in his fifth book of the Power of simple Medicines. For συμφυλότερα, καὶ οἰκειότερα πολὺ, this warmth is nearer of kin to us, and more proper, than any other that can be invented: as Victorinus Strigelius hath taken notice.

Ver. 3. So they sought for a fair damsel throughout all the coasts of Israel, and found Abishag the Shunammite, and brought her to the king.] She being young, sprightly, and willing to be taken into his bed: for his other wives were grown too old to put any life into him.

Ver. 4. And the damsel was very fair.] Of an amiable countenance.

And cherished the king, and ministered to him; but the king knew her not.] Did not enjoy her as his wife; but she remained still a virgin: being his bedfellow only to keep him warm.

Ver. 5. Then Adonijah the son of Haggith exalted himself, saying, I will be king.] Taking advantage of his father's age and weakness (who he thought could not oppose it), he resolved to take possession of the kingdom: but the crown, as the Jews fancy, would not fit him.

And he prepared him chariots and horsemen, and fifty men to run before him.] Just as Absalom had done, when he began to conspire against his father, 2 Sam. xv. 1.

Ver. 6. And his father had not displeased him at any time, in saying, Why hast thou done so?] This was one of David's great faults, extraordinary indulgence unto his children: of whom he was so fond, that he seems to have overlooked their errors, and never to have chidden them for any thing they did amiss. And now in his old age this wickedness was more apparent; he growing naturally more remiss, careless, and sluggish.

And he also was a very goodly man.] And so the more likely to draw the people after him. For a noble aspect was always a qualification for the royal authority; as appears by the history of Saul, David, and Absalom.

And his mother bare him after Absalom.] He pretended to the crown, because Absalom being dead, he was next to him in order of birth. (See 2 Sam. iii. 3, 4.)

Ver. 7. And he conferred with Joab the son of Zeruiah, and with Abiathar the priest.] Whom, it is likely, he knew to be two discontented persons: the former upon the account of David's putting Amasa in his place; and the other because he saw Zadok in greater favour than himself.

And they, following Adonijah, helped him.] Furthered him in his design, as a means to secure themselves with the next heir.

Ver. 8. But Zadok the priest, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and Nathan the prophet, and Shimei, and Rei, and the mighty men which belonged unto David, were not with Adonijah.] The three first of these are well known to have been great favourites of David: and therefore Adonijah knew would not be for his turn. The two next, it is likely, were persons of note, who were perfectly in David's interest: and Shimei possibly may be the person whom Solomon preferred to a great office, (iv. 18.) though Abarbinel thinks he was Shimei who cursed David. (See upon the next chapter, ver. 8.) The mighty men here mentioned are those named in 2 Sam. xxiii. and his guards, who had served under David so long, and done such mighty acts in his reign, and under his conduct, that Adonijah had no hope of drawing them in to his party.

Ver. 9. And Adonijah slew sheep, and oxen, and fat cattle.] Of the Hebrew word meri, which we translate fat cattle, see upon 2 Sam. vi. 13.

By the stone of Zoheleth which is by En-rogel.] The Hebrew word Zohel signifies a slow motion, as Bochart observes in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. i. cap. 9. from whence this stone had its name: the fullers here pressing out the water, which dropped from the clothes that they had washed in this well, called Rogel. Josephus saith the king's gardens lay near this well: which, out of him, is also affirmed by Procopius Gazæus.

And called all his brethren the king's sons.] Whose names are mentioned in 2 Sam. iii. 4, 5. and more largely in 1 Chron. iii. 4, 5, &c.

And all the men of Judah the king's servants.] Except those beforementioned, ver. 8. and again excepted, ver. 10. But all the rest of the family of David, and the principal persons of the tribe of Judah, with the high-priest, and the captain of the host, being present, there seemed to be nothing wanting to the making of him king, but only his anointing. For this seems to have been a federal feast; wherein they sware allegiance to Adonijah.

Ver. 10. But Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah, and the mighty men, and Solomon his brother, he called not.] It was a feast, I suppose, upon a great sacrifice: unto which none came but they who were invited.

Ver. 11. Wherefore Nathan spake unto Bath-sheba the mother of Solomon, saying, Hast thou not heard that Adonijah the son of Haggith doth reign.] It seems they were so bold as to proclaim him king.

And David our lord knoweth it not?] For it was secretly contrived between him and Joab, and the rest: without the privity of David or Bath-sheba.

Ver. 12. Now therefore come, let me, I pray thee, give thee counsel, that thou mayest save thy own life, and the life of thy son Solomon.] Whom he knew they would endeavour to cut off: as the person designed by David to be his successor.

Ver. 13. Go and get thee in unto king David, and say unto him, Didst not thou, my lord, O king, sware unto thy handmaid, saying, Assuredly Solomon thy son shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne? Why then doth Adonijah reign?] We do not read any where else of this oath; but no doubt he had solemnly sworn to her, that he would make her son his successor: God himself having designed him to that honour; as appears from 2 Sam. vii. 12. where God promises by Nathan to set upon his throne a son that should proceed from him: which plainly signified, none of his sons already born was to be the person. But more plainly, 1 Chron. xxii. 8—10, &c. he declares that God told him Solomon should reign after him, and build him a house, and thereupon he commanded all the princes of Israel to be assistant to him, ver. 17. and see xxviii. 5, 6. All this, I doubt not, was known to Adonijah; which made his crime the greater, in setting himself against the decree of Heaven: and he himself confesses as much in the next chapter, ver. 15.

Ver. 14. Behold, while thou yet talkest there with the king, I also will come in after thee, and confirm thy words.] Which he knew would quicken the king, to give speedy orders about this matter.

Ver. 15. And Bath-sheba went in unto the king into the chamber.] Being the king's wife, she had the privilege to come into his bedchamber, without asking leave, as Kimchi observes. Whereas Nathan did not appear before the king till they told him he was there to wait upon him, (ver. 23.)

And the king was very old.] And could not discern who it was that entered into the chamber.

And Abishag the Shunammite ministered unto the king.] And informed him, it is likely, that Bath-sheba was come into the room to speak with him.

Ver. 16. And Bath-sheba bowed, and did obeisance to the king.] First bowed her head, and then her body: as the manner was even for their wives, as well as other persons.

And the king said, What wouldest thou?] She had signified, I suppose, to Abishag, that she had some petition to make to him.

Ver. 17. And she said unto him, My lord, thou swarest by the Lord thy God unto thy handmaid, saying, Assuredly Solomon thy son shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne.] David sware this, as Abarbinel thinks, when Absalom his eldest son rebelled against him. And the rather, because Nathan had told him (as I observed before), a child should proceed from him that should sit upon his throne: who therefore was then unborn. But all the rest, except Solomon, were born before this promise; and therefore he concluded were none of them designed by God to be his successors.

Ver. 18. And now, behold, Adonijah reigneth; and now, my lord the king, thou knowest it not.] This she saith, that she might not seem to accuse David of breaking his oath: and that she might aggravate the crime of Adonijah, in presuming to usurp the throne while his father was alive, and without his knowledge.

Ver. 19. And he hath slain oxen, and fat cattle, and sheep in abundance, and hath called all the sons of the king, and Abiathar the priest, and Joab the captain of the host: but Solomon thy servant hath he not called.] She very submissively calls herself his handmaid, and her son his servant: the more to win upon his affection unto those that humbly depended upon his pleasure.

Ver. 20. And thou, my lord, O king, the eyes of all Israel are upon thee, that thou shouldest tell them who shall sit upon the throne of my lord the king after thee.] This she said all Israel expected from the king, that she might free him from all fear of such a rebellion as Absalom raised; the people not being joined to Adonijah, but continuing in suspense, till the king had declared his mind about his successor. Thus Abarbinel. And this power of naming a successor continued for some time after him, as appears by the story of his grandson Rehoboam: who, though no great man, yet took upon him this authority of nominating a successor, and made of his youngest sons, viz. Abijah, king after him. (See 2 Chron. xi. 20. 22, &c.) But this custom did not last long; not being in use among their neighbours: as the story of the Moabites shews, 2 Kings iii. 27. Yet it was the manner of excellent princes among the Romans to appoint their successor, whom the people gladly received. So Augustus did: and M. Aurelius commends Nerva for so doing.

Ver. 21. Otherwise it shall come to pass, when my lord the king shall sleep with his fathers, that I and my son So- lomon shall be accounted offenders.] Guilty of death for aiming at the kingdom.

Ver. 22. And, lo, while she talked with the king, Nathan the prophet also came in.] To confirm what she had said, according to his promise, (ver. 14.)

Ver. 23. And they told the king, saying, Behold Nathan the prophet.] Whereupon Bath-sheba, it is likely, withdrew, as if she supposed he had some private message to deliver unto David.

And when he was come in before the king, he bowed himself before the king with his face to the ground.] The prophets themselves, as well as other men, gave the profoundest reverence to the king (as Maimonides observes), that they might teach all his subjects their duty. Nor was the high-priest excepted. (See Schickard de Jure Regni, cap. 4. Theor. 13.) The Hebrew word is used for religious worship, in Psal. xlv. 12. xcv. 6. but very often only for political, and that very anciently, in Gen. xxiii. 7. Ruth ii. 10. 2 Sam. xvi. 14. and many other places.

Ver. 24. And Nathan said, My lord, O king, hast thou said, Adonijah shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne?] He knew very well he had given no such order; but he said this to awaken the king, to consider how presumptuous Adonijah was.

Ver. 25. For he is gone down this day, and hath slain oxen, and fat cattle, and sheep in abundance, and hath called all the king's sons, and the captain of the host, and Abiathar the priest: and, behold, they eat and drink before him, and say, God save king Adonijah!] By this time Nathan had received perfect intelligence, what was the design of that great feast; and they had not only consulted to raise Adonijah to the throne, but actually proclaimed him king. Which was more than Bath-sheba had told him.

Ver. 26. But me, even me thy servant, and Zadok the priest, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and thy servant Solomon, hath he not called.] For he knew they were all faithful to king David; and would follow his directions.

Ver. 27. Is this thing done by my lord the king, and thou hast not shewed it unto thy servant, who shall sit on the throne of my lord the king after him?] In a matter of this importance, he could not believe the king would act without his advice: whom he was wont to consult on other occasions; and who had acquainted him with the mind of God concerning Solomon.

Ver. 28. And king David answered and said, Call me Bath-sheba.] Who was withdrawn, as I said, into another room, upon the coming in of Nathan: or stood at a distance in the room where they were.

And she came into the king's presence, and stood before the king.] To understand his pleasure.

Ver. 29. And the king sware, and said, As the Lord liveth, that hath redeemed my soul out of all distress.] Unto whom he was so much indebted, that it could not be thought he would take his name in vain: but she might trust him now that he so solemnly sware again to her.

Ver. 30. Even as I sware unto thee by the Lord God of Israel, saying, Assuredly thy son shall reign after me, and he shall sit upon my throne in my stead; even so will I certainly do this day.] He had not forgotten his former oath, which he now renews; and resolves immediately to put it in execution.

Ver. 31. Then Bath-sheba bowed her face to the earth, and did reverence to the king.] Most humbly acknowledged his goodness; by a lower reverence than she made before, (ver. 16.)

And said, Let my lord the king live for ever.] There could be no higher expression of love and thankfulness, than to desire never to see Solomon on the throne, if it were possible for David always to enjoy it.

Ver. 32. And king David said, Call me Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada. And they came before the king.] They were such trusty and resolute persons, that he knew would not fear to execute his commands.

Ver. 33. And the king said unto them, Take with you the servants of your lord.] His constant guards, the Cherethites and Pelethites. (See ver. 38.)

And cause Solomon my son to ride upon my own mule.] The rest of David's sons were wont to ride upon mules, when they went abroad, (2 Sam. xiii. 29.) And Absalom rode upon a mule, when he was hanged in the oak, (xviii. 9.) But David had a mule peculiarly reserved for himself alone; on which Solomon being set, it was the beginning of his royal authority: for no private person whatsoever, as Abarbinel observes, might ride upon the king's mule. He also further notes, that David ordered him to ride upon a mule, and not upon a horse, because a horse is prepared for battle, (Prov. xxi. 31.) but a mule is a quiet creature: signifying the peace, tranquillity, and security, which they enjoyed in Solomon's reign. But the first is the more pertinent observation: for it was capital (as Maimonides observes) to ride upon the king's horse or mule; or sit in his throne; or use his sceptre, &c. without the king's order. As, on the contrary, to have the honour to ride upon his horse, by his order, was accounted the highest dignity among the Persians, as appears by the story of Mordecai in the sixth chapter of Esther.

And bring him down to Gihon.] A fountain on the west side of Jerusalem, which divided itself into two streams, as some say, and made two pools: that of Siloam, and that of Solomon, mentioned by Josephus, (lib. vi. de Bello Judaico, cap. 38.) But Kimchi, and Abarbinel also, take them only for different names for one and the same rivulet; which was called Gihon, and also Siloam, as the Targum hath it. Hither they were ordered to bring down Solomon; for it is a maxim among the Jews, that they do not anoint a king, but near a fountain: though they have no authority for it, that I know of, but from this chapter: where we read of Adonijah's going to En-rogel, (ver. 9.) and Solomon's being brought to Gihon; which was a fountain or brook near Jerusalem: for thereabout a great number of people used always to be; whom they would have to observe it. The Jews give another reason for it, in the Talmud; that it might be a signification and good omen of the perpetuity of the kingdom: which should continue like a fountain, which runs perpetually. (See Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 1. Theor. 4.) But from what is said here of Solomon, we cannot safely make a general conclusion, that all kings were anointed at fountains. For Saul the first king was not; and in the history of David, who was anointed three times, there is no mention of it.

Ver. 34. And let Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, anoint him there king over Israel.] One of them poured out the oil, and the other anointed him, as the forenamed

Schickard thinks it probable. Or, as others will have it, Zadok (as vicar of the high-priest, who in his absence performed all his offices) did both: and Nathan the prophet was witness of the Divine revelation and promise, that Solomon should succeed in the kingdom. For Abarbinel is of opinion, that no king was anointed but by the authority of a prophet: which is hard to be proved out of Scripture, as Carpzovius observes. (See ver. 39.)

And blow ye with the trumpet, and say, God save king Solomon!] Proclaim him to be the king of Israel. The history of Absalom shews that he was proclaimed king by the sound of the trumpet, (2 Sam. xv. 10.) And when God proclaimed his law, and himself the king of Israel, the sound of the trumpet preceded with great vehemence, (Exod. xix. 16.) And hence many places in the Psalms are explained, which say, God went up with the sound of a trumpet, when, after the manner of kings, he triumphed over his enemies, (xlvii. 5. xcviii. 6.)

Ver. 35. Then ye shall come up after him, that he may come and sit upon my throne.] Attend upon him to Jerusalem, and give him actual possession of the throne.

For he shall be king in my stead: and I have appointed him to be ruler over Israel and over Judah.] To have the same authority over all the people that David had.

Ver. 36. And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada answered the king, and said, Amen.] Gave his consent in the name of all the rest: and I suppose sware allegiance to him.

The Lord God of my lord the king say so too.] They all said the same, ver. 47. Nothing doubting God would establish his authority.

Ver. 37. As the Lord hath been with my lord the king, even so be he with Solomon, and make his throne greater than the throne of my lord king David.] He knew David loved his children so passionately, and desired their happiness so much, that he was assured he should not offend him with this wish. In the Targum it is, As the Word of the Lord hath helped my lord the king, &c.

Ver. 38. So Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and the Cherethites, and the Pelethites.] This (and in ver. 43.) is the last time that the Cherethites and Pelethites (whom Procopius Gazæus here calls funditores et sagittarios, slingers and archers) are mentioned in the holy Scriptures: for we read no more of them after the death of David. Which makes it probable, that in their room, David himself, in the conclusion of his reign, had appointed those troops which we read of in 1 Chron. xxvii. to attend upon him every month under their several commanders: which is the conjecture of Corn. Bonaventura Bertram, de Republ. Judaica, cap. 10. p. 133. And these are they he thinks who guarded Joash, (2 Kings xi. 4, &c.) called Ceri, or Cerim, i. e. Ariates (not much different from Crethi) and Ratzim, which he translates Cursores. But I leave this to better judgments.

Went down, and caused Solomon to ride on the king's mule, and brought him to Gihon.] According as king David had ordered, (ver. 34.)

Ver. 39. And Zadok the priest.] Here the anointing of him is attributed to the priest alone. And indeed the unctions which are said to be made by a prophet, as Samuel anointed Saul and David, were private, but not public: which was always done by the priest, as Fortunatus Scacchus hath endeavoured to shew in his third Myrothecium, cap. 49, 50. It must be confessed, that the prophet anointed Saul in Gilgal when he was publicly declared king: but then they offered sacrifice, which could not be without the priest: and the Israelites made a covenant with David when they anointed him in Hebron, which must be by feasting upon a sacrifice offered by the priest. Yet a great many of the Jews are confident that no man, no, not the high-priest, could anoint a king, but only a prophet, as Samuel did David, and Nathan (Abarbinel here affirms) did Solomon, and Ahijah did Jeroboam.

Took a horn of oil.] A vessel of oil, as the Arabic translates it: which vessel was made of an ox's horn, as Bochartus observes, lib. ii. Hierozoicon, cap. 37. par. i. They commonly made cups of such horns; whence the Greek word κεράσαι, to mingle wine with water. (See Fortunatus Scacchus, Myrothec. i. cap. 48.)

Out of the tabernacle, and anointed Solomon.] This made his unction more solemn, and his person more sacred, because anointed with holy oil. Though the Jews are generally of opinion, that it was not necessary to anoint their kings with this holy oil made by Moses. And, indeed, they all agree there was no necessity of anointing them at all (the son being sufficiently anointed by the unction of his father), unless there arose a controversy about the succession of the crown. Thus Solomon was anointed because of the function of Adonijah, Joash because of Athaliah, and Jehu because of Joram. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Success. in Pontif. cap. 9. and Schickard's Jus Regium, cap. 1. Theor. 4.) Fortunatus Scacchus also hath spent a whole chapter, of a good length, to shew that a private unction might be made with any oil: but a public, by oil taken from the tabernacle. Whence it is said of David, with my holy oil have I anointed thee. Yet he thinks that this oil, preserved in the tabernacle for that purpose, was not the same with the oil made by Moses, wherewith the high-priest alone was anointed. This he confirms by no contemptible arguments, in his Myrothecium iii. Sacror. Elæochrysm. cap. 48.

And they blew the trumpet; and all the people said, God save king Solomon!] After the unction followed the acclamation of the people. (See ver. 34.)

Ver. 40. And all the people came up after him.] From Gihon unto Jerusalem.

And the people piped with pipes, and rejoiced with great joy.] To see a king settled by David's appointment: which they hoped might prevent all contests about the succession.

So that the earth rent with the sound of them.] An hyperbolical expression, to signify the very loud noise the people made with their shouts and their pipes: which were instruments that had their name among the Hebrews from the many holes that were in them: as the illustrious Spanhemius observes upon Callimachus's hymn ad Dianam, ver. 244. where he notes great variety of them.

Ver. 41. And Adonijah, and all the guests that were with him, heard it as they had made an end of eating.] But, perhaps, were not yet risen from the table. (See ver. 49.)

And when Joab heard the sound of the trumpet, he said, Wherefore is this noise of the city being in an uproar?] By this time Solomon was got into Jerusalem; from whence they could hear the shouting, and the sound of the trumpet and music. Which Josephus saith was accompanied with a great feast: which is agreeable to 1 Chron. xxix. 21, 22.

Joab was most concerned to inquire what the matter was; for if the city was in an uproar, as he seems to suspect, it was his business, as captain of the host, to suppress it.

Ver. 42. And while he yet spake, behold, Jonathan the son of Abiathar the priest came.] He had been employed by David to bring him intelligence, (2 Sam. xv. 27.) and it is likely was now left in Jerusalem by his father's order, to bring him news of what passed there.

And Adonijah said unto him, Come in; for thou art a valiant man, and bringest good tidings.] Or rather, thou art a virtuous man: for so the word we here translate valiant is rendered in Prov. xii. 4. And so the Targum in this place, thou art a man that fearest to sin: and being a good man, he hoped brought good tidings, like himself.

Ver. 43. And Jonathan answered and said to Adonijah, Verily our lord king David hath made Solomon king.] He tells him (according to his character) he would not flatter him, but tell him the plain truth: that David had not only declared Solomon should succeed him in the throne, but actually made him king: and related the whole history of his proceedings in the following words.

Ver. 44. And the king hath sent with him Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and the Cherethites, and Pelethites, and they have caused him to ride on the king's mule.

Ver. 45. And Zadok the priest, and Nathan the prophet, have anointed him king in Gihon.] By authority from God, which Nathan, I suppose, pronounced; and then Zadok anointed him.

And they are gone up from thence rejoicing, so that the earth rang again. This is the noise that ye have heard.

Ver. 46. And also Solomon sitteth on the throne of the kingdom.] He was in actual possession of the kingdom: though his father was alive. For to sit upon the throne was proper to the king: and none else, on pain of death, might be placed there. So Valerius Maximus speaks of the Persians, lib. v. cap. 16.

Ver. 47. And moreover, the king's servants came to bless king David, and said, God make the name of Solomon greater than thy name, and make his throne greater than thy throne.] See ver. 37.

And the king bowed himself upon the bed.] Worshipped God, and prayed it might be so.

Ver. 48. And also thus said the king, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which hath given one to sit on my throne this day, mine eyes even seeing it.] He gave a solemn thanks to God for the happiness of seeing Solomon begin his reign with such affection of his people, as they expressed by their joy at his inauguration. Jonathan, it appears by this, had been a diligent observer of every thing that had been done in this matter: for he omits nothing, but gives them a full and faithful account.

Ver. 49. And all the guests that were with Adonijah were afraid, and rose up, and went every man his way.] They rose from table where they were sitting, and departed every man to his own home in great haste, that it might not be known they had been with Adonijah; who wanted those marks of royalty which were bestowed on Solomon: for he neither rode on the king's mule, nor was he anointed, nor sat on the throne of the kingdom: nor do we read of any forces that he had with him to maintain his title. Yet Fortunatus Scacchus thinks Adonijah wanted none of the marks of royalty, (insomuch that Bath-sheba told David he reigned, ver. 18.) but this one alone. Which defect threw down all the regal majesty of Adonijah, scattered all his forces, and translated the possession of the kingdom to Solomon, as soon as he was consecrated by this holy unction, (lib. iii. Myrothec. cap. 47. p. 571.)

Ver. 50. And Adonijah feared because of Solomon, and arose, and went, and caught hold of the horns of the altar.] He thought he had committed a crime worthy of death, by usurping the kingdom without his father's consent, and against the known design of God: and therefore he fled to the altar for safety and protection. It being a privileged place, not by the appointment of the law, but by the custom of all nations. It is a question to what altar he fled; whether to that at the tabernacle in Gibeon, or to that newly built in the thrashing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite. Some think to this last, which was nearest; and it is expressly said of Joab in the next chapter, (ver. 29.) that he fled to the tabernacle of the Lord; which is not said here.

Ver. 51. And it was told Solomon, saying, Behold, Adonijah feareth king Solomon: for, lo, he hath taken hold of the horns of the altar, saying, Let Solomon swear to me today, that he will not slay his servant with the sword.] He offered to surrender himself, and make no opposition, if he might but be secured of his life: which he humbly begged by taking sanctuary at the altar. These words, to-day, signify that he desired him from henceforth he would not punish him for what was past.

Ver. 52. And Solomon said.] He did not swear unto him, as he desired, but only declared.

If he will shew himself a worthy man, there shall not a hair of him fall to the earth.] He gave him a full pardon for what was past; on condition he behaved himself as became a good subject for the time to come.

But if wickedness be found in him, he shall die.] If he did any thing (as Abarbinel glosses) which shewed that he had still a rebellious mind, this pardon should signify nothing, because he had broken the condition of it.

Ver. 53. So king Solomon sent, and they brought him down from the altar. And he came and bowed himself to king Solomon.] He owned him for his sovereign.

And Solomon said unto him, Go to thine house.] There to lead a private life, and not go abroad with such an equipage as he had done, (ver. 5.)

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. NOW the days of David drew nigh that he should die.] As he himself was sensible.

And he charged Solomon his son, saying.] After the example of Abraham, the father of the faithful, (Gen. xviii. 19.)

Ver. 2. I go the way of all the earth.] And so was unable to govern any longer.

Be thou strong therefore, and shew thyself a man.] In wisdom and in courage.

Ver. 3. And keep the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies.] Under these four words are comprehended all the laws of Moses: statutes being such constitutions as had not their foundation in reason, but in the will and pleasure of God: as not to sow two seeds of different kinds together, &c. (See Drusius and Grotius upon Numb. xix. 2. and Masius upon Josh. xxiv. 25.) Commandments were moral duties, which had a manifest reason; as, not to steal, &c. Judgments were the laws belonging to civil government, in things between one man and another: such as are mentioned Exod. xxi. and the following chapters. And testimonies were such laws as preserved the remembrance of some great things; and testified to them the loving-kindness of the Lord; as, the sabbath, the passover, and all the rest of the feasts.

As it is written in the law of Moses.] Which their kings were bound not only to read, but to write a copy of it with their own hands, for their own use: that they might learn to fear the Lord, &c. (Deut. xvii. 18, 19.)

That thou mayest prosper in all that thou doest, and whithersoever thou turnest thyself.] Or, that thou mayest do wisely, &c. as it is in the margin. For there is no policy like true religion and piety.

Ver. 4. That the Lord may confirm his word, which he spake concerning me, saying, If thy children take heed to their ways, to walk before me in truth with all their heart, and with all their soul, there shall not fail thee (said he) a man upon the throne of Israel.] To engage him to keep the charge of the Lord, he represents unto him the gracious promise which God had made him, to perpetuate the kingdom in his family without interruption, (2 Sam. vii. 15, 16. Psal. cxxxii. 12.) provided his children sincerely and heartily served God, in faithful obedience to his commands.

Ver. 5. Moreover, thou knowest also what Joab the son of Zeruiah did unto me.] After he had given him this general charge, he proceeded to direct him to do some particular pieces of justice and kindness. And, first of all, bids him remember how Joab had used him: how insolently, for instance, he had treated him in his great affliction, and threatened a new rebellion, (2 Sam. xix. 7.) and lately had set up Adonijah to reign, while he was yet alive. Or this may refer to what follows.

And what he did to the two captains of the host of Israel, unto Abner the son of Ner, and Amasa the son of Jether, whom he slew.] For this was a great dishonour to David, who had given Abner safe conduct; and passed his word to Amasa that he should be commander-in-chief of all his forces: and therefore he might say it was done to himself. But it is an idle conceit of the Jews, in Jalkut, and in other books, which refer these words, what he did to me, unto his shewing the letter which David wrote him concerning Uriah, unto the great commanders in the army, (2 Sam. xi. 15.) and thereby exposed the king as a murderer of one of his best subjects. D. Kimchi mentions this upon this place.

And shed the blood of war in peace, and put the blood of war upon his girdle that was about his loins, and in his shoes that were on his feet.] This was a high aggravation of his crime, that he did not only shed that blood in peace (speaking to them in a friendly manner when he shed it), but after he had done he was not at all ashamed of it, but appeared with their blood upon his belt, and in his shoes: as if he thought it a glory to him, that he had slain them in a battle with them.

Ver. 6. Do thou therefore according to thy wisdom, and let not his hoar head go down to the grave in peace.] It was not safe to give any countenance to so bold a man as Joab, who was of great authority among the soldiers: in a new kingdom, and a young man being king. Therefore, if there was a fair occasion, and he could do it prudently, he advises Solomon to cut him off. For David had not remitted his former crimes (nor could he by the law), but only deferred the punishment of a man who was very powerful, and very serviceable in his wars. Though Abarbinel is of opinion he was not cut off for those old crimes: but the new one in following Adonijah could not be forgiven; because he had deserved so ill before on other accounts. But some move a doubt how Solomon, being but a youth, could cut off Joab; which David durst not do, when he most flourished. Which will easily be resolved, if it be considered that now it was a time of peace, when Joab was less necessary: and Solomon's reputation grew continually, (ver. 12.) and so he was more respected than Joab; who now declined in his interest, by reason of his age.

Ver. 7. But shew kindness unto the sons of Barzillai the Gileadite, and let them be of those that eat at thy table.] As Mephibosheth had done: who, it is likely, was now dead, for otherwise he would not have forgotten him. David's gratitude here is very remarkable; which extended itself to all the sons of Barzillai: who only desired him to be kind to Chimham, (2 Sam. xix. 37.)

For so they came to me when I fled because of Absalom thy brother.] That is, such kindness they shewed to David, inviting him to Barzillai's house, who sustained him in his great distress, (2 Sam. xix. 32.)

Ver. 8. And, behold, thou hast with thee Shimei the son of Gera, a Benjamite.] These words, thou hast with thee, are understood by Abarbinel as if David had said, I see that thou art very familiar with Shimei; whom thou lovest and advisest withal. But, that he might not trust him, he remembers him how bitterly he was cursed by him in his distress: and therefore might do as much by Solomon, if he should fall into the like trouble. And he thinks Solomon, being young, might the more easily be drawn in to hearken to such a crafty man's counsel; because he did not follow Adonijah: for he takes him to be the Shimei mentioned in the foregoing chapter, (ver. 8.) But the plain sense of his having Shimei with him, is, that he was in his power, being one of his subjects.

Which cursed me with a grievous curse in the day when I went to Mahanaim.] See 2 Sam. xvi. 5—7.

But he came down to me at Jordan, and I sware to him by the Lord, saying, I will not put thee to death with the sword.] See 2 Sam. xix. 18, 19, &c.

Ver. 9. Now therefore hold him not guiltless: for thou art a wise man, and knowest what thou oughtest to do unto him; but his hoar head bring down unto the grave with blood.] His intention was not, as Abarbinel glosses, that he should put him to death for his cursing him: but he admonishes Solomon not to trust him, nor follow his advice; but if (saith he) he do to thee as he did to me, that is, any ways offend thee, do not forgive him as I did. But bring down his hoar head, &c. that is, though he be an old man, let not that move thee to clemency towards him; but punish him according to his deserts. And David knew his humour so well, that he did not doubt he would give Solomon occasion to cut him off, and that he was so wise as not to spare him. In short, he did not bid him cut him off for cursing him; but only that he should cautiously observe him: and if he committed any new offence worthy of death, not pardon him as he had done.

Ver. 10. So David slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David.] The author beforementioned is a little too conceited in his interpretation of the first part of these words: which he will have to signify, not that David died (which is the common import of this phrase), but that his soul rested in the other world, with those just and good men that had been before him. But he observes well enough, that the latter part of this verse informs us he was not buried in the sepulchre of his father, (as Saul was, 2 Sam. xxi. 12, &c.) for that was in Beth-lehem: but, he being a great king, was buried in the chief city of the kingdom; which he himself had founded, and where was the throne of the house of David, (Psal. cxxii. 5.) He tells also, out of Josephus's Antiquities, (see lib. vii. cap. 12.) that there was a great vault over his sepulchre, in which was hid an immense treasure: unto which nobody knew the way, but those that understood the artifice wherewith it was built. Out of this vault they took, in the time of Antiochus, so much money as made him withdraw his army from them. Which Procopius Gazæus also mentions. And Herod took out of it a great many talents for the building of the temple: but in following times there was no man to be found to whom the secret was communicated, how to open it; so that no more money was taken out from that time. What credit is to be given to this I shall not determine, but suspect its truth.

Ver. 11. And the days that David reigned over Israel were forty years: seven years reigned he in Hebron, and thirty-three years reigned he in Jerusalem.] The very same account is given in 1 Chron. xxix. 27. But in 2 Sam. v. 5. it is said he reigned seven years and six months in Hebron, (and the same is said before, chap. ii. ver. 11.) which, with the three and thirty years in Jerusalem, make forty years and a half. To solve this difficulty (as some of the Jews esteem it) they have devised this conceit: that David had a leprosy six months, to punish him for his adultery with Bath-sheba: all which time he being as a dead man, it is not accounted to his reign. But they did not consider that the six months was part of his reign in Hebron, before he committed that adultery in Jerusalem. Which shews that this is a frivolous fancy; and the true account of this matter is, that the Scripture is wont to reckon only complete years (as Kimchi observes upon that place of Samuel), and therefore omits the six months, being but a part of the year. (See vi. 38.)

Ver. 12. Then sat Solomon upon the throne of David his father; and his kingdom was established greatly.] This Abarbinel thinks may refer to the second solemn investiture of Solomon by all the estates of the realm. Who confirmed that which had been done by a few (though by David's order) at Gihon, (1 Chron. xxix. 22, 23.)

Ver. 13. And Adonijah the son of Haggith came to Bath-sheba the mother of Solomon. And she said, Comest thou peaceably? And he said, Peaceably.] She had some reason to distrust him: because by her means he had lost the kingdom.

Ver. 14. He said moreover, I have something to say unto thee. And she said, Say on.] He did not pretend to come to make her a visit; but about some business.

Ver. 15. And he said, Thou knowest that the kingdom was mine.] By right of primogeniture.

And that all Israel set their faces on me, that I should reign.] The kingdom, he pretends, was his by the inclination of the generality of the people to him, as David's successor.

Howbeit the kingdom is turned about, and become my brother's: for it was his from the Lord.] Lest she should imagine he meant any harm, or was inwardly disgusted at his being disappointed of the kingdom, he calls Solomon his brother; and entitles God to the change: and therefore would not have her think he affected another change; which would be to oppose the Lord.

Ver. 16. And now I ask one petition of thee, deny me not. And she said, Say on.] In the Hebrew the words are, turn not away my face: which signify, that he should be very much ashamed if she did not grant his petition.

Ver. 17. And he said, Speak, I pray thee, to Solomon, the king (for he will not say thee nay), that he give me Abishag the Shunammite to wife.] Both he and she surely were not ignorant, that it was unlawful for any man to marry his father's wife: but they thought, because David knew her not, the marriage was not completed.

Ver. 18. Bath-sheba said, Well, I will speak for thee to the king.] For she did not understand the drift of this desire: but was only forward to do courtesies to a man, fallen from very great hopes.

Ver. 19. Bath-sheba therefore went unto king Solomon, to speak unto him for Adonijah. And the king rose up to meet her, and bowed himself unto her.] For the high honour to which he was advanced, did not make him forget the honour due to a parent: unto whom he was also much indebted for his preferment to the kingdom.

And sat down in his throne, and caused a seat to be set for the king's mother.] In the Hebrew it is, a throne to be set for her: it being a seat in the form of a throne, though not so glorious as the king's.

And she sat on his right hand.] Which was the most honourable place, next to himself, (Psal. xlv. 9. cx. 1.)

Ver. 20. Then she said, I desire one small petition of thee; I pray thee, say me not nay.] It is likely it was the first petition she had made to him; and, as she thought, would cost him nothing: which made her call it, a small petition.

And the king said, Ask on, my mother; for I will not say thee nay.] If the thing were fit, and safe to be granted.

Ver. 21. And she said, Let Abishag the Shunammite be given to Adonijah thy brother to wife.

Ver. 22. And king Solomon answered and said unto his mother, And why dost thou ask Abishag the Shunammite for Adonijah? ask for him the kingdom also.] He gently reprehends her ignorance: for it is as if he had said, Do you call this a small petition? You had as good ask the kingdom for him.

(For he is my elder brother).] And hath that pretence to the kingdom: unto which he would add this.

Even for him, and for Abiathar the priest, and for Joab the son of Zeruiah.] Who were all in this plot. So the Hebrew words, in the opinion of Lud. de Dieu, are better rendered by the Chaldee paraphrast, than by any other interpreter, Was not he, and Abiathar, and Joab, in this counsel? The LXX. more plainly, With him are Abiathar the priest, and Joab the chief commander of the army: that is, they are his accomplices, and have laid their heads together to give him this counsel.

Ver. 23. And king Solomon sware by the Lord, saying, God do so to me, and more also, if Adonijah have not spoken this word.] Made this request, which he knew came originally from him.

Against his own life.] For he looked upon it as a treasonable design, to ask David's wife might become his. For, according to the custom of the Hebrews, no man who had been servant of the king, might serve any other master; nor might any man ride upon the king's horse; nor sit on his throne, nor use his sceptre: as they say, in the title Sanhedrin, cap. 2. sect. 2. 5. Much less might any private person marry the king's widow: who belonged only to his successor. Therefore God gave David all the wives of Saul, (2 Sam. xii. 8.) All which the Gemara upon that place (cap. 2. sect. 14.) applies unto this history of Adonijah; whose desire to marry the king's widow (which was not lawful for any private person) was looked upon as an affecting the kingdom. So Coccius glosses upon that place. And, indeed, Adonijah seems to have understood well enough, that Abishag was wholly in the power of Solomon; and did not return to her father's house after the death of David: but remained with him in his possession, as one of those things that were appropriated to him. Which moved Adonijah (as Abarbinel observes) to desire her of Solomon; and not address himself to her, or to her relations; but to him, because she belonged to the crown. (See Selden, lib. i. de Uxor. Hebr. cap. 10.)

Ver. 24. Now therefore, as the Lord liveth, which hath established me in the throne of my father, and hath made me a house.] That is, a royal family.

As he promised.] In 2 Sam. vii. 12, 13.

Adonijah shall be put to death this day.] He repeats the oath, to signify it was his unalterable resolution he should not live; but be put to death, without delay: which in such cases is very dangerous.

Ver. 25. And king Solomon sent by the hand of Benaiah the son of Jehoiada; and he fell upon him that he died.] For such executions were there done not by mean persons, but by men of eminence: who at the king's command cut off offenders. (See Judg. viii. 20.)

Ver. 26. And unto Abiathar the priest the king said, Get thee to Anathoth, unto thine own fields.] This was a city of the priests, (Josh. xxi. 28.) where he commanded him to lead a private life, either in that part of the suburbs which fell to his share, or in some land which he had purchased, as Jeremiah afterward did, (Jer. xxxii. 6—8.)

For thou art worthy of death: but at this time I will not put thee to death.] He seems now only to reprieve him, that he might keep him upon his good behaviour: for if hereafter he gave just cause, he might put him to death, as well as now put him out of his office.

Because thou barest the ark of the Lord God before David my father.] He was faithful to him in the rebellion of Absalom: when he brought the ark from Jerusalem to accompany him, (2 Sam. xv. 24. 29.)

And because thou hast been afflicted in all wherein my father was afflicted.] Underwent all the hardships that David inured, all the time of his exile under Saul, (1 Sam. xxii. 20, 21, &c.)

Ver. 27. So Solomon thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the Lord; that he might fulfil the word of the Lord, which he spake concerning the house of Eli in Shiloh.] Which might partly move Solomon to deprive him. (See 1 Sam. ii. 31, &c.)

Ver. 28. Then tidings came to Joab.] That Adonijah was put to death, and Abiathar banished.

(For Joab had turned after Adonijah, though he had not turned after Absalom).] The reason of which, Abarbinel thinks, was, because Solomon was very young, and not fit, he thought, to manage public affairs: and his mother also had a blot upon her.

And Joab fled unto the tabernacle of the Lord.] Which was at Gibeon. (See the foregoing chapter, ver. 51.) This makes it appear that Joab had a hand in the counsel beforementioned, (ver. 22.) as Solomon suspected.

And caught hold on the horns of the altar.] Which were four, at each corner thereof: in height, as the Jews say, five hand-breadths; that is, a common cubit. Here he thought to save himself, according to the custom of all nations, who fled to their altars, when they were guilty of any great crime, and were in great danger. But Jewish doctors say, Joab was mistaken in two things. First, in fancying there was security from thence for a wilful murderer: and, secondly, in that he looked for safety by taking hold of the horns of the altar, whereas the refuge of the altar (as Kimchi saith) was on the top of it only. But I look upon this as frivolous; Rasi's opinion is better: that as God appointed them cities of refuge whither the manslayer should flee when they came into the land of Canaan, (Exod. xxi. 13.) so, while they were in the wilderness, the camp of the Levites served for that purpose. And the following words (ver. 14.) declaring, that if a man committed a presumptuous murder, he should be taken from the altar and put to death; it not only confirms what he saith, but intimates, that even in the land of Canaan the altar continued a refuge for those that fled to it. But then this question arises, why Joab (who, as the Jews fancy, was president of the great Sanhedrin, and understood the law) should think to find shelter here, being a wilful murderer? To which the Jews answer, that he hoped hereby to save his estate, which otherways would have been forfeited. So they say in the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 6. n. 7. He hoped to be condemned by the judgment of the Sanhedrin, and then his goods would go to his heirs: whereas if he was cut off by the king they would fall to him. (See Coccius there, Annot. 2.) Others say, he hoped to obtain burial by this means. But I take these to be mere conceits. It is more probable, that, as Dr. Lightfoot conjectures, he hoped to obtain a pardon, as Abiathar had done, by consecrating himself to God and to his service: as he did, he thinks, by this solemn ceremony. For the laying hold of the altar had a vow in it for the future, as well as the hope of present safety. Which may be argued from the name of the altar: which made that which touched it to be holy. (See his treatise of the Temple, chap. 34. sect. 3.)

Ver. 29. And it was told king Solomon that Joab was fled into the tabernacle of the Lord; and, behold, he is by the altar: then Solomon sent Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, saying, Go fall upon him.] Which punishment, as Abarbinel observes, was not inflicted on him for killing Abner and Amasa: though the remembrance of that innocent blood which he shed moved him not to pardon the faults he had newly committed: first, in setting up Adonijah to be king while his father was living, which was no better than rebellion; being done without David's order: and, secondly, in this new attempt to pretend to the kingdom, by advising him to beg Abishag for his wife. Solomon did not punish him for the former, because he had pardoned Adonijah: and therefore would not be severe against his adherents. But he renewing his traitorous designs, he thought fit to cut them both off: and Joab thought he deserved no less, as appears by his flying to the altar. Which was an acknowledgment that he was guilty of that crime which Solomon charged upon him, in being one of the wicked counsellors of Adonijah, and therefore deserved to die. Thus he.

Ver. 30. And Benaiah came to the tabernacle of the Lord; and said, Thus saith the king, Come forth.] The forenamed author thinks that Benaiah had a mind to bring him to Solomon, and try to get his pardon, so far as to have him only deposed from his office, as Abiathar was.

And he said, Nay; but I will die here.] Which he said, that he might bring Solomon into the people's hatred for staining the house of God with blood.

And Benaiah brought the king word, saying, Thus said Joab, and thus he answered me.] This interpreters generally take to be but the repetition of the same thing in different words: but Abarbinel takes them for two distinct answers of Joab, in which he refuses to come from the place where he was; and pronounces the sentence upon himself, and desires no pardon. For those words, thus saith Joab, respect (he thinks) the sentence which he pronounced on himself, that he would die: and those words, thus he answered, signify he would not come from the altar.

Ver. 31. And Solomon said to Benaiah, Do as he hath said, and fall upon him, and bury him.] Kill him at the very altar, where he resolves to die: after which he would not deny him burial suitable to his quality, (ver. 34.) But many think he did not kill him at the very altar; but dragged him from thence, and then slew him. For what need was there to defile the holy place with blood? And so the command is, Exod. xxi. 14. Though others are of opinion, that Solomon did think fit to have him killed at the very altar; to let all men see that no place, though ever so holy, should secure any man from the hand of justice.

That thou mayest take away the innocent blood, which Joab shed.] He means the blood of those two persons mentioned in the next verse: whose murder (as I said before) was not the immediate reason of Joab's death: but the words of Solomon are to be understood (Abarbinel thinks) as if he had said to Benaiah, Do not imagine thou shalt offend God, by killing Joab at the very altar, but rather perform an acceptable service to him: by cutting off a man who deserves to die, not only upon the account of Adonijah; but of the innocent blood which he shed heretofore. So the business of Adonijah was the principal cause of his death: the other only the secondary; which he remembers, that he might warrant Benaiah to kill him in the tabernacle.

From me, and from the house of my father.] The crimes of Joab in killing those two men could not be punished by the house of judgment, because there were no witnesses of that murder: but David might have done it by such proofs as satisfied him of his guilt. Yet he omitted it, because Joab was so potent in the army: and so Solomon feared the guilt might stick upon his family, if it were not wiped off by this execution upon Joab.

Ver. 32. And the Lord shall return his blood upon his own head.] Make him alone bear the punishment of his iniquity.

Who fell upon two men more righteous and better than he, and slew them with the sword, my father not knowing thereof, to wit, Abner the son of Ner, captain of the host of Israel, and Amasa the son of Jether, captain of the host of Judah.] His crime was the more heinous, because it brought a suspicion upon David, as if it had been done by his order: which calumny he laboured to wipe off, by the unfeigned grief he expressed for Abner, (2 Sam. iii. 37.)

Ver. 33. Their blood therefore shall return upon the head of Joab, and upon the head of his seed for ever.] Why doth he repeat what he said before? Abarbinel answers, it is not a mere repetition; but Solomon pronounces that the curse of David should come upon him: so that Joab's own death should not expiate the guilt; but his posterity should suffer for it in future generations, according to what David said, 2 Sam. iii. 28, 29.

But upon David, and upon his seed, and upon his house, and upon his throne, shall be peace for ever before the Lord.] He prays and prophesies that his family and kingdom might never suffer upon this account, now that the sin which had not been punished in David's lifetime, had received a just punishment from him.

Ver. 34. So Benaiah the son of Jehoiada went up, and fell upon him, and slew him.] He is said to go up, because Gibeon, where Joab was at the tabernacle, was a high place.

And he was buried.] It is not said who took care of his burial; but it is likely Benaiah. (See ver. 21.) Because Joab was a man of dignity, and one of the royal family.

In his own house in the wilderness.] He did not bury him in the house, but in some ground belonging to it, and accounted a part of the habitation, which was in the wilderness; so they called those parts of the country, which were but thinly inhabited. And Abarbinel is of opinion, that here Joab had built a hospital, where he provided, in several rooms, a bed, a table, and a candlestick, for poor travellers.

Ver. 35. And the king put Benaiah the son of Jehoiada in his room over the host; and Zadok the priest did he put in the room of Abiathar.] It is evident that Zadok was a great man before this; at least the vicar of the high-priest Abiathar: who was, as some of the Jews fancy, deprived by David himself, or suspended from his office, upon his anointing Adonijah. But no such anointing is mentioned in the story of Adonijah; nay, it is most likely (as I before observed) that he wanted it. And therefore he remained high-priest till now that Solomon removed him, and translated that great office from the family of Ithamar to that of Eleazar, (according to the threatening against Eli, 1 Sam. ii. 30.) in which it continued till the time of the captivity; no notice being taken of Jonathan the son of Abiathar, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 42. and in 1 Sam. xv. 27. See Selden, de Succession. in Pontif. lib. i. cap. 4, 5. and Grotius, de Imperio Sum. Potestat. where he observes, (cap. 10.) that the sagan, or vicar of the high-priest, had rather a hope, than a right, to succeed in the office of high-priest. For Maimonides saith, the Sanhedrin chose him out of the family of Aaron; but here it is plain the king disposed of that office. For otherwise it could not be said truly, that Solomon put Zadok in the room of Abiathar; by the same authority that he put Benaiah in the room of Joab. Bellarmine, indeed, for fear kings should be thought superior to the high-priest, saith, Solomon did this not as a king but as a prophet. (Lib. ii. de Pontifico, cap. 29.) But Solomon was not yet a prophet; and all they who had royal authority in the time of the Macedonians, and Romans, and the posterity of Herod, challenged to themselves this power of making a high-priest; though they left to the Jews an αὐτονομία (the government of themselves by their own laws) in other things.

Ver. 36. And the king sent and called for Shimei, and said unto him, Build thee a house in Jerusalem, and dwell there, and go not forth thence any whither.] It was fit to confine such a turbulent man as Shimei was; and not suffer him to go about whither he pleased, throughout the tribes of Israel, where he might stir up sedition. But it was very kind to confine him to such a pleasant place as Jerusalem, and the suburbs of it: which made Abarbinel renew his conceit (from those words of David, thou hast with thee Shimei), that Solomon had a great love to him, and made him his familiar. But it is more reasonable to think that Solomon suspected his fidelity; and therefore would have him always in his eye, in the royal city.

Ver. 37. For it shall be, that on the day thou goest out, and passest over the brook Kidron, thou shalt know for certain that thou shalt surely die.] He mentions the brook Kidron, because that was in the way to Baharim; where Shimei dwelt: as appears by comparing 2 Sam. xv. 23. with xvi. 5. But Solomon's intention was, that if he went out of Jerusalem any way, to a greater distance than Kidron was from thence, he should die for it. For when he went to Gath after his servants, he went directly the quite contrary way; that city lying westward of Jerusalem, as Kidron did eastward.

Thy blood shall be on thine own head.] He should be guilty, and nobody else, of his death: for it was in his power to preserve his life.

Ver. 38. And Shimei said unto the king, The saying is good.] He confesses the king's kindness in this injunction; and that he was beholden to him, for laying no greater burden upon him.

As my lord the king hath said, so will thy servant do.] Which he confirmed by an oath, (ver. 42, 43.)

And Shimei dwelt in Jerusalem many days.] Three years, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 39. And it came to pass, at the end of three years, that two of Shimei's servants ran away unto Achish the son of Maacah, king of Gath: and they told Shimei, saying, Behold, thy servants be in Gath.] Achish had been so great a friend to David, that though David had conquered the Philistines, yet he suffered Achish still to retain the title of king, and to be only tributary to him: so that there was a friendly correspondence between his city and Jerusalem; where Shimei might easily hear, by somebody or other who had been at Gath, that his servants were there.

Ver. 40. And Shimei arose, and saddled his ass, and went to Gath to Achish to seek his servants.] In three years' time he thought Solomon might have forgotten his injunction; or he presumed he would not hold him strictly to it: especially since he did not go from Jerusalem for his pleasure, but to recover what he had lost; which he thought was pardonable. For these servants, it is likely, were worth a great deal of money: where with he had purchased them.

And Shimei went, and brought his servants from Gath.] Where Achish would not protect them; being in friendship with the Israelites.

Ver. 41. And it was told Solomon that Shimei had gone from Jerusalem to Gath, and was come again.] If Solomon had not constant spies about Shimei, to watch his motions; yet such a journey as this could not be well undertaken so secretly, but some or other would observe it, and inform against him.

Ver. 42. And the king sent and called for Shimei, and said unto him, Did I not make thee swear by the Lord, and protested unto thee, saying, Know for certain, that on the day thou goest out, and walkest abroad any whither, thou shalt surely die? and thou saidst unto me, The word that I have heard is good.] He repeats their agreement; and only adds that he made Shimei solemnly swear that he would stand to it, and did thankfully accept it.

Ver. 43. Why then hast thou not kept the oath of the Lord, and the commandment that I have charged thee with?] He lay under a double guilt, of breaking his oath to God, and of disobeying the king's command.

Ver. 44. And the king said moreover to Shimei, Thou knowest all the wickedness that thine heart is privy to, that thou didst to David my father.] He knew upon what wicked principles he cursed David, and what inward hatred and malice he had to him: and what villanous designs against him, if he could have accomplished them.

Therefore the Lord shall return thy wickedness upon thine own head.] Upon which, if he reflected, he could not but see the justice of God, in letting him fall into other crimes, which deserved death.

Ver. 45. And king Solomon shall be blessed, and the throne of David shall be established before the Lord for ever.] To which Shimei wished confusion: but the Lord turned his curses into blessings, as David hoped, (2 Sam. xvi. 12.)

Ver. 46. So the king commanded Benaiah the son of Jehoiada; which went out, and fell upon him, that he died.] He went out from the presence of the king, and carried Shimei along with him: and then did execution upon him.

And the kingdom was established in the hand of Solomon.] By the removal of these bad men beforementioned: and by the alliances he made, mentioned in the next chapter, &c.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. AND Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh king of Egypt, and took Pharaoh's daughter.] To be his wife. Which was not unlawful, if she was first made a proselyte to the Jewish religion; as in all probability she was. For though his wives drew him in to worship strange gods; yet the gods of the Egyptians are not reckoned among them, (xi. 5, 6, &c.) which is a sign she was not a worshipper of other gods. Hitherto also Solomon loved the Lord, as it is said, ver. 3. and was beloved of him, as his appearing to him in Gibeon shews, ver. 5.

And brought her into the city of David.] Unto his palace at Jerusalem: which was after he had begun to build the temple, as they say in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 15.

Until he had made an end of building his own house, and the house of the Lord.] After which he built a house on purpose for this wife to dwell in, (ix. 24. 2 Chron. viii. 11.) But first he built God's house, then his own, and then the walls of Jerusalem.

And the wall of Jerusalem round about.] If David encompassed it with a wall, as some think is signified, 2 Sam. v. 9. Solomon made another wall, and thereby made it stronger than David left it. Or else, he repaired the wall which David had built, and raised it higher.

Ver. 2. Only the people sacrificed in high places, because there was no house built unto the name of the Lord, until those days.] This is a short account of the happiness of Solomon's reign hitherto, that there was nothing in it blameable, but only the people's sacrificing in high places. Which having been ancient places of worship (in groves or woods, on the top of hills), the people continued to resort thither, to perform that worship which God had appointed. So that there was no fault in the worship itself, but only in the place of it. And he gives the reason why the people took this liberty, because there was not a house built, to be a settled place for worship; the tabernacle also had been removed from place to place a long time; and was not fixed till it came to Jerusalem. Concerning high places, see upon Deut. xii. 2. Cornel. Bertram, indeed, fetches the original of them from the cities of the Levites, where they kept schools, and had places for prayer; and where he thinks the people at last sacrificed in the highest part of the city. (De Repub. Judaica, cap. 15.) But this custom seems, more likely, to have been derived from the ancient patriarchs, and was imitated by the gentiles as well as Jews.

Ver. 3. And Solomon loved the Lord, walking in all the statutes of David his father.] Following his directions, who commanded him carefully to observe all God's laws, ii. 2, 3.

Only he sacrificed and burnt incense in high places.] Which David his father had never done (as far as appears by his history), which renders Solomon's fault the greater, in following the common practice of all the nations, rather than the example of his pious father.

Ver. 4. And the king went to Gibeon to sacrifice there; for that was a great high place.] Because the tabernacle was there, and the great brazen altar which Moses made. For after Shiloh was destroyed, it was carried to Nob; and the priests being there slain by Saul, it was carried to Gibeon, (2 Chron. i. 3.) where the Jews say, there was the greatest synagogue in all the land.

A thousand burnt-offerings did Solomon offer upon that altar.] It is not easy to apprehend how so many sacrifices should be consumed upon an altar, which was but five cubits square; for I suppose he speaks of Moses's altar, which was of no larger dimensions. But Kimchi hath well observed, that we must not fancy they were all offered upon one day; but during the time he stayed at Gibeon, before he returned to Jerusalem. Yet if we suppose this was at some of the great festivals, none of which lasted above seven days, it must be acknowledged a wonderful thing, that so many should be consumed, though offered both at morning and evening sacrifice. The Jews therefore do acknowledge a miracle herein, as there were many, they say, continually at the temple; which are disbelieved, because the Jews are accounted fabulous writers. But if well considered, some of them at least carry good reason in them. For instance, they say the smoke of the sacrifices went always directly up to heaven in a steady pillar, and was not blown about with every puff of wind, as smoke commonly is. For if it had not been so, when there was a vast number of sacrifices offered, no man would have been able to stand in the court of the Lord's house. The fire also upon the altar was exceeding quick and devouring, being celestial fire, which dispatched the sacrifice sooner than ordinary fire would have done. So Dr. Lightfoot observes, in his treatise of the Temple, chap. 34. sect. 1. From whence it was called Ariel, the lion of God, because it was so devouring. And therefore, after the return from their captivity from Babylon (as L'Empereur observes out of the Gemara), the altar was made larger; because the fire burnt more slowly, when they wanted that heavenly flame, which was strong and powerful. (Annot. in Cod. Middoth. cap. 1. sect. 1. p. 103.)

Ver. 5. In Gibeon God appeared to Solomon in a dream by night.] Perhaps he thought he saw the Divine glory shine round about him: or else the meaning is, God revealed himself in a dream, as the Targum here expresses it, The Lord was revealed to Solomon by night; when men have often seen that represented to them, which they found true when they were awake; as Tully shews by many instances; especially out of Aristotle's famous story of the two men that travelled together to Megara; one of which being killed in his inn, the other, who lay in a friend's house, had all the fact represented clearly and distinctly to him in his dream, as if he had seen it done; so that he found out the murderers in the morning. (See lib. i. De Divinatione, cap. 24—26, &c.)

And God said, Ask what I shall give thee.] He heard a voice speaking to him, and bidding him ask what he desired, and it should be bestowed upon him. This voice he took to be from God (as appears by his answer), who herein shewed himself very gracious to Solomon, and also made a trial of his inclinations.

Ver. 6. And Solomon said, Thou hast shewn unto David my father great mercy, according as he walked before thee in truth, and righteousness, and in uprightness of heart with thee; and thou hast kept for him this great kindness, that thou hast given him a son to sit upon his throne, as at this day.] Thankful acknowledgments of mercies already received (as St. Chrysostom notes), invite new blessings to be bestowed upon us. Uprightness of heart, here ascribed to David, doth not signify that he was without fault (for the contrary is evident, that he was guilty of great transgressions against the moral law), but it is spoken in opposition to Saul, who was rejected for controlling the orders of God.

Ver. 7. And now, O Lord my God, thou hast made thy servant king instead of David my father; and I am but a little child: I know not how to go out or how to come in.] There are those, particularly Rasi, who think he was but twelve years old when he spake these words; and therefore calls himself naar, a child. But Abarbinel hath shewn, that they ground this upon an uncertain computation; and that, if he was but a child of twelve years old now, he must have begun to reign when he was but seven or eight years old: for he had sat some time upon the throne, as appears by the foregoing story, when he had this dream. And his father calls him a wise man, when he left the throne to him, (chap. ii. 6. 9.) And, from many other strong arguments, he concludes him to have been at least twenty years old when he began to reign; and therefore calls himself here a child, with respect only to his skill in managing public affairs; as is signified in the last words, I know not how to go out, &c. i. e. to govern so great a people, for want of experience. Thus Benjamin is called a child, Gen. xlvi. 20.; and Moses calls Joshua by the same name, Exod. xxxii. 10. though they were above thirty years old: and the sons of Eli, when they ministered as priests, 1 Sam. ii. 17.

Ver. 8. And thy servant is in the midst of thy people which thou hast chosen, a great people, that cannot be numbered or counted for multitude.] And consequently great abilities were required to do exact justice to them all.

Ver. 9. Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart to judge thy people, that I may discern between good and bad: for who is able to judge so great a people?] That is, without the Divine guidance and assistance, he thought it impossible to understand what was law in all cases; so as dexterously to dispatch business, and decide all differences. For young men, as Aristotle observes, are unfit for government; because in them, τὸ βουλευτικὸν ἀτελὲς, their consultive power is very imperfect, as he speaks in the first book of his Politics, cap. 7. And therefore, in his book ad Nicomachum, he will not so much as admit a young man to the lectures of politics; τῆς πολιτικῆς οὐκ εἶην ἀκροατὴς οἰκεῖος ὁ νέος. But this is not universally true, as we see not only in the example of Solomon, who was extraordinarily accomplished by God in his youth for the greatest things; but by some examples among the heathen, of young men who managed the weightiest affairs with as much prudence as they who were of the greatest experience. Witness Scipio and Octavianus Augustus. But such persons were rarely found: so that Solomon himself saith, "Woe to the land whose king is a child," (Eccles. x. 16.)

Ver. 10. And the speech pleased the Lord, that Solomon had asked this thing.] For it was a token of a virtuous mind and a public spirit, that desired above all things the honour of God, and the good of his people.

Ver. 11. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thyself long life; neither hast asked riches for thyself, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies.] Which are things of which men are naturally most desirous.

But hast asked for thyself understanding to discern judgment.] As far transcending long life, wealth, and victory over enemies.

Ver. 12. Behold, I have done according to thy words: lo, I have given thee a wise and understanding heart, so that there was none like thee before thee, neither after thee shall any arise like unto thee.] For other wise men gather their knowledge by study, and observation, and other helps (as Abarbinel here notes), but Solomon had his by inspiration: so that he went to bed an ignorant man, but awaked in the morning like an angel of God. At once, as his words are, he who was like other men, was made like the Son of God. For he had not only the skill of government imparted to him; but a general knowledge of all other things, as the following history tells us. Whence he fancies he calls himself Agur, (Prov. xxx. 1.) because in him there was a collection of all manner of wisdom and knowledge, and this imparted from God. Which is the reason, he imagines, why he does not call himself Oger, which is an active word, but Agur, which is a passive: because he did not gather all his wisdom himself, but it was given him from the hand of God.

Ver. 13. And I have also given thee that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour.] These are absolutely promised him: but here is no mention of long life; for that depended upon the condition of his steadfast obedience to God, as it follows in the next verse.

So that there shall not be any among the kings like unto thee all thy days.] He promises he should excel all the kings that were in his time, in riches and renown: though there were richer in future ages, as Alexander and others were.

Ver. 14. If thou wilt walk in my ways, and keep my statutes and commandments, as thy father David did walk, then I will lengthen thy days.] This God himself mentions, in the first place, (ver. 11.) as the greatest worldly blessing; especially when accompanied with great riches and honour: which Solomon was not to expect, unless he continued obedient to God.

Ver. 15. And Solomon awoke; and, behold, it was a dream.] He saw and heard all the foregoing things so clearly and distinctly in his sleep, as if he had been awake: and did not know till he awoke that all was done in a dream; which was one way of God's revealing himself to his prophets. But Maimonides, I think, is here a little too curious; for from these words, Behold it was a dream, he concludes this was an inferior degree of prophecy from what others had in dreams. For they that prophesied in dreams, do not call it afterward a dream; but simply say, it was a prophecy. So when the patriarch Jacob awoke out of a dream of prophecy, he did not say it was a dream, but saith absolutely, Surely God is in this place, &c. Gen. xxviii. 16. (More Nevoch. lib. ii. cap. 45.)

And he came to Jerusalem, and stood before the ark of the covenant of the Lord.] Which was there in a tabernacle which David pitched for it, (2 Sam. v. 17.) though the tabernacle which Moses made remained at Gibeon; where Solomon had been to worship.

And offered burnt-offerings, and offered peace-offerings.] Giving thanks to God, that he had been pleased to speak with him, and reveal himself to him.

And made a feast for all his servants.] Upon the sacrifices of peace-offerings, it is likely, which he had offered; whereby he endeared himself unto them. For nothing more wins men's affection than bounty, affability, clemency, and such-like virtues.

Ver. 16. Then came two women that were harlots unto the king.] They kept a house of public entertainment, as the Targum translates it, and perhaps were also common women: but then, the Jews suppose, they were not Israelites, but strangers; and so not comprehended in the law, Deut. xxiii. 17.

And stood before the king.] As they used to do, who brought any cause before a court to be judged.

Ver. 17. And the one woman said, O my lord, I and this woman dwell in one house; and I was delivered of a son with her in the house.] This case, as Abarbinel thinks, should have been first brought into some of the inferior courts, near the place where they lived; and if they could not have determined it, then to the great Sanhedrin: and if they found it too hard for them, then they should have brought it to the king; who otherwise might have easily erred, no inquisition having been made into the matter, if a Divine Spirit had not directed him. But this opinion of Abarbinel is grounded on another fancy, that there was a great Sanhedrin in these days, which cannot be proved.

Ver. 18. And it came to pass, that the third day after I was delivered, that this woman was delivered also.] Of another son; which being born so soon after the other, they could not be distinguished by their age.

And we were together; there was no stranger with us in the house, save we two in the house.] So that there was no witness of what passed between them; but all relied on their own credit; which made the case more difficult.

Ver. 19. And this woman's child died in the night; because she overlaid it.] Some marks upon the body, it is likely, discovered that it was smothered: and Kimchi here notes, that if it had died of a disease it would have cried, and the neighbours been called in, and the thing been known.

Ver. 20. And she rose at midnight, and took my son from beside me, while thy handmaid slept, and laid it in her bosom, and laid her dead child in my bosom.] This made the matter obscure; for how should she know what her companion did, when she was asleep?

Ver. 21. And when I arose in the morning to give my child suck, behold, it was dead; but when I had considered in the morning.] When it was perfect day; which it was not when she arose to suckle the child.

Behold, it was not my son which I did bear.] There was some resemblance, it is likely, in the features of the two children; so that the neighbours did not know the one from the other: but the mother, who had carefully observed it, knew by some tokens that this dead child was none of hers.

Ver. 22. And the other woman said, Nay; but the living is my son, and the dead is thy son. And this said, No; but the dead is thy son, and the living is mine. Thus they spake before the king.] One affirming what the other denied; but having no evidence to make proof of what they said.

Ver. 23. Then said the king, The one saith, This is my son that liveth, and thy son is the dead: and the other saith, Nay; but thy son is the dead, and my son is the living.] From hence the Jews argue, that the judges before they pronounced sentence were bound to sum up the evidence that had been given on both sides: that it might be seen they had observed and understood their allegations, and accordingly gave judgment. For thus Solomon doth in this case, where there was no more than he repeated; there being no witnesses on either side.

Ver. 24. And the king said, Bring me a sword. And they brought a sword to him.] As much as to say, Here is nothing but affirming on one part, and denying on the other, without any proof: I must therefore try some other way to decide this controversy.

Ver. 25. And the king said, Divide the living child in two, and give half to the one, and half to the other.] For both pretended to it, and this he thought the best way to end the dispute. For he knew the woman, whose the child really was, would be moved with such tender compassion to it, that she would never suffer it to be divided: and so he should discover the true mother. Thus interpreters commonly expound it. But Abarbinel thinks this would have been no extraordinary proof of Solomon's wisdom above other men's; nor have begot such a fear in the Israelites as this judgment did. Therefore he thinks Solomon made a discovery of the truth, antecedent to this experiment; by observing the countenance, the manner of speech, and all the motions of the women, whereby he discerned the secrets of their hearts, and penetrated to the bottom of the business; which this command to divide the child discovered to all.

Ver. 26. Then spake the woman whose the living child was unto the king (for her bowels yearned upon her child), and she said, O my lord, give her the living child, and in no wise slay it: but the other said, Let it be neither mine nor thine, but divide it.] Natural affection clearly discovered the truth, without any other evidence.

Ver. 27. Then the king said, Give her the child, and in no wise slay it: for she is the mother of it.] As appeared by the pity which her love excited to it.

Ver. 28. And all Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged, and they feared the king.] Very much reverenced, and stood in awe of him.

For they saw that the wisdom of God was in him to do judgment.] That is, saith Abarbinel, the wisdom proper to God; which searches the reins, and trieth the hearts. Therefore they feared him, persuading themselves, they could not have a thought of any evil design against him, which he would not discover.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. So king Solomon was king over all Israel.] Reigned with the full consent of all the tribes of Israel.

Ver. 2. And these are the princes which he had.] The principal officers employed under him.

Azariah the son of Zadok the priest.] He was the son of Ahimaaz, the son of Zadok; and therefore was Zadok's grandson, (1 Chron. vi. 8, 9.) But such are usually called sons in Scripture, as Rasi observes upon Gen. xx. 12. And Zadok, it is probable, in his old age, bred him up in his house as his child. It is not said here what office he had, unless we translate the word priest, as we do in the margin, chief officer, or prime minister of state. But this Abarbinel thinks is a mistake; and he takes him to have been one of the scribes, together with those two that follow in the next words, Elihoreph and Ahiah. For thus he thinks the words should be translated, Azariah the son of Zadok the priest, and Elihoreph, and Ahiah the son of Shisha, were scribes; there wanting a vau before Elihoreph, as is frequent in Scripture, (Exod. i. 1, 2.) And these three secretaries had each their several employments. One, he thinks, was in matters of judgment; the other in the revenue; and the third was concerned in writing annals, keeping the records, and was a public register.

Ver. 3. Elihoreph and Ahiah the sons of Shisha, scribes: Jehoshaphat the son of Ahilud, the recorder.] Or master of requests. So Rasi understands the word hammaskir: one that heard all men's causes, and brought them before the king.

Ver. 4. And Benaiah the son of Jehoiada was over the host; and Zadok and Abiathar were the priests.] That is, the principal, or high-priests. Kimchi thinks this was not that Abiathar whom Solomon ejected, and placed Zadok in his room, (ii. 35.) but another of that name. But Ralbag takes him to be the same that was thrust out of the priesthood; yet suffered to minister, when Zadok was not well, or could not attend: and Abarbinel approves of this opinion. Or, perhaps, Solomon permitted him, upon his petition, to come to Jerusalem, not to officiate as high-priest, but to live upon the altar, (according to the prediction, 1 Sam. ii. 36.) and he retained the name and title of high-priest, though Zadok only enjoyed the office. L'Empereur thinks he is here joined with Zadok, because in the beginning of Solomon's reign he did discharge the office of high-priest: and after he was deposed, he retained the title of that dignity as long as he lived, because of his precedent function. (Annot. upon Bertram de Rep. Jud. p. 420.)

Ver. 5. And Azariah the son of Nathan was over the officers.] That is, the twelve officers mentioned below, (ver. 7, 8, &c.) who gave accounts unto him, who was their overseer.

And Zabud the son of Nathan was principal officer, and the king's friend.] The word cohen signifies here, as it doth 2 Sam. viii. 18. minister of state, among whom Zabud was the chief: one whom the king entrusted with the management of all affairs, and with his most secret counsels, he being always with him, as Abarbinel observes. Dr. Hammond notes upon St. Matt. ix. Annot. 2. that the king's friend was an officer of nearness to the king: as Mr. Selden observed before him, in his Uxor. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 16. p. 201, 202. For Nathan having bred up Solomon, (see 2 Sam. xii. 25.) it was easy for him to get his sons preferred by him to the highest dignities under him, when he came to be king; especially since he was very instrumental in placing him upon the throne.

Ver. 6. And Ahishar was over the household.] Lord high-chamberlain (as we speak in our language), who took in, and displaced officers in the family.

And Adoniram the son of Abda was over the tribute.] Which was imposed on the people for the support of the government. Such contributions were raised several ways in several kingdoms: but good and wise princes took care not to lay burdens on such things as were necessary for the livelihood of the poor; and that they were not too heavy upon any thing: as Solomon's were, if the people's complaints were just, after his death: but perhaps this word tribute, which we translate levy in the margin, may refer not to the levying of money, but of men. Concerning which we read in the next chapter, ver. 13, 14. where Adoniram is said to be over the levy: and so he might be over both, of men and money.

Ver. 7. And Solomon had twelve officers over all Israel, which provided victuals for the king and his household: each man in his month made provision.] The country being divided into twelve parts, there were so many persons (called Nitzavium, because there they were placed) constituted to buy provisions for the king and his family, at the best hand, and every thing in its proper season; to be sent to the place where the king resided, by every one in his month. By which means there was great plenty for all that belonged to the court; both for his house, and his stables of horses; for domestics, and for all foreigners that came thither about business, or to hear his wisdom: who were there entertained without any grievance to his people.

Ver. 8. And these are their names: The son of Hur.] He tells only the name of the father, who it seems was more illustrious than the son: unless we translate these words, Ben-Hur.

In Mount Ephraim.] And the territory belonging to it: which must be understood of the rest of the places mentioned in the following verses.

Ver. 9. The son of Bekar.] Or Ben-Bekar, as those that follow may be translated: though it is probable, as I said before, that the fathers are named, not the sons, because they were very illustrious persons, and better known: who managed, perhaps, this affair by their sons.

In Makaz, and in Shaalbim, and Beth-shemesh, and Elon-beth-hanan.] It is not material in what country these places were; and therefore I shall not inquire after them.

Ver. 10. The son of Hesed, in Aruboth; to him pertained Sochoh, and all the land of Hepher.] There were more Sochos than one, as we find Josh. xv. 35. 48. It is uncertain which is here meant. The land of Hepher possibly may be the portion given to the daughters of Hepher, (Josh. xvii. 3, &c.)

Ver. 11. The son of Abinabab, in all the region of Dor; which had Taphath the daughter of Solomon to wife.] Solomon had no daughters marriageable when these officers were made: but in process of time this man, and Ahimaaz mentioned ver. 15. had behaved themselves so well in their office, that Solomon did them the honour to give them two of his daughters to be their wives.

Ver. 12. Baana the son of Ahilud; to him pertained Taanach and Megiddo, and all Beth-shean, which is by Zartanah, beneath Jezreel, from Beth-shean to Abel-meholah, even unto the place that is beyond Jockneam.] These places have been named in the foregoing books: where I have noted as much as I can find about them. Here the author names the person himself that was employed (as he doth in some of the following verses) and not merely the father. The reason of which I cannot give, unless it were that he was a very noted person.

Ver. 13. The son of Geber, in Ramoth-Gilead: to him pertained the towns of Jair the son of Manasseh, which are in Gilead: to him also pertained the region of Argob, which is in Bashan, threescore great cities with walls, and brazen bars.] These countries beyond Jordan are also well known, being often mentioned in the foregoing books.

Ver. 14. Abinadab the son of Iddo had Mahanaim.] And the territory belonging to it, which was very fertile: but this seems to some not to bear proportion to the rest, being not a twelfth part of the whole country. Therefore they follow the marginal translation, to Mahanaim: that is, all the territory from the places beforenamed unto this place.

Ver. 15. Ahimaaz was in Naphtali; he also took Basmath the daughter of Solomon to wife.] As Abinadab had married another of his daughters, (see ver. 11.)

Ver. 16. Baanah the son of Hushai was in Asher and in Aloth.] This man, perhaps, was the son of Hushai, the friend of David; and therefore preferred by Solomon.

Ver. 17. Jehoshaphat the son of Paruah in Issachar.] It appears by this, and the foregoing and following verses, that some of these officers had whole tribes assigned them for their province.

Ver. 18. Shimei the son of Elah in Benjamin.] Concerning this person, see chap. i. ver. 8.

Ver. 19. Geber the son of Uri was in the country of Gilead, in the country of Sihon king of the Amorites, and of Og king of Bashan.] That is, in the rest of the country of Gilead beforementioned, ver. 13.

And he was the only officer which was in the land.] There is nothing in the Hebrew answering to those words, he was: therefore this doth not relate to the officer beforementioned; but the meaning is, as Abarbinel expounds it, that besides all those officers beforenamed, there was another who took care of strangers, who were going to court, or coming from it: as the other twelve took care of his family, and all belonging to it. This officer made provision in that country where the king then dwelt; and therefore is not named, because he was not fixed and settled in his office, as the others were; but chosen by the citizens of that city, where the king resided.

Ver. 20. And Judah and Israel were many, as the sand which is by the sea in multitude.] The same Abarbinel thinks this and the next verses explain the reason why this officer was appointed: first, because Israel and Judah were so great a people; and secondly, because strangers came from several regions, to bring presents, or about other business. And therefore it was necessary this officer should set a reasonable price upon all things sold in the market, that they might not exact upon any body, when they saw a multitude of buyers, which might tempt them to sell their commodities too dear.

Eating and drinking, and making merry.] In perfect security; and being well-pleased and highly satisfied.

Ver. 21. And Solomon reigned over all kingdoms, from the river to the land of the Philistines, and unto the border of Egypt.] The bounds of his kingdom were Euphrates on the east, the country of the Philistines on the west, and Egypt on the south. For so God promised that their dominion should be extended, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates, (Gen. xv. 18.) And accordingly David conquered so far, and Solomon maintained his conquests.

They brought presents, and served Solomon all the days of his life.] This explains what went before: which is not to be understood as if all those countries had no other king than Solomon; but that their kings were tributaries to him, and made him presents in token of their subjection.

Ver. 22. And Solomon's provision for one day was thirty measures of fine flour, and sixty measures of meal.] By meal is meant a coarser sort of flour for inferior servants: and the measure here spoken of contained ten ephahs. So here was bread enough provided for near three thousand persons, as some compute it.

Ver. 23. Ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and a hundred sheep.] This and the foregoing verse Abarbinel thinks are added, to satisfy some questions that arise about the constitution of so many officers: for why might he not be supplied out of the neighbouring cities and towns? which he shews here could not be; because of the vast quantity of provision which was necessary for one day. And it is observable, that oxen are here mentioned in the first place (both those fatted at home, and those fatted in the pastures), being anciently esteemed the most noble meat: as appears by Homer's heroes. Who, as Dioscorides notes, never had any thing in their feasts, no, not at marriages, but fat oxen. See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 32. where he mentions the great entertainments made by Agamemnon, Menelaus, Nestor, Alcinous. Nor did they that courted Penelope, though the most voluptuous of all men, eat any other meat.

Besides harts, and roe-bucks, and fallow-deer.] Which were meats highly esteemed among the Jews, and mentioned next to the foregoing, Deut. xiv. 4, 5.

And fatted fowl.] Many restrain the word Barburim to birds, or fowl, as we do: and some think they were capons: Kimchi and others say, fatted fowl out of Barbary; from whence they had the name of Barburim. But the name of Barbary was not known in Solomon's time: and therefore Bochart thinks the word should be translated, the choicest of all fatted things, (Hieroz. par. ii. lib. i. cap. 19.) and so Gousset, in his late Commentaries of the Hebrew Tongue.

Ver. 24. And he had dominion over all the regions on this side the river.] It might be objected to what was said before, that all the country of Israel could not afford such a constant supply of provisions: which he prevents by this observation, that his dominion extended to a great many other regions, from whence they might be furnished with more than his own country afforded.

From Tiphsah even unto Azzah, over all the kings on this side the river.] This is an explication of what is said ver. 21. that he reigned from the river, that is Euphrates, to the land of the Philistines: for Tiphsah is the same with the city Tapsæus; where there was a bridge, and a ferry over Euphrates, as Strabo testifies in many places: (see lib. xvi. p. 747.) and the very name implies as much, for פסח is transire, to pass over, in the Hebrew language.

And he had peace on all sides round about him.] None of his neighbours gave him any disturbance: so that the Israelites had nothing to divert them (as Abarbinel observes) from improving their lands, and increasing their rents; whereby there was a greater plenty of all things. Machiavel magnifies those who by force of arms achieved mighty things, and raised themselves to a great height of glory: but Hermannus Conringius well corrects him with this observation, that Solomon among the Jews, and Numa Pompilius among the Romans, got a more lasting name in all future ages by the art of peace. For which he refers to Cicero, lib. ii. de Officiis.

Ver. 25. And Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree, from Dan even to Beer-sheba.] This he saith (the same author thinks) to shew the great plenty of corn, and wine, and oil, as well as of cattle and all other things: vines and fig-trees are particularly mentioned, because they were planted in Judea more than any other trees; for the sweetness of their fruit, and the benefits of their shade.

All the days of Solomon.] That is, till the end of his life. When some adversaries were stirred up against him: but for so short a time, in his old age, that he had peace the far greater part of his reign, (1 Chron. xxii. 9.)

Ver. 26. And Solomon had forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots.] In 2 Chron. ix. 25. it is said he had but four thousand. But there is no disagreement between these two places; for he speaks here of his horses, and there of their stalls or stables; there being ten in every stable, which make forty thousand, as Abarbinel observes. But this doth not satisfy Bochartus, who rather inclines to Jacobus Capellus's opinion, that the Hebrew word arbaim here signifies four not forty, (Hierozoicon, lib. ii. par. i. p. 155, &c.) But this is without example; therefore others think that in the Chronicles the author speaks of those stalls for horses which he had in Jerusalem for his constant guard, which were but four thousand: whereas here he speaks of those which were dispersed throughout his whole kingdom.

And twelve thousand horsemen.] Which were distributed, it is likely, in every tribe; to keep them in peace, and to be ready to oppose any enemy that might invade them: wherein Abarbinel thinks that Solomon did not offend against the law in Deuteronomy, which commanded them not to multiply horses, (xvii. 16.) because he did it not out of pride and vanity; but to preserve peace, by keeping all his neighbours in awe. And he professes not to trust in them, Prov. xxi. 31.

Ver. 27. These officers provided victuals for king Solomon, and for all that came to king Solomon's table, every man in his month: they lacked nothing.] This is repeated, to shew their diligence, exactness, and care, which were remarkable: especially since they took care of his stables, as well as of his household, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 28. Barley also and straw.] Barley was anciently horse-corn, as appears by many places in Homer; which Bochartus hath observed in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 9.

For the horses and dromedaries.] The Hebrew word rechesh signifies swift horses, as Abarbinel thinks. (See Esther viii. 14.) But others take them for mules, as we translate it in the margin. Bochartus thinks it certain, that this word imports a kind of horse, Micah i. 13. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 6. 21.)

Brought they unto the place where the officers were.] Or rather, where the beasts were. For there is no word for officers in the Hebrew.

Every man according to his charge.] Which lasted for a month, every year.

Ver. 29. And God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much.] Knowledge of all manner of things; and prudence in the administration of the government.

And largeness of heart.] A mind very comprehensive of all sort of knowledge; and a heart to do a vast deal of good.

Even as the sand that is on the sea-shore.] As the sand there encloses a vast body of waters; so his mind contained an ocean of knowledge, as the lord Bacon somewhere observes.

Ver. 30. And Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east country.] Some, by these eastern sages, understand the Chaldeans: who were rather a northern people, as Jeremiah describes them, (i. 14.) and were not famous for learning in Solomon's time; nor began to be so till the reign of Nabonassar: nor are the Tyrians here meant, as Pineda imagines; for they were a western people: but the Oriental Arabians; who were famous for wisdom in ancient times, as appears by the book of Job. And in after-ages Porphyry reports (as St. Cyril tells us, lib. x. contra Julianum), that Pythagoras travelled into this country, to improve himself in learning: where were many of those wise men called magi, as well as among the Persians. Thus Conringius in his Supplementum 5. ad L. de Antiq. Academicis. But after all, Abarbinel takes the word kedem not to signify east, but ancient time. And so the children of kedem are those who were born in the days of old: when men lived some hundreds of years; and so improved themselves in knowledge (especially in astronomical learning), far more than it was possible for men to do, after their lives became very short. This makes our wisdom defective, as was observed by Hippocrates in his Aphorisms, "Art is long, and life is short." But Solomon, by a special gift of God, was more knowing than they who lived above ten times as long as he did. But this is a forced sense, as appears by the next words, concerning Egypt.

And all the wisdom of Egypt.] Which country was celebrated for wisdom in Moses's time, as appears from Acts vii. 22. and in aftertimes Macrobius calls Egypt, matrem artium, the mother of arts. But it was famous, especially, for the knowledge of the motions of the heavenly bodies: for he saith, (lib. i. Saturnal. cap. 15.) "Primos omnium cœlos scrutari et metiri ausos fuisse;" that they were the first who attempted to search and measure the heavens: for which the great serenity of their air gave them opportunity. As for their civil prudence, it is sufficiently indicated in the words of Isaiah, xix. 11.

Ver. 31. And he was wiser than all men.] Of that age wherein he lived. But some extend this to all men that were before him, or should come after him. For in Midrasch Koheleth (upon Eccl. vii. 24.) they thus gloss, "Wiser than col Adam, all men (this is the first Adam), and than Ethan (this is Abraham), and than Heman (this is Moses)." But Maimonides discreetly confines the words to the men of that age, whom he mentions, Ethan, Heman, &c. and will by no means allow him to have been wiser than Moses. (See More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 4.)

Than Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, and Chalcol, and Darda.] If these were the sons of Zerah the son of Judah, mentioned 1 Chron. ii. 6. then it is not true that Solomon is compared only with the wise men of his age; for these lived long before him. And the two former are thought to have been endued with the spirit of prophecy, being the authors, as some think, of two psalms. For Psalm lxxxviii. is said to be an instructive Psalm of Heman the Ezrahite, and the next (lxxxix.) of Ethan the Ezrahite. Of this opinion is Dr. Lightfoot. But it is more probable that other men are here meant; for we read of Heman, the grandchild of Samuel, 1 Chron. vi. 33. who was also a prophet, 1 Chron. xxv. 5. and in the same time there was one Ethan, a Levite of the posterity of Merari, 1 Chron. vi. 46. who is joined with Heman and Asaph as principal singers, 1 Chron. xv. 17. Now the forementioned psalms may more reasonably be ascribed to them; there being express mention of David and his kingdom in one of them: and then Solomon is compared only with the wise men of his own time, and not with those that lived before Moses. They that think otherwise of these men, were misled by the Jews, who would have some psalms to have been composed before David. This they began to suppose (as a most learned friend of mine, Dr. Alix, hath observed to me) after the times of the apostles, as Justin Martyr affirms in his Apology, p. 76.

The sons of Mahol.] This confutes those that make them the sons of Zerah: unless we suppose him to have had two names, as it must be confessed was common among the Jews. And this last name might be given him, because he was a skilful musician: for Mahol signifies a pipe.

And his fame was in all nations round about.] All the neighbouring countries heard the fame of his wisdom.

Ver. 32. And he spake three thousand proverbs.] Being an excellent moral philosopher, as well as a natural. St. Jerome thinks these are those we read in the book of the Proverbs, which doth not contain so many: but is more probable than what Josephus affirms, that he wrote three thousand books of Proverbs: which is an extravagant conceit; for the Scripture mentions only three thousand proverbs, many of which we must confess to have been lost, as other composures of his are.

And his songs were a thousand and five.] He was a great poet also: for anciently wise men were wont to give good instructions in songs; which made them to be more easily remembered. But none of these compositions were thought to be divinely inspired, but only the song of songs: which was therefore joined to the sacred books. The rest were not adapted to stir up a sense of piety; as the Psalms of David were: who is therefore called the sweet singer of Israel, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1.

Ver. 33. And he spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall.] That is, of all sorts of plants, from the greatest to the smallest. For ezub (which we commonly translate hyssop) seems to be the same with the Ethiopian word azub, which signifies mint; and is more agreeable to this place, being more directly opposed to the cedar than hyssop: which hath a stalk, and sometimes of great strength, as De Dieu and Job Ludolphus have observed. And for this reason Hottinger (in his Smegma Oriental. p. 580.) takes it for the wall-flower, which is less than hyssop. But Bochartus maintains hyssop to be here meant; of which the Jews reckoned four sorts: and one of them may well be thought to grow upon walls. Though there is no necessity, he thinks, to put that interpretation upon the word bekir, which we translate on the wall: which may signify, as the particle beth doth in many places, near or hard by the wall. Of Jerusalem, that is, which was encompassed with mountains: and the Arabians observe that hyssop grew in the mountains, especially about Jerusalem. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50.) From Solomon's great skill in the properties and virtues of all plants, Nachmanides makes bold to conclude that he wrote a book of medicine.

And he spake also of beasts, and fowl, and creeping things, and fishes.] This shews the vastness of his learning; which comprehended the whole history of animals, as well as of plants; whose nature and qualities he understood. Some Jews fancy that Aristotle saw these books, and published them in his own name, in his Historia Animalium. It is a rule given by those who write books of civil prudence, that they who apply themselves to the management of public affairs, should not follow other studies; which by their delight may draw their minds too much from business: but Solomon had so vast a genius, that he pursued all manner of knowledge, while he governed his kingdom with great prudence. For he composed a great number of songs, and discoursed of all sorts of creatures, both in the sea and in the land: which belonged to contemplative, not to practical studies. So that in his days the wish of Plato was fulfilled, that "either philosophers might be kings, or kings be philosophers."

Ver. 34. And there came of all people to hear the wisdom of Solomon, from all kings of the earth, which had heard of his wisdom.] It is a conceit of Kimchi, that kings came from all parts of the countries round about to hear his wisdom; and their people, when they returned, came to their kings to learn what Solomon had said. But this is not the literal sense of the words; nor is it probable that any but the queen of Sheba came in person to hear his wisdom. For they would have been mentioned, as she is. Therefore the plain meaning is, that people came from all the neighbouring nations, being sent by their kings, who heard of his fame. Nay, their own natural desires might carry them to him. For, as Dion Prusæus observes, (Orat. de Regno, p. 6.) there is no spectacle so grateful as a wise and good king. All men flock to see him, and partake, τῆς καλῆς διανοίας καὶ ἀγαθῆς, of his good and pious mind. Especially if he be mild and gentle, there is no spectacle so sweet and lovely; insomuch, that they who see him are loath to leave him (as he speaks a little before), and they that hear him, ἐπιθυμοῦσιν ἰδεῖν, &c. are desirous to see him, more than children are to find their unknown father.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. AND Hiram king of Tyre sent his servants unto king Solomon.] That is, he sent ambassadors to condole with king Solomon on the death of his father (as the manner was), and to congratulate his accession to the throne. Eupolemus calls this king Suron (as he is called Huram in the book of the Chronicles), and makes mention of those letters which were sent by these ambassadors. (See Eusebius in his Præpar. Evang. lib. ix. cap. 33, 34.)

(For he had heard that they had anointed him king in the room of his father); for Hiram was ever a lover of David.] And therefore was desirous to continue in friendship with his son.

Ver. 2. And Solomon sent to Hiram, saying.] There were three embassies passed between them, as Abarbinel observes; for Hiram began, and Solomon returned it; and then Hiram sent to him again, ver. 8. But two only are mentioned in 2 Chron. ii. 3. 11. For Ezra there (as he observes) minded only what concerned the building of the temple; and so omitted the first embassy, which was no more than a compliment.

Ver. 3. Thou knowest how that David my father could not build a house to the name of the Lord his God, for the wars which were about him on every side, until the Lord put them under the soles of his feet.] This was one reason; but not the chief: for God commanded him to desist, when he had it in design.

Ver. 4. And now the Lord my God hath given me rest on every side, so that there is neither adversary nor evil occurrent.] Nothing to make him fear any disturbance.

Ver. 5. And, behold, I purpose to build a house unto the name of the Lord my God.] For his worship and service.

As the Lord spake unto David my father, saying, Thy son, whom I will set upon thy throne in thy room, he shall build a house unto my name.] This he spake by the prophet Nathan, 2 Sam. vii. 13.

Ver. 6. Now therefore command them.] That is, his servants who were skilled in such work.

To hew me cedar-trees.] Which were the most firm and durable, as well as most fragrant of all other.

Out of Lebanon.] Which was, if not all, yet a great part of it within the dominion of Solomon. Who therefore doth not ask trees of him which were his own; but only that his servants should hew and prepare them for his use, which they understood better than the Israelites.

And my servants shall be with thy servants.] To assist them, as they should be directed by them; and to receive the timber from them, and convey it to Solomon, when it was prepared.

And unto thee will I give hire for thy servants, according to all that thou shalt appoint.] Pay them what wages they pleased to demand for their work.

For thou knowest there is not among us any that can skill to hew timber like the Sidonians.] Both Tyre and Sidon were now under one and the same king, and both of them very ingenious in mechanics; especially the Sidonians: whom Homer calls πολυδαιδάλους, excellent artists in divers things. For he ascribes to them all the neater sort of work, both in his Iliads and his Odyssey, as Bochartus observes, in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 35. By which arts they grew very rich, in a time of long peace, which they enjoyed, as we learn from Judg. xviii. 7. where the Sidonians are made the example of those that lived very securely. But as for the Israelites, they did not mind manufactures, but applied themselves wholly to agriculture and feeding of cattle. There had been most admirable workmen among them, who knew how to cut and engrave precious stones, to cast and work up metals, &c. but this was before they came into the land of Canaan, in the time of Moses, when Bezaleel and Aholiab excelled in many different arts, which were necessary for the work of the tabernacle. But the Scripture acquaints us, that they had their skill by inspiration from God; and it doth not appear that they had any successors; so that in the time of Solomon there were no professed artificers who could undertake the work of the temple.

Ver. 7. And it came to pass, that when Hiram heard the words of Solomon, he rejoiced greatly.] Which demonstrates a more than ordinary friendship which he had for king David and the people of Israel.

And said, Blessed be the Lord this day, which hath given unto David a wise son over this great people.] If he was not become a proselyte to the Jews' religion (which one would have expected should have been recorded if he had), yet he had a great veneration for the God of Israel, who was properly called the Lord: and, it is likely, he worshipped him together with his own God.

Ver. 8. And Hiram sent to Solomon, saying, I have considered the things which thou sentest to me for: and I will do all thy desire concerning timber of cedar, and concerning timber of fir.] The word which we translate fir, others think signifies pine or cypress. For fir seems not so fit for this work, being a light wood, and not durable, and apt to take fire. Their conjecture is most reasonable, who think it was a kind of cedar: and therefore comprehended under that name, ver. 6. where Solomon desires of him only, that his servants might hew him cedar-trees.

Ver. 9. My servants shall bring them down from Lebanon unto the sea.] The Mediterranean Sea; in which his city stood.

And I will convey them by sea in floats.] Some think they were tied together, and drawn in the water by vessels; as the manner now frequently is: but they wanted not vessels wherein to convey them; for Diodorus Siculus saith, (lib. vi.) that Sidon had in his time, τριήρεις καὶ πεντήρεις πλείους τῶν ἑκατὸν, more than a hundred three-oar and five-oar vessels belonging to it: and that city was but two thousand furlongs from Tyre, as Strabo saith.

Unto the place that thou shalt appoint me.] Which was Joppa: a famous sea-port in the country of Israel, (2 Chron. ii. 16.)

And will cause them to be discharged there, and thou shalt receive them.] When they were landed in that place.

And thou shalt accomplish my desire, in giving food for my household.] For, living in barren islands, they wanted corn; though they had plenty of money; being great merchants. And in aftertimes, it appears, they were supported by provisions from Judea, (Acts xii. 20.)

Ver. 10. And Hiram gave Solomon cedar-trees, and fir-trees, according to all his desire.] That is, he agreed to give him all that he desired: but the trees were not yet cut down and prepared.

Ver. 11. And Solomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of wheat for food to his household, and twenty measures of pure oil.] In 2 Chron. ii. 10. it is said twenty thousand baths of oil. How corim and bathim differ I shall not examine; but that place in the Chronicles plainly speaks of what was given to the workmen, who had other things besides (there mentioned) to support them in their labours: but here the prophet speaks of what was given for the use of Hiram's family, as Kimchi and Ralbag solve this seeming contradiction. Abarbinel hath another solution. (See Buxtorf's Vindicæ Hebr. Veritatis, par. ii. cap. 2. p. 424.)

Thus gave Solomon to Hiram year by year.] During their lives.

Ver. 12. And the Lord gave Solomon wisdom as he promised.] His wisdom appeared more and more in all his transactions.

And there was peace between Hiram and Solomon; and they two made a league together.] It was lawful in ancient times, before the law of Moses was given, to make leagues with strangers to their religion for their mutual benefit: as appears by the story of Jacob and Laban, Isaac and Abimelech (though some doubt whether he was an idolater), and the law of Moses made no alteration, as Grotius observes, lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 16. sect. 9. If Hiram therefore worshipped other gods, Solomon might notwithstanding make a league with him, (insomuch that Hiram calls him brother, ix. 13.) he being none of the seven nations of Canaan.

Ver. 13. And king Solomon raised a levy out of all Israel; and the levy was thirty thousand men.] To cut down the trees which Hiram's servants were to hew.

Ver. 14. And sent them to Lebanon, ten thousand a month by courses; a month they were in Lebanon, and two months at home.] That they might not be tired with their labour; nor neglect their own families while they were employed abroad.

And Adoniram was over the levy.] Took care to raise them, and to see them disposed according to Solomon's order. (See iv. 6.)

Ver. 15. And Solomon had threescore and ten thousand that bare burdens.] viz. Porters, carters, seamen, and such-like.

And fourscore thousand that were hewers in the mountains.] That is, hewers of stone, for timber was hewed by Hiram's servants in Lebanon. And these hundred and fifty thousand were not Israelites, as the thirty thousand beforementioned were; but strangers of other nations, as may be gathered from ix. 21, 22. It may seem strange to some, that so many men should be employed about the building of so small a place as the temple was: but they must consider that there were many other works besides which Solomon designed, and which he finished; (ix. 15.) for which we read of no other preparation of materials but what was now made.

Ver. 16. Besides the chief of Solomon's officers which were over the work, three thousand and three hundred, which ruled over the people that wrought in the work.] In 2 Chron. ii. 18. they are said to have been three thousand and six hundred: for three hundred were overseers even of the three thousand three hundred, who were to oversee the rest. That is, superior officers, who surveyed the whole, as Kimchi observes. Or, as Abarbinel takes it, there were three hundred supernumeraries, who were employed in the more exquisite sort of work: or when any of the other failed, were ready to supply their places.

Ver. 17. And the king commanded, and they brought great stones, costly stones, and hewed stones, to lay the foundation of the house.] All things being now prepared, Solomon himself seems to have been present at the laying of the foundation of the house; which was not only very strong, but also very magnificent. For he caused stones of great bigness to be laid for the foundation, and some of great price, (such as marble, some think, see vii. 10.) and those also hewn and polished, not rough, that they might lie more regularly and even: which shews the nobleness of his mind, in making that which was not exposed to open view suitable to that which was seen.

Ver. 18. And Solomon's builders and Hiram's builders did hew them.] It seems Solomon's servants learned of Hiram's; or at least were directed by them to assist in the work.

And the stone-squarers.] Or the Giblites, as it is in the margin, who are mentioned in Josh. xiii. 5. being Phœnicians, inhabitants of Gabala, a promontory mentioned by Pliny, (see Psal. lxxxiii. 7.) who were the most excellent artists in those parts.

So they prepared timber and stones to build the house.] Made all ready not only to lay the foundation, but to build the house.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, in the four hundred and eightieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt.] These years are variously computed by the Jewish doctors; with which I shall not trouble the reader: but only observe, that they are plainly divided into two intervals, by the words of Jephthah to the Ammonites, Judg. xi. 26. where he tells them the Israelites had dwelt in the land of Canaan three hundred years. Unto which if we add the forty years wherein they wandered in the wilderness, there were three hundred and forty years past at that time, since they came out of Egypt. And so the other interval from thence unto the building of the temple was a hundred and forty years: which is not hard to make out, according to Sir John Marsham's computation. (See my annotations on that place of the book of Judges.)

In the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel.] But why did he not begin the work sooner, according to the command of his father David, who left him all things necessary, gold, silver, brass, &c. for the building of it; and also a draught of it: so that he might have begun when he began to reign? To which Abarbinel answers, that Solomon would not make use of what his father had prepared, but resolved to build the house at his own cost and charge; and put into the treasury of the Lord's house, that which David had dedicated to this work; (vii. 51.) and therefore he stood in need of four years' time, to gather so much gold and silver as was necessary to defray the charges of this work.

In the month Zif, which is the second month, that he began to build the house of the Lord.] Either to lay the foundation of it, or to build upon the foundation beforementioned.

Ver. 2. And the house which king Solomon built for the Lord.] For his worship and service: and wherein his Divine presence might dwell among them, (ver. 13.)

The length of it was sixty cubits.] Forty of which belonged to the holy place; and twenty to the most holy.

And the breadth thereof twenty cubits, and the height thereof thirty cubits.] The length and breadth of it was twice as big (Abarbinel and others observe) as the tabernacle of Moses: which was in length but thirty cubits, and in breadth but ten. Whereas the temple was twenty cubits wide through the whole, and sixty long: besides the porch. When it is said the height was thirty cubits, it must be understood of the holy place: for the holy of holies was only twenty. (See ver. 20.) And so the height of the holy place was three times more than it was in the tabernacle: for his temple was to resemble a high tower; having chambers above it, in three stories one above another, as the Jewish doctors observe. (See 1 Chron. xxviii. 11.)

Ver. 3. And the porch before the temple of the house, twenty cubits was the length thereof, according to the breadth of the house; and ten cubits was the breadth thereof before the house.] He gives no account of the height of it: but in 2 Chron. iii. 4. Ezra seems to say, it was a hundred and twenty cubits. Which words Kimchi imagines relate to the porch alone: but Abarbinel wonders how this could come into his head; when this height belongs to the whole house. For if it belonged only to the porch, then nothing is there said of the house itself: and besides, it immediately follows that he overlaid it with pure gold. Which is not true of the porch (for that was not overlaid with gold) but only of the house of God. Which, from the foundation to the covering of it, was thirty cubits high; and above that covering were three stories of chambers, which were ninety cubits: and so in all the height of the house was a hundred and twenty.

Ver. 4. And for the house he made windows of narrow lights.] Or, as it is in the margin, broad within and narrow without. By which means the house was better secured from the weather; and yet had lights enough. See Casaubon upon Athenæus, p. 363. where he observes, the Greeks call such windows τοξικὰς, "fenestras longas et angustas, ad emittenda tela, quam ad lucem admittendam factas;" long and narrow windows made to shoot out weapons, than to let in light. And he translates these Hebrew words, fenestras, prospectu clausas, viz. from the outward part.

Ver. 5. And against the wall of the house.] Or, joining to it, as it is in the margin: for the beams were not fastened in the walls of the house, as we read in the next verse; but a wooden wall, some think, went round the house, unto which these chambers were fastened.

He built chambers round about, against the walls of the house round about, both of the temple and of the oracle.] But not of the porch where the entrance into the house was. It appears out of Ezekiel and Josephus, as Peter Martyr observes, that there were twelve of these chambers on the south side, and as many on the north; and six on the west.

And he made chambers round about.] In the Hebrew, he made ribs: by which some understand galleries. Which encompassed all the forenamed chambers, as our ribs do the entrails of our bodies. Without which there could not have been a convenient passage to the several chambers: which were made to serve the priests to lay their garments in, and wherein they rested, and ate of the sacrifices, and other uses.

Ver. 6. The nethermost chamber was five cubits broad, and the middle was six cubits broad, and the third was seven cubits broad.] It appears by ver. 10. that they were but five cubits high, and built over one another three stories, increasing in breadth, every story, one cubit, by the contrivance which follows.

For without in the wall of the house he made narrowed rests round about.] In the margin we translate it, narrowings or rebatements. By which seem to be meant, that the wall to which they were adjoined was thicker below and above narrower: so that there was more space to make the upper chambers wider.

That the beams should not be fastened to the walls of the house.] But in that outward wall which I mentioned before, made of wood: for he would have no holes made in the wall of the temple. (See L'Empereur upon Codex Middoth, p. 147, 148. and Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, p. 40.)

Ver. 7. And the house, when it was in building, was built of stone made ready before it was brought thither.] So fitted for their several uses and places, that they might be joined together, without any other labour, by putting them one by, or upon, another.

So that there was neither hammer, nor axe, nor any tool of iron, heard in the house while it was in building.] The sense is plain, that the stones were laid without any noise, there being nothing to be done but to join them together. But the Jews are so foolish as to fancy, that they were not hewn nor planed by any instrument before they came thither; but a worm called samir, which God created on purpose, did the business: and that the stones of their own accord came to the temple; and there the angels laid them in their place and order. (See L'Empereur upon Codex Middoth, p. 183.) Which fable arose from somebody that did not understand the word samir, which signifies a very hard stone called smiris (as Bochartus hath observed), with which stones might be cut and polished as diamonds are. (See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. vi. cap. 11.) An emblem this was, as all interpreters note, of that peace and quiet which should be in the Christian church, where all things should be done without contention. "Utinam Deus hoc tandem aliquando elargiatur, ut omnes in domo suo idem dicamus et sentiamus," as P. Martyr prays upon this place.

Ver. 8. The door of the middle chamber.] By which they were to go into the middle row of chambers.

Was in the right side of the house.] On the south side, which in Hebrew is called the right side, because, when men look towards the east, the south is on their right hand. Some think there was the like door in the north; but it is more likely, that one door served to carry them round to all the chambers.

And they went up with winding stairs into the middle chamber.] That they might take up the less room.

And out of the middle into the third.] There was the like pair of stairs into the third story.

Ver. 9. So he built the house, and finished it.] That is, the walls of the house.

And also covered the house.] He also covered the top of it.

With beams and boards of cedar.] In the margin, the vaultings and the ceilings of cedar. That is, the roof was an arch within, which made it look more noble, though without it was flat.

Ver. 10. And then he built chambers against all the house five cubits high.] The word then is not in the Hebrew; and being omitted the sense is plain, that he gives an account of the height of these chambers, as before (ver. 6.) of the breadth. But it is very briefly; and we are to understand that those below, and those in the middle, and those above, were every one of an equal height; viz. five cubits. So they were fifteen cubits in all: which was five less than the height of the house, for that was twenty cubits. Otherwise there would have been no room for the windows: which, I suppose, were above all these chambers, in the top of the house.

Ver. 11. And the word of the Lord came to Solomon, saying.] By the prophet Ahijah the Shilonite, as the Jews say, in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 20. For it is not said that God appeared to him now, as he did iii. 5. and ix. 2, 3. In which latter place it is said God appeared to him, the second time: which is a proof (as Abarbinel notes) that now God did not appear to him, but spake to him by a prophet.

Ver. 12. Concerning this house which thou art in building, if thou wilt walk in my statutes, and execute my judgments, and keep all my commandments to walk in them; then will I perform my word with thee, which I spake unto David thy father.] See 2 Sam. vii. 13. Here Abarbinel makes a query, why this prophecy is inserted in the middle of the work, which might seem to have been more proper in the beginning, or after it was ended: but Solomon laying the foundation, and raising the building very firm and strong, which might last to many generations, God would not have him presume upon its duration, unless he and the people of Israel were obedient to him: and therefore told him he had better not proceed, nor be at any further charge, unless he intended to be a good man, and observe all his laws. And the continuance of this house, and of God's presence among them, depending on this, plainly signified, that let him build it ever so strong it should be demolished, if he proved disobedient.

Ver. 13. And I will dwell among the children of Israel.] As he had done in the tabernacle, (Exod. xxv. 8.)

And I will not forsake my people Israel.] But protect them in the good land he had given them.

Ver. 14. So Solomon built the house, and finished it.] God spake the foregoing words, while he was building it, that he might desist, if he did not intend to be obedient to him. But these words import, that notwithstanding this admonition, he went on to build the house, as magnificent and durable as he intended; resolving to keep God's commandments.

Ver. 15. And he built the walls of the house within with boards of cedar.] He wainscotted, as we now speak, the whole house with cedar.

Both the floor of the house, and the walls of the ceiling.] Or, as we translate it in the margin, From the floor of the house, unto the walls of the ceiling. That is, from the bottom to the top.

And he covered them on the inside with wood.] The word them is not in the Hebrew. Which if we retain, it relates to the walls of the ceiling: that is, to the top of the house, which in the inside was covered with wood, (ver. 9.)

And covered the floor of the house with planks of fir.] Or, with another sort of cedar, which was a great deal firmer and more lasting than fir. (See chap. v. 8.)

Ver. 16. And he built twenty cubits on the sides of the house.] The house here meant is the most holy place: for he had spoken of the other part of the house, called the sanctuary, in the foregoing words.

Both the floor and the walls with boards of cedar.] Or, as the foregoing verse, from the floor to the walls of the ceiling.

He even built them for it within, even for the oracle, even for the most holy place.] Here he explains what he meant by the house in the beginning of the verse. And this was most properly the house of all the parts of the temple: because here the Divine Glory inhabited, and from hence God gave answer, when he was consulted. It is called Debir: as the outward house is called Hechal.

Ver. 17. And the house.] That is, the holy place, as the next words explain it.

That is, the temple before it.] The part of the house which was before the most holy place. In the Hebrew the words are before my face: that is, before the place where the Divine Glory appeared.

Was forty cubits long.] As long again as the most holy place. (See ver. 2. 16.)

Ver. 18. And the cedar of the house within was carved with knops.] Of an oblong figure, like an egg, as Forsterus thinks, comparing this place with 2 Kings iv. where there is the like word, and there translated gourds.

And open flowers.] Not buds, but flowers, spread and full-blown.

All was cedar; there was no stone seen.] This relates, I suppose, to the knops and flowers, which were all of cedar: and so doth not contradict 2 Chron. iii. 5.

Ver. 19. And the oracle he prepared in the house within, to set there the ark of the covenant of the Lord.] In the innermost part of the house he fitted the most holy place to receive the ark of God. It seems to be called the innermost part, because it was furthest from the entrance into the building. The Jewish doctors have a conceit, that this signifies a room which he made under ground (under the floor of the oracle), where the ark might be hid, in case the house should be laid desolate. And he made this cave in very deep and winding burrows, putting a stone upon the mouth of it, upon which the ark stood. Here Josiah they fancy hid the ark, and the pot of manna, and the rod of Aaron, and the holy oil, where they were found after their return from Babylon. For which story there is no foundation; and it contradicts what they all acknowledge, that there was no ark in the second temple. It is far more reasonable to think, that by debir, which we translate oracle, is here meant the partition which separated the holy place from the most holy: which Solomon is here said to have prepared or established, in the midst of the house, as the words are in the Hebrew. This Gousset hath made probable: though it appears from ver. 23. (where the cherubims are said to be within the oracle), that this word signifies not only the partition which made the separation, but the place itself, which was separated thereby from the sanctuary, to be God's dwelling-place.

Ver. 20. And the oracle in the fore-part.] That is, in the innermost part beforementioned: which is also called the fore-part, because it was before him that entered into the house.

Was twenty cubits in length, and twenty cubits in breadth, and twenty cubits in the height thereof.] It was a perfect square.

And he overlaid it with pure gold.] Not merely gilt it, but covered it with plates of gold: for the gold amounted to six hundred talents, as Ezra saith, 2 Chron. iii. 8.

And so covered the altar.] Of incense, which was before it in the holy place.

Which was of cedar.] Or, he covered the altar with cedar, that the gold might the better lie upon it.

Ver. 21. So Solomon overlaid the house with pure gold.] That is, the most holy place (called the oracle in the foregoing verse), which he made as sumptuous as he could for the Divine residence.

And he made a partition by the chains of gold.] The most holy place was separated from the sanctuary by a partition: before which there was a veil also, which hung upon golden chains. Thus this passage is to be understood, for the partition itself did not depend upon chains.

And he overlaid it with gold.] That is, overlaid the partition.

Ver. 22. And the whole house he overlaid with gold.] This is meant of the sanctuary, which was overlaid with gold, as well as the oracle.

Until he had finished all the house.] Some think the very chambers, which were without the house, were likewise made thus splendid. But I see no ground to affirm it.

Also the altar, that was before the oracle, he covered with gold.] That is, the altar of incense; thence called the golden altar: which was in the upper end of the sanctuary, near the entrance in the oracle. This he covered with cedar, (ver. 20.) and now overlaid with gold.

Ver. 23. And within the oracle he made two cherubims of olive-tree, each ten cubits high.] These were different from those made by Moses, which were of solid gold: and arose out of each end of the mercy-seat; being of one piece with it, and looking one upon the other, (Exod. xxv. 18, 19.) But these were made of olive-wood; or, as it is in the Hebrew, of tree of oil. For many such sorts of wood there were besides olive; as pine, cedar, &c. And these two are plainly distinguished; olive and oily-wood, in Nehem. viii. 15. Here it may be proper to note, that the word debir (which we constantly translate oracle) comes from debar, which signifies to speak; because God, who dwelt between the cherubims, declared his mind from hence, when he was consulted by the high-priest with urim and thummim: and it still retained this name (though we never read of any answer by urim and thummim while this temple stood), because it had been the place from whence God had been wont to speak to the high-priest. I have observed elsewhere, that there might be the use of urim and thummim in this temple, though it be not recorded: but it is highly probable, that upon their rejecting the government of God, and turning the theocracy into a human government by kings, God ceased to direct and govern them by that Divine oracle. During the reign of David, indeed, there is some footsteps of it, their new government by kings being not yet well established: so that we may think there was a mixture of the theocracy still with it, as may be gathered from 2 Sam. ii. 1. iii. 19. 23. xxi. 1. But after that, there is not the least glimpse of it; but they inquired of God by the prophets, 1 Kings xxii. 3. 2 Kings iii. 11. 29. xxii. 14. where the high-priest himself, being sent by king Josiah to inquire of God, went to Huldah the prophetess. Which is a demonstration, that the answer by urim and thummim ceased, when God's government was cast off by them: to which that oracle properly appertained.

Ver. 24. And five cubits was the one wing of the cherub, and five cubits the other wing of the cherub: from the uttermost part of the one wing to the uttermost part of the other wing was ten cubits.] Whereas those of Moses were only so long as to cover the mercy-seat; which was but two cubits and a half in length, (Exod. xxv. 17.)

Ver. 25. And the other cherub was ten cubits: both the cherubims were of one measure and one size.] So that they filled the whole breadth of the house, which was twenty cubits.

Ver. 26. The height of one cherub was ten cubits, and so was it of the other cherub.] They stood upon their feet, upon the floor of the house, (2 Chron. iii. 13.) each being ten cubits high, as was said at the first, (ver. 23.) that is, half as high as the house.

Ver. 27. And he set the cherubims within the inner house.] With their faces towards the sanctuary: so that they looked upon him that entered into the oracle.

And they stretched forth the wings of the cherubims.] Or rather (as in the margin) the cherubims stretched forth their wings.

So that the wings of the one touched the one wall, and the wings of the other touched the other wall.] That is, the south and the north walls of the house. Whereas the wings of those cherubims that Moses made stretched from east to west: for they looked one upon the other over the mercy-seat.

And their wings touched one another in the midst of the house.] Where they must needs meet, being five cubits long on each side, (ver. 24.) and the house twenty cubits wide.

Ver. 28. And he overlaid the cherubims with gold.] So that there were four cherubims in the most holy place of Solomon's temple. Two lesser made by Moses of massy gold; and two larger made by Solomon, overlaid with gold. Those made by Moses were part of the mercy-seat, and inseparable from it; these of Solomon seem to have spread their wings over it, being added only for the greater ornament and glory of God's house. So Abarbinel observes, that Solomon did not make a new ark, which was the only thing made by Moses, which Solomon did not imitate and make more glorious. But this he durst not presume to open, and to take out the book of the law, and put it into an ark of his own making. It being unlawful for him to touch it, and therefore he let it remain, with its cover, the mercy-seat, and the cherubims belonging to it; and only placed these new cherubims over it, as a covering to it, for the greater beauty of the house.

Ver. 29. And he carved all the walls of the house round about with carved figures of cherubims, and palm-trees, and open flowers, within and without.] Both in the most holy place, and in the sanctuary.

Ver. 30. And the floor of the house he overlaid with gold, both within and without.] This hath the same meaning with the foregoing words: that the floor of the whole house, both the inner and outward part, was overlaid with gold, which made it wonderfully splendid and magnificent.

Ver. 31. And for the entrance of the oracle he made doors of olive-tree.] Or some tree that was oily. (See Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, p. 87.)

The lintel and side-posts were a fifth part of the wall.] These words are very obscure; for the words of the wall are not in the Hebrew, but only a fifth. Which may be understood to signify, that they held the proportion of a fifth part of the doors. But there are those who think the meaning is, that this gate was the fifth in number belonging to the house. The first they make account was that which let into the court of the people; the second, into the court of the priests; the third, was the door of the porch; the fourth, of the holy place; and this fifth of the oracle. And accordingly they interpret these words, ver. 33. the fourth.

Ver. 32. The two doors also were of olive-tree.] Or, as it is in the margin, the leaves of the doors: explaining what sort of doors they were, viz. folding-doors; as it follows, ver. 34.

And he carved upon them carvings of cherubims, and palm-trees, and open flowers, and overlaid them with gold, and spread gold upon the cherubims and palm-trees.] The meaning seems to be, that he laid plates of gold upon the doors of the house, and gilt the cherubims, trees, and flowers.

Ver. 33. So also he made for the doors of the temple.] That is, of the holy place.

Posts of olive-tree, a fourth part of the wall.] See ver. 31.

Ver. 34. And the two doors were of fir-tree.] Or, of a kind of cedar; as was before observed.

The two leaves of the one door were folding, and the two leaves of the other door were folding.] Whereby they took up less room, when they were opened.

Ver. 35. And he carved thereon cherubims, and palm-trees, and open flowers; and covered them with gold fitted upon the carved work.] This was said before, ver. 32. therefore repeated, I suppose, to signify that both sides of the doors were thus carved and covered with gold. I have not meddled with the mystical signification of any of these things: in which men's fancies differ very much; though in one thing they all agree: that by the cherubims, which were so plentiful in every part of the house, the hosts of angels are represented, there attending upon the Divine Majesty, as his ministers to execute his pleasure.

Ver. 36. And he built the inner court.] Which was that wherein the priests officiated.

With three rows of hewed stone, and a row of cedar-beams.] That the people who were in the outward court might see what the priests did: the wall which separated the priests from the court of the people being but three cubits high (as most understand these words); for the cedar was not laid upon the top of the wall, but was the facing of it within side. The priests likewise from hence might speak and deliver any message from God to the people.

I conclude this account of Solomon's works with an observation of Abarbinel: That this Divine writer doth not mention several things belonging to the house of God, as the altar of burnt-offering, the candlestick, the table, the laver, (though they were ten times as many as Moses made, see 2 Chron. iii.) because his intention was only to explain the great things which he did, and such as wrought in men admiration: not things in which there was no majesty, nor any great cost bestowed upon them. Therefore he takes notice of the great and precious stones (that is, stones of great price) wherewith he laid the foundation of the house, (ver. 17.) and the rest of the things mentioned in this chapter; which were very chargeable, and which shewed the greatness of his mind, his wisdom, prophecy (as his words are), and riches: but other things, as the court of the temple, &c. he passes over compendiously. But this observation is not altogether true; for though this Divine writer does not take notice of every thing made by Solomon in this chapter; yet in the next, I think, he omits nothing, save only the brazen altar of burnt-offering, which is not mentioned in this book among Solomon's works; but taken particular notice of in 2 Chron. iv. 1. where its large dimensions are described. All other things, as the lavers, the candlestick, the table, &c. are here mentioned in the following chapter.

Ver. 37. In the fourth year was the foundation of the house laid, in the month Zif.] He repeats this (which was said ver. 1.) to subjoin in the next words, how long the house was in building.

Ver. 38. And in the eleventh year, in the month Bul (which is the eighth month).] As Zif was the second.

Was the house finished throughout all the parts thereof, and according to all the fashion of it.] Every thing was completely finished, according to his design; without any need of addition or alteration.

So was he seven years in building it.] And a half: but the lesser number is omitted, as is usual in these books, and in other authors: particularly half a year is omitted in the reign of David, who is only said to have reigned forty years. (See the second chapter of this book, ver. 11.) And considering the curiosity of the work, and the scarcity of men of skill, it is no wonder that it was so long before it was perfected: but rather the alacrity and diligence of Solomon (as Abarbinel notes) is to be admired; who finished this work with all the speed he could make; when he was almost as many more years in building his own house, which was not so costly and sumptuous. An account of which is given us, in the beginning of the next chapter: where the author tells us he built two houses, and sets down the dimensions of one of them.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. BUT Solomon was building his own house thirteen years, and he finished all his house.] He did not begin to build his own house till he had finished the house of God; that nothing might hinder that holy work. This appears from ix. 10. where we read he was twenty years in building both.

Ver. 2. And he built also the house of the forest of Lebanon.] The forenamed house was in Jerusalem: near to which he built another, in a cool, shady mountain; which made it resemble Mount Lebanon. And here he dwelt in summer, as in the other in winter. But it is not likely it was in Mount Lebanon; for that was in the very extremity of his kingdom, where he would not have set his throne; (as he seems to have done in this house, ver. 7.) for that was too far distant from the usual place of his residence. And for the same reason he would not have there placed the golden shields that he made; as we find he did, x. 17. It was therefore near to Jerusalem, (appears from xiv. 25, 26.) and called by the name of the Forest of Lebanon: just as many pleasant and delightful places in that country were called Carmel. Because it was in a lofty place like Lebanon; and the trees which grew there made it very shady and cool.

The length thereof was a hundred cubits.] Which was not longer than the house of God, if we take in all the courts belonging to it.

And the height thereof thirty cubits.] The height of the first story was so many cubits: upon which, in all likelihood, there was another of the like height.

Upon four rows of cedar pillars.] Which supported the building; and made four walks under it.

With cedar-beams upon the pillars.] Upon which was laid the floor of the next story.

Ver. 3. And it was covered with cedar above upon the beams, that lay on forty-five pillars, fifteen in a row.] So there were but three rows of pillars in the second story, which were sufficient for the support of the roof. And we may guess from hence that there were threescore pillars below.

Ver. 4. And there were windows in three rows, and light was against light.] Directly opposite one against the other, which we call thorough lights.

In three ranks.] Or, on three sides of the house, the south, the north, and the east; that it might have the freer air. On the west side was the porch, and so no windows were there. Others interpret it, the windows were exactly one under another in three rows.

Ver. 5. And all the doors and posts were square with the windows.] The figures of the doors and of the windows were one and the same; viz. square.

And light was against light in three ranks.] This is meant of the smaller windows that were over the doors; which, it is likely, were also square.

Ver. 6. And he made a porch of pillars; the length thereof was fifty cubits, and the breadth thereof thirty cubits.] This was for his guard, and for people to walk in who came about business (as well as for state and ornament), and therefore was covered to keep them dry in rainy weather.

And the porch was before them.] That is, before the pillars of the great house, before spoken of.

And the other pillars and the thick beams were before them.] That is, they were directly opposite one to the other. Or, if we follow the marginal translation (according to them), the sense is, that it had its pillars and beams just like the great house; and, it is likely, rooms built upon those beams for his servants.

Ver. 7. Then he made a porch for the throne where he might judge, even the porch of judgment.] So it was called, because here he sat to hear and determine the causes that people brought before him. With whom he would not have his house cumbered; but made this porch without the house, where he dispatched such business.

And it was covered with cedar from one side to the other.] In the Hebrew, from floor to floor: that is, from the ground to the roof of the porch.

Ver. 8. And his house where he dwelt had another court within the porch, which was of the like work.] There was a court between the porch and the house, which may be called the inner court; and then another beyond the porch, which may be called the outward. So that it stood between two courts, which were both alike.

Solomon also built a house for Pharaoh's daughter.] Near, I suppose, to his own house; she being a person of the highest quality, and his first wife.

(Which he had taken to wife).] See iii. 1.

Like unto this porch.] Not for figure, or bigness; but for the materials of which it was built.

Ver. 9. All these were of costly stones, according to the measure of hewed stones, sawed with saws, within and without.] All the forementioned buildings were polished on both sides: so that they appeared both within and without; that is, both on the inside which was towards the palace of Solomon, and on the outside which was towards the great court.

Even from the foundation unto the coping.] From the bottom of the building to the top of it.

And so on the outside towards the great court.] Not only on the front of the house, but on the back side of it, towards the great court.

Ver. 10. And the foundation was of costly stones, even great stones; of ten cubits, and stones of eight cubits.] By costly stones (mentioned here and in the foregoing and following verses) are not to be understood precious stones; but stones that being bigger and firmer, and better polished than others, were of greater price: as Bochartus explains it, both here and v. 17.

Ver. 11. And above were costly stones (after the measure of hewed stones), and cedars.] The roof was finished after the same manner; with stones and cedar-beams.

Ver. 12. And the great court round about.] viz. Of Solomon's palace.

Was with three rows of hewed stone, and a row of cedar-beams.] Just like the inner court of the house of the Lord; (vi. 36.) and so the following words are to be understood.

Both for the inner court of the house of the Lord.] Or rather, as for the inner court of the Lord's house; for so the particle vau sometimes signifies.

And for the porch of the house.] Of Solomon's own house.

Ver. 13. And king Solomon sent and fetched Hiram out of Tyre.] For though he was an Israelite by birth, yet he dwelt at Tyre: and it is likely had the privileges of that city, and so was one of king Hiram's subjects. And therefore in 2 Chron. ii. 13. that king saith he sent him to Solomon: that is, granted his request, that this man might come and serve him. And accordingly Solomon sent for him, and fetched him to Jerusalem.

Ver. 14. He was a widow's son of the tribe of Naphtali.] She herself was of the tribe of Dan, (2 Chron. ii. 14.) but her first husband was of the tribe of Naphtali; by whom she had this son.

And his father was a man of Tyre.] When she was a widow she married a man of Tyre; who is called Hiram's father, because he bred him up, and was the husband of his mother.

A worker in brass.] And in stone, and purple, and a great many other things, as we read in the place abovementioned But brass is only mentioned here; because he is going to speak only of such works.

And he was filled with wisdom and understanding, and cunning to work all work in brass.] He had an excellent genius to this work; and besides the instructions of his father, it is not improbable that God endued him with great skill in contriving, and also working all manner of work of this sort.

And he came to king Solomon, and wrought all his work.] He presently found him to be an excellent artist; and so employed him in all his business.

Ver. 15. And he cast two pillars of brass, of eighteen cubits high a-piece.] In 2 Chron. iii. 15. it is said, he made two pillars of thirty-five cubits high: which doth not contradict these words, it being evident that there he speaks of both the pillars (as Abarbinel observes), which were thirty-five cubits. But here he speaks of them singly, which were each but eighteen cubits. Both of them, indeed, made thirty-six cubits; but one cubit must be allowed for the basis of each, which is not considered in the book of Chronicles. This seems a better solution of this small difficulty than that of L'Empereur, in his preface to Codex Middoth, where he saith, one of these writers speaks of the common cubit, and the other of the sacred, which was double to the common. Each pillar, therefore, he thinks, was eighteen sacred cubits, but thirty-five common; to which one common cubit must be added for the basis. But this distinction of common and sacred cubits is not allowed by every body.

And a line of twelve cubits did compass either of them about.] So they were four cubits in thickness. (See Dr. Lightfoot, of the Temple, p. 61—63. and L'Empereur's preface to Benjamin Tudelensis.) Eupolemus, a heathen writer, takes notice of these pillars, and says they were as high as the temple. (Eusebius, lib. ix. Præpar. Evang. cap. 34.)

Ver. 16. And he made two chapiters of molten brass, to set upon the top of the pillars: the height of the one chapiter was five cubits, and the height of the other was five cubits.] This account of them Ezra also gives, 2 Chron. iii. 15. Yet in 2 Kings xxv. 17. they are said to be but three cubits. But it is to be observed, that it immediately follows in that place, there was a wreathen work, and pomegranates upon the chapiters; which in all made five cubits; and are all here comprehended in the word chapiter.

Ver. 17. And nets of checker-work, and wreaths of chain-work, for the chapiters which were upon the top of the pillars.] This curious work encompassed the chapiter, and contained, as it were, the pomegranates afterward mentioned; which might be seen through these nets.

Seven for the one chapiter, and seven for the other chapiter.] Some think that each chapiter was adorned with leaves, and flowers, and fruit, in four orders; which were bound about with three chains. But it is very hard to explain this work, which is so very briefly described. (See Dr. Lightfoot, in the forenamed place.)

Ver. 18. And he made the pillars.] That is, he finished them in this manner. (See the same author, p. 63.)

And two rows round about upon the one net-work, to cover the chapiters that were upon the top with pomegranates: and so did he for the other chapiter.] There were two rows of pomegranates; which took up one of the five cubits, whereof the chapiter consisted.

Ver. 19. And the chapiters that were upon the top of the pillars were of lily-work.] In imitation of lilies.

In the porch.] Such as were in the porch of the temple.

Four cubits.] The other four cubits were of lily-work, except the middle.

Ver. 20. And the chapiters upon the two pillars had pomegranates also above, over against the belly which was by the net-work.] This is very obscure, because shortly delivered. But the meaning seems to be, that the lily-work being above and below, at the top and the bottom of the chapiters, the middle cubit (called the belly) was all covered with pomegranates.

And the pomegranates were two hundred, round about upon the other chapiter.] In the book of Jeremiah, lii. 23. it is said that there were ninety-six on a side; but all of them, upon the net-work, were a hundred in all; which Abarbinel thus explains: The pomegranates on the net-work were towards the four quarters of the world, being twenty-four towards each quarter; which in all made ninety-six. And in each angle there being one great pomegranate, they made up the number a hundred.

Ver. 21. And he set up the pillars in the porch of the temple: and he set up the right pillar, and called the name of it Jachin; and he set up the left pillar, and called the name thereof Boaz.] It is generally thought, that these pillars were made and erected only for ornament; because they supported no building. But Abarbinel's conjecture is not improbable, that Solomon had respect to the pillar of the cloud, and the pillar of fire, that went before them and conducted them in the wilderness, and was the token of the Divine providence over them. These he set at the porch or entrance of the temple (Jachin representing the pillar of the cloud, and Boaz the pillar of fire), praying and hoping that the Divine Light, and the cloud of his glory would vouchsafe to enter in there; and by them God and his providence would dwell among them in this house.

Ver. 22. And upon the top of the pillars was lily-work.] This seems to have been said before, (ver. 19.) but the next words, So was the work of the pillars finished, shew that this was a new addition, to crown all, after the pillars were erected, as Abarbinel observes.

Ver. 23. And he made a molten sea.] The Hebrews call any great collection of waters by the name of a sea. So the lake of Gennesaret, and others, are called in the gospel; and here it signifies a great vessel, containing abundance of water. Which served for the washing of the sacrifices, and of the priests and Levites; who washed their hands and their feet; not in it, but with water drawn out of it by pipes or conduits.

Ten cubits from the one brim to the other: and it was round about.] Of a circular figure.

And its height was five cubits.] Beside the height of the oxen whereon it stood.

And a line of thirty cubits did compass it about.] For the diameter being ten cubits, this must be the compass of it. This sea was filled with water by the Gibeonites; who were afterward called Nethinims.

Ver. 24. And under the brim round about there were knops compassing it.] They were in the shape of an egg; on the top of every one of which was an ox head; from whose mouth water gushed out: so Abarbinel gathers from 2 Chron. ii. 3. where they are called oxen, from the figure of their head.

Ten in a cubit, compassing the sea round about.] So there were three hundred of these knops in all; the sea being thirty cubits round.

The knops were cast in two rows when it was cast.] They were not carved afterward, but cast at first, when the sea was molten. And there being two rows of them, Abarbinel thence concludes there were six hundred in all, one under another. From whence water might flow out of the sea, to wash a great number at a time.

Ver. 25. And it stood upon twelve oxen.] Oxen were used not only for drawing the plough, but for carrying burdens upon their backs; as they are still employed among the Indians. Whence Solomon placed the figure of these creatures under his molten sea, as the supporters of it. There was so little danger of their being worshipped, that the meanness of the use to which they served, had made some believe that Solomon made them in contempt of the golden calf, which the Israelites worshipped in the wilderness; and placed them under the sea, that the people might see there was nothing worthy of adoration in these figures. Josephus, indeed, thinks Solomon offended in making these images: but this is confuted by the glory of the Lord filling the temple after it was finished. Which shewed that he approved of all this work; which it is likely was done by his instruction: but some great men think Josephus is in the right.

Three looking towards the north, and three looking towards the west, and three looking towards the south, and three looking towards the east.] This seems to import that this sea was square (the oxen looking towards the four quarters of the world), whereas it is said before, (ver. 25.) that it was round all about. And so it was (as the Jewish interpreters, particularly Abarbinel and Ralbag, expound this) in the brim of it, it was perfectly round, and so it continued in the two upper cubits: but below the brim (in the three lower cubits) it was square. And, as Kimchi thinks, in the two upper cubits there were no knops; but in the three lower, just above the oxen that supported the sea.

And the sea was set above upon them, and all their hinder parts were inward.] Under the sea, that they might not be seen.

Ver. 26. And it was a hand-breadth thick, and the brim thereof was wrought like the brim of a cup, with flowers of lilies.] In the shape of lilies: that is, not plain and straight, but bending downwards, after the manner of those flowers. (See Dr. Lightfoot, of the Temple, p. 230, &c.)

It contained two thousand baths.] A bath, being of the same bigness with an ephah, (Ezek. xlv. 11.) is thought to contain eight gallons: so that this sea contained five hundred barrels; that is, it had thus much water constantly in it. But if it had been filled up to the brim, it would have held three thousand baths, as we read 2 Chron. iv. 5. which quantity they were not wont to put into it, lest with the wind it should run over. Or, as the most learned of the Jews reconcile these two places, these words in the book of the Kings are to be understood of moist things; but those in the Chronicles of dry; which being heaped up, it would contain a third part more than of things liquid. With which some compare those words of our Saviour, (Luke vi. 38.) "Good measure heaped up, shaken together, and running over."

Ver. 27. And he made ten bases of brass.] Tables or stands upon which the lavers (mentioned below, ver. 38.) were to rest. (See Dr. Lightfoot, of the Temple, p. 228, &c.)

Four cubits was the length of one base, and four cubits the breadth, and three cubits the height thereof.] They were made so broad that the lavers might stand more firmly, being each four cubits; but not so high, that the priests might more easily reach to wash the sacrifices in them, (2 Chron. iv. 6.)

Ver. 28. And the work of the bases was in this manner: they had borders.] To keep up the lavers from falling.

And the borders were between the ledges:] It is not easy to apprehend what he means by ledges; because, as P. Martyr observes, we have no such work in these days.

Ver. 29. And on the borders that were between the ledges were lions, and oxen, and cherubims.] Oxen are called cherubims in Ezek. x. 14. Therefore the meaning here is, that, besides lions and oxen, there were other cherubims (the figures of eagles perhaps) which adorned these borders.

And upon the ledges there was a base above.] This is so darkly expressed, that I do not apprehend the meaning; unless it be this, that the upper ledge was over the heads of these animals; and the under ledge was that upon which their feet rested, as the next words signify.

And beneath the lions and oxen were certain additions of thin work.] Under these figures there was some other work added (which was not cast together with them), and drawn very thin.

Ver. 30. And every base had four brazen wheels.] They run upon wheels like a coach, or chariot; so might easily be removed from place to place, as the convenience of the priests required.

And plates of brass.] Between the wheels and the bases. (See Dr. Lightfoot in the same book, p. 226.)

And the four corners thereof.] For they were square, (ver. 27.)

Had undersetters.] In the Hebrew, shoulders. Which were fitly so called, because, as burdens are borne upon men's shoulders, so were the lavers upon these; which supported them, when set upon the bases, and kept them from falling when they run upon the wheels.

Under the laver were undersetters molten, at the side of every addition.] These were molten with the bases, when they were cast.

Ver. 31. And the mouth of it.] The bases seem to have been hollow at the top; that the feet of the lavers might enter in, and be fastened there: and this he calls the mouth of it.

Within the chapiter and above.] Nothing of a chapiter is mentioned until now: therefore it is hard to know what is meant by it. Many take it for a smaller basis, rising out of the greater; in which was the mouth, or hollow place before spoken of.

Was a cubit.] In height. See ver. 35. where it is said, on the top of the base was a round compass half a cubit high. Which seems to be meant of this chapiter, which rose but half a cubit above the base, the other half being below it.

But the mouth thereof was round, after the work of the base, a cubit and a half.] This was the wideness of it.

And also upon the mouth of it were gravings with their borders, four-square, not round.] Though this hollow place, called the mouth, was round within; yet on the outside it was square, and had borders which were engraved.

Ver. 32. And under the borders were four wheels; and the axle-trees of the wheels were joined to the base; and the height of a wheel was a cubit and half a cubit.] So that the bottom of the base was not far from the ground.

Ver. 33. And the work of the wheels was like the work of a chariot-wheel.] Only the hinder-wheels and the fore-wheels were all of a height.

Their axle-trees, and their naves, and their felloes, and their spokes, were all molten.] Cast together with the wheels.

Ver. 34. And there were four undersetters to the four corners of one base: and the undersetters were of the very base itself.] He mentioned the undersetters before, (ver. 30.) Now he relates the number of them; and that they were of the same piece with the base itself; being cast together with it, and not made afterward.

Ver. 35. And on the top of the base there was a round compass of half a cubit high.] See ver. 31.

And on the top of the base, the ledges thereof, and the borders thereof, were the same.] Cast altogether at the same time.

Ver. 36. For on the plates of the ledges thereof, and on the borders thereof, he graved cherubims, lions, and palm-trees, according to the proportion of every one, and additions round about.] In the Hebrew, According to the nakedness of every one: which seems to signify that these figures were as big as the void spaces in the plates would admit.

Ver. 37. After this manner he made the ten bases; all of them had one casting, one measure, and one size.] They were cast in the same mould; and all of the same bigness and shape.

Ver. 38. Then made he ten lavers of brass.] Which were to stand upon the bases forementioned.

One laver contained forty baths.] See ver. 26. From whence it will appear that each of these lavers contained ten barrels of water.

And every laver was four cubits.] Some think that they were of this height. But these words rather relate to the diameter of them, which was four cubits: and then their compass was twelve cubits.

Upon every one of the ten bases one laver.] The bases being exactly fitted to receive them: for they were each four cubits in length and breadth, (ver. 27.)

Ver. 39. And he put five on the right side.] That is, on the south side, (see vi. 8.)

Of the house.] That is, of the court where the priests ministered.

And five on the left side of the house.] That is, on the north side of that court.

And he set the sea on the right side of the house eastward, over against the south.] That is, in the south-east: so that as soon as the priests entered (which they did at the east gate) they might have water to wash their hands and their feet.

Ver. 40. And Hiram made the lavers, and the shovels, and the basons: so Hiram made an end of all the work that he made king Solomon for the house of the Lord.] These seem to have been the last things that he made: and so he finished all the work, which he recapitulates, with the addition of some other not mentioned before. Shovels, for instance, or besoms, wherewith they cleansed the altar from the ashes, that they might not hinder the fire from burning: and basons, wherein the priests received the blood of the sacrifices that were offered.

Ver. 41. The two pillars, and two bowls of the chapiters that were on the top of the two pillars; and the two networks, to cover the bowls of the chapiters that were on the top of the pillars.

Ver. 42. And four hundred pomegranates for the two networks, even two rows of pomegranates for one net-work, to cover the two bowls of the chapiters that were upon the pillars.] Being to sum up all the works he had finished, he now adds the number of pomegranates that were upon the pillars: which had not been mentioned before.

Ver. 43. And ten bases, and ten lavers upon the bases.

Ver. 44. And one sea, and twelve oxen under the sea.

Ver. 45. And the pots.] Pots or caldrons were those vessels, wherein they boiled those sacrifices which were divided between the priest and the people that offered them: that is, peace-offerings, that they might eat them before the Lord, and feast with him upon his own meat.

Shovels, and basons.] They are mentioned before, but here I suppose have a different signification (though in the Hebrew the words are the same) from what they had in ver. 40. And the first word signifies flesh-hooks, wherewith they took the meat out of the pots: and the second the platters, or dishes, into which it was put, to be set before them.

And all these vessels, which Hiram made to king Solomon for the house of the Lord, were of bright brass.] Or polished brass: or, the purest and finest that could be got. The Syriac and Arabic translators render it, Corinthian brass. But it is not credible, that it was known in the days of Solomon.

Ver. 46. In the plain of Jordan did the king cast them, in the clay-ground between Succoth and Zarthan.] In the Hebrew the words for clay-ground are, in the thickness of the ground. That is, the earth was stiff and glutinous, and upon that account more fit to make moulds of all kinds. And in a plain country, such moulds were more easily fixed than on the sides of hills, or steep places.

Ver. 47. And Solomon left all the vessels unweighed, because they were exceeding many: neither was the weight of the brass found out.] In the Hebrew, it was not searched, or inquired into; because it would have been very troublesome to take an exact account of it.

Ver. 48. And Solomon made all the vessels that pertained unto the house of the Lord.] He made them all new, except the ark, the mercy-seat, and the cherubims annexed to it.

The altar of gold.] That is, the altar of incense, which stood in the holy place before the oracle.

And the table of gold, whereon the shew-bread was.] That is, all the table-work: there being no less than ten, (2 Chron. iv. 7, 8.) Upon one of which, in all probability, which was more noble than the rest, the shew-bread was placed. Unless we suppose the table which Moses made was preserved for that use; and Solomon added the rest for the greater ornament of the place. And (as Josephus writes) the gold and silver basons were set upon them; together with a vast number of phials.

Ver. 49. And the candlesticks of pure gold, five on the right side, and five on the left, before the oracle.] He made ten candlesticks instead of one which was in the tabernacle of Moses: because the place was more capacious; and the vessels were not to be removed from place to place as they were before: and therefore there might well be more of them.

The flowers.] Which were wrought upon the candlesticks.

The lamps, and the tongs, of gold.] Wherewith to take coals from the altar of burnt-offering.

Ver. 50. And the bowls, and the snuffers, and the basons, and the spoons, and the censers, of pure gold.] The use of these is visible. The first being to keep oil for the lamps; the next to trim them: the basons (which were a hundred, as we learn from the book of Chronicles) were to receive the water of sprinkling, and the blood of the sacrifices which was sometimes brought into the most holy place: the spoons served to take up the oil: the censers were for offering incense; though some translate this word dish-pans, wherein the incense was kept. There were other censers of silver, which received the coals from the altar upon all days but the tenth of Tisri (which was the great day of expiation), when the golden censer received them, and by it the most holy place was incensed. On other days it was not employed, but at the altar of incense; where the coals were poured out of the silver censer (which received them from the altar of burnt-offering) into the golden, to burn the incense: as the Talmudists say, both in Codex Joma and Tamid. Where they also say, that the foregoing word capoth, which we translate spoons, signifies a vessel which contained the incense that was to be offered upon the coals in the golden censer. See Braunius, in his Selecta Sacra, lib. ii. cap. 5. where he hath learnedly explained both these words, caph and machtah, which we translate spoons and censers, where he hath demonstrated the latter signifies the instrument that received the coals from the altar of burnt-offering, and the former that which had the incense in it to be poured upon them.

And the hinges of gold, both for the doors of the inner house, the most holy place, and for the house, to wit, of the temple.] This shews the vast riches of Solomon, and his great piety: which made him spare no cost to beautify the house of God, and the meanest thing belonging to it. Whereby the people, who were much taken with outward splendour, were preserved from idolatry: for they could go no where and see a place comparable to this of Solomon; there being then nothing in the whole world like to it for riches and glory.

Ver. 51. So was ended all the work that king Solomon made for the house of the Lord. And Solomon brought in the things which David his father had dedicated; even the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, did he put among the treasures of the house of the Lord.] I observed upon vi. 1. that Abarbinel thinks he would use none of the things that were dedicated by his father; but do all at his own cost and charges. Yet others think these words mean no more, but that all the remaining silver and gold, which David left, and was not spent in this work, Solomon would not employ to his own uses; but religiously preserved in the treasury of the temple. Where the altar of burnt-offering, which Moses made, and some other things, which were now of no use (far better and larger being made), were also laid up, as the tabernacle itself was. For the temple being built, there was no further occasion for the tabernacle; and yet it was fit to preserve it, as a place that had been holy to the Lord.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. AND Solomon assembled the elders of Israel.] That is, the judges in their several cities.

And all the heads of the tribes.] Every tribe had one or more principal ruler in it.

And the chief of the fathers of the children of Israel.] The principal persons of every family in those tribes.

Unto king Solomon in Jerusalem.] Where the house of the Lord was now fixed.

That they might bring up the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of the city of David, which is Zion.] For thither David had brought it from the house of Obed-Edom, and made a tabernacle for it, (2 Sam. vi. 12. 17.) until a fixed house should be prepared for it, which was now built upon a neighbouring mountain.

Ver. 2. And all the men of Israel.] All the forenamed persons, with their attendants, which, no doubt, were numerous.

Assembled themselves unto king Solomon at the feast in the month Ethanim, which is the seventh month.] Here the Targum thus paraphrases, In the month which anciently was called the first month, but now is the seventh: and called Ethanim, because more sacred solemnities (which were the support and strength of their religion and government) were appointed in this month than in any other. And among the rest the feast of tabernacles; which is here meant, as Kimchi, and Abarbinel, and others think. And upon the occasion of this assembly the Jews observe, in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 15. that "the Schechinah doth not dwell but in the congregation."

Ver. 3. And all the elders of Israel came.] All the forementioned great persons were called elders, and are here comprehended under that name.

And the priests took up the ark.] The ark had been carried by the priests three times before this: when they went over Jordan; when they encompassed the walls of Jericho; and when David sent it back, when he fled from Absalom, (2 Sam. xv. 29, 30.) It was the office of the Levites to carry the ark upon their shoulders, except upon special occasions: and now they could not, because it was not lawful for them to enter into the holy place, into which it was to be carried, and then into the most holy. It is said, indeed, 2 Chron. v. 4. that the Levites took it up: but the meaning is, that they took it up and carried it to the temple, and then the priests took it up, (ver. 6.) and carried it into the holy place.

Ver. 4. And they brought up the ark of the Lord, and the tabernacle of the congregation.] Together with the ark, they brought up the tabernacle. But the question is, what tabernacle, whether that made by Moses, which was in Gibeon, (2 Chron. i. 3.) or that made by David, which was at Jerusalem, (2 Sam. vi. 17.) I think the latter is never called the tabernacle of the congregation, as the former frequently is. But it may be probably thought that both of them were now carried into the temple, and laid up there; to avoid all danger of superstition and idolatry: and that no worship might be performed any where, but only at this house of God, which he now dedicated to him.

And all the holy vessels that were in the tabernacle.] viz. The altar of incense, and the table, and the candlestick, and every thing belonging to them: which remained in the tabernacle, when the ark was removed from it.

These did the priests and the Levites bring up.] The priests brought up the ark; and the Levites carried the tabernacle, and the vessels of the sanctuary.

Ver. 5. And king Solomon, and all the congregation of Israel, that were assembled unto him, were with him before the ark.] When it was brought into the house of God, and settled there; for it is not likely such a multitude of sacrifices as follow, could be offered in the way from Mount Sion to the temple, as some were when David brought it from the house of Obed-Edom to Jerusalem, (2 Sam. vi. 13.)

And sacrificed sheep and oxen, that could not be numbered for multitude.] That is, a vast number; which might have been told, but not easily; as was said before of the weight of the brass employed about the vessels of the house of God, vii. 47. (See there.) Here is no mention of Solomon's dancing before the ark as David did; for all holy men were not alike moved by God; their tempers and conditions being very different. Solomon was now in a state of great tranquillity, and constant pleasure: but David had been disturbed by the stroke upon Uzzah, a little before his great transport of joy, at the safe conduct of the ark to Jerusalem.

Ver. 6. And the priests brought in the ark of the covenant of the Lord unto his place, into the oracle of the house, to the most holy place.] Before the glory of the Lord filled the house, the priests were permitted to enter into the oracle: but afterward none but the high-priest might approach so near unto the Divine presence, which dwelt there: and he but once a year.

Even under the wings of the cherubims.] Which Solomon had made. For the cherubims made by Moses were fixed to the mercy-seat, and inseparable from it: and stood together with the ark under these cherubims.

Ver. 7. For the cherubims spread forth their two wings over the place of the ark, and the cherubims covered the ark, and the staves thereof.] For they were very large, stretching forth their wings from one side of the house unto the other, (vi. 22. 24, &c.)

Ver. 8. And they drew out the staves, that the end of the staves were seen out in the holy place before the oracle.] By the holy place is here meant the most holy, where the ark was under the cherubims: which covered both the ark and the staves. But the staves were so drawn out that the ends of them might be seen: whereby the high-priest was directed in the way he should go just before the mercy-seat on the day of expiation; when he went between these two staves to sprinkle the blood before God. See 2 Chron. v. 9. and Buxtorf. in his Arca Fœderis, where he explains both this and the next verse, and gives a large account of drawing out the staves, (p. 96, 97.)

And they were not seen without.] In the sanctuary.

And there they are unto this day.] And in this posture.

Ver. 9. There was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone, which Moses put there at Horeb, when the Lord made a covenant with the children of Israel, when they came out of the land of Egypt.] The very same words, in a manner, are repeated, 2 Chron. v. 10. But it is commonly observed that both these places seem to contradict the apostle's words, Heb. ix. 4. For it is said here in these books, that nothing was in the ark save only the two tables of stone: but that there, the pot of manna and Aaron's rod were also in the ark. For so they generally interpret those words ἐν ᾗ, in which, i. e. in the ark, στάμνος χρυσῆ, the golden pot containing the manna, &c. Many learned men have endeavoured to reconcile these places several ways, which Andreas Sennertus hath collected in a treatise on purpose about it. Which might have been spared by this easy observation, that the preposition ἐν doth not always signify in, but by: and so the place in the Hebrews is to be rendered, not in which, but by which. Bochartus hath given a great many instances of such use of the particle beth in the Old Testament, (Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 50.) And indeed it is never said there that the pot of manna was laid up in the ark, but "before the Lord and before the testimony;" (Exod. xvi. 33, 34.) and the same is said of Aaron's rod, (Numb. xvii. 4.) Which signifies no more than putting them by the ark. (See Huetius, Demonst. Evang. p. 322.)

Ver. 10. And it came to pass, when the priests were come out of the holy place.] That is, the oracle, where they had set down the ark.

That the cloud filled the house of the Lord.] In this cloud was the glory of the Lord (ver. 11.) which now filled the temple, as it had anciently done the tabernacle, when it was first erected, (Exod. xl. 34.) Only there the cloud covered the tabernacle without, and the glory of the Lord shined within: but here the house itself was filled with the cloud, out of which the glory of the Lord broke; and after it had filled the whole house, settled in the most holy place.

Ver. 11. So that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud: for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord.] By this it appears that the cloud filled the sanctuary, as well as the most holy place: for in the sanctuary the priests ministered at the altar of incense. And it appears also by the next verse, that, at the first, nothing but a dark cloud filled the house, which was very astonishing: but afterward the glory of the Lord (as I said) broke out, which was more amazing. Insomuch, that Moses himself was not able to enter into the tabernacle of the congregation, when this cloud and glory first appeared, (Exod. xl. 35.)

Ver. 12. Then spake Solomon.] When he saw the priests come out of the house of God in great consternation, he uttered these words which follow, with his face turned towards the altar, to compose and comfort them. This shews that the cloud filled the house before Solomon prayed: whereas in 2 Chron. vii. 1—3. it appears the Divine glory did not fill it till after he had prayed. Which Abarbinel reconciles with very good reason:—The cloud, in which was the glory of the Lord, or the fire, came into the temple before Solomon prayed: which made him say here, the Lord dwelleth in thick darkness. Which he beholding, prayed to God, who gave such a sensible token of his presence there. Now when he had made an end of his prayer, then the fire that was in the cloud broke forth, and consumed the sacrifices on the altar: and the glory of the Lord filled the house, as it is recorded in the book of Chronicles.

The Lord said that he would dwell in thick darkness.] As much as to say, Be not afraid; but look upon this cloud as a token of God's presence and protection: and that he owns this for his house where he intends to dwell, according to what he said, Lev. xvi. 2. This cloud is called thick darkness, because it hindered the sight of any other thing that was in the holy place; either the altar, candlestick, or table. Nothing was seen but the glory of the Lord when it broke out, which dazzled their eyes rather than enlightened them. And it is observable, that the better to represent this, the high-priest when he went into the most holy place was to fill it with a cloud of smoke by the incense he offered, which made the place dark, (Lev. xvi. 12, 13.) that he might not lose his life by the splendour of the Divine Glory.

Ver. 13. I have surely built thee a house to dwell in.] He turns his speech from them to God; and expresses his hope that he would be pleased to continue in this house: which he perceived by this glorious cloud he intended to make his habitation.

A settled place for thee to abide in for ever.] Not like the tabernacle, which was a moveable habitation; but a place wherein he hoped he would settle, and never remove from it. From hence the Jews call this Beth-haolam, the eternal house, or the house of ages. Which was not like Gilgal, Shiloh, Nob, and Gibeon (as Abarbinel explains it), which did not last long, though God for some time dwelt there: they not being in the place which the Lord had chosen to place his name there: which was in Mount Moriah.

Ver. 14. And the king turned his face about.] From the court of the priests to the court of the congregation, having the altar on his back.

And blessed all the congregation of Israel.] In that form, perhaps, which God himself prescribed, (Numb. vi. 23, 24, &c.)

(And all the congregation of Israel stood).] Both out of reverence to God, and respect unto the king.

Ver. 15. And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which spake with his mouth unto David my father, and hath with his hand fulfilled it, saying.] He acknowledges the goodness of God in his gracious promise; and his faithfulness in fulfilling it. Which promise was made by Nathan, unto whom the word of the Lord came about this matter, (2 Sam. vii. 4.)

Ver. 16. Since the day that I brought forth my people Israel out of Egypt, I chose no city out of all the tribes of Israel to build a house, that my name might be therein.] He had often told them that they should worship him in the place which he would choose; but he never declared his choice of a place till David's time, (2 Sam. vii. 6.)

But I chose David to be over my people Israel.] See 2 Sam. vii. 8. to whom he shewed the place which he would make his dwelling, and where he would be worshipped.

Ver. 17. And it was in the heart of David my father to build a house for the name of the Lord God of Israel.] This is, as I said before, where God would dwell among them, and be graciously present with them. (See 2 Sam. vii. 2.)

Ver. 18. And the Lord said unto David my father, Whereas it was in thine heart to build a house unto my name, thou didst well that it was in thine heart.] He accepted and commended his good intentions, but would not let him put them in execution. This honour he reserved for his son, as it follows in the next words.

Ver. 19. Nevertheless thou shalt not build the house; but thy son, that shall come forth out of thy loins, he shall build the house unto my name.] See 2 Sam. vii. 12, 13.

Ver. 20. And the Lord hath performed the word that he spake; and I am risen up in the room of David my father, and sit on the throne of Israel, as the Lord promised, and have built a house for the name of the Lord God of Israel.] He concludes as he began, with a thankful acknowledgment of the faithfulness of God in performing his promise.

Ver. 21. And have set there a place for the ark.] The token of God's presence among them.

Wherein is the covenant of the Lord, which he made with our fathers.] That is, the tables of the covenant: which by a figure are called the covenant, because they contained it.

When he brought them out of the land of Egypt.] And told them, that by the tenure of this covenant they were to hold the land of Canaan.

Ver. 22. And Solomon stood before the altar of the Lord.] Having spoken the foregoing words with his face towards the people, and blessed them; now he turned about again with his face towards the altar, to make a solemn prayer to God.

In the presence of all the congregation of Israel.] Being advanced upon a scaffold which he had made, of three cubits high, (as we read in 2 Chron. vi. 13.) so that all might see and hear him.

And spread forth his hands towards heaven.] Which was a solemn posture of prayer among other nations. And it is evident both from that place in the Chronicles, and from ver. 54. of this chapter, that when he had stood awhile with his face towards the altar, he fell down upon his knees, and spread forth his hands towards heaven.

Ver. 23. And he said, O Lord God of Israel, there is no God like thee, in heaven above, or on earth beneath, who keepest covenant and mercy with thy servants that walk before thee with all their hearts.] He acknowledges the transcendent excellences of the Divine Majesty; and particularly again commemorates his faithfulness to those who serve him sincerely.

Ver. 24. Who hast kept with thy servant David my father that thou promisedst him: thou spakest also with thy mouth, and hast fulfilled it with thy hand, as it is this day.] This relates to that part of God's promise to David, that his son should build him a house. (See ver. 15, 16, &c.)

Ver. 25. Therefore now, Lord God of Israel, keep with thy servant David my father that thou promisedst him, saying, There shall not fail thee a man in my sight to sit on the throne of Israel.] He looked upon that as an earnest he would fulfil the other part of his promise to David, which he made at the same time, concerning his kindness to his posterity, (2 Sam. vii. 12, 13.)

So that thy children take heed to their way, that they walk before me as thou hast walked before me.] He speaks like a wise man, who was fully acquainted with the mind of God: whose promise concerning the inheritance of the kingdom he acknowledges depended upon this condition, if they took heed to their way, &c.; that is, continued in the faith and worship of God, as David did. But if they proved idolaters, then they made themselves unworthy of this privilege to the seed of David (as Abarbinel speaks), and lost the inheritance of the kingdom, because they were none of his children. And therefore, after Solomon and Jeroboam also turned away from God and followed idols (as he goes on), God might justly have taken the divided kingdom away from their children. And when all Israel forsook the Lord, and worshipped the gods of the nations round about them, he did forsake their land, and would no longer dwell among them, nor continue the kingdom to them.

Ver. 26. And now, O Lord God of Israel, let thy word, I pray thee, be verified, which thou spakest unto thy servant David my father.] This is not an unnecessary repetition; but (as Abarbinel notes) God, when he spake to David of building the temple by his son, promised two things: first, the stability of his kingdom in his family; (2 Sam. vii. 16.) and secondly, that he would shew the greatest kindness and friendship to them; such as a father doth to his son, (ver. 13.) Solomon here begs of God in this prayer both these benefits: the first in the foregoing verse, and the other in this.

Ver. 27. But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Behold, the heaven, and heaven of heavens, cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have builded?] He would not have the people possessed with such gross imaginations as were among the heathens; who fancied their gods were confined to their temples. No, saith Solomon, the heaven itself, no, not the highest heaven, can comprehend his infinite majesty.

Ver. 28. Yet have thou respect unto the prayer of thy servant, and to his supplication, O Lord my God, to hearken unto the cry and unto the prayer which thy servant prayeth before thee to-day.] But he would have them know that God, who could be confined no where, was in a special manner present here, to grant the requests of those who piously made their supplications to him, as he now did, in this place.

Abarbinel observes upon ver. 39. that Solomon uses three words in this verse, which in some places signify the very same thing: but being all used here together, he thinks have distinct meanings. For the word rinnah (which we translate cry), he thinks, signifies setting forth with a loud voice the praises of God: concerning which their wise men in Beracoth say, "Let a man first commemorate the praises of God, and then let him pray." Then the word tepillah (which we translate prayer), he thinks, signifies men's judging and condemning themselves before God for their offences: confessing they are unworthy to have their petitions granted. And the other word techinah (supplication we translate it) imports men's petitions to God for what they want, and deprecating his displeasure, &c.

Ver. 29. That thine eyes may be open towards this house night and day, even towards the place of which thou hast said, My name shall be there.] He prays that God would have a gracious respect unto all that came to make their petitions there. For as, in the former verse (as Abarbinel observes), he prays God would hear his own petitions: so in this, that he would hear all other pious worshippers.

That thou mayest hearken to the prayer which thy servant shall make towards this place.] He beseeches God to hear him, if he looked towards this place in his prayer; though he was not present at the temple to prefer his petition. For thus pious men were wont to direct their prayer, when they were far distant from it; nay, when the temple was demolished, (Dan. vi. 10.) And when they were at the temple, they could only look towards the most holy place: for the people came no nearer than into the outward court of the temple, and the priests no further than to the next court to it. Save only when they went to order the lamps, and burn incense morning and evening, and renew the shew-bread: otherwise they also stood and officiated at a distance in the court appointed for them, called the court of the priests. So both people and priests stood in their several courts, and worshipped with their faces towards the temple, where the ark and mercy-seat were. From whence came the expression of worshipping the Lord towards his holy temple: that is, towards the place where the mercy-seat was. And also the expression of worshipping towards his footstool: for if the glory of the Lord sat upon the cherubims, under which the ark stood, then it was his footstool. (See Psal. xcix. 5. cxxxviii. 2.)

Ver. 30. And hearken thou to the supplication of thy servant, and of thy people Israel, when they shall pray towards this place.] Here, as the same Abarbinel observes, he desires, whether there was one or many that prayed, he would hear them.

And hear thou in heaven thy dwelling-place.] He directs the people's mind up to heaven, the place where he dwells in the highest majesty and glory: of which the bright cloud in the temple was a token and resemblance.

And when thou hearest, forgive.] For sins unpardoned would hinder his blessing from descending on them; and therefore, in the first place, he implores forgiveness of them.

Ver. 31. If any man trespass against his neighbour, and an oath be laid upon him to cause him to swear.] This seems to relate to such as were accused of denying that which was said to be deposited with them by their neighbour. Who were to purge themselves by an oath, there being no witness to convince them.

And the oath come before thine altar in this house.] It was the custom of all nations to touch the altar when they made a solemn oath: calling God, that is, to witness the truth of what they said, and to punish them if they did not speak the truth.

Ver. 32. Then hear thou in heaven, and do, and judge thy servants, condemning the wicked, to bring his way upon his head; and justifying the righteous, to give him according to his righteousness.] He desires God to hear the complaint of him who was defrauded, or unjustly accused: and shew who had right on his side; by punishing the offender, and acquitting the injured person.

Ver. 33. When thy people Israel be smitten down before the enemy, because they have sinned against thee, and shall turn again to thee, and confess thy name.] Acknowledge him to be God alone, and renounce all false gods.

And pray, and make supplication to thee in this house.] Or, towards this house; expecting help from God alone.

Ver. 34. Then hear thou in heaven, and forgive the sin of thy people Israel, and bring them back into the land which thou gavest unto their fathers.] Deliver them out of the captivity into which their enemies had carried them, and restore them to their own country. The Jews think the Schechinah was always in captivity with them, and brought them forth from thence.

Ver. 35. When heaven is shut up, and there is no rain, because they have sinned against thee.] As God is said to bring the wind, (Psal. cxxxv. 7.) so he doth the rain out of his treasures. Which when he shuts up, no showers can fall, till he open them again.

If they pray towards this place, and confess thy name, and turn from their sin, when thou afflictest them.] That had been the frequent fruit of their affliction in former ages; though as soon as God had delivered them, they revolted from him; as we read in the whole book of Judges.

Ver. 36. Then hear thou in heaven, and forgive the sin of thy servants, and of thy people Israel, that thou teach them the good way wherein they should walk.] These words are better translated in 2 Chron. vi. 27. (where the Hebrew words are the very same with these here) When thou hast taught them the good way wherein they should walk. He doth not desire their pardon, till their affliction had taught them better obedience.

And give rain upon thy land which thou hast given to thy people for an inheritance.] He first desires their amendment, and then that the times and seasons might be amended.

Ver. 37. If there be in the land famine.] Which arose sometimes from other causes, besides want of rain.

If there be pestilence, blasting, mildew, locust, or if there be caterpillar.] These two creatures, locusts and caterpillars, made great desolations where they swarmed, (Exod. x. 4, 5. Psal. cv. 34, 35.) Mildew, also, the heathens themselves were sensible was a punishment sent from heaven. And therefore Numa Pompilius (as Strigelius observes) ordained a solemn festival called rubigalia, in the beginning of May, to pray for their preservation from this rubigo, as they called it, which corrupted their corn. (See Pliny's Nat. Hist. lib. xviii. cap. 29.)

If their enemy besiege them in the land of their cities.] In their gates; whereby they were so straitened, that none could go in, or out.

Whatsoever plague, whatsoever sickness, there be.] The word plague signifies some extraordinary stroke by the hand of God.

Ver. 38. What prayer and supplication shall be made by any man, or by all thy people Israel.] Who in national calamities were wont to beseech God's mercies with public fasting and prayer; which, if they neglected, he entreats him not to reject the supplications of any particular person who besought his favour for himself and family.

Which shall know every man the plague of his own heart.] We are taught by Ezra, in 2 Chron. vi. 29. to understand these words of any private trouble or grief which any man laboured under: for so the words are there, when every one shall know his own sore, and his own grief. That is, shall make his secret moan for any affliction which lies heavy upon his spirit.

And spread forth his hands towards this house.] That is, pray as Solomon now did to God. (See ver. 22.)

Ver. 39. Then hear thou in heaven thy dwelling-place, and forgive, and do, and give to every man according to his ways, whose heart thou knowest.] He would have the people know that God could not be deceived with words; but have them expect an answer from him, according to the sincerity of their hearts, in their professions of repentance.

(For thou, even thou only, knowest the hearts of all the children of men).] This sense begets in men the greatest awe of the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 40. That they may fear thee all the days that they live in the land that thou gavest unto our fathers.] That they might learn by his great goodness, to worship him alone religiously all their days: and by that means possess in peace and plenty the good land he had bestowed upon them.

Ver. 41. Moreover, concerning a stranger that is not of thy people Israel, but cometh out of a far country for thy name's sake.] To become a proselyte to the true religion, and worship God alone, though he was not circumcised, and thereby bound to keep the whole law. Such strangers came to pray at the temple, though they might not offer any sacrifices, except only a burnt-offering. And therefore we may observe, that in the New Testament the Greeks are said to come to a feast, ἵνα προσκυνήσωσιν, that they might worship, not that they might keep the Passover, (John xii. 20.) And the like is said of the eunuch, Acts viii. 22. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4, 5.)

Ver. 42. (For they shall hear of thy great name, and of thy strong hand, and thy stretched-out arm).] All the stupendous wonders he had done: which declared him to be above all gods; the most High, and Holy One.

When they shall come, and pray towards this place.] In the court behind that of the Israelites: which was made on purpose for the religious uncircumcised gentiles. Such, saith Victorinus Strigelius (whose words I think fit here to transcribe), were Naaman the Syrian; Nebuchadnezzar, and his son Evilmerodach; Darius the Mede; Cyrus the Persian; Cornelius, and the Ethiopian eunuch, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles; and many such-like heathens; who were members of the true church. By which means, and by the dispersion of the Jews among other nations, many heathens were called to the acknowledgment of the only true God. (See Josephus's last book of Antiquities, chap. 2.)

Ver. 43. Hear thou in heaven thy dwelling-place, and do according to all that the stranger calleth to thee for.] He had the same sense with St. Peter, that "God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth God, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him," (Acts x. 35.)

That all the people of the earth may know thy name, to fear thee, as do thy people Israel.] By this it is evident, that truly good men in ancient time desired all the gentile world might be incorporated with them: unto which, in our Saviour's time, the Jews were unaccountably averse.

And that they may know that this house, which I have builded, is called by thy name.] Hath thy glorious presence in it.

Ver. 44. If thy people go out to battle against their enemy, whithersoever thou shalt send them, and pray unto the Lord towards this city which thou hast chosen, and towards the house that I have built for thy name.] Some of the Jews wonder that Solomon should mix his prayer for strangers with those for the people of Israel, and not rather finish first what he had to desire for the Israelites, and then pray for the gentiles. If there be any thing in this, it was to shew that God made no difference between them and pious people of other nations. It is here remarkable, that they were not to make war, without a warrant and commission from God, upon the neighbouring nations. Not to satisfy their ambition and vain-glory, but by his command, or upon just and necessary reasons; which would warrant them to implore and expect God's blessing upon their arms.

Ver. 45. Then hear thou in heaven their prayer and supplications, and maintain their cause.] Shew the justice of it, by making them victorious.

Ver. 46. If they sin against thee (for there is no man that sinneth not), and thou be angry with them, and deliver them to the enemy.] The weakness of human nature, and its proneness to sin, doth not excuse wilful offences against God; especially apostacy from him, which was the cause of all their calamities.

So that they carry them away captives into the land of the enemy, far or near.] A good cause sometimes miscarries for the iniquity of those that are engaged in it.

Ver. 47. Yet if they shall bethink themselves in the land whither they were carried captives, and repent, and make supplication to thee in the land of them that carried them captives, saying, We have sinned, we have done perversely, we have committed wickedness;

Ver. 48. And so return to thee with all their heart, and all their soul, in the land of their enemies which have led them away captive.] In these, and in the foregoing words, (ver. 47.) he gives a full description of true repentance. Which begins in the serious reflection which men make upon their past lives, and their present miseries into which their sins have brought them. Which begets an unfeigned sorrow and resolution of amendment, with earnest supplication for mercy and grace: confessing themselves unworthy of it, and condemning themselves for their sins, and the high aggravations of them (expressed here by doing perversely, and committing wickedness), which at last concludes in their quitting that wicked course of life, and their sincere conversion to the service of God.

And pray unto thee towards the land which thou gavest unto their fathers, the city which thou hast chosen, and the house which I have built for thy name.] The very looking towards this place, with earnest imploring the mercy of God, and desire of his helps, was to own him that dwelt here, and acknowledge him alone for their God. Which was a means (as that excellent person Dr. Alix admonishes me) to keep them from idolatry; all the nations of the world turning their faces towards the east, when they worshipped; but the Jews to the west, where the holy place was. And for this cause, when the temple and the holy city were destroyed, and the ark of the testimony was gone; yet good men looked and prayed towards the place where it was wont to be, as appears by the prophet Daniel. And therefore Solomon much more supposes they would do so, when they were all standing. Which may seem, as Mr. Mede observes, to have been done out of the use of all mankind, without any special precept to that purpose; which is no where to be found. Nature having taught mankind, as in their addresses to great persons, to look unto their face; so in their addresses to the Divine Majesty, to look that way, or towards that place, where his presence is more demonstrated than elsewhere. From whence he concludes, that to worship towards the place, where there is any sign or specification of his presence, is no idolatry. (See his Discourse upon Psal. cxxxii. 7.)

Ver. 49. Then hear thou their prayer and supplication in heaven thy dwelling-place, and maintain their cause.] In the Hebrew their right: which they had forfeited by their disobedience; but he prayed it might be restored unto them upon their repentance.

Ver. 50. And forgive thy people that have sinned against thee, and all their transgressions wherein they have transgressed against thee, and give them compassion before them that have carried them captive, that they may have compassion on them.] Treat them mercifully while they continued their slaves; and give them their liberty to return to their own land. Solomon enlarges much upon this in the following verses, as a thing of the greatest importance. Because he knew that they, as well as all men else, were prone to offend God, (ver. 46.) and might provoke him to expel them from this land. Towards which the Jews now at this day turn their faces, when they pray to God; but to no purpose: for it only demonstrates they have so provoked God by a crime more heinous than ever was committed, that he will have no regard to their petition.

Ver. 51. For they be thy people, and thine inheritance, which thou broughtest out of Egypt, from the midst of the furnace of iron.] Wherein they wrought with cruel labour. (See Deut. iv. 20.)

Ver. 52. That thine eyes may be open unto the supplication of thy servant, and unto the supplication of thy people Israel, to hearken unto them in all that they call for unto thee.] He brings two arguments for the Divine compassion towards them. First, that it might not lose the glory of what he had formerly done for them; and then, that it might appear he dwelt in this house, and had respect unto the penitent prayers that were here made to him.

Ver. 53. For thou didst separate them from all the people of the earth, to be thine inheritance, as thou spakest by the hand of Moses thy servant, when thou broughtest our fathers out of Egypt, O Lord our God.] See Exod. xix. 5. Here he adds a third argument; the peculiar laws that he had given them; whereby they were distinguished from all people: in the observance of which he beseeches him to preserve them. It was not a mere angel that brought them out of Egypt, but the Divine Λόγος conducted them; to whom therefore this prayer of Solomon's was directed. For the Schechinah or Divine Glory that settled in the temple, and there was worshipped, was this Divine Person, and not an angel personating God.

Ver. 54. And it was so, that when Solomon had made an end of praying this prayer and supplication unto the Lord, he rose up from before the altar of the Lord, from kneeling on his knees, with his hands spread up to heaven.] See ver. 22.

Ver. 55. And he stood, and blessed all the congregation of Israel with a loud voice, saying.] Now he turned about again, with his face the other way, from the altar to the people.

Ver. 56. Blessed be the Lord, that hath given rest unto his people Israel, according to all that he promised: there hath not failed one word of all his good promise, which he promised by the hand of Moses his servant.] He celebrates again the faithfulness of God, which continued now, as it had done in the days of Joshua. (See Josh. xxi. 45. xxiii. 14.)

Ver. 57. And the Lord God be with us, as he was with our fathers: let him not leave us, nor forsake us.] Of which there was no doubt, if they cleaved steadfastly unto him, as it follows in the next words.

Ver. 58. That he may incline our hearts unto him, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments, and his statutes, and his judgments, which he commanded our fathers.] This was the greatest blessing he could ask for them; as the means to preserve them in his favour.

Ver. 59. And let these my words, wherewith I have made supplication before the Lord, be nigh unto the Lord our God day and night.] Be ever acceptable to him.

That he maintain the cause of his servant.] That is, of Solomon, and his successors.

And the cause of his people Israel at all times, as the matter shall require.] That is, according to his and their necessities.

Ver. 60. That all the people of the earth may know that the Lord is God, and that there is none else.] That by his signal favours to the Israelites, all the world might be invited to acknowledge him to be God alone.

Ver. 61. Let your hearts therefore be perfect with the Lord our God, to walk in his statutes, and keep his commandments, as at this day.] When they were perfectly free from all false worship, and served God alone; as he exhorted them to continue still to do, with sincerity of heart.

Ver. 62. And the king, and all Israel with him, offered sacrifices before the Lord.] Which was a solemn act of worship, whereby they acknowledged him to be their God. And these sacrifices seem to have been laid upon the altar before Solomon begun his prayer, ready to be offered: and when he had done, fire came from heaven (as we read 2 Chron. vii. 1.) and consumed the sacrifices. Which was another token of God's presence in this house; as the cloud had testified, and hereby was further confirmed: for the fire from heaven declared how acceptable the sacrifices were that were offered in that place.

Ver. 63. And Solomon offered a sacrifice of peace-offerings, which he offered unto the Lord.] Besides the burnt-offerings beforementioned.

Two-and-twenty thousand oxen, and a hundred and twenty thousand sheep.] Which could not be all offered upon that day when he made his prayer, but while the feast lasted, which was in the whole fourteen days, ver. 65. (See upon iii. 4.) The heathen imitated these sacrifices in their hecatombs, which they offered of a hundred beasts of a kind; as, suppose, a hundred oxen, a hundred goats, and a hundred swine. They are described by Julius Capitolinus, in the life of the emperors Pupienus Maximus and Balbinus; the last of which, he saith, was so transported with joy, being fuller of fear, that he offered a hecatomb; which was such a sacrifice as this. A hundred altars of turf were raised in one place, at them a hundred swine and a hundred birds were killed. But if it were the sacrifice of an emperor, a hundred lions, a hundred eagles, and a hundred of other such kind of animals were offered: but no such ravenous creatures were ever offered to the true God.

And all the children of Israel dedicated the house of the Lord.] By this prayer of Solomon, and by the sacrifices, whereby all the people supplicated and gave thanks to God, this house was set apart for God's worship and service. For then a thing or place is said to be dedicated, when it is first employed to that use unto which it is hereafter designed. Concerning which see Selden, lib. iii. de Synedriis, p. 204, &c.

Ver. 64. The same day did the king hallow the middle of the court that was before the house of the Lord.] That is, the court of the priests, which he did not consecrate (for that was done before), but employed it to holy uses, and, as it were, honoured it by religious acts, (as Mr. Mede speaks upon Lev. xix. 30.) And so the name of God is said to be hallowed, or sanctified by us, when we use it holily and reverently. Thus they explain it in the Gemara, he hallowed it; that is, he set up another altar there, as L'Empereur observes upon Codex Middoth, cap. 3. sect. 1.

For there he offered burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings, and the fat of peace-offerings.] In the middle of the court he erected several altars, for the reason following: and, indeed, the whole court was little enough upon this occasion, as Dr. Lightfoot acknowledges in his book of the Temple, p. 192, 193.

Because the brazen altar that was before the Lord.] Near the door of this court.

Was too little to receive the burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings, and the fat of the peace-offerings.] Therefore, by a special licence from God, he set up other altars; which were to serve only during this present solemnity, when such a vast number of sacrifices were to be offered. But afterward no other altar was to be allowed, but that one brazen altar where God by Moses appointed all sacrifices should be offered; that they might be preserved in the worship of one only God. Therefore the Jews say these other altars which Solomon erected were of stone; which were soon pulled down again. But Fortunatus Scacchus hath said a great deal to make it probable that he did not erect any altars besides the brazen, but sacrificed upon the ground, (Myrothec. ii. cap. 56.)

Ver. 65. And at that time Solomon made a feast, and all Israel with him.] Such solemnities were usual among the heathen, when they celebrated the presence of any of their gods, as the illustrious Ezek. Spanhemius hath observed upon Callimachus's Hymn to Apollo, (ver. 13.) where he justly makes account that they derived this custom from this famous festival of king Solomon: which Josephus sets out admirably. (See lib. viii. Archæolog. cap. 2.)

A great congregation, from the entering in of Hamath unto the river of Egypt.] Hamath was the utmost bounds of Judea to the north, called afterward Epiphania, and by the inhabitants at this day is called Hama. Sometimes the bounds of this kingdom this way are said to be the great river Euphrates; as by the river of Egypt, which was the south bounds, is commonly understood Nilus. So Nahal is translated by Jonathan, and the Jerusalem interpreter upon Numb. xxxiv. 5. And, indeed, the word Nilus comes from thence, for the Hebrew word was anciently pronounced not Nahal, but Neel: from whence the Greek Νεῖλος, and the Latin Nilus, as Bochartus observes in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. v. cap. 15. But here the river of Egypt is that little stream which discharges itself into the sea, by the Lacus Sirbonides, between Mount Casius and Rhinocolura, the last town of Palestine. It is called by Joshua, (xiii. 1.) Sichor, the same with Nile, because it was but a branch from the alveus pelusiacus of that great river. (See Gen. xv. 18.)

Before the Lord, seven days and seven days, even fourteen days.] It appears by 2 Chron. vii. 9. that the feast of the dedication of the altar lasted seven days; and then the other seven days were the feast of tabernacles, which followed after the other.

Ver. 66. On the eighth day he sent the people away.] So Ezra likewise saith, 2 Chron. vii. 10. but adds, that it was the twenty-third day of the seventh month: whereas the last day of the feast of tabernacles (which was the eighth from the beginning) was the twenty-second. Therefore Solomon took his leave of them on the last day of the feast, which was the two-and-twentieth day of the month; and they went home the next day. By this also it appears, these fourteen days of feasting were not kept all together, without intermission: for the great day of expiation was on the tenth of this month; seven days before which, I suppose, the feast of dedication was kept, and then they rested till the fifteenth, when the feast of tabernacles began.

And they blessed the king.] Gave him thanks for his kindness, and prayed God to make his reign prosperous.

And went to their tents joyful and glad of heart, for all the goodness that God had done for David his servant, and for his people Israel.] In the book of Chronicles it is added, and unto Solomon: but that is here included in the goodness of God to David, on whom God bestowed such a successor. With whose magnificent entertainment they were abundantly satisfied; and rejoiced exceedingly, that God had done such great things for David and his family; and made all Israel happy in the great peace and plenty which they enjoyed, together with God's holy religion so gloriously established among them.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when Solomon had finished the building of the house of the Lord, and the king's house, and all Solomon's desire that he was pleased to do.] We are taught by Ezra (2 Chron. vii. 11.) to understand these words in this manner: Thus Solomon finished the house of the Lord, &c.; and concluded all with the foregoing prayer, and the great festival which he kept.

Ver. 2. That the Lord appeared to Solomon the second time, as he had appeared to him in Gibeon.] When he appeared to him in a dream: and so it is said, 2 Chron. vii. 10. the Lord appeared to Solomon by night. Which he had done once before, and no more: for that which he spake to him vi. 11, 12. was by a prophet. (See there.)

Ver. 3. And the Lord said unto him, I have heard thy prayer and thy supplication that thou hast made before me.] This shews that the first verse is to be understood as I have there observed; for otherwise, we must suppose this appearance of God to Solomon was eleven years after he had finished the house of the Lord. Which is not likely; but it is more natural to think it was the very next night after he had dismissed the people.

I have hallowed this house which thou hast built.] By the glorious cloud which came into it and filled it; and by the fire which, descending from heaven to consume the sacrifices, testified his acceptance of them.

To put my name there for ever.] Besides those visible tokens of his presence there, he now declares by word of mouth, that he owned this for his house; and would always dwell in it, if they kept his covenant, as the Targum here interprets it.

And mine eyes and my heart shall be there perpetually.] By his eyes and his heart he means his gracious providence, and his tender love and affection, should always have regard to what was done there; and it should be most acceptable to him.

Ver. 4. And if thou wilt walk before me, as David thy father walked, in integrity of heart, and in uprightness, to do according to all that I have commanded thee, to keep my statutes and my judgments.] In all things relating to religion and civil government, which David commonly did: though some time, and in one thing, he foully miscarried.

Ver. 5. Then will I establish the throne of thy kingdom upon Israel for ever, as I promised to David thy father, saying, There shall not fail thee a man upon the throne of Israel.] See 2 Sam. vii. 12, 13.

Ver. 6. But if you shall at all turn from following me, you and your children.] In the Hebrew the words are, if in turning you turn from me: which signifies more than their at all turning from him. Rather it should be translated, if they altogether turned from following him; that is, fell to idolatry: for he did not intend to forsake them for every offence; but only when they forsook him, as the next words explain it.

And will not keep my commandments, and my statutes, which I have set before you, but go and serve other gods, and worship them.] There was a general corruption of their manners, when they fell to idolatry.

Ver. 7. Then will I cut off Israel out of the land which I have given them.] This shews that he speaks in the foregoing words of a general apostacy from him.

And this house, which I have hallowed for my name, will I cast out of my sight.] No longer continue his gracious presence there, which he had promised, ver. 3.

And Israel shall be a proverb.] So that when men would express how unhappy any one was, they should say, "As miserable as the Jews."

And a by-word among the people.] Who mocked at their calamity.

Ver. 8. And at this house, which is high.] Renowned for its riches, and splendour, and great resort unto it.

Every one that passeth by it shall be astonished.] To see such a marvellous change; for Pliny testifies that Jerusalem was the most famous city in the east, as Grotius observes.

And shall hiss; and shall say, Why hath the Lord done thus unto this land, and to this house?] Out of scorn and derision shall ask what is the matter, that this famous place, which boasted so much of the favour of God, is laid in ruin.

Ver. 9. And they shall answer, Because they forsook the Lord their God, who brought forth their fathers out of the land of Egypt, and have taken hold upon other gods, and worshipped them, and served them; therefore hath the Lord brought upon them all this evil.] The Jews were forced to give this account of their calamity.

Ver. 10. And it came to pass in the end of twenty years, when Solomon had built the two houses, the house of the Lord, and the king's house.] The former of which was seven years in building, the latter thirteen, (vi. 38. vii. 1.)

Ver. 11. (Now Hiram the king of Tyre had furnished Solomon with cedar-trees, and fir-trees, and with gold, according to all his desire).] See chap. v. 8. 10. where mention is made of these trees, but nothing said of gold: but in the fourteenth verse of this chapter we find that Hiram sent him a hundred and twenty talents of gold. Which it is not likely he gave Solomon; who rather purchased so much of him for wheat and oil, and such-like things which Hiram's country wanted; though it abounded with gold. For the Tyrians were great merchants, fetching gold from Ophir, (ver. 27, 28.)

That then king Solomon gave Hiram twenty cities in the land of Galilee.] They were near, or adjoining to the country of Galilee (as the particle beth frequently signifies), but were no part of the land of Canaan, when it was divided among the Israelites: for that could not be alienated, being God's heritage. They were therefore cities out of the territories of Israel, as appears from Josh. ix. 27. but had been conquered partly by Pharaoh, who gave them to Solomon, as part of his daughter's portion; and partly by Solomon himself, who had power to dispose of them; especially since at that time they were not inhabited by the Israelites. (See 2 Chron. viii. 2. and Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. i. cap. 3. sect. 12. n. 3.) Hotoman, indeed, a famous lawyer, thinks that Solomon did not give Hiram a propriety, and perpetual right in these cities; but only the possession and enjoyment of them till the debt was satisfied, which Solomon had contracted, by the assistance which Hiram afforded him in building the temple. But his ground is not solid: for, as our Selden also hath shewn, (lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 16.) the kings of Israel might dispose of those lands which they had conquered in a voluntary war, without the consent of the senate. Bochartus also is of the same mind, that these cities were no part of the country of Judea: but Abarbinel confirms Hotoman's opinion, that the revenues of these cities were given to him till the debt was discharged.

Ver. 12. And Hiram came out from Tyre to see the cities which Solomon had given him; and they pleased him not.] Were not suitable to his desire, and the genius of his people; for the soil being fat and very deep (as is generally thought), it required great labour to till it, and was not pleasant to dwell in.

Ver. 13. And he said, What cities are these that thou hast given me, my brother?] These are not words of contempt; for it is not likely that Solomon, who had been highly obliged to Hiram (and was in his own temper very generous), would give him that which was of little value. But his meaning is, these cities were not such as would serve his purpose; which made him return them to Solomon again, (2 Chron. viii. 2.) who, no doubt, made him some other recompence, which gave him better satisfaction. Abarbinel thinks, that Solomon having agreed to give Hiram so many measures of wheat and oil, as are mentioned, v. 11. with which he had supplied him every year; now that this work was ended, gave him this country, out of which he might raise this provision for his household himself. Which Hiram did not like, because his people were addicted to merchandise, not to agriculture: but did not upon this account break off friendship with Solomon, as appears by the following history.

And he called them the land of Cabul unto this day.] It is commonly thought that Hiram called them, by way of contempt, Cabul; which signifies a dirty country: or, as Josephus will have it, displeasing (as we translate it in the margin of our Bibles). For Chabulon, he saith, in the Phœnician language, signifies as much as οὐκ ἀρέσκον, that which doth not please, (lib. viii. Archæol. cap. 2.) But the LXX. seem to have understood the word better; who translate it ὅριον, the term or bound: as if Cabul were the same with Gebul; caph and gimel being frequently changed, as Bochartus observes; who approves of this signification of the word. For Chabulon was that tract of ground which bounded the lower Galilee: extending from Tiberias unto this place, as Josephus himself saith, lib. iii. de Bello Judaico, cap. 2. (See Bochartus, in his Canaan, lib. ii. cap. 4.)

Ver. 14. And Hiram sent to the king sixscore talents of gold.] It may be better translated, and Hiram had sent, &c. See ver. 11. where the reason is given why Solomon offered him so rich a country: Which, though he did not like, yet these words, Abarbinel thinks, signify, that notwithstanding Hiram continued his generous friendship with Solomon, and after that sent him all this gold; or, it was sent him as his share in their traffic to Ophir, mentioned in the conclusion of this chapter.

Ver. 15. And this is the reason of the levy which king Solomon raised.] That the raising of a great tribute upon the people, and employing so many men in his works, might not seem strange, he here shews the cause of it; which was his great and numerous buildings; suitable to the high dignity to which God had advanced him. But Mr. Selden hath shewn, by many instances, that the word mas is used, not only for pecuniary tribute, but for corporeal labour. And thus he interprets these words, this is the cause of requiring the labour and work of so many men. Which when he had declared, iz. his great buildings, then he proceeds (ver. 20.) to relate who they were that he employed in this service, (lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 14.)

For to build the house of the Lord, and his own house.] Of which an account hath been already given.

And Millo.] Which was a large and very beautiful place (as Abarbinel takes it), near to Zion; where the Israelites were wont to meet, and take their pleasure: and because it was full of people, was therefore called Millo; which signifies fulness, or repletion. Now David had built round about Zion, from Millo inward, (as we read 2 Sam. v. 9.) but had left the structure of Millo itself imperfect; which Solomon now completed, with a particular respect to Pharaoh's daughter, whose house was near to it, (ver. 24. of this chapter.) In this place some think there was a strong fortress built, which they gather from xi. 27. and 2 Chron. xxxii. 5. But others will have it to signify that deep valley or ditch (it may be called) which was between Mount Zion (the city of David) and Mount Moriah, on which the temple stood. Therefore, that there might be a convenient passage from the king's palace to the house of God, Solomon joined these two mountains by a bridge or a causeway, which could not be done without filling up the valley, or making great arches; some think the one, and some the other.

And the wall of Jerusalem.] Which was a great structure. For there were three walls, one within another, as Abarbinel and Joseph ben Gorion explain it: the inner wall compassing the house of God and the house of the king; the middle wall compassing the houses of the prophets and great persons; (which explains 2 Kings xxii. 14.) and the third compassed the houses of all the people.

And Hazor.] Which had been a very eminent city, and the head of some kingdoms before the conquest of Canaan, (Josh. xi. 10.) and was given to the tribe of Naphtali, (Josh. xix. 36.)

And Megiddo.] A city in the tribe of Manasseh, (Josh. xvii. 11.)

And Gezer.] In the tribe of Ephraim, (Josh. xxi. 21.)

Ver. 16. For Pharaoh king of Egypt had gone up and taken Gezer, and burnt it with fire, and slain the Canaanites that dwelt in the city.] For the Israelites could not dispossess the Canaanites, but they continued in Joshua's time, and after, to dwell in Gezer, (Josh. xvi. 10. Judg. i. 29.) And it seems David and Solomon did not expel them, but continued them under tribute; until Pharaoh, upon some provocation (which is not recorded), utterly extirpated them, and burnt their city. This was done, I suppose, before the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter; and was the very first expedition that the Egyptians made out of their own country, as Sir John Marsham thinks, in his Can. Chron. Seculum 14.

And given it for a present unto his daughter, Solomon's wife.] It is likely he had begun to repair the city: and now upon the marriage of his daughter restored it to Solomon, who perfectly rebuilt it.

Ver. 17. And Solomon built Gezer, and Beth-horon the nether.] This is, having finished the building of Gezer, he built the lower Beth-horon, which was in the tribe of Benjamin; (Josh. xviii. 13, 14.) and Ezra tells us also (in 2 Chron. viii. 5.) Beth-horon the upper, which was in the tribe of Ephraim, (Josh. xvi. 5.) but not here mentioned: either because it was not of so great consequence, or did not need so much reparation as the other.

Ver. 18. And Baalath.] There was a city of this name in the tribe of Dan, (Josh. xix. 44.) But it is likely this was a city near Tadmor, where Baal had been formerly worshipped: for Baal was one of the gods of that people, it appears in the following observation.

And Tadmor in the wilderness.] This word Tadmor signifies in Hebrew as much as Palma in Latin. From whence it was called by the Romans Palmyra; which was one of the most splendid cities in the eastern countries: which gave name to the Palmyrenæ Solitudines, mentioned by Pliny and Ptolemy. There have been lately, after twelve hundred years' obscurity, several noble inscriptions found in this place by some that travelled into this wilderness: but Bochartus hath one of far greater antiquity, of two Phœnician gods, Aglibelus and Melachbelus, viz. the summer and the winter sun: in his Geogr. Sacra, par. ii. called Canaan, lib. ii. cap. 8. p. 811. where he calls this Tadmor a city of Phœnicia.

In the land.] Of Hamath Zobah (a part of Syria), as Ezra seems to expound it, (2 Chron. viii. 3, 4.) which country Solomon had conquered.

Ver. 19. And all the cities of store that Solomon had.] Where he laid up corn against a time of need; or arms and ammunition, in case of war. Some will have them cities where he kept his treasure, which is not likely.

And cities for his chariots, and cities for his horsemen.] Which he had in great number, (iv. 26.)

And that which Solomon desired to build in Jerusalem, and in Lebanon, and in all the land of his dominion.] So that whithersoever he went, he had a house for his entertainment in every part of his country. Behold, saith Abarbinel, the reason of the tribute (ver. 15.) is given from all these buildings: and after he had finished them, he laid no further tribute upon his people: who murmured at these impositions, as we find, after he was dead: but in these public buildings a great number of hands were employed, whereby idleness was expelled, manufactures were learnt, the poor were relieved, all the meaner people exercised, cities adorned, diseases driven away, and no place left for envy and sedition: while the subjects found the treasure that was raised employed for the benefit of so many of them; as Bodinus discourses, in his book De Republica, lib. xi. cap. 2. where he observes how Augustus, having settled the empire in peace, kept the people in their duty by this means; repairing many temples, decayed by time, or burnt by fire: laying out vast sums upon the chapel of Jupiter Capitolinus, and other public edifices; insomuch, that he gloried, "he left Rome a marble city, which he found a brick."

Ver. 20. And all the people that were left of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, which were not of the children of Israel.] But by this time were become, I suppose, proselytes to the Jewish religion, as the Gibeonites were, or at least renounced their idolatry.

Ver. 21. Their children which were left after them, whom the children of Israel also were not able to destroy, upon them did Solomon levy a tribute of bond-service unto this day.] He was able to have rooted them all out, as the law required; but that command did not take place after they had submitted, and made peace with the Israelites, (as those words suppose, Josh. ix. 19.) And they seem now to have been in so poor a condition, that Solomon did not lay any tribute of money upon them; but only of burdensome labour. Of these were the seventy thousand that bare burdens, and eighty thousand that were hewers in the mountains; mentioned v. 15. Thus Mr. Selden, in the place abovementioned, explains these words, they were not able utterly to destroy: which was not for want of power, but because they had made a covenant with them, and did not consume them, (as it is in 2 Chron. viii. 8:) But they would not receive them into peace with them, till they became proselytes of the gate: and when they had done so, they became tributaries; and therefore such persons, by virtue of their covenant, Solomon now commanded to this service. (See lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gentium, cap. 14.)

Ver. 22. But of the children of Israel did Solomon make no bondmen.] By this means he spared the children of Israel, whom he did not employ in any servile labours about his public works; but put them into nobler offices, as it here follows. Yet this implies that his royal power might have laid such loads on them, if he had not designed to rule with great gentleness over them.

But they were men of war.] Which was accounted an honourable employment.

And were his servants.] Officers in his court.

And his princes.] Governors of provinces.

And his captains, and rulers of his chariots, and his horsemen.] Commanders of his guards.

Ver. 23. And these were the chief of the officers that were over Solomon's work, five hundred and fifty, which bare rule over the people that wrought in the work.] In 2 Chron. viii. 10. they are said to be but two hundred and fifty. For the Hebrew doctors commonly say that there were of these officers but two hundred and fifty Israelites: the other three hundred were proselytes. But the plainest account of this is given by Abarbinel, that there were only two hundred and fifty set over those that wrought in the temple: the rest were employed in looking after his public works in other places. And it must be observed, also, that there were far greater numbers employed when the temple work was carried on with great speed, as we read before, (v. 16.)

Ver. 24. But Pharaoh's daughter came up out of the city of David unto her house which Solomon had built for her: then did he build Millo.] There was not the like necessity for building Millo that there was for building the walls of Jerusalem, and the cities beforenamed: but he did it (as Abarbinel observes) in honour, and for the pleasure of Pharaoh's daughter; who was to remove unto a house near to it. And the reason she did not continue in the house where David had dwelt, we are told in 2 Chron. viii. 11. which was, because it was a kind of holy place, where it was not fit for her to remain; the ark of God having dwelt there.

Ver. 25. And three times in the year did Solomon offer burnt-offerings and peace-offerings upon the altar which he built unto the Lord.] The meaning is not, that he offered sacrifices no oftener; but that he never failed to keep the three solemn festivals, which God commanded to be observed by every body, when he offered sacrifices suitable to those great mercies which were then commemorated; and to the great blessings God had bestowed upon his family.

And he burnt incense upon the altar that was before the Lord.] In the holy place, before the oracle. Where he could not burn it himself; but he gave it to the priests at his own charge, to be offered with a particular respect to him. This, it is likely, he did every day, morning and evening.

So he finished the house.] This was said before, but now repeated; because, after he had kept the three great festivals there, it was not only consecrated, but all Divine offices had been performed in it; and there was nothing more to be added.

Ver. 26. And king Solomon made a navy of ships in Ezion-geber.] This name Ezion-geber signifies spina viri; it lying in a rocky, ragged shore, running out into the sea like the back-bone of a man. So Arrianus (as Bochartus observes) in his Periplus describes the inmost part of the Sinus Arabicus (where Ezion-geber lay) as very dangerous, because of the rocks and shelves. Which makes it less strange, that the ships of Jehoshaphat were broken there in pieces, in the very port, before they put out to sea, (2 Kings xxii. 48.) Insomuch that in aftertimes this port was forsaken, and they frequented Elath. Josephus will have Ezion-geber to be the same with Berenice, a city on the African shore, over against Syene; others have different conjectures: when the Scripture plainly teaches us that it was a port of Idumea, not far from Aela upon the Red Sea; and not far distant from the wilderness of Zin. For the Israelites removed their camp from this place to that wilderness, as we read Numb. xxxiii. 36.

Which is beside Eloth.] Or Elath, for it is called by both names: and by the Greeks and Romans, Aela, and Ailat, and Elat, and Elana, &c. Which was a port known in the days of Moses, (Deut. ii. 8.) belonging to the Edomites; and, as St. Jerome saith, to the Egyptians: for it was ambigui juris, lying on the confines of both countries. Insomuch that Sir John Marsham thinks Solomon and Hiram now built ships there, with the good leave of Pharaoh; the Egyptians now not minding merchandise, but were set upon conquering countries: but David having conquered Edom, (2 Sam. viii. 14.) I rather think became master of this port; where Solomon built a navy of ships in his own right, and went thither himself to see it, (2 Chron. viii. 17.) It continued in the possession of the Israelites about a hundred and fifty years, till, in the time of Joram, the Edomites recovered it, (2 Kings viii. 20.) But it was again taken from them by Azariah, and left by him to his son, (2 Kings xiv. 22.) but lost again by his grandson Ahaz, from whom the king of Syria took it, (2 Kings xvi. 6.) The Syrians held it a long time, till, after many changes under the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ, it came into the hands of the Romans; who quartered there the tenth legion, as St. Jerome tells us. (See Bochartus, in the second part of his Geographica Sacra, called Canaan, lib. i. cap. 44.)

On the shore of the Red Sea, in the land of Edom.] What the Hebrews call the sea of Suph, other nations call the sea of Edom, from the country which it washes, viz. Idumea; as appears from this place. From whence the Greeks (not knowing the reason of the name) call it ἐρυθρὰν θάλασσαν, the Red Sea: the word Edom signifying rubrum or rufrum, red or yellow, as Bochartus and Ludolphus have observed.

Ver. 27. And Hiram sent in the navy his servants, shipmen that had knowledge of the sea, with the servants of Solomon.] The navy was Solomon's, who had servants of his own on board the ships, to go and traffic at Ophir: but they had no skill in navigation, and therefore Hiram sent as many Tyrians as were necessary to man the ships; they having been always bred at sea.

Ver. 28. And they came to Ophir.] It is certain there was a place called Ophir, or as the LXX. call it Σόφιρ (which word Josephus also uses instead of Ophir), and by others called Ὀρφῆν, which was in Arabia Felix. But this cannot be the place here meant, as Bochartus hath demonstrated by many arguments, in his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 27. This one is sufficient, that it was a three years' voyage to Ophir here mentioned; whereas the other was very near the place where the navy was prepared. And besides, they fetched ivory from Ophir, whereas there are no elephants in Arabia; therefore we must search for it somewhere else: and there is little doubt it was in India: but in what part of it, is not so easy to be determined. The famous Bochartus thinks it was Taprobana; which is the same with that now called Zeilan, or Seilan. For what the ancients say of Taprobana, that the moderns say of Zeilan; as he hath shewn in a very large diagram of both countries, in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 46. And, indeed, Grotius before him concluded, there was no better way to guess where this place was, than by considering what commodities were brought from thence, and inquiring of merchants (who have been in the remote parts of the world) where not only gold, and silver, and precious stones, but ivory, and all the rest that were fetched from Ophir, are to be found now. And, in a letter to his brother, he desires him to make this inquiry for him. (See Epistol. 483.)

And fetched from thence gold, four hundred and twenty talents.] It is said in 2 Chron. viii. 18. that they brought four hundred and fifty: but we may well suppose that thirty talents might be spent in the charges of the voyage to and fro; so that only four hundred and twenty came to Solomon's coffers. Or rather, as Abarbinel thinks, Solomon gave the servants of Hiram, who managed the ships, thirty talents for a gratuity. Or, as Laniado (who delights to contradict Abarbinel), the Jerusalem talent was bigger than that of Ophir: so that four hundred and fifty Ophir talents made but four hundred and twenty Jerusalem talents. It is easy also to say, that there came of gold refined only four hundred and twenty into Solomon's treasury; though the whole mass was four hundred and fifty.

And brought it to king Solomon.] It is no improbable conjecture of Abarbinel, that Solomon at first trafficked in the ships of Hiram; which voyage brought him for his share the hundred and twenty talents mentioned ver. 14. of this chapter: which Hiram is said to have sent to him, as the profit (that is) of his adventure. Which was so great that Solomon resolved to build a navy of his own; at which Hiram was so far from being offended, that, like a true friend, he furnished him with mariners to manage the ships; and they brought him this great quantity of gold at their return from their first voyage.

The imperial laws forbid noblemen to exercise merchandise as a thing below them: and therefore it much less becomes a king; as Bodinus discourses, lib. vi. de Republ. cap. 2. But we must not measure antiquity by our own times: and that author well adds, that though he would not have kings now to be merchants, yet if he might have his choice, "Mercatorem eum malo quam tyrannum," &c. I had rather a prince should be a merchant than a tyrant; and noblemen should rather trade than oppress and make a prey of their tenants.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. AND when the queen of Sheba.] Josephus thinks she was queen of Meroe, which was anciently called Saba. But a great many of his countrymen more rightly understand this matter; who say she came from Aljemin, which was the south part of Arabia Felix, near the Red Sea; and so our Saviour calls her the queen of the south, which is the signification of Jemin in Hebrew; and in Arabic, with the addition of Al, is called Aljemin.

Heard of the fame of Solomon, concerning the name of the Lord.] Theodoret thinks she was a religious woman, as far as the light of nature guided her; and if we may believe the Hebrew tradition, she had some tincture of revealed religion from her pious ancestors: for they think she was descended from Abraham by Keturah, one of whose sons begat Sheba, (1 Chron. i. 32.) Now she came to hear of Solomon's fame by the ships that went to Ophir: for they sailed by her coast, and in all likelihood spread his fame there, as they did in all other places where they touched, proclaiming his magnificence, and especially his wisdom, and his glorious temple which he had built for the worship of his God: whose praise they set forth as far above all gods.

She came to prove him with hard questions.] To try whether he was so wise as report made him; by propounding difficult questions to him, which none but a man divinely illuminated could resolve, as Abarbinel understands it.

Ver. 2. And she came to Jerusalem.] The fable of Agatharcides is confuted by this, which saith the royal dignity among the Sabæans was but a kind of captivity. For after the inauguration of their king, it was forbid, by an ancient oracle, that he should stir out of his palace upon pain of stoning: but there he enjoyed himself in all manner of pleasure.

With a very great train.] Royally attended.

And with camels that bare spices, and very much gold, and precious stones.] These presents which she brought to Solomon are a great argument she came from Arabia Felix, which abounded with such things, but none of them are in Meroe: nor can Meroe be said to be the ends of the earth, from whence our Saviour saith this queen came, there being many large countries in Africa beyond Meroe, but none beyond the Sabæans in Arabia, whose country lay upon the sea. See Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 26. where he shews they abounded in gold, having such plenty of it from Ophir, that they exchanged it for brass and iron, &c. giving double, or thrice the weight of them. And yet the Abyssine Christians (who say her name was Marqueda) are very confident she came from their country; where it is as constant a tradition that she had a son by Solomon, from whom their kings are derived. So Ludolphus observes, in his notes upon the confession of Claudius king of Ethiopia, where he saith, this was "the faith of his father the Israelitish king."

And when she was come to Solomon, she communed with him of all that was in her heart.] Had the liberty to propound whatsoever she desired to be resolved about; either in natural, I suppose, or Divine things.

Ver. 3. And Solomon told her all her questions.] That is, answered them to her satisfaction.

There was not any thing hid from the king, which he told her not.] There was nothing so secret, which he did not reveal to her.

Ver. 4. And when the queen of Sheba had seen all Solomon's wisdom.] Had fully discovered the wonderful variety of wisdom wherewith he was endowed.

And the house which he had built.] Both for God and for himself; the magnificence of which was admirable.

Ver. 5. And the meat of his table.] Where it is likely she was entertained while she stayed at Jerusalem.

And the sitting of his servants.] At their table.

And the attendance of his ministers.] Who waited on him at his table, and in his chamber, and other places.

And their apparel.] Which was different, I suppose, according to their several offices; but all very stately.

And his cup-bearers.] Who filled out his wine, and brought and delivered it to him; with such ceremony as made his grandeur appear in that small thing.

And his ascent by which he went up to the house of the Lord.] From his own palace; of which L'Empereur gives an account, upon Codex Middoth, p. 50. But the ancient interpreters understand by the word olatho not his ascent, but his burnt-offering, which he offered in the house of the Lord. And it is very likely, she saw the service of God's ministers in his house, as well as Solomon's in his own house; and was made by Solomon to understand the meaning of every thing that was done there. Which must needs put her into an ecstacy of admiration, as it here follows. And thus the LXX. translate these words, καὶ τὴν ὁλοκαύτωσιν αὐτοῦ ἣν ἀν ἔφερεν ἐν οἴκῳ κυρίου, whom P. Martyr, Victorinus Strigelius, and others, follow in these words: "Et holocausta ejus, quæ in domo Domini offerebat;" and his burnt-offerings, which he offered in the house of the Lord.

There was no more spirit in her.] She was perfectly astonished. For as he discoursed of all sorts of natural things, so he was no less skilful in political government; and transcended in the knowledge of Divine matters, as his book shews us; having all things likewise in such order both in his house, and every where else, that it was amazing. A very great man of our own observes, that such things as these—the apparel, the sitting and attendance of his servants, were justly admired by her as an indication of Solomon's wisdom. For they are the outworks which preserve majesty itself from approaches and surprisals. And whatsoever prince departs from these forms, and trappings, and ornaments of his dignity and pre-eminence, will hardly be able, at some time, to preserve the body itself of majesty from intrusion, invasion, and violation.

Ver. 6. And she said unto the king.] When she had recovered herself out of her astonishment.

It was a true report that I heard in my own country of thy acts, and of thy wisdom.] They did not deceive her, who, by their reports of him, moved her to take this long journey.

Ver. 7. Howbeit, I believed not the words, till I came, and mine eyes had seen it.] She thought they might magnify things too much, as travellers are wont to do; especially when they speak of their own country.

And, behold, the half was not told me: thy wisdom and prosperity exceedeth the fame which I heard.] This was very extraordinary; for commonly men find things fall far short of their expectations.

Ver. 8. Happy are thy men.] His subjects.

And happy are these thy servants, which stand continually before thee, and hear thy wisdom.] Especially those that were about his person, and ministered unto him; who had opportunity every day to hear his wise sayings and discourses.

Ver. 9. Blessed be the Lord thy God.] One would think, by this, that she became a proselyte before she returned to her own country; whither she carried better things than she presented to Solomon (which the next verses mention); the treasures of heavenly wisdom. Philostorgius, indeed, saith, that in his time the Sabæans sacrificed to the sun and moon, and certain demons of their own country; and yet ἐκ περιτόμου τὸ ἔθνος, &c. the nation was circumcised after the Jewish manner on the eighth day. Which rite they received, one would think, from this queen, and retained it a long time, though they continued their old superstition. It is possible, indeed, that the Jews who lived among them, might persuade them to it. For the same Philostorgius saith, οὐκ ὀλίγον πλῆθος Ἰουδαίων αὐτοῖς ἀναπέφυραι, no small number of Jews was mingled with them.

Which delighted in thee, to set thee on the throne of Israel: because the Lord loved Israel for ever, therefore made he thee king, to do judgment and justice.] A most excellent admonition both to the people and to the king; that they should think themselves highly obliged to God, who had given them such a king; and he should think God made him king to govern his people justly. This sense the wise heathen had, that governors were set over men by God for their good: as Aristotle told Alexander in a letter to him, wherein he exhorts him to keep in mind, that his kingdom was given him by God for the sake of mankind, εἰς εὐεργεσίαν, οὐ πρὸς ὕβριν, that he might do them good, and not abuse them.

Ver. 10. And she gave the king a hundred and twenty talents of gold.] Though we do not find that the ancients speak of any mines of gold in the Sabæans' country; yet they abounded with it, being near to that Ophir which I before mentioned, and is spoken of in the book of Job, xxii. 24. xxviii. 16. (in an age when they were not acquainted with the Indian Ophir, which was very remote from them.) And several other places there were also near to them, who had plenty of gold, as Bochartus shews in his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 27. p. 159, &c.

And of spices very great store, and precious stones.] This country was famous for myrrh, frankincense, and cinnamon (Josephus adds balsam, also), as Bochart observes, out of many authors in the same book, cap. 26. p. 149. 153. For their very fires were made of cassia and cinnamon. Precious stones also he shews were so common in this country, that they adorned their cups, and their beds, and their stools, &c. with them. (See him, p. 150.)

There came no more such abundance of spices as these which the queen of Sheba gave to king Solomon.] For it seems the Jews maintained no trade with this country.

Ver. 11. And the navy also of Hiram that brought gold from Ophir.] This is meant of Ophir in India, mentioned ix. 28. From which Hiram's navy is said to bring gold, though the ships were Solomon's, because Hiram's servants had the management of them.

Brought in from Ophir great plenty of almug-trees, and precious stones.] It is very uncertain what these almug, or algum-trees were (as they are called by a transposition of letters in 2 Chron. ii. 8.) Our famous Dr. Castell thinks it was the wood called sanctulum, which is proper for all the uses mentioned in the next verse, and is still in India. And R. D. Kimchi upon that place in the Chronicles saith it was a red wood which is now called brezil. By which cannot be meant the wood that comes from Brazil, for that country was not known in his days; but probably he calls it brezil, from the Hebrew word barzel, which signifies iron; it being of such a dark colour. And such a wood there is now in the kingdom of Java, as Gousset observes out of Thevet, and other authors, in his Comment. Linguæ Hebr.

Ver. 12. And the king made of the almug-trees pillars for the house of the Lord, and for his own house.] Or rather rails (as we translate it in the margin of our Bibles), which were made on either side the causey which went up from the king's house to the house of the Lord. Compare this with 1 Chron. xxvi. 16. 18. and 2 Chron. ix. 11. and see Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, p. 125. where he only quotes Ralbag, who saith he made battlements, i. e. rails, on either side, that men by them might stay themselves as they went along the highway of that ascent.

Harps also and psalteries for singers: there came no such almug-trees, nor were seen unto this day.] This account of almug-trees is mixed with the story of the queen of Sheba, because she is said (ver. 5.) to have admired the ascent (as we translate it) which Solomon made to the house of the Lord. Which appeared the more magnificent, because the rails thereof were made of this rare wood. Which Abarbinel fancies was coral, which grows in the very sea, and they had never seen before; nor did any come after.

Ver. 13. And king Solomon gave unto the queen of Sheba all her desire, whatsoever she asked, beside that which Solomon gave her of his royal bounty.] By their mutual presents, which she made to him, (ver. 10.) and he at her departure made to her, they testified their friendship to each other; desiring by these to be remembered. And Solomon desired to know what would be most acceptable to her, among all the rarities she had seen, which he bestowed upon her: besides, he generously added more things of value, which it is likely she had not in her own country.

So she turned, and went to her own country, she and her servants.] Accompanied, it is probable, with many of the Israelites, who went and planted themselves there: from whom sprung those Jews, who, Philostorgius saith, were mixed with the Sabæans in no small numbers, as I observed, ver. 9. But the Jews of whom he speaks were such as settled there after the last captivity; and it was not lawful for a Jew, while the temple stood, to settle in a place, from whence he could not come three times a year to worship at Jerusalem.

Ver. 14. Now the weight of gold which came to Solomon in one year was six hundred threescore and six talents of gold.] The history of the queen of Sheba being ended, he returns to give an account of Solomon's riches and magnificence; which he had begun to set forth before. And first he relates what a vast quantity of gold was brought into his country every year; not only from Ophir, but from other countries, unto which perhaps the queen of Sheba opened him a passage.

Ver. 15. Besides that he had of the merchantmen.] Who paid custom for the goods they brought from several countries; or, as Abarbinel thinks, the men of Hattarim (as the words are in the Hebrew) signify a certain nation, viz. the Tartars (as they are now called), who brought commodities from the north country to the people of Israel, as others did from the south.

And of the traffic of the spice-merchants.] There is no reason thus to translate these words, as the same author thinks: but they signify in general all sorts of traders, who brought in merchandise, by sea or land.

And all the kings of Arabia.] Who sent him presents.

And of the governors of the countries.] Which David or he had conquered, and placed governors there; who gathered his tribute, and sent it to him every year.

Ver. 16. And king Solomon made two hundred targets of beaten gold: six hundred shekels of gold went to one target.

Ver. 17. And he made three hundred shekels of beaten gold; three pound of gold went to every shield.] These targets and shields seem to have been made for state and pomp; to be carried before him, upon some special occasions. Though we do read in the Roman authors of some great captains to whom golden shields were granted, as a reward of their great valour: and these perhaps might be intended for the same purpose. But then we must not think that the shields weighed but six hundred shekels (which would have been so small as to be of no use), but that each cost six hundred shekels of gold; as Fortunatus Scacchus observes, Myrothec. iii. cap. 3.

And the king put them in the house of the forest of Lebanon.] Where, it is likely, he kept his most precious treasure. See concerning this house, vii. 2. which Josephus saith the queen of Sheba admired above all things she saw in Judea: the vast multitude of cedar pillars that were in it, making it look like the forest of Lebanon: from whence some think it had its name.

Ver. 18. And the king made a great throne of ivory.] We never read of ivory until about Solomon's time; who, perhaps, brought elephants out of India, and took care to have a great deal of ivory brought with them. Insomuch, that we read of ivory palaces, (Psal. xlv. 9.) whose walls were overlaid with ivory; which was more precious than gold in ancient times, as Pliny tells in many places.

And overlaid it with the best gold.] Not entirely, so as to cover the ivory (for then it might as well have been made of wood), but here and there; as P. Martyr reasonably conjectures. Which made the throne appear more beautiful by the mixture of gold and ivory; with which, at due distances, it was studded. In this throne he sat when he administered justice, and gave audience to ambassadors, and the like.

Ver. 19. The throne had six steps.] Was advanced to a just height, that he might be seen and heard by all.

And the top of the throne was round behind.] Making a half circle over his head.

And there were stays on either side of the place of the seat.] Like one of our great chairs, which have rests to lean one's arms upon, on either side.

And two lions stood beside the stays.] As their supporters.

Ver. 20. And twelve lions stood on the one side, and on the other upon the six steps.] Upon every step a lion stood reared up, on each side, as if he was falling upon his prey: which many interpreters think had a mystical meaning in it, as every thing else had belonging to this throne; with which I shall not trouble the reader. Grotius thinks he offended in making these figures; and having once begun to transgress the law, he grew still worse and worse.

There was not the like made in any kingdom.] That is, in those times there was none to be compared with it; but in after-ages there were perhaps more glorious. For Athenæus saith, the throne of the Parthian kings was of gold, encompassed with four golden pillars, beset with precious stones, (lib. xii. Deipnos.) And the Persian kings, he saith, sat in judgment under a golden vine (and other trees of gold), the bunches of whose grapes were made of several sorts of precious stones.

Ver. 21. And all king Solomon's drinking vessels were of gold, and all the vessels of the house of the forest of Lebanon were of pure gold; none were of silver: it was nothing accounted of in the days of Solomon.] Who brought in such plenty of gold, that it made silver of less value while he lived.

Ver. 22. For the king had at sea a navy of Tarshish with the navy of Hiram.] These words are added to give a further account how Solomon came to have gold in such abundance: for he trafficked for it in another fleet, besides that which went to Ophir. That fleet, it is plain, was Solomon's, and sailed out of his own port Ezion-geber, (ix. 26.) though it was manned by Tyrians, because they understood the sea. Whereas this navy here spoken of belonged to Hiram, and went out of his port at Tyre; and Solomon had only the liberty to trade in it to Tarshish. Which was a place wherewith the Tyrians had very ancient commerce; and therefore Hiram was the chief in this voyage, as Solomon was in that to Ophir.

Once in three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver.] It was not so far off, that they could not return in less than three years: but, as Abarbinel supposes, they went thither in the end of one year, and stayed there the next to vend and to buy their commodities; and then returned in the beginning of the third year. Bochartus hath made it very probable that this place was Tartessus in Spain, where gold and silver in ancient times, if we may believe Strabo and others, whom he quotes, were plentiful. But I do not find any proof that ivory, apes, and peacocks, were the commodities of that country. (See his Phaleg. lib. iii. cap. 7.)

And ivory.] The Hebrew word senhabim is of doubtful signification: but the word sen, or shen, certainly signifying a tooth, interpreters have supposed that habim signifies an elephant; and both together import elephants' teeth, i. e. ivory. But it is hard to give an account of this word habim: therefore Bochartus rather thinks that the whole word senhabim signifies an elephant: which best agrees with what follows, apes and peacocks, all three signifying living creatures: and, indeed, ivory itself, in this chapter, is simply called by the name of sen: where he speaks of Solomon's throne, ver. 18. (See his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 20.)

And apes.] The Hebrew word kephim is both by the ancients and moderns translated apes: which creature Pliny calls cephos; and saith they were seen but once at Romo in his days, and that they came out of Ethiopia. So that if Tarshish was in Spain, they that sailed thither trafficked in Afric also before they came home. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 31.)

And peacocks.] The LXX. do not adventure to translate the Hebrew word thuccijim: but the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, and Latin, translate it as we do, peacocks: and so do the most learned among the Jews, as Bochartus shews in a long dissertation; where he probably guesses this creature had its name by a small transposition of letters from Cuthajim; as much as to say a bird of Cuth, or a Persian bird. Which transpositions are so usual, that we have an instance of it in this chapter: the trees here called almugim, being called in the Chronicles algumim. See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 23. where he shews how beautiful a creature this is: which might well be brought from foreign countries to Judea, where there were none of them.

Ver. 23. So king Solomon exceeded all the kings of the earth for riches and for wisdom.] The latter of which he begged of God; who graciously promised to add the former; which he did to admiration.

Ver. 24. And all the earth sought to Solomon, to hear his wisdom, which God had put in his heart.] That is, the great men of the neighbouring countries came, as the queen of Sheba did, to be acquainted with his wisdom; which they heard was a Divine gift.

Ver. 25. And they brought every man his present, vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and garments, and armour, and spices, horses, and mules.] This shews that he speaks, in the former verse, of the great men of the earth; who made these presents to him, when they came into his country.

A rate year by year.] This seems to signify that they so highly prized his wisdom, that they courted his friendship; and voluntarily sent him a certain present every year, as a token of the continuance of it.

Ver. 26. And Solomon gathered together chariots, and horsemen.] In a time of profound peace, he thought it a piece of wisdom to be ready for war, as a means to preserve the peace. Though the surest way to enjoy the happiness wherein he lived, had been to observe strictly the commands of God.

And he had a thousand and four hundred chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen.] Four hundred of these chariots, Josephus saith, were presented from the kings and princes beforementioned: and he had a thousand of his own before. But what need was there for so many stables for his horses as seem to be mentioned, iv. 26. viz. forty thousand? The word is not stables, but stalls; every horse having a stall, not a stable to himself: and some chariots had two, some four horses belonging to them. And yet even thus there were too many: therefore we must suppose they did not always stand in one place; but sometimes in one country, sometimes in another. Where it was necessary there should be stalls for them, when he removed from city to city.

Whom he bestowed in the cities for chariots, and with the king at Jerusalem.] The former part of these words relates to the chariots, which were kept in the country, in the cities Solomon built for them, (ix. 19.) and the latter to the horsemen, which were always with the king in Jerusalem; as Abarbinel understands these words. Thus Solomon took care they should not be burdensome to his people, by keeping them all in one place: but they were distributed through the country, only a great body of horse in the royal city.

Ver. 27. And the king made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones.] As common as pebbles.

And cedars made he to be as the sycamore-trees which are in the vale, in abundance.] Ordinary things, like willows, that among us grow numerously in low grounds.

Ver. 28. And king Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt.] Here he again openly transgressed the law of God (as Grotius observes), presuming he had no need of those cautions, which were given against this by Moses in the book of Deuteronomy, (xvii. 16.)

And linen yarn.] Most think byssus, fine linen, is hereby meant; which was a great commodity in Egypt.

The king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price.] It is acknowledged by all interpreters that these, and the following words in the next verse, are very obscure.

Ver. 29. And a chariot came up and went out of Egypt for six hundred shekels of silver, and a horse for a hundred and fifty: and so for all the kings of the Hittites, and the kings of Syria, did they bring them out by their means.] These words Bochartus seems to me to have cleared with the greatest perspicuity, by taking the Hebrew word mikveh, not for linen yarn, or fine linen; but for the toll or custom that was taken for the horses that were brought out of Egypt. And thus he translates the whole; Horses were brought up to Solomon out of Egypt; and as for the toll or custom, the merchants of king Solomon hired it at a price (that is, redeemed it of the king of Egypt for so much constantly); and a chariot coming out of Egypt went out for six hundred shekels of silver, and a horse for a hundred and fifty; and so for all the kings of the Hittites, and for the kings of Syria, did they bring by their hands. The sense of which words is plainly this, that noble horses being found in those times in few countries but Egypt, Pharaoh would not suffer them to be carried from thence without a great tribute, which he exacted from them; which was six hundred shekels for a chariot, and a hundred and fifty for a horse. This must not be understood to be the price at which they were bought, but the custom paid for them; otherwise every horse would have been of the same value, which is absurd. Solomon, therefore, bringing many thousand horses out of Egypt, prevailed with his father-in-law to free him from this grievous tribute, and to accept of a certain sum of money to be paid him every year instead of it. Thus being freed from the custom, which was demanded of all others; all the kings of the Hittites and Syrians bought their chariots and horses of Solomon's merchants, who could afford to sell them cheaper than they could have them in Egypt. (See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 9.)

By the kings of the Hittites are meant the rulers of some of that nation, who were driven out by the Israelites; and lived in the north-east of the land of Canaan, or in some part of Arabia. (See Judg. i. 26.)

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. AND king Solomon loved many strange women (together with the daughter of Pharaoh).] It was not a fault in him that he married Pharaoh's daughter; she being a proselyte, as is generally supposed, to the Jewish religion. But in marrying so many other women besides, he committed two sins against the law; one in multiplying wives, and another in marrying those of strange nations, who still retained their idolatrous religion; which was expressly against their law, as the next verse declares it. The Jewish doctors, indeed, are so very desirous to excuse Solomon, that they say these strange women were proselyted: but Mr. Selden well observes, that then it had been no sin to have married with some of them; and yet Nehemiah says it was a sin, xiii. 26. (lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 15. p. 625, 626. and Buxtorf. de Sponsal. et Divort. p. 40, 41.)

Women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Zidonians, and Hittites.] Some think Solomon would not have taken wives out of these nations, had it not been out of some political principle: which some think was, that he might by their means gain intelligence of the state of those countries: others, that he might extinguish the old enmity which was between the Israelites and those nations; to which he might probably hope to put an end, by contracting these marriages with them. But good intentions will not justify the doing unlawful things.

Ver. 2. Of the nations concerning which the Lord said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall not go in to them, neither shall they come in unto you: for surely they will turn away your heart after their gods.] This relates particularly to the Hittites and the Zidonians beforementioned; and consequently the rest of the seven nations of Canaan, with whom they were forbidden to make any marriage, (Exod. xxxiv. 16. Deut. vii. 3.) for the weighty reason here mentioned. For though they might marry wives of other nations, if they embraced the Jewish religion; yet of the seven nations of Canaan they might not, though they were converted to their religion: lest the venom might lurk and lie hid; and at last break out, and infect them. Great was the foresight of Moses (wherewith God endowed him) in giving this precept (as Grotius notes); for the not observing it undid the Israelites, and was the foundation of their utter ruin.

Solomon clave unto these in love.] He not only married them, but had a great affection to them; whereby his heart was easily alienated from God.

Ver. 3. And he had seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines.] Of these princesses, few or none had the name of queens, as Abarbinel observes; but they only who were of the highest esteem with him, or who were of royal extraction. He thinks Solomon enjoyed every one of these once, and then shut them up, that nobody might touch them afterward. (See Buxtorf. de Sponsal. et Divort. p. 48, 49. and Hackspan's Miscellanies, lib. i. cap. 6.) But it seems to me more probable, that he kept so many wives merely for state and pomp; after the manner of the eastern princes; but never used many of them. Just as they do now in China, where the emperor hath a great multitude of wives, chosen out of the prime beauties of the country: many of which he never saw in his life; as Father la Compte tells us in his history of China, par. i. p. 62. The same is said of the Great Mogul, that he hath as many women as will make up a full thousand (which is Solomon's number), as the author of the Voyage to the Indies tells us, in the end of P. le Valle's History, sect. 20. p. 469. It must be considered, also, that Solomon had not brought them to this number in the beginning of his reign, but towards the latter end; when his riches increasing, he made vast expenses; and studied to outdo all other kings, in magnificence of all kinds.

And his wives turned away his heart.] He was so delighted in their company, that they turned away his thoughts from serious business; yea, from God himself.

Ver. 4. For it came to pass, when Solomon was old, that his wives turned away his heart after other gods.] For, indulging himself too much in pleasure, he weakened both his body and his mind: and growing old betime, began to doat upon other gods; which he suffered his wives to worship privately, and at last openly to exercise the religious rites of their own country.

And his heart was not perfect with the Lord his God, as was the heart of David his father.] He did not forsake the Lord, but joined other gods with him. Which a man of his sense could never have done, (who had solemnly acknowledged in his prayer, that there was no god like to the Lord, yea, that there was no god else, viii. 23. 60.) if his mind had not been enervated, and his understanding darkened by sensual pleasures.

Ver. 5. And Solomon went after Ashtoreth the goddess of the Zidonians.] He worshipped Astarte, of which see in the book of Judges, ii. 13. and 1 Sam. vii. 3, 4.

And after Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites.] This god was the same with Moloch; whom he calls an abomination, because highly detested by God: who had given them a particular caution against worshipping the host of heaven, (Deut. iv. 10.) Now Moloch signifies the prince of that host, as I may call it, the sun; the king of heaven, as the moon was called the queen: in this all agree, that Moloch comes from melech, which in the Hebrew language signifies a king, and is of the same import with Baal and Adonis (which signify lord), which were worshipped by many nations, as Moloch was: who was not the peculiar god of the Ammonites; but the god whom they principally worshipped.

Ver. 6. And Solomon did evil in the sight of the Lord, and went not fully after the Lord, as David his father did.] And yet Abarbinel thinks he did not commit idolatry by offering sacrifices to these false gods; but was only persuaded by his wives so far as to learn the manner after which they worshipped their gods, by being present at the rites of their religion. Which was a dangerous piece of learning; which he might have known without being present at their sacrifices.

Ver. 7. Then did Solomon build a high place for Chemosh the abomination of Moab.] Concerning Chemosh I have said enough elsewhere. (See Numb. xxi. 29.)

In the hill that is before Jerusalem.] He set up an altar upon the Mount of Olives; where all the city of Jerusalem might see what they did. This contradicts Abarbinel, and shews he was more than a spectator of their worship: which he encouraged by building an altar for it. And indeed that author is much to blame in abusing his excellent parts, to find excuses for such a foul crime.

And for Moloch the abomination of the children of Ammon.] In the same place, I suppose, Moloch was worshipped: for he would not adventure to permit strange worship to be exercised in Jerusalem itself; though his posterity did. And so from little beginnings followed great mischiefs.

Ver. 8. And likewise did he for all his strange wives, which burnt incense, and sacrificed unto their gods.] For what was granted to one, the rest would be apt to claim; or else complain of unkindness to them. It is an astonishing thing that a man of his wisdom should not rather have converted them all to his religion, than be seduced by them so much as to favour theirs. But he took no pains with them, having given up himself wholly to his pleasures; and growing conceited perhaps of his great wisdom, thought he could reconcile his religion with theirs; and find a good meaning in all their superstitions. Abarbinel observes, in several places, that it is never said Pharaoh's daughter turned away his heart from the Lord, or that he set up an altar for her: which is an argument she was proselyted to the true religion, and continued in it. As the rest might have been, if he had made it his business, and had not grown indifferent, and thought all religions alike. Which hath been the disease of some great wits.

Ver. 9. And the Lord was angry with Solomon, because his heart was turned from the Lord God of Israel, which had appeared to him twice.] First at Gibeon, in the beginning of his reign, iii. 5. and then at Jerusalem, after the building of the temple, ix. 2. There was another time when a message came to him, by the word of the Lord, vi. 12. But we do not read that God appeared to him more than twice; which was enough to establish him in his faith, fear, and love.

Ver. 10. And had commanded him concerning this thing, that he should not go after other gods.] For in both those visions the happiness God promised him was declared to depend upon his observation of God's statutes, as David his father did. (See iii. 14. ix. 4, 5.) And when he had begun to build the temple, he admonished him, that he had better desist than go on in that work, unless he intended to keep all his commandments, vii. 12, 13.

But he kept not that which the Lord commanded.] Which was the greater crime, because he had so oft admonished him of his duty, and done such great things for him.

Ver. 11. Wherefore the Lord said unto Solomon.] Either by some prophet, or by a vision: wherein he appeared to him as terribly as before he had done kindly, and pronounced this doom upon him. The former I think is most probable, that God would not vouchsafe to appear to him any more; but sent this message by Ahijah, or some other prophet.

Forasmuch as thou hast done this, and thou hast not kept my covenant, and my statutes, which I commanded thee, I will surely rend the kingdom from thee, and give it unto thy servant.] Tear it in pieces, and give the greater part of it to one of his own subjects, viz. Jeroboam. This was enough to astonish any man, to hear that all his splendour should be so soon eclipsed, if he were not perfectly stupified: and it is likely it did make him reflect upon his folly; and, as many think, moved him to write the book of Ecclesiastes.

Ver. 12. Notwithstanding in thy days I will not do it for David thy father's sake: but I will rend it out of the hand of thy son.] Though this was some mitigation of the punishment, that in his days the kingdom should continue entire; yet he humbled him by letting him know this favour was not granted for his sake, but for his father's, who had served him faithfully.

Ver. 13. Howbeit I will not rend away all the kingdom; but will give one tribe to thy son for thy servant David's sake.] In memory also of David's faithful service he adds another mitigation of the punishment: that the whole kingdom should not be torn from his son, but he would leave him one tribe, over which he should reign: which was that of Judah, unto which Benjamin was an appendix, being much mixed with it.

And for Jerusalem's sake, which I have chosen.] To be the place of his habitation, in the temple built there by Solomon, which he would suffer to remain to his posterity.

Ver. 14. And the Lord stirred up an adversary unto Solomon, Hadad the Edomite: he was of the king's seed in Edom.] Though God did not execute the forementioned threatening till after his death, yet he began to afflict Solomon by raising up three adversaries against him; who disturbed his repose, in his old age, when he most desired to be quiet. The first of them is here mentioned, who had a mortal hatred to Solomon, ever since the death of David, who had endeavoured to destroy him with every male in the country. But God restrained his wrath from attempting any thing against Solomon, as long as he observed God's commands.

Ver. 15. For it came to pass, when David was in Edom.] To conquer the country: which he did entirely, and put garrisons into it, (2 Sam. viii. 14. 1 Chron. xviii. 12, 13.)

And Joab the captain of the host was gone up to bury the slain.] It is not to be supposed that the Edomites slew none of the Israelites in the defence of their country: and those are they, it is probable, unto whom Joab, after he had done his business, went up to give an honourable interment.

After he had smitten every male in Edom.] That is, all he could find; for some fled, as Hadad did.

Ver. 16. (For six months did Joab remain there with all Israel.] That is, with all his army.

Until he had cut off every male in Edom).] Intending to extirpate the nation.

Ver. 17. That Hadad fled, he, and certain Edomites of his father's servants with him, to go into Egypt; Hadad being yet a little child.] He being very young, some of his father's servants took him and hid him, and themselves with him, in some secret place; and when Joab was busy in giving a solemn burial to the Israelites, they took that opportunity to carry Hadad into Egypt.

Ver. 18. And they arose out of Midian.] But first they went into Midian, that they might send from thence to know if Pharaoh would give them entertainment and protection.

And came to Paran.] Which was in the way to Egypt. For the wilderness of Paran lay between Edom and Egypt.

And they took men with them.] To attend Hadad; that he might appear like a young prince.

And they came to Egypt, unto Pharaoh king of Egypt.] He invited him not only to come into his country, but to his own palace.

Which gave him a house, and appointed him a table, and gave him land.] According to the manner of generous princes, who pity noble persons that are in distress; Pharaoh not only assigned him a house, and kept a table for him, that he might want nothing; but moreover gave him land, that out of its revenues he might provide himself an equipage suitable to his quality.

Ver. 19. And Hadad found great favour in the eyes of Pharaoh, so that he gave him to wife the sister of his own wife, the sister of Tahpenes the queen.] This argues a high esteem of him, for the princely qualities which it is likely appeared in him. Though sometimes the affections of kings are unaccountable, and they prefer those who do not deserve it.

Ver. 20. And the sister of Tahpenes bare him Genubath his son, whom Tahpenes weaned in Pharaoh's house.] The queen had as great a fondness for the child, as the king had for his father; and would have him nursed and weaned in Pharaoh's palace.

And Genubath was in Pharaoh's household among the sons of Pharaoh.] He was educated among the king's children, as if he had been of them; which gave Hadad, no doubt, great reputation.

Ver. 21. And when Hadad heard in Egypt that David slept with his fathers, and that Joab the captain of the host was dead.] Whom he dreaded more than David; having done that terrible execution upon his country, of destroying their males for six months together.

Hadad said to Pharaoh, Let me depart, that I may go to my own country.] Which he hoped to recover, now that the great enemies of it were dead, and Solomon young.

Ver. 22. Then Pharaoh said unto him, But what hast thou lacked with me, that thou seekest to go to thine own country? And he answered, Nothing: howbeit let me go in any wise.] Nothing would satisfy him, but to go and attempt the regaining the dominion of Edom. Which some fancy he did, by the intercession of Pharaoh, who persuaded Solomon to let him reign in Edom, paying him a tribute; which now in the end of Solomon's reign he denied to pay, and rebelled against him. But this proceeds upon a supposition, that when David died Solomon was married, which is not true. Nor is it certain that he was the same Pharaoh whose daughter Solomon married, that had been so kind as to educate Hadad. It seems to me more likely, that though Hadad ventured to his own country, he durst not attempt any thing till Solomon began to decline in the favour of God, and of his people too. For if Hadad had moved any change of government, Solomon had forces enough to suppress him; and in his vigorous age, no doubt, would have done it; he being so great a prince, and having so many chariots and horsemen always ready, that I am apt to think Hadad did not so much as enter into his own country, but lived somewhere near it; watching an opportunity to get possession of it; which he found in the conclusion of Solomon's reign.

Ver. 23. And God stirred him up another adversary, Rezon the son of Eliadah, which fled from his lord Hadadezer king of Zobah.] When he saw his army beaten by king David, 2 Sam. viii. 3.

Ver. 24. And he gathered men unto him, and became captain over a band, when David slew them of Zobah.] Some of those that fled, when David defeated Hadadezer, enlisted themselves under Rezon; who became their commander. And it is probable, he lived after the manner of the Arabians, by plunder and robbery, all the days of David, and the best part of Solomon's reign.

And they went to Damascus, and dwelt therein, and reigned in Damascus.] Not in the days of David, who had put a garrison into Damascus, and brought the people under tribute, (2 Sam. viii. 5, 6.) And so they continued subject unto Solomon; till he, doating upon strange women, minded not the defence of his conquests. Which Rezon took the advantage of, and invaded and got possession of Damascus, and reigned there, as Hadad did in Edom.

Ver. 25. And he was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon.] This is not to be understood of the whole reign of Solomon, which for the most part was peaceable, (as was observed before, iv. 20. 25.) but of all the days which remained of his life, from the time that his wives publicly exercised their idolatry, unto the day of his death.

Beside the mischief that Hadad did.] This signifies, as Abarbinel thinks, that Hadad durst not have rebelled against Solomon, if Hadad had not led him the way; but seeing what success he had in Edom, he and his men seized on Damascus.

And he abhorred Israel, and reigned over Syria.] In combination with Hadad he defied Israel, and made himself king, not only of Damascus, but over all the country thereabout.

Ver. 26. And Jeroboam the son of Nebat, an Ephrathite of Zereda, Solomon's servant.] In a public employment.

(Whose mother's name was Zeruah, a widow-woman), even he lifted up his hand against the king.] Not against king Solomon, that we read of, but against his son; to whom he gave great disturbance, as soon as Solomon was dead.

Ver. 27. And this was the cause that he lifted up his hand against the king: Solomon built Millo, and repaired the breaches of the city of David his father.] This was the occasion of Jeroboam's advancement, as it follows in the next verse. For Solomon being engaged in many buildings, chose fitting persons to oversee his works; among which Jeroboam was one. Who took this opportunity to work in the people a disaffection to Solomon and his government, as Abarbinel and other of the Jews imagine. For he represented, say they, the building of Millo as a work of vanity, only to gratify Pharaoh's daughter: and the breaches of the city of David they take to have been only open places, at which people might enter and come easily many ways to the king's palace; whereas, being stopped up by Solomon, access was not so easy, but they were forced to go about. This was represented as a grievance, especially since such heavy burdens were laid upon the people to maintain these expenses. But the text suggests nothing of this.

Ver. 28. And the man Jeroboam was a mighty man of valour.] Of great courage and strength of body.

And Solomon seeing the young man that he was industrious.] Very diligent in the business wherein he had employed him, of looking over his works.

He made him ruler over all the charge of the house of Joseph.] Gave him greater preferment, which was to look after the revenue of a whole province—the tribe of Ephraim, and, as some think, Manasseh also. This was a high obligation upon him; but it made him, the Hebrew doctors think, only more presumptuous to instil discontent into the people, who were unnecessarily burdened to support Solomon's vanity in such vast buildings as he undertook. If Jeroboam was guilty of joining with the people in their murmurings, and increasing them, this cannot properly be called lifting up the hand, that is, rebelling against Solomon: but was a preparation for it, and disposed the people to the revolt which afterward followed.

Ver. 29. And it came to pass at that time, when Jeroboam went out of Jerusalem.] Where he had been, it is likely, to give up his accounts, and was returning to his charge.

That the prophet Ahijah the Shilonite found him in the way.] Met with him as he was going along. Some of the Jewish doctors will have this prophet to be one of those who came out of Egypt with Moses, and therefore must be five hundred years old. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. p. 668.) Which, if it could be believed, made him the fitter person to reprove Jeroboam afterward for the sin of the golden calves, and also for the rebellion which he had seen punished in Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.

And he had clad himself with a new garment.] That he might make the better appearance at court, when he waited on the king.

And they two were alone in the field.] The prophet, I suppose, took Jeroboam aside to speak with him privately: for it cannot be thought that Jeroboam had no servants to attend him; but they were bid to stay where they were, until the prophet and he went to confer about some private business.

Ver. 30. And Ahijah caught the new garment that was on him, and rent it in twelve pieces.] An emblem of what followed, or rather a prediction of it: for there were two ways in those ancient days of foretelling things; one in express words, the other in signs and resemblances; according to the manner of the eastern people in the eldest times. Many instances we have of it, after this of Ahijah. As Zedekiah made himself a pair of iron horns, and said to Ahab, "With these shalt thou push the Syrians," &c. (xxii. 11.) Elisha also foretold the victories of Joash, by shooting arrows and stamping on the ground so many times, (2 Kings xiii. 18, &c.) Jeremiah foretold the pulling down of Jerusalem's pride, by the rotting of his girdle, where it was buried by Euphrates; and a great many more in the Old Testament, which continued in the New; Agabus foretelling the bonds of St. Paul, by binding his own hands and feet with St. Paul's girdle.

Ver. 31. And he said to Jeroboam, Take thee ten pieces; for thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, Behold, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee.] Whence it is called frequently the kingdom of the ten tribes.

Ver. 32. (But he shall have one tribe.] Besides his own. Or Benjamin and Judah may be looked upon but as one tribe; both of them having a share in the city of Jerusalem, and lying near one to the other.

For my servant David's sake, and for Jerusalem's sake, the city which I have chosen out of all the tribes of Israel).] See above, ver. 13.

Ver. 33. Because they have forsaken me, and have worshipped Ashtoreth the goddess of the Zidonians, and Chemosh the god of the Moabites, and Milcom the god of the children of Ammon.] It seems by this, that some of the people, at least of Solomon's court, followed his bad example.

And have not walked in my ways, to do that which is right in mine eyes, and to keep my statutes and my judgments, as did David his father.] This was a great aggravation of his sin, that he had so good a father; who had given him an excellent education under Nathan the prophet, (as I observed, 2 Sam. xii. 25.) and a most pious example; having never gone after other gods, but celebrated the praises of the Lord with the highest strains of love and devotion.

Ver. 34. Howbeit I will not take the whole kingdom out of his hand.] No, not the kingdom of the ten tribes; which Solomon held as long as he lived. These and the following words explain the threatening, (ver. 32.) of rending the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, not to be meant of taking any part of it from him, during his life.

But will make him a prince all the days of his life for David my servant's sake, because he kept my commandments and my statutes.] This was an admonition to Jeroboam not to molest Solomon in his lifetime, by raising rebellion against him; and also to walk in God's ways as David did, and not fall into idolatry; for which sin God resolved to punish Solomon so severely, as to rend the greatest part of his kingdom from his posterity.

Ver. 35. But I will take the kingdom out of his son's hand, and will give it unto thee, even ten tribes.] He bids him not doubt of what he promised; but he must stay for it till Solomon was dead.

Ver. 36. And unto his son will I give one tribe.] He saith one tribe, though there were two; because (as Abarbinel observes) they had their portion and possession together in Jerusalem; and, though two tribes, were both called by the name of Judah; because of the eminence and glory of that tribe; which was so great, that, before the division of the kingdom, Judah is often mentioned as distinct from the rest of Israel. (See 1 Sam. xi. 8. 2 Sam. v. 5.)

That David my servant may have a light alway before me in Jerusalem, the city which I have chosen to put my name there.] By a light is meant a succession of kings, who are called the light of the people, (as David is, 2 Sam. xxi. 17.) because they cheer them by their comfortable influence, when they govern well. And these are said to be before God in Jerusalem; because there he dwelt where they reigned.

Ver. 37. And I will take thee.] From that condition wherein he was, and place him on a throne, as here follows.

And thou shalt reign according to all that thy soul desireth.] Have a very flourishing kingdom.

And shalt be king over Israel.] But not reign in Jerusalem.

Ver. 38. And it shall be, if thou wilt hearken unto all that I commanded thee, and wilt walk in my ways, and do that which is right in my sight, to keep my statutes and my commandments, as David my servant did, that I will be with thee, and build thee a sure house, as I built for David.] The same promise that he made to David, 2 Sam. vii. 16. only he doth not say he would establish his kingdom for ever.

And will give Israel unto thee.] Make them his obedient subjects.

Ver. 39. And I will for this.] For their sin, mentioned ver. 33.

Afflict the house of David.] By this rending the greatest part of the kingdom from them.

But not for ever.] For in the days of the Messiah, saith Rasi, the kingdom shall be restored to the house of David.

And he might have added, that few returned out of their captivity but the house of Judah, who were delivered in a wonderful manner from Babylon.

Ver. 40. Solomon sought therefore to kill Jeroboam.] A sign of his dotage; that he could entertain a thought of endeavouring to defeat the purpose of God! But how he came to know what was secretly transacted between Ahijah and Jeroboam alone, is a great question. Perhaps the prophet made no scruple to report what he had delivered in the name of the Lord. Or, Jeroboam himself, being puffed up with this assurance, could not contain, but told it to some of his confidants, who spread it abroad. Or, his servants, though they heard not a word spoken, yet seeing the rending of his garment into twelve parts, and the giving ten to him, might speak of it: the meaning of which Solomon easily understood; being told (by the same prophet, perhaps) that the kingdom should be rent from him, and given to his servant, ver. 11.

And Jeroboam arose, and fled into Egypt.] This was a common refuge for discontented people. And it may seem strange that the king of Egypt, being nearly allied to Solomon, either his father-in-law, or brother-in-law (for many think the father of Solomon's wife was dead), should give such persons entertainment. But it is to be considered that kingdoms are never married; and princes commonly regard only their own interest.

Unto Shishak king of Egypt.] All the kings of Egypt had the title of Pharaoh, even from the time of Abraham: but we never find any of them, till now, called by his proper name, to distinguish from other Pharaoh's; unless Remesis (Gen. xlvii. 11.) be the name of a king, not of a country. Now all agree that this is the great king who is called by the Greeks Sesostris: who having subdued Ethiopia, extended his conquests into Asia, as far as the Assyrians and Medes, as Josephus tells us, who calls him Sethosis, lib. i. contra Apion.

And was in Egypt until the death of Solomon.] Being protected by Shishak: who, it is likely, was now projecting the great conquests he made afterward.

Ver. 41. And the rest of the acts of Solomon, and all that he did, and his wisdom, are they not written in the book of the acts of Solomon?] All the kings of Israel, as Abarbinel thinks, maintained some wise men, who wrote all that passed in their reign. Perhaps this was begun by Solomon (for we read not of any book of the acts of David), and out of these annals, the sacred writer of this book took what he thought most useful, and omitted the rest, which he did not judge so necessary and instructive.

Ver. 42. And the time that Solomon reigned in Jerusalem over all Israel.] There seems to have been no need to say he reigned in Jerusalem, since he reigned over all Israel; if it had not been to shew the great tranquillity of his reign. Which was such, that he did not go out to war as other kings, but lived quietly in his royal city.

Was forty years.] He lost the great privilege of long life, which God promised if he performed such sincere obedience as David did; unto whose age he did not attain.

Ver. 43. And Solomon slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David his father; and Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead.] Thus concludes the history of this great man; without any the least mention of his repentance; though he saw terrible punishments coming upon his family. Which should have moved him (one would think) to pull down the high places he had built for idolatrous worship, and abandon all his strange wives; and done some remarkable honour to the Lord God of Israel. Which if he did, the Divine writer did not think fit to record it, but to leave all in uncertainty, and leave a blot upon his memory; that all posterity might have a frightful example of human weakness, and learn thereby to watch and pray, lest they enter into temptation.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. AND Rehoboam went to Shechem.] A multitude of children was accounted a great blessing among the Israelites: but if Solomon had any more besides this son and two daughters, mentioned iv. 11. 15. this holy writer would not do him the honour to mention them, but passes them by in silence: nor doth he vouchsafe to acquaint us (as is usual) in the beginning of his story, from whom Rehoboam was descended by the mother's side; but in the conclusion mentions it twice (xiv. 21. 31.) that she was an Ammonitess, one of an infamous nation. Howsoever, though he was not entirely an Israelite, he pretended to the kingdom; being the eldest, if not the only son of Solomon, to whom it belonged by the law then established; which ever after continued in Judah. That which follows shews this was the opinion of all the people.

For all Israel were come to Shechem to make him king.] To acknowledge him for their sovereign, as rightful successor to Solomon. They met for this purpose at Shechem, because it was the most convenient place, being in the middle of the kingdom: or, as others think, because it was in the tribe of Ephraim; where they could speak their minds more freely than they durst at Jerusalem, which was in the tribe of Judah. And this hath some colour in it, from what follows; that they sent for Jeroboam to meet them there, who would not venture to come to Jerusalem.

Ver. 2. And it came to pass, when Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who was yet in Egypt, heard of it.] The words of it are not in the original, but only that he heard: either of this meeting, or of the death of Solomon, or both: for he could not hear of this meeting without hearing of his death.

(For he was fled from the presence of king Solomon, and Jeroboam dwelt in Egypt).] As hath been related in the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 3. That they sent and called him.] At the same time that he heard of this meeting, and the occasion of it, a message came to him from the assembly, to desire his assistance.

And Jeroboam and all the congregation of Israel came, and spake unto Rehoboam, saying.] By all the congregation is meant all their elders, and heads of their tribes; who chose Jeroboam to be their speaker.

Ver. 4. Thy father made our yoke grievous: now therefore make thou the grievous service of thy father, and his heavy yoke which he put upon us, lighter, and we will serve thee.] They begin with a complaint against the former government; but promise to submit to Rehoboam as their king, and be his faithful subjects, if he would promise to ease them of those burdens which his father had imposed on them. Which were not so heavy as they represented them; considering the peace and plenty they enjoyed, (iv. 25.) and the vast riches he brought into the kingdom: so that silver was nothing accounted of in his days, (x. 21.) But people are more sensible of the smallest pressures, than of all their enjoyments: and most sensible of the least burden, when they are at perfect ease. Such were the tributes he exacted for his buildings, the expenses of his family, and maintenance of chariots and horsemen, which were all for the honour of the nation, and employed great numbers of them. Abarbinel thinks it is possible, when war was raised by Hadad and by Rezon against him, in his latter days, the tribute might be increased, and occasion their grumbling. But howsoever that be, it is observable that they make no complaints at all of Solomon's idolatry, and the strange worship he introduced; about which they were not concerned, but rather complied with him. (See xi. 33.)

Ver. 5. And he said unto them, Depart yet for three days, then come again to me. And the people departed.] He desired time to consider, in so weighty a business; pretending, I suppose, he would examine the truth of their allegations: otherwise it had been dangerous to send them away without any answer, when it was evident they were disgusted.

Ver. 6. And king Rehoboam.] By this it is plain he had a title to the kingdom; though they had not yet made a recognition, as we speak, of his authority.

Consulted with the old men that stood before Solomon his father, while he yet lived.] Solomon was so wise, as in his best days not to depend solely on his own wisdom; but had other wise men, with whom he advised, as his counsellors, in all matters of moment.

And said, How do ye advise, that I may answer this people?] Being men of great experience, who had learned, no doubt, much wisdom under so wise a king as Solomon, he had reason both to consult such sages, and to depend upon their advice, as likely to be most prudent and safe.

Ver. 7. And they spake unto him, saying, If thou wilt be a servant unto this people to-day, and wilt serve them, and answer them, and speak good words to them, then they will be thy servants for ever.] This was most solid advice, to get possession of the kingdom, and then he might govern as his father had done. And he might easily be possessed of it, by condescending to them for once, and giving them such an answer as they desired; which would oblige them to him for ever. For to be their servant one day, signified no more than to court them with good words, and kind promises, to be an easy governor of them: which would win their hearts, and make them submit cheerfully to him; and give him the same power which his father had.

Ver. 8. But he forsook the counsel of the old men, which they gave him.] He was proud and vain, I suppose, and scorned to court his people; expecting obedience unto him, as an absolute monarch.

And consulted with young men that were grown up with him, and stood before him.] He had made some of his familiars, who had been bred up with him and attended him, to be now of his privy-council: men inexperienced, and who understood not the humour of the people; which is a frequent fault of new kings, who, to shew their power, presently change their counsellors, and put in new officers; to gratify all their dependants; not considering who are wisest, but who have been their companions.

Ver. 9. And he said unto them, What counsel give ye, that we may answer this people who have spoken to me, saying, Make the yoke which thy father did put upon us lighter?] It is likely he told them what the old counsellors had said; who, they thought, were too timorous, and therefore give more bold and fierce advice.

Ver. 10. And the young men that were grown up with him spake unto him, saying.] They were not so young but they might have had more wit (if they had not been men of pleasure); for Rehoboam being one-and-forty years old when he began to reign, (xiv. 21.) and these men growing up with him, were about the same age.

Thus shalt thou speak unto the people that spake unto thee, saying, Thy father made our yoke heavy, but make thou it lighter to us; thus shalt thou say unto them, My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins.] They advise him to threaten to lay burdens upon them as much heavier than his father's, as the loins are thicker than the little finger: words of infamy, madness, stupidity, and full of lies, as Abarbinel here glosses: for he magnifies himself, as if his power excelled his father's, unto whom he was nothing comparable. And if it had been true, it did not become him to boast on this fashion; but he ought rather to have highly magnified the glory and majesty of his father.

Ver. 11. And now whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, I will add to your yoke.] What a senseless stupidity was this (as the same author proceeds) to grant the accusation to be true which they brought against his father, and not rather to have excused and defended so excellent a prince, from whom they could not but acknowledge they had received exceeding great benefits?

My father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.] This is still worse, to accuse his father of such severity (which the people did not), that he treated the Israelites like beasts: for a whip is for a horse, as Solomon observes, Prov. xxvi. 3. And who could endure to hear him say, that he would treat them far more severely, and tear their very flesh in pieces? For that is meant by scorpions, whips with rowels in them (as we speak), which Abarbinel calls iron thorns. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 32.) Ralbag simply calls them thorns tied to a whip, which grievously pricked and tore the flesh. (See Carpzovius upon Schickard's Jus Regium, cap. 2. Theor. 7. p. 143.) What people could bear this with patience, or endure to come under the yoke of such a furious prince?

Ver. 12. So Jeroboam and all the people came to Rehoboam the third day, as the king had appointed, saying, Come again the third day.] In which time wiser thoughts, one would have expected, should have taken place: but Solomon had observed, that "there is no counsel, nor understanding, nor wisdom, against the Lord," (Prov. xxi. 30.) whose doing this was, as it follows, ver. 15.

Ver. 13. And the king answered the people roughly, and forsook the counsel of the old men which they gave him.] He answered them like a tyrant, not like a king.

Ver. 14. And spake to them after the counsel of the young men.] Which was most suitable to a prince of a high and violent spirit.

Saying, My father made your yoke heavy, and I will add to your yoke: my father also chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.] He thought, it is likely, to have frighted them into obedience by this blustering language, which justly made him odious.

Ver. 15. Wherefore the king hearkened not unto the people of Israel.] Who desired to be eased of their burdens.

For the cause was from the Lord, that he might perform his saying, which the Lord spake by Ahijah the Shilonite unto Jeroboam the son of Nebat.] God infatuated his counsels to bring about his own design. Otherwise, he could not have been so blinded, as not to see how basely he reflected upon his father; and how unlikely it was that the people would submit to such a power as he intended to exercise over them. But, as Livy excellently speaks, "fatis urgentibus rempublicam, omnia salutaria monita spernuntur." And here one cannot but observe the vast difference there is between the sacred and profane historians. The intention of the former is to possess men's minds with a sense of Divine Providence, which secretly rules in all public, as well as private affairs. Machiavel himself, though far from being religious, was sensible of an overruling power interposing in all things, which few historians acknowledge so as they ought: but rather write, as if they would not have their reader think of any thing but the wisdom, strength, and policy, of those that manage affairs, without any consideration of the care God takes of them. Of this Hermannus Conringius thinks Polybius himself to have been guilty, whatsoever excuses Casaubon makes for him. (De Civili Prudentia, cap. 14.)

Ver. 16. So when all Israel saw that the king hearkened not unto them, the people answered the king, saying, What portion have we in David?] They renounce all interest in him, and in his family.

Neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse.] So they call David in a contemptuous and scornful manner. Wherein they have left us an exact picture of an ungrateful world, as Victorinus Strigelius here speaks. For no eloquence is able to express the great merits of David to the children of Israel.

To your tents, O Israel. Now see to thy own house, David. So Israel departed to their tents.] They left Rehoboam, and bade him look to his own affairs; for they would have nothing to do with him. Thus other kingdoms have been overturned by the folly of heady young men: as an old poet observes in Tully's book de Senectute, cap. 6. where he quotes these verses out of Nævius in a play of his, in which one asks,

"Cedo, qui vestram Rempublicam tantam amisistis tam cito."

Tell me, I beseech thee, how you came to lose such a famous commonwealth so quickly?

Unto which he brings in another returning this answer,

"Proventabant oratores novi, stulti adolescentuli."

There arose up new orators, a company of foolish youths.

Upon which Cato makes this remark; viz.

"Temeritas est florentis ætatis, prudentia senescentis."

Rashness is the property of youth, prudence belongs to old age.

Ver. 17. But as for the children of Israel which dwelt in the cities of Judah, Rehoboam reigned over them.] As several of the Simeonites also did; who were very nearly situated to Judah.

Ver. 18. Then king Rehoboam sent Adoram, who was over the tribute.] This was a new piece of imprudence, to send one to treat with them, when they were so highly exasperated; and to send him (with promises, perhaps, of easing them, when it was too late) who had the principal care of those tributes, of which they complained. For people hate those that are the instruments of their oppression, or any way employed in it.

And all Israel stoned him with stones, that he died.] There was a general uproar against him; in which they committed this barbarity against the law of all nations; which prohibits any violence to be done to a king's ambassador. But in their rage, the king feared (it appears by the next words) they would have no respect to himself.

Therefore king Rehoboam made speed to get him up to his chariot, to flee to Jerusalem.] This seems to be a further imprudence; for he should have maintained his ground and kept footing (as we speak) in the country of Israel; from whence it might not have been easy for them to expel him: but fear is as bad an adviser as fury. This is the first time that we read of a king riding in a chariot; for we never read that either Saul, or David, or Solomon, rode in them: but after the division of the kingdom, there is frequent mention of the use of them both by the kings of Judah and Israel.

Ver. 19. So Israel rebelled against the house of David unto this day.] Would no longer be governed by any of David's race; who had been their deliverer from their powerful enemies. The remembrance of which might have made them more patient; and not so forward to revolt from a family to which they had been so much obliged. But old kindnesses are laid asleep, and people are strangely forgetful of benefits, as Pindar speaks, in Isthmia, ode 7.

Ἀλλὰ παλαιὰ γὰρ εὖδει
Χάρις, ἀμνάμονες δὲ βροτοί.

This defection from the family of David is justly called a rebellion, as Salianus notes in his Annals; for though God willed this defection as a punishment of sin, yet they did wickedly who were the authors of it. And though the family of Solomon deserved such a punishment, yet the people had no just reason to forsake their legal prince. For they had no order from God for it: and Rehoboam's answer to them did not deserve such a resentment; much less so sudden and inconsiderate. Nor did the prophetical prediction warrant it: which might have been fulfilled some other way, than by such a violent throwing off his government.

Ver. 20. And it came to pass, when all Israel heard that Jeroboam was come again.] The great men had seen him, and needed not to be informed of his return; (ver. 3.) but now the news was spread over all the country.

That they sent, and called him to the congregation.] From his tent, unto which he was gone, as other people were, (ver. 16.)

And made him king over all Israel.] Without any condition, that we can find, though it is likely he promised to ease them of all their burdens.

There was none that followed the house of David but the tribe of Judah only.] Which comprehends Benjamin also, being one with it, as was observed before, (xi. 31, 32.) And it was by the singular providence of God, that they were not also tempted to desert such a haughty prince as Rehoboam was.

Ver. 21. And when Rehoboam was come to Jerusalem, he assembled all the house of Judah, with the tribe of Benjamin, a hundred and fourscore thousand chosen men, which were warriors, to fight against the house of Israel, to bring the kingdom again to Rehoboam the son of Solomon.] This was a very potent tribe, especially assisted by Benjamin, and wanted not affection to the house of David, which they had expressed upon all occasions; and were ready now, with a very numerous army, to fall upon the Israelites, before their new king was settled in his throne, and bring them back to their rightful king.

Ver. 22. But the word of God came to Shemaiah the man of God, saying.] A person, known to be a prophet, was sent to them from God with a message, before they marched to the country of Israel.

Ver. 23. Speak unto Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, king of Judah.] God himself owns him for no more than king of Judah.

And to all the house of Judah and Benjamin, and to the remnant of the people, saying.] Unto those mentioned ver. 17.

Ver. 24. Thus saith the Lord, Ye shall not go up to fight against your brethren the children of Israel: turn every man to his house; for this thing is from me.] Who was resolved to maintain what he had done. It was the intention and design of God to make Jeroboam king; but he did not stay for his appointment, but usurped the kingdom by the help of certain vain fellows, who raised a sedition against Rehoboam. (See 2 Chron. xiii. 5—7.) And besides, God did not promise to set his posterity upon his throne (as he did to David and Solomon), unless he kept his commandments, which he did not: and therefore, though he saith the thing was from him, yet the setting his son upon the throne after him, and the succeeding kings, was not from him; but in Hosea he saith, (viii. 4.) They have set up kings, but not by me: they have set up princes, and I knew it not; i. e. did not approve it.

They hearkened therefore to the word of the Lord, and returned to depart, according to the word of the Lord.] Now Rehoboam was cool, and began to be wise, in not resisting the counsel of God, who had taken the kingdom from him; but submitting to his decree, and bearing it patiently. The people, at least, were of this mind, and persuaded him not to engage in a war, wherein God would appear against him. According to the counsel of Menander mentioned by Strigelius, Μὴ θεομάχει, μηδὲ προσάγου τῷ πράγματι χειμῶνας ἑτέρους, τοὺς δὲ ἀναγκαίους φέρε. Fight not against God; neither do any thing to bring upon thyself new storms and tempests: but bear those that are necessary, and cannot be avoided.

Ver. 25. Then Jeroboam built Shechem in Mount Ephraim, and dwelt therein.] For there it is likely they chose him king; and therefore he enlarged and beautified it (which is meant by built), to be his royal seat.

And he went out from thence, and built Penuel.] But this did not satisfy him, he removed from thence to another city, which he also built; and so became a builder as well as Solomon, with whose buildings he is thought to have found fault.

Ver. 26. And Jeroboam said in his heart, Now shall the kingdom return to the house of David.] Though God had told him he would build him a sure house, (xi. 37, 38.) if he kept his commandments, yet he did not trust to his promise; but after he had been some time possessed of the kingdom, began to fear a revolt of the people, if he permitted them to worship God according to the law; and so contrived to make an alteration in religion.

Ver. 27. If the people go up to do sacrifice in the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, then shall the heart of this people turn again unto their lord, even unto Rehoboam king of Judah, and they shall kill me, and go again to Rehoboam king of Judah.] All the people of Israel being bound at the three great feasts to go up to Jerusalem to worship; as also, upon other solemn occasions, devout persons going thither to offer gifts and sacrifices; he was afraid they would be so taken with the splendour and magnificence of the temple, and of the royal city, and recal to memory the famous acts of David and Solomon, who were buried there; and the king would find such means to oblige them, and the priests and Levites so solicit them to unite themselves again to Judah (who appeared to have the better cause, having the temple in possession where God dwelt), that they would be drawn not only to forsake him, but to kill him. For besides all this, their belief of one only God was the principal cause of union among them: and next to that was their worshipping God at one only place. Therefore, instead of consulting God, and committing himself to him, who could and would have preserved him in the kingdom he had given him, notwithstanding all these dangers; he took counsel, as it here follows, of such as were governed only by reasons of state, and devised how to establish himself by wicked inventions.

The Talmudists, after their manner, add another reason why he took the following resolution. For, saith R. Nachman, (in the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 11. n. 46.) the custom being that none should sit in the court of the temple, but only the king of the house of David, he thought with himself, that if the people saw Rehoboam sit, and him stand, they would conclude the former to be king, and Jeroboam but his servant. Another reason is alleged by Kimchi: when the year of release came, Jeroboam said within himself, it is written, (Deut. xxxi. 10, 11.) "At the end of every seventh year thou shalt read this law in the ears of all Israel," &c. Now if I attempt to read it, the people will say, The king who is in the place which God hath chosen (i. e. Jerusalem) must read first, and so I must read it after him, which will be a disgrace to me; and if I read it not at all it will be worse, for I shall be thought profane. But these, and such-like, are frivolous reasons, for his resolution to draw the people from the worship of God according to the law, at his own house at Jerusalem.

Ver. 28. Whereupon the king took counsel.] Of some secular politicians, who, if they could but preserve the civil government, cared not what became of religion. The Jews in the place abovementioned, in the Sanhedrin, tell the story in this manner; That he summoned a council, consisting partly of pious, partly of wicked men; whom he asked whether they would subscribe to all that he ordered. They answered, Yes. Then he said, he would be constituted their king: to which they consenting, he asked if they would obey him. To which there being a ready compliance, he added, Even though I command you to serve idols? at which the pious men startled, and were full of indignation; but their wicked neighbours whispered to them, saying, Do you think Jeroboam will honour idols? he saith this only to try your obedience. And so even Ahijah himself was drawn in, by this fraud, to subscribe to what he proposed, that they would be obedient in all things without exception.

And made two calves of gold.] One egg, as Bochartus speaks, is not more like to another, than these calves were to that which Aaron made. Only, as the Jews say in Sanhedrin, till Jeroboam's time the Israelites sucked but one calf; but from that time they sucked two. They were of the same matter with Aaron's, and made for the same reason: his, because Moses was absent; and these, because the holy city (where the temple, the altar, the priests of God were) they could not come to with safety. And as Aaron, so Jeroboam learnt this calf-worship in Egypt, where he lived for some years. The LXX. translate these words, δύο δαμάλεις χρυσᾶς, two she-calves; and so doth Josephus: and the prophet Hosea also speaks of them in the feminine gender, (x. 5.) by way of contempt and despisal, as Bochartus thinks. It is not improbable (as some learned men have conjectured), that he made two calves, in imitation of the Egyptians, with whom he had conversed, who had a couple of oxen which they worshipped; Apis at Memphis, the metropolis of the upper Egypt; and Mnevis at Hierapolis, which was the chief city of the lower.

And said unto them, It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem.] Or, as some expound the Hebrew words, You have gone long enough to Jerusalem.

Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt.] The very same words that Aaron had spoken, Exod. xxxii. 4. and they had the same meaning. For he would have them think, that there was no need of going up to Jerusalem, three times a year, with labour and charge; when the true God, who brought their fathers out of Egypt, dwelt among them there no less than at Jerusalem. For God is every where in his essence (it is likely he told them), and cannot be included in any place; and if they required any special symbols of his presence, behold, here they were in those calves which he set up. As if every man had power to devise, out of his own head, a symbol of God's presence. (See Vossius, de Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. i. cap. 3.)

Ver. 29. And he set the one in Beth-el, and the other put he in Dan.] The former of which was in the south, the latter in the north of the country of Israel; and as Beth-el was in every body's opinion a sacred place (having been consecrated by Jacob, when God appeared to him there more than once), so Dan had been famous for the teraphim of Micah: unto which there had been great resort, a long time, (Judg. xviii. 30.) For such reasons as these, it is likely, he waved his royal city, which was Shechem; and chose these two places for the residence of the Divine Majesty: for so he pretended that these calves represented God; whom he did not forsake, but worshipped him in these symbols of his presence.

Ver. 30. And this became a sin.] Led them into foul idolatry: for that was the sin which Jeroboam is so often accused of: and the settling a calf in Dan was a high aggravation of their sin; there being no pretence for two calves; nor for placing one there, where God had never been extraordinarily present.

For the people went to worship before the one, even unto Dan.] Which place being in the extreme part of the country, yet the people were so zealous in their idolatry, that they travelled to offer sacrifice there; so that they who thought it grievous to go to worship God at Jerusalem, did not think much to go a great deal further to worship an idol. This seems to me the simplest meaning; which others take to be, that they who dwelt in Beth-el were so zealous, that they would go as far as Dan to worship the other calf.

Ver. 31. And he made a house of high places.] That is, saith Abarbinel, he made a house or temple at Dan; wherein there was not one altar only, as there was at Jerusalem, but a great many high places.

And made priests of the lowest of the people, which were not of the sons of Levi.] The Hebrew words miketzoth haam should not be interpreted the lowest of the people; but, as the same Abarbinel expounds it, out of all the people; he made any body a priest, though he was not of the sons of Levi. And Bochartus hath justified this exposition, by a great many examples of the use of these words in other places. To this Jeroboam was forced, because the Levites would not serve his impiety, (2 Chron. xi. 14.) and therefore he expelled them all, and seized on their cities and lands. Whereby, as he eased the people of paying their tithes, there being none to demand them; so he gratified them by making priests out of every tribe and family; even in the extremest part of the country, as the Hebrew words signify. Thus as he transferred the kingdom from the house of David, so he transferred the priesthood from the family of Aaron, and let it loose, that any body might be admitted to that honourable employment. Which was a very popular thing, and ingratiated him, no doubt, with the Israelites. And Cornel. Bertram thinks, that as he had priests, so he had Levites also of the same stamp; that is, some to officiate under the priests, as they did. The former he called cohenim, as they were called in Judah; the other he called cemarim, who ministered as the Levites did; but in black, not in white garments, and thence had their name. (De Republ. Judaica, cap. 16.)

Ver. 32. And Jeroboam ordained a feast in the eighth month, on the fifteenth day of the month, like unto the feast that is in Judah.] That is, the feast of tabernacles; which by the law was to be celebrated on the fifteenth day of the seventh month. This he altered, and, as Abarbinel thinks, might possibly give this reason for his impious presumption; that this feast being instituted by God after the gathering of their fruits, which were sooner ripe about Jerusalem than in the northern parts of the country; he pretended the eighth month would be a better time for it than the seventh; because then they would be every where gathered. But his chief intention in this change, was to alienate the people from the rites observed at Jerusalem.

And he offered upon the altar.] This was a high presumption, to invade the priesthood himself, and offer sacrifices to his gods. A crime which none of the kings of Judah were guilty of, but only Uzziah; who was smitten with a leprosy, for meddling with the priests' office, 2 Chron. xxvi. 19.

(So he did in Beth-el), sacrificing unto the calves that he had made.] What he had done in Dan, he did also in Beth-el; for hitherto hath been related only what he did in the remotest place.

And he placed in Beth-el the priests of the high places which he had made.] There he also built a house, or temple; and set up many altars in it, where these priests officiated as they did in other high places.

Ver. 33. So he offered upon the altar he had made in Beth-el the fifteenth day of the eighth month.] There he began this new festival, and consecrated it himself.

In the month which he had devised of his own heart.] Out of his own will and pleasure (as the Targum translates it), against the express ordinance of God.

And ordained a feast unto the children of Israel.] To be observed, I suppose, every year in Beth-el, as the feast of tabernacles was at Jerusalem. And it is likely it lasted as many days; unless he effected to make alterations in every thing, and ordained more, or fewer days, as he thought good.

And he offered upon the altar, and burnt incense.] He presumed to perform the highest part of the priest's office, which was to burn incense. Which he had not done in Dan, as Abarbinel thinks, but only in Beth-el; which was in some regard the metropolis of his kingdom, and head of the tribe of Ephraim; to which place the prophet, mentioned in the next chapter, came, and not to Dan. He observes also that the Scripture saith thrice he offered upon the altar, speaking of different times and places. First it is said, ver. 30. that he offered upon the altar; that is, at Dan, where all Israel went to worship. Secondly, he offered again in Beth-el, in the beginning of this verse. And then it is said here in conclusion, that he ascended the altar in Beth-el, not to offer sacrifice, but to burn incense, which he had not done in Dan. And when he burnt incense on the feast-day he had instituted, the man of God came from Judah, and prophesied against the altar, as it follows in the next chapter.

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, that there came a man of God out of Judah.] That is, a prophet; for none are called men of God, but prophets. And so this man is called below; (ver. 18.) whence Kimchi concludes David was a prophet, because he is called a man of God. And this prophet is thought by the Jews to be Iddo; whose vision against Jeroboam is mentioned 2 Chron. ix. 29. But this is an evident mistake; for Iddo was alive in the days of Ahijah the son of Rehoboam, (2 Chron. xiii. 22.) whereas this prophet here spoken of, was killed immediately after this prophecy. Therefore they were not the same; unless we suppose that what is here related fell out in the latter end of Jeroboam's reign.

Tertullian in his book De Jejunio, cap. 16. calls him Sameas; where Rigaltius observes that Josephus calls him Jadon, and Epiphanius Joam.

By the word of the Lord unto Beth-el.] By a particular command of God.

And Jeroboam stood by the altar to burn incense.] Upon that feast-day which he had instituted. See the last verse of the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 2. And he cried against the altar in the word of the Lord.] Declared it, and the worship there performed, to be idolatrous; which he spake by authority from God.

And said, O altar, altar!] Some think he mentioned the altar twice, to signify that he prophesied against that in Dan, as well as against this in Beth-el.

Thus saith the Lord, Behold, a child shall be born unto the house of David, Josiah by name.] The prophets saw things future, as if they were present. And though this was not to come to pass till above three hundred and sixty years after this time, yet this man of God foretells it, as if it were to be done ere long. And the prediction is the more wonderful, because he tells out of what family he should spring, and what should be his name.

And upon thee shall he offer the priests of the high places that burn incense upon thee, and men's bones shall he burn upon thee.] The meaning is not that he should burn the priests alive; but the execution of this prophecy explains it: that he should slay the priests of the high places, and then burn their bones, as he did the bones of those that had been buried, and thereby defile this altar. (2 Kings xxiii. 15, 16. 20.)

Ver. 3. And he gave a sign the same day.] To confirm this prophecy.

Saying, This is the sign which the Lord hath spoken.] A proof that he spake from God, and not from himself.

Behold, the altar shall be rent, and the ashes that are upon it shall be poured out.] This could not be done, but by the power of God; who hereby demonstrated he had sent this prophet to speak these words; which were presently fulfilled.

Ver. 4. And it came to pass, when Jeroboam heard the saying of the man of God, which had cried against the altar in Beth-el.] In the presence of the king himself, when he was about the solemn service of his gods.

That he put forth his hand from the altar.] Where he stood, (ver. 1.)

Saying, Lay hold on him.] As he himself would have done, had he been near him.

And his hand which he put forth against him, dried up, so that he could not pull it in again to him.] The muscles and sinews shrunk, so that it was stiff and rigid, and he perfectly lost the use of it. Which prodigy was a new token, that the prophet's words would be fulfilled.

Ver. 5. And the altar also was rent, and the ashes poured out from the altar, according to the sign which the man of God had given by the word of the Lord.] Which so amazed all the people, that we do not find any body went about to lay hold on him; but Jeroboam himself was, for the present, astonished at the miraculous power of God.

Ver. 6. And the king answered and said unto the man of God, Entreat now the face of the Lord thy God, and pray for me.] A marvellous change! He that just now threatened, humbly supplicates him that smote him.

That my hand may be restored me again.] He was convinced that healing must come from the same hand that gave the wound; and that it was in vain to seek to his gods.

And the man of God besought the Lord, and the king's hand was restored him again, and became as it was before.]

He did not intend his destruction, but his reformation; and therefore granted his request. Whereby a new miracle was wrought for his conversion.

Ver. 7. And the king said unto the man of God, Come home with me, and refresh thyself, and I will give thee a reward.] A strange insensibility of God's great mercy to him, which did not lead him to repentance, when it moved him to so much gratitude as to desire to reward him that was the instrument of his cure. His hand was restored, but not a good mind.

Ver. 8. And the man of God said to the king, If thou wilt give me half thine house, I will not go in with thee, neither will I eat bread nor drink water in this place.] For he had a charge from God (as it follows) not to communicate with them, who were apostates from their religion.

Ver. 9. For so it was charged me by the Lord, saying.] The same Divine authority, which sent him thither to do what they had heard and seen, gave him this following charge.

Eat not bread, nor drink water, nor turn again by the same way that thou camest.] The reason is plain, why he should not eat or drink with them; because that was to have familiar society with idolaters. But why he should not return the same way that he came, is not so evident. Some think it was to represent, that even the way to Beth-el was abominable; and therefore not to be frequented: or, to shew how much we ought to abhor that which leads to evil. But it seems to be a proverbial speech; signifying that he should be constant and steadfast in executing the charge committed to him. For he that doth any thing without success is said to return by the way that he went, (Isa. xxxvii. 29. 34.) And therefore, not to return by the way that he went, is to do his business effectually.

Ver. 10. And so he went another way, and returned not by the way that he came to Beth-el.] To shew (as many think) how God detests the way to idolatry; and would have it to be forgotten.

Ver. 11. And there was an old prophet.] One who had many years been a prophet before this apostacy; whose name the Jews say was Micah: who was a worshipper of the true God, though he dwelt among this idolatrous people. A great many take him to have been a false prophet: but Theodoret proves that he was a true, though guilty of telling a lie to the man of God. (See Hermannus Witsius's Miscellanea, tom. i. p. 142, &c.)

In Beth-el.] He was originally of Samaria, as we learn from 2 Kings xxiii. 18. But removed hither, it is likely, since this revolution, that he might see what Jeroboam designed.

And his sons came and told him all the works that the man of God had done that day in Beth-el.] In the Hebrew it is, his son came and told him, &c. that is, one of his sons came first, and told all the foregoing passages; and afterward came all the rest of them, and confirmed what he had related.

The words that he had spoken to the king, them they also told their father.] By this it appears they were present when Jeroboam stood at the altar, and therefore joined in that idolatrous worship; though their father did not, and yet was so timorous that he durst not reprove it.

Ver. 12. And their father said unto them, Which way went he? For his sons had seen what way the man of God went that came from Judah.] They had the curiosity to observe what way such a remarkable person went to his own country; imagining, perhaps, their father would have a mind to discourse with him.

Ver. 13. And he said unto his sons, Saddle me the ass. So they saddled him the ass, and he rode thereon.] In the way they directed him.

Ver. 14. And went after the man of God, and found him sitting under an oak.] Weary, I suppose, with a long journey; and faint for want of victuals.

And he said, Art thou the man of God that came from Judah? And he said, I am.

Ver. 15. Then he said unto him, Come home with me, and eat bread.] He had a mind to have a further trial of the truth of what the man of God had said; and so, in a crafty deceitful manner, enticed him back; contrary to his commission.

Ver. 16. And he said, I may not return with thee, nor go in with thee: neither will I eat bread nor drink water with thee in this place.] It seems he was forbidden so much as to go into any of their houses; lest he should be tempted to eat with them.

Ver. 17. For it was said to me by the word of the Lord, Thou shalt eat no bread nor drink water there, nor turn again to go by the way that thou camest.] For which reason he refused to accept of the king's invitation.

Ver. 18. And he said unto him, I am a prophet as thou art.] He pretended, as Abarbinel thinks, that God had revealed the very same to him concerning the altar in Beth-el, that he had threatened.

And an angel spake unto me by the word of the Lord, saying, Bring him back.] And he further pretended that he found him here by the direction of an angel. For he did not tell him that he learned from his sons what had passed; but pretended he had it by prophecy; and that an angel, in the name of God, commanded him to bring him back to his house, and refresh himself there.

To thine house, that he may eat bread and drink water.] He persuaded him, I suppose, that the meaning of God's charge, thou shalt not eat bread, nor drink water in this place, was to be understood of sinners and idolaters, with whom he might not communicate: but he being a prophet, was not to be comprehended in that command. And therefore the angel said, Bring him back to thine house: not to the habitation of any idolater, but to his dwelling-house, which was undefiled. Thus Abarbinel.

But he lied unto him.] All this was a fiction, which God suffered for the trial of the good man; whether he would believe him, or a man he did not know.
